

82176

DO NOT CUT, TEAR OR DEFACE BOOKS OR MAGAZINES.

THE Nation

A LIBERAL WEEKLY DEVOTED TO POLITICS, ECONOMICS, SCIENCE, FOREIGN AFFAIRS, LITERATURE,
DRAMA AND THE ARTS

FOUNDED 1865

82176

VOLUME 152

JANUARY 4, 1941, to JUNE 28, 1941

THE NATION, INC.
55 FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK

INDEX TO VOLUME 152

JANUARY 4, 1941, to JUNE 28, 1941

The following letters are used to indicate the type of article:

A Art
Arc Architecture
C Correspondence
Ct Cartoon
D Drama
E Editorial Article
EP Editorial Paragraph
M Music
MP Moving Pictures
P Poetry
S Signed Article

Book reviews and reviewers are indexed separately in the Book Review Section.

Pages	Pages
1-28 January 4	393-420 April 5
29-56 January 11	421-456 April 12
57-84 January 18	457-484 April 19
85-112 January 25	485-512 April 26
113-140 February 1	513-540 May 3
141-168 February 8	541-568 May 10
169-196 February 15	569-596 May 17
197-224 February 22	597-624 May 24
225-252 March 1	625-652 May 31
253-280 March 8	653-680 June 7
281-308 March 15	681-708 June 14
309-364 March 22	709-736 June 21
365-392 March 29	737-764 June 28

A

A. F. of L. See American federation of labor
Academic freedom
Schappes, M., indicted on perjury charge; EP..... 367
Academy of motion picture arts and sciences; annual awards. A. Bower; S..... 305
Accidents, coal-mining; safeguards demanded; EP..... 311
Acheson, Dean G.
Appointed assistant secretary of state; EP..... 115 Spokesman for the state department against the Gillette-Coffee resolution. I. F. Stone; S..... 687 Aeronautics. See Aviation
Affectionately yours. A. Bower; MP..... 622 African war. See War, African Agar, Herbert
American appeasers; S..... 316; see also C..... 419; C..... 539
Agencies, governmental. See United States
Aglion, Raoul
General Wavell's African campaign; S.. 372
Germans stir anti-British feeling among Moslems; S..... 607; see also EP..... 597
Agriculture
America's underfed are market for our surpluses. T. S. Harding; S..... 209
Dairy farmers protest increase in fluid-milk price classification. R. Hill; C..... 484
Fullmer bill will increase living costs; EP..... 628
Machinery evicts the farmer. D. Kramer; S..... 497
National defense moves the farmer off the land. J. Daniels; S..... 241
Plight of the tenant farmer. J. Daniels; S..... 474
Prices of farm products rising rapidly; E 571
Aguirre Cerda, Pedro. See Chile
Aid to Britain. See United States—
And the war
Air power. See Aviation
Aitken, Webster; performance of Mozart concerto. B. H. Haggin; M..... 306
Albania. See Balkan states
Aliens; attacks on, in Hollywood. A. Bower; S..... 249
German and Italian, arrested here; EP.. 571
Allen, Jay
Jailed by Germans in occupied France; EP..... 366
Allis-Chalmers company. See Strikes
Aluminum
Monopoly responsible for shortage of metal. I. F. Stone; S..... 603; see also EP..... 87; E..... 629
Aluminum company of America
Aggravates drought by refusal to obey the federal power act. J. Daniels; S.. 670 Indicted with German trust on charge of creating magnesium monopoly; EP... 143
Alvarez del Vayo, Julio
Effect of a German victory on Latin America; S..... 342
Franco consults the axis; S..... 202

Replies to his article on the role of the emigrés; C..... 16, 17, 18, 19, 55, 56, 83, 84, 139, 140
Road to Gibraltar, the; S..... 521
Spain receives Italy's bill for cost of aid given insurgents; S..... 258 America. See United States
America first committee. U. Sinclair; C.... 56
Rally at Madison square garden; EP.... 628
American federation of labor
Green, W., claims AFL majority at Ford plant. I. F. Stone; S..... 147; see also EP..... 143
American federation of teachers
Executive council moves to oust communists; E..... 228; see also correction, 255; C, 307; C, 308; C..... 456
Referendum upholds ouster of communist dominated locals; EP..... 711 American labor party, the; and the New York mayoralty election. W. Chazan; S..... 465
American medical association; convicted under Sherman act; EP..... 423 American newspaper guild. See Newspapers
American rescue ship mission; contradictory claims of; EP..... 58
American student union. R. Spivack; S.... 71
American youth congress. R. Spivack; S.... 71
Anderson, Marian; recital. B. H. Haggin; M..... 222
Anderson, Sherwood
Death; EP..... 284
Tribute to. F. Kirchwey; S..... 313
Angell, Norman
On role of political emigrés in America; S..... 17
Western nations should help Russia, the; S..... 744
Anti-semitism. See Jews
Anti-trust laws. See Monopolies
Appeasers, American
America first committee. U. Sinclair; C..... 56
America first rally; EP..... 628
Call for negotiated peace after Greek collapse; E..... 516
Gallery of. H. Agar; S..... 316; see also C, 419; C..... 539
Lindbergh's plan for a "negotiated peace"; E..... 115
Marshall, V., describes W. R. Davis's "peace mission"; EP..... 30 Architecture
TVA. D. Haskell; S..... 592
Argentina
Ban proposed on Argentine beef for United States armed forces; EP..... 422
Fascist foreign minister visits Washington; EP..... 542
Arias, Arnulfo. See Panama
Armaments. See Defense, national Army, United States. See United States—
Army
Arsenic and old lace. J. W. Krutch; D..... 108
Art
Abstract show; Miró, Léger, and Kandinsky. C. Greenberg; A..... 481
American exhibit goes to Latin America, an. P. Rosenfeld; A..... 649
Architecture of the TVA. D. Haskell; S..... 592
Carson, R.; photographs of New York. P. Rosenfeld; A..... 191
Exhibition: El Greco paintings. C. Lazare; A..... 137
Exhibition: 19th century French art. P. Rosenfeld; A..... 250
Exhibition: United States Indian arts. J. Charlot; A..... 165
Mané-Katz, exhibition. P. Rosenfeld; A. 82
Opening of the national gallery. C. Lazare; A..... 588; see also C..... 678
Ascoli, Max
On role of political emigrés in America; S..... 18
Association of catholic trade unionists. See Labor unions
Atkinson, Brooks
Moral issues confronting democracy; S..... 262; see also C, 392; C..... 420
Auden, W. H.
Note on world order, a; S..... 131
Song; P..... 382
Austin, Warren R.
Supports lease-lend bill, but asks for statement of British peace aims; EP.. 197
Austria
Seventh anniversary of Vienna workers' uprising. F. Hoellering; S..... 173
Authors
New world literature, a. I. Novel in Indo-America. L. A. Sanchez; S..... 323

II. Modern poetry of America Hispana. A. Reyes; S..... 376, 411
III. Young writers of America Hispana, the. E. Mallea; S..... 502
IV. Hispano-American's world, the. W. Frank; S..... 615
Aviation
Air power against land power in Balkan debacle; EP..... 542
Knudsen fails to act on Reuther plan for mass plane production. I. F. Stone; S..... 259, 371, 519, 575; see also E.... 602
Plane production lags; EP..... 683
Reuther plan for mass plane production; EP..... 2, 30
Avila Camacho, Manuel. See Mexico.
B Baile, Helen Tufts
Letter on the Descendants of the American revolution; C..... 391; see also C, 223; C..... 308
Balkan states
Albanian campaign reveals breakdown of Italian military morale; EP..... 421
Bulgarian coup may result in Anglo-Greek-Turkish bloc; E..... 256
Bulgarian-Turkish pact. P. Stevens; S. 294; see also E..... 285; EP..... 226
Bulgarian-Turkish resistance to nazi demands; EP..... 57
Campaign endangers nazi oil supplies; EP..... 459
Debacle teaches lesson of air superiority; EP..... 542
Effect of the Yugoslav coup. S. Pribichevich; S..... 399; see also E..... 395
German moves in. F. Kirchwey; S..... 201
German plans for spring campaign. R. H. Markham; S..... 289; see also E. 284
German-Soviet accord on, reported; EP. 29
German tourist season reopens. Low; Ct. 211
German troop concentrations suggest other objectives; EP..... 1
Greek victory opens way for Nazi drive on Egypt; EP..... 513
Military analysis of the Greek campaign. F. Kirchwey; S..... 489
Nazi pressure on Bulgaria. P. Stevens; S. 211
Nazi propaganda techniques in the Balkan campaign. P. Stevens; S..... 747 Relative strength of nazi and British forces in; E..... 424
Russia impedes German conquest of. H. Greenwall; S..... 148; see also EP. 365
Shift in Yugoslavian opinion may result in Balkan anti-axis bloc; EP..... 310
Skopje offensive belies reports of Yugoslav capitulation; EP..... 458
Wait, maybe I don't go. Low; Ct..... 469
Yugoslavia yields to the axis. R. H. Markham; S..... 289; see also E..... 285
See also names of countries.
Ballet theater. B. H. Haggin; M..... 306
Barnett, Robert W.
Japan and the tri-partite alliance; S. 492; see also E..... 488; C..... 539
Barzin, Betty
Vichy government honors H. Bergson; C..... 223; see also C..... 391; C..... 392
Batavia. See Dutch East Indies
Batista, Colonel Fulgencio. See Cuba
Beal, Fred E.
Thanks those working for his freedom; C..... 196; see also C..... 195
Beautiful people, the. J. W. Krutch; D.. 537
Beecham, Sir Thomas. B. H. Haggin; M.. 509
Bendiner, Robert
My sister Eileen; D..... 53
Old acquaintance; D..... 137
Benés, Vojta
On Alvarez del Vayo's proposal for council of the emigration; C..... 139
Bennett, Harry. See Ford motor company.
Bennett, Milly
Letter from T. Wintringham, a; C.... 510
Bergson, Henri
Evaluation, an. I. Edman; S..... 76
Honored by Vichy. B. Barzin; C..... 223 see also C..... 391; C..... 392
Bess, Demaree
"Uncensored" reports from nazi-occupied territory; E..... 62
Bethlehem steel corporation; representation plan provokes strikes; EP..... 395
Strike at Lackawanna plant. J. Wechsler; S..... 269
Bevin, Ernest. See Great Britain
Biddle, Francis, defends the Hobbs bill; EP. 655
Bingham, Colonel Ralph Charles. See Great Britain

- Blackmur, R. P.
Rats, lice, and history; P..... 559
- Blanco, Louise S.
Puerto Rico's new deal; progressives win election; S..... 100
- Blitzstein, Marc
His music for "Valley town." B. H. Haggin; M..... 194
- Block, Harry
From Cárdenas to Avila Camacho; S..... 266
- Blockade. See War, European
- Blood and sand. A. Bower; MP..... 677
- Blum, Leon
Thanks American group for birthday cable. H. Carlisle; C..... 651
- Bonds, tax-exempt. See Tax-exempt bonds
- Books
Classics fight back in France. B. Friedl and I. Ehrenpreis; S..... 671
For Alabama steel workers. W. Crawford; C..... 455
For merchant seamen. H. Howe; C..... 455
For southern workers. R. Hilborn; C..... 196
Continuance of low postal rate urged. M. Marshall; S..... 475
Modern age's low-priced book experiment fails; the case for lower prices. M. Marshall; S..... 755
National association of manufacturers investigates school texts; EP..... 227; see also C..... 280
Novel in Indo-America. L. A. Sánchez; 323
Readers' club formed. M. Marshall; S..... 159
- Borgese, G. A.
On Alvarez del Vayo's proposal for council of the emigration; C..... 83
- Boutell, C. B.
Success of the Lone Ranger radio program; S..... 44
- Bower, Anthony
Annual awards of academy of motion picture arts and sciences; President Roosevelt's speech; S..... 305
Attacks on aliens in Hollywood; S..... 249
Block booking replaced by new system in picture industry; S..... 193
Convention of the theatre owners; S..... 732
Defense and the motion pictures; S..... 390
Dieterle, W., gives a party; S..... 454
Disney's labor troubles; S..... 565, 676
Hearst, W. R., objects to "Citizen Kane"; S..... 192
Hollywood's pan-American campaign; S..... 192
Labor union in the film industry; S..... 249
Latin America hostile to American films on countries; S..... 622
- Reviews of motion pictures:
Affectionately yours..... 622
Blood and sand..... 677
Citizen Kane..... 508
Great lie, the..... 508
Lady Eve, the..... 305
Lady from Cheyenne, the..... 454
Major Barbara..... 565
Man hunt..... 732
Meet John Doe..... 390
Men of boy's town..... 508
Nice girl..... 305
One night in Lisbon..... 622
Out of the fog..... 732
Rage in heaven..... 305
Shining victory..... 677
So ends our night..... 192
Strawberry blonde..... 249
Sunny..... 677
That Hamilton woman..... 390
That night in Rio..... 390
That uncertain feeling..... 454
Tight shoes..... 732
Tobacco road..... 305
Trial of Mary Dugan, the..... 249
Woman's face, a..... 622
Ziegfeld girl..... 508
- Screen extras and the union; S..... 453, 676
Women's clubs threaten boycott of actors supporting Bridges; S..... 565
- Braatoy, Bjarne
On role of political emigrés in America; S..... 17
- Brady, Philip G.
Use of poison gas in warfare, the; S..... 668
- Brand, Marion
Letter on action of national executive committee of Descendants of the American revolution; C..... 308; see also C..... 223; C..... 391
- Brand, Phoebe
Democracy must work; C..... 455
- Breitscheid, Rudolf; delivered to gestapo; EP..... 198
- Bridges, Harry
FBI report on case likely to embarrass Jackson; EP..... 3
Judge Sears to preside at retrial; EP..... 311
Retrial will test communist party membership as ground for deportation; EP..... 199
Women's clubs in Hollywood threaten boycott of actors supporting him. A. Bower; S..... 565
- Britain. See Great Britain
- Broadcasting. See Radio
- Broch, Theodor
Norway's passive resistance to German occupation; S..... 98
- Brophy, John. See Congress of industrial organizations
- Browder, Earl; conviction upheld by the supreme court; EP..... 199
- Bryson, Fred
Letter on "Lord Halifax on a horse" by C. Sandburg; C..... 594; see also..... 499
- Budget, public. See Finance, public
- Buhler, Henry
Letter on defense production; C..... 483; see also 239, 371
- Bulgaria
Determined to resist nazi demands; EP..... 57
Nazi intrigues in; EP..... 29
Nazi invasion looms; EP..... 226
Pressure on, by nazis. P. Stevens; S..... 211
See also Balkan states
- Burke-Wadsworth bill. See Selective service
- Burma
May be next Japanese objective; EP..... 226
Burma road. See Chinese-Japanese war
- Business
And the RFC. K. Hutchison; S..... 584
Annual corporation reports, the. K. MacNeal; S..... 151
Bankers oppose SEC ruling on competitive bidding. K. Hutchison; S..... 472
Big business international obstructs defense; E..... 425
Big business versus big unions. J. Daniels; S..... 697
Canning industry shows huge profits; EP..... 283
Consumer consumption needs redirection, not curtailment. P. Murray; S..... 745 Corporation profits in 1940. K. Hutchison; S..... 379; see also EP..... 170; EP..... 198
Defense contract racket, the. C. La Farge; S..... 407
Economic cooperation with Latin America. L. Corey; S..... 8, 67
Fullmer bill will bring price rises; EP..... 628
Funk, W.; statement on German war finance and currency; EP..... 366
General electric head outlines a new deal program for. K. Hutchison; S..... 184
Germany's new economic order in practice. K. Hutchison; S..... 128, 752
Gillette-Coffee resolution for an investigation of war trade with the axis, the. I. F. Stone; S..... 687; see also E..... 572; C..... 707
Henderson, L., heads new bureau to stabilize price structure; EP..... 457
Hull calls for an end of economic nationalism; EP..... 599
Industrial profits in first quarter of 1941; EP..... 543
Industrialists exert pressure on Knudsen. I. F. Stone; S..... 371
Japanese-American trade. See Japanese-American relations Limiting purchasing power can speed defense production. M. Stewart; S..... 610; see also C..... 763
Nazi victory and American trade, a; EP..... 515
Need for economic reorganization after the war. K. Hutchison; S..... 353
Price rise due to speculation and transportation shortages. K. Hutchison; S..... 640
Pricing policy and mass production. K. Hutchison; S..... 19 Profits, prices, wages. K. Hutchison; S..... 379
Proposed ban on meat and wool imports hits Latin American countries; EP..... 422
Reply to Noyes and Strauss on making America produce. E. King; C..... 56
Report of the temporary national economic committee. I. F. Stone; S..... 315
Rising cost of living stirs labor trouble; E..... 657; see also C..... 763
Signs of inflation in the commodity market; E..... 571
Steel price ceiling and profits; E..... 488
Things to come. Low; Ct..... 354
Removal of moral embargo improves American-Russian trade; E..... 144
See also Monopolies; Trade agreements
- Byrnes, James F., appointed to the supreme court; EP..... 711
- C
C.I.O. See Congress of industrial organizations
- Cairns, Dorion
Corrects statements made in Betty Barzin's letter on Bergson; C..... 391; see also C..... 223
- Camacho, Manuel Avila. See Mexico
- Canada
St. Lawrence waterway will provide cheap power for defence industries; EP..... 367
- Cárdenas, Lazaro. See Mexico
- Caribbean sea. See Latin America
- Carlisle, Helen Grace
Birthday cable from American group to L. Blum; C..... 651
- Carson, Letty Gay
Breaking the Tammany stranglehold; C..... 567; see also 465
- Carson, R. Robin; photographs of New York. P. Rosenfeld; A..... 191
- Censorship. See Italy; Freedom of the press
- Census
Gerrymandered states expected to ignore population increases. R. Neuberger; S..... 127; see also C..... 195
Population shifts in German-controlled Europe. A. Field; S..... 433
- Chamberlain, William Henry
Letter on "Who are the appeasers?" by H. Agar; C..... 539; see also..... 316
- Charlot, Jean
Exhibition: United States Indian arts; A..... 165
- Chasan, Will
Can Tammany come back? S..... 465; see also C..... 567
- Chemicals for war. J. Schulyer; S..... 291
- Chicago milk vendors' case; Justice Frankfurter's decision. I. F. Stone; S..... 203
- Child labor. See Labor
- Children, schools for, in defense centers. J. Daniels; S..... 327
- Chile
New deal faces an election, the. S. G. Inman; S..... 235
- China
Break between Chiang Kai-shek and the Communists; EP..... 310
Clash of fourth route army and Kuomintang troops may bring civil war; EP..... 114
Currie report on internal conditions. I. F. Stone; S..... 400
Problems of the people's political council; the communist situation..... 639
Snow, E., reports internal dissension; E..... 61
- Chinese-Japanese war
Burma road railway to provide relief for China's transportation problem; EP..... 366
Chinese recapture several Japanese-held towns in Kwangtung; EP..... 366
Failure of the Japanese spring offensives; EP..... 654
Japanese offensive strikes China coast; EP..... 514
Internal dissension in China benefits Japan; E..... 61; see also EP..... 310
Japan begins drive to south; EP..... 2
Japan seeks end to disastrous "China incident"; E..... 398; see also EP..... 571
Japanese drive north of Hong Kong threatens China's supply line; EP..... 171
Russian-Japanese agreement may partition China; E..... 146; see also E..... 285
Russo-German war may stop Russian shipments to China; EP..... 738
Shiratori's views on. R. Barnett; S..... 492; see also C..... 539
See also Japanese-American relations
- Christian front
Boston group shows nazi film; EP..... 683; see also 747
Mails franked material under Wheeler's signature; EP..... 683
- Chungking. See China
- Churchill, Winston. See Great Britain
- Citizen Kane. A. Bower; MP..... 508
- Hearst, W. R., objects. A. Bower; S..... 192
- Civil rights
Menaced by new appropriations provisions for FBI; EP..... 486
- Clapp, Martyn C.
Letter on "Lord Halifax on a horse" by Carl Sandburg; C..... 594; see also 499
- Claudia, J. W. Krutch; D..... 221
- Coal; mine workers' new contract proposals include safeguards against accidents; EP..... 311
- Coca cola and the courts. J. Spingarn; S..... 666
- Coffey, John M. See Gillette-Coffee resolution
- Collective bargaining. See National labor relations board
- Collins, Herbert R.
Poll tax corruption; C..... 483
- Commerce. See Business
- Committee on food for the small democracies. See Hoover, H.
- Committee to defend democracy formed. W. Young; C..... 596
- Common Ground; second issue much improved. M. Marshall; S..... 22
- Communism
Encyclopedia editors make changes in article on. M. Nomad; C..... 420
- Communist party
Attacks on. P. Brand; C..... 455
Breaking the Stalinist hold on the Newspaper guild; E..... 742
British, works for Hitler. H. Laski; S..... 176; see also C..... 251
Chilean, opposes Aguirre Cerda. S. G. Inman; S..... 235
Chinese; quarrel with the government. 639

- Issue in the Schappes case; EP..... 367
 Move to oust members of, from American federation of teachers; E.....228; see also correction, 255; C.....307; C.....308; C..... 456
 North American aviation strike; Murray versus the communist bloc. R. Stein; S.....715; see also E..... 684
 Role in west coast strikes brings anti-labor legislation proposals. F. Kirchwey; S..... 713
 Supreme court to decide if affiliation is cause for deportation; EP.....87, 199, 311 Union teachers vote expulsion of communist-dominated locals; EP..... 711
- Congress
 Misuse of franking privilege by isolationists; EP..... 683
 President's message to. F. Kirchwey; S..... 34
 Tasks before; E..... 3
 Congress of industrial organizations
 Brophy, J., states union policy on the war; EP..... 599
 Conference of, with British labor proposed, to speed aid to Britain; EP... 366
 Murray faces the communist bloc as an aftermath of the Inglewood strike; R. Stein; S.....715; see also E..... 684
 Murray opposes mediation board to handle strikes in defense industries; EP.... 283
 Murray plan for improved industrial output, the. R. Stein..... 526
 Plan for coordinating steel industry; E. 145
- Conrad, Sherman
 Humphrey-Weidman company inaugurates dance repertory; S..... 109
 Conscientious objectors. See Selective service
 Conscription. See Selective service
 Consumer consumption; needs redirection, not curtailment. P. Murray; S..... 745 Contracts, defense. See Defense, national
 Convoy out of London. M. B.; S..... 664
 Convoys. See United States—And the war
 Corey, Lewis
 Are empires all alike? S..... 661
 Choice for the Americas; S.....8, 67
- Corporations
 Annual financial statements. K. MacNeal; S..... 151
 Control American economy. I. F. Stone; S..... 315 Show increased profits in 1940. K. Hutchison; S...379; see also EP...170, 198
- Cot, Pierre
 On role of political emigrés in America; S..... 16
- Coudert, Frederic R. Jr. See Rapp-Coudert committee
 Coughlin, Charles E. See Appeasers Counts, George S.
 Labor's stake in a British victory; S.. 360
- Crawford, W. H.
 Books for Alabama steel workers; C... 455
 Crazy with the heat. J. W. Krutch; D... 136
 Cream in the well, the. J. W. Krutch; D... 136
 Crete. B. R. Redman; P..... 724
 See also War, European
- Croatia. See Italy
 Croce, Benedetto
 Liberty and action; S..... 467
- Crosswaith, Frank R.
 Letter on J. Daniels' "Defense problem number 1"; C.....594; see also... 501 Strikes in defense industries; C..... 252
- Cuba
 Batista acts to crush "revolt"; EP.... 171
 Cudahy, John, interviews Hitler; EP..... 682
 Culture and liberty. H. Read; S..... 437
 Currie, Lauchlin. See United States—and China
- D
 Dabney, Virginius
 Changes opinion on O. Waller case; C.....168; see also C..... 223
 Daily Worker, British, suppressed; EP.... 113
 Dakar. See War, African Dalton, Hugh. See Great Britain
 Dance
 Ballet theater. B. H. Haggin; S..... 306
 Humphrey-Weidman company inaugurates dance repertory. S. Conrad; S. 109
- Daniels, Jonathan
 America must conquer its fear; S..... 271
 Beal, F., article on, criticized. A. Konikow; C.....195; see also C..... 196
 Big business versus big unions; S..... 697
 Connecticut, Georgia of the north; S.. 410
 Death of negro soldier held from public; S..... 642
 Defense moves the farmer off the land; S..... 294
 Defense problem number 1; S.....501; see also C..... 594
 Dictators and poll taxes; S..... 213
 Discrimination against Negroes in the national defense program; S.....158, 614; see also EP.....87; C..... 594
- Dollar-a-year men in defense; S.....47, 298
 Draft rejections for physical defects; S..... 531
 Drought, defense, and Alcoa; S..... 670
 Housing in national defense centers; S.....186, 547
 Morality in defense camp areas; S..... 586
 Multiplicity of war charities; S..... 436
 Need for education of trade union members; S..... 102
 Northern draftees and southern belles; S..... 381
 Plight of the tenant farmer; S..... 474
 Press relations in national defense centers; S.....21, 75, 130, 642
 Schools for children in defense centers; S..... 327
 Smearing of United States, 1, the; S.. 725
 Soldiers need fun; S..... 754
- Darlan, Admiral Jean. See France
 Davis, William Rhodes
 "Peace mission" to Germany in 1939; EP..... 30
 Decision. M. Marshall; S..... 272
- Defense, national
 Adjusting American production for national emergency. F. Sternberg; S.. 552
 Aid to migratory workers urged; EP.....284, 423
 Airplane production lags; EP..... 683
 Allocation for, in 1941 budget; E..... 60
 Aluminum shortage, the. I. F. Stone; S.....603; see also EP...87; E..... 629
 And economic cooperation with Latin America. L. Corey; S.....8, 67
 And Negroes
 Attitude of. M. Lochard; S..... 14
 Discrimination against. J. Daniels; S.....158, 614; see also EP...87; C..... 594
 And sports. C. Riess; S..... 237
 And the chemical industry. J. Schuyler; S..... 291
 And the motion pictures. A. Bower; S.. 390
 And United States policy in the Caribbean. W. A. Roberts; S..... 428
 And WPA. F. Rhylick; S..... 155
 Bill to draft private property; EP.... 683
 CIO plan for coordinating steel industry; E..... 145
 Community pools will tap unused reserves of machinery and men. I. F. Stone; S..... 575
 Conscription. See Selective service
 Contracts
 Canners unsuccessful in obtaining suspension of over-time provisions; EP 283
 Congress should investigate the Ford contract; E..... 88
 Ford fails to meet specifications; EP.. 3
 Ford violates labor laws; EP..... 30
 New field of racketeering, a. C. LaFarge; S..... 407
 Wall Street Journal charges squeeze-play forced rejection of Ford bid; EP..... 171
 War department rejects Ford bid. I. F. Stone; S..... 147
 Corporation profits from. K. Hutchison; S.....379; see also EP...170; EP.....198; EP..... 543 Dollar-a-year men in defense. J. Daniels; S.....47, 298
 Drive for longer work-week in defense industries; EP..... 58
 Drought, defense, and Alcoa. J. Daniels; S..... 670
 Excess profits tax. See Excess profits tax Government concessions to the oil monopoly. I. F. Stone; S..... 491
 Henderson, L., heads new price-stabilization bureau; EP..... 457
 Housing
 Additional appropriation needed; Palmer seeks to interest private enterprise; EP..... 170
 CIO plan to end shortage; E..... 117
 In defense centers. J. Daniels; S.....186, 547
 Palmer, C. F., new defense housing coordinator; E.....117; see also EP..... 283
 Pomeroy, H., asked to resign from housing commission; EP.....283; see also E..... 117
 Unsatisfactory bill reaches senate; E. 370
 How to meet defense expenditures. M. Stewart; S.....178, 610; see also C.....456; C..... 763
 Ickes, H. L., named coordinator of the oil industry. I. F. Stone; S..... 659
 Increase in rolling stock. K. Hutchison; S..... 695
 Knudsen and Hillman split on major problems. I. F. Stone; S..... 259
 Knudsen fails to act on Reuther plan. I. F. Stone; S.....259, 371, 519; see also C.....483; E..... 602
 Knudsen should resign from the OPM. I. F. Stone; S.....519, 550, 575; see also EP...515; correction, 568; EP..... 655; C..... 707
- La Follette report on "little steel" strike warns against bottleneck today"; EP. 394 Machine-tool shortage. I. F. Stone; S.....550, 575; see also E..... 545
 Magnesium monopoly of Aluminum company of America causes bottle-neck; EP..... 143
 Missouri proposes model anti-sabotage bill; EP..... 226
 Mobilizing science for defense research. I. F. Stone; S..... 7
 Moves the farmer off the land. J. Daniels; S..... 241
 Murray plan for industry councils. R. Stein; S..... 526
 National defense advisory commission becomes office for production management. I. Stone; S..... 63
 National mediation board. See Strikes
 Navy department charges Walsh-Healy act impedes; EP..... 87
 New defense bonds, the. K. Hutchison; S.....529; see also EP...543
 New tax proposals for financing costs; E.....517; see also EP...571; E..... 741
 Obstructions created by big business international; E..... 425
 Officials split on methods of meeting defense industry shortages. I. F. Stone; S..... 259
 President's message to congress. F. Kirchwey; S..... 34
 President's "unlimited emergency" speech, the. I. F. Stone; S..... 659
 Press relations in national defense centers. J. Daniels; S.....21, 75, 130, 642
 Problem of the southern states. J. Daniels; S.....501; see also C..... 594
 Recent defense expenditures; E..... 311
 Requires redirection of consumer consumption, not curtailment. P. Murray; S..... 745
 Reuther plan for mass plane production; EP.....2, 30
 Roosevelt urged to investigate productive capacity; E..... 602
 Saint Lawrence waterway, the. B. Putney; S...577; see also EP...367; E. 712
 Schools for children in defense centers. J. Daniels; S..... 327
 Selective service. See Selective service
 Shipping shortage and idle shipyards, the. I. F. Stone; S..... 631
 Shortage in strategic metals; EP..... 255
 Shortage of electric power impedes defense industries; EP..... 655
 Steel needs. K. Hutchison; S.....239; see also EP...255; C.....483; EP...515; EP...545; E.....629; EP..... 654
 Steel price ceiling fixed for the emergency; E..... 488
 Strikes. See Strikes
 Tasks before congress; E..... 3
 United States takes Greenland as defense base. J. Joesten; S..... 471
 War and industrial mobilization. H. Roth; Ct..... 552
 See also United States—And the war
- Dekanozov, V. G. See Union of soviet socialist republics Dekker, H. C.
 Comment on B. Atkinson's "The decision is simple"; C.....420; see also... 262
 De Lacy, Hugh
 Urges protest on Hobbs bill; C..... 540
- Democracy
 American, future of. Letters by F. Schuman, L. Dennis, and M. Lerner; C.....36; see also C.....111; C.....167; C..... 455
 And centralization of power. J. Daniels; S..... 697
 And imperialism. A. Viton; S..... 345
 And the war
 Moral implication of a nazi defeat. R. Niebuhr; S..... 357
 Lincoln's views on, misstated by M. Hart. P. Stern; C..... 280
 Moral issues which must be faced. B. Atkinson; S...262; see also C...392; C..... 420 Preservation of. A. Kolnai; S.....636; see also C..... 736
 Safeguarding civil liberties. P. Brand; C..... 455
 Totalitarian dictatorship assures continuance. W. Steele; C..... 455
- Democratic party
 Can Tammany come back? W. Chazan; S.....465; see also C..... 567
- Denmark
 German control of Danish business. K. Hutchison; S..... 752
 Greenland taken over by America as base. J. Joesten; S..... 471
- Dennis, Lawrence
 Native appeaser. H. Agar; S..... 316
 On the future of American democracy; C...36; see also C...111; C...167; C..... 455

- Deportation
Bridges retrial to decide whether communist party membership is cause for; EP 199, 311
Case against J. Valtin, the; EP 543
Strecker retrial to test past membership in communist party as grounds for; EP 87
Descendants of the American revolution; several members resign; C 223; see also C 308; C 391
Diamond, Norman H.
Palestine's army; C 419; see also C 651
Diehl, John
Reply to R. Spivack's article on new trends in youth movement; C 168; see also 71
Dilliard, Irving
Missouri has no governor; S 183
Diplomatic appointments; EP 86
Disney, Walt. See Moving pictures
Doctor's dilemma, the. J. W. Krutch; D 331
Dodd, William E.
Notes from his diary. F. Kirchwey; S 118
Dolivet, Louis
Underground in France; S 554
Donnell, Forest C.; election to governorship of Missouri contested. I. Dilliard; S 183
Dorau, Herbert
SEC hearings reveal subsidies to him from public utilities; EP 115
Douglas, Justice William O.
Opinion in Express publishing company case; EP 283
Dow chemical company. See Aluminum company of America Draft, the. See Selective service
Drama. See Krutch, J. W., Bendiner, R., and Marshall, M. (for reviews)
Duff, Charles
British countryside reaction to the war; S 404
Dunn, Gano; report on steel capacity. K. Hutchison; S 239; see also EP 255; EP 515; E 545; EP 654
Dutch East Indies, and Japan; E 200
Batavia rejects Japanese demands; EP 711
German attempt to seize Java. G. Pepper; S 295
- E
East, near. See War, European; names of countries
Economy for a new world. K. Hutchison; S 353
Eden, Anthony. See Great Britain
Edman, Irwin
Henri Bergson, an evaluation; S 76
Education
Drastic cuts in state appropriation for New York schools; EP 423
Labor education service organizes new teaching service for workers. T. Sender; C 140
New school of social research receives permanent charter; EP 486
Schools for children in defense centers. J. Daniels; S 327
School textbooks and the National association of manufacturers; EP 227; see also C 280
Tribute to H. Rugg. R. Meyer; C 541
Edwards, R. L.
Comment on "The coming labor crisis"; C 763; see also E 657
Egypt. See War, African
Ehrenpreis, Irvin and B. Friedl
Classics fight back in France, the; S 671
Eight o'clock Tuesday. J. W. Krutch; D 81
Eire. See Ireland
Eldridge, C. Dewitt
Letter on Carl Sandburg's "Lord Halifax on a horse"; C 568; see also 499 Electric bond and share case. See Securities and exchange commission
Emigrés. See Refugees
England. See Great Britain
Ethiopia. See War, African European war. See War, European Everybody's business; articles by K. Hutchison, 19, 73, 128, 184, 239, 296, 379, 472, 529, 584, 640, 695, 752
Excess profits tax
Corporations show profits despite taxes. K. Hutchison; S 379; see also EP 170; EP 543
Express publishing company case, decision in; EP 283
- F
FBI. See Federal bureau of investigation
FCC. See Federal communications commission
Fahy, Agnes. See Newspapers—American newspaper guild
Fantasia; use of music in. B. Haggin; M 53, 566
Farber, Martin M.
On Alvarez del Vayo's proposal for council of the emigration; C 55
Farm relief. See Agriculture
Farming. See Agriculture
Fascism and nazism
And imperialism. A. Viton; S 345
Austrian workers fought first battle against. F. Hoellering; S 173
Christian front shows nazi film; EP 683
Destructive character of. L. Corey; S 661
Fate or freedom? A. Kolnai; S 636; see also C 736
Financial mission of Dr. K. Rieth, the; EP 628
Future of American democracy. Letters by F. Schuman, L. Dennis, and M. Lerner; C 36; see also C 111; C 167; C 455
German consular and propaganda offices in U. S. ordered closed; axis assets frozen; EP 710
Growth of American, in 1940 45
Lapica, R., calls Nation's exposure of Ukrainian nationalists inaccurate; C 83
See also Appeasers
Fear, America's enemy. J. Daniels; S 271
Federal bureau of investigation
Appropriations bill proposes virtual political police duties; EP 486
Investigates Nation subscribers in government posts; EP 656
Report on Bridges likely to embarrass Jackson; EP 3
Seeks wire-tapping bill; EP 227; see also E 257
Federal communications commission
Acts to curb monopolistic practices of NBC and CBS; E 544
Rulings being fought by the big chains. D. Saunders; S 634
Federal reserve system; new program of monetary control to prevent inflation; E 31
Federal trade commission
Report shows huge profits for canning industry; EP 283
Federal union
Analysis of proposals. K. Hutchison; S 355
And the republican party; EP 198
Views of Benjamin Franklin on. W. Taylor; C 652
Field, Anthony
Population shifts in German controlled Europe; S 433
Field, Dorothy M.
American summer school in Chile; C 512
Fifth column; proposal to combat by advertising. C. Holway; C 55
Fighting chance for a sick society. R. Niebuhr; S 357
Films. See Moving pictures; Bower, A. (for reviews)
Finance, public
Budget for 1941; E 60
How to meet defense expenditures. M. Stewart; S 178, 610; see also C 456; C 763
New defense bonds, the. K. Hutchison; S 529; see also EP 543; C 763
Proposal for monetary control to forestall inflation; E 31
Tax proposals for financing defense; E 517; see also EP 571; E 741
Treasury proposes to abolish tax-exempt bonds. K. Hutchison; S 73
See also Excess profits tax
Finerty, John F.
Replies to V. Dabney on O. Waller case; C 223; see also C 168
Finland
Hitler's game. J. Joesten; S 716
Fischer, Louis
Case of the Spanish jewels, the; S 459
Hitler marches east; S 743
Moral embargo on Russia, the; S 146; see also E 144
Stalin gets a new job; S 573
Fitzgerald, F. Scott
Death. M. Marshall; S 159
Flight to the west. M. Marshall; D 53
Food; relation between diet and income; EP 628
Food for Europe
American food shipments to France aid Germany; E 397
American shipments fail to neutralize France and Spain. F. Kirchwey; S 600
Britain rejects Hoover plan for feeding Belgium; EP 281
Flour shipment to France may serve as wedge against blockade; EP 365
Hoover's plan for feeding occupied areas; EP 199
Refugees and American food shipments; E 461
Vichy seeks American wheat; E 312
Vichy threatens use of French navy to convoy foodships; EP 282 stamp plan; should be extended. T. S. Harding; S 209
Ford, Henry. See Appeasers
Ford motor company
Bennett, H., assails the victory of the CIO union; EP 629
CIO strike at the River Rouge plant. J. Wechsler; S 426; see also C 707
Congress should investigate Ford defense contract; E 88
Defense contract violates labor laws; EP 30
Fails to meet specifications on defense contracts; EP 3
Green, W., claims AFL majority. I. F. Stone; S 147; see also EP 143
NLRB hearing on union's election petition. I. F. Stone; S 427
Signs a union contract with the automobile workers' union; EP 739
Union victory at River Rouge plant; E 460
Wall Street Journal charges squeeze play forced rejection of truck bid; EP 171
War department rejects defense contract bid. I. F. Stone; S 147 Four saints in three acts. B. H. Haggin; M 706
- France
Allen, J., jailed by Germans in occupied territory; EP 366
And Japan. See Indo-China
Can Vichy hold Syria? P. Stevens; S 688; see also EP 597; EP 681
Ciel! Can't you see by the flag we're French? Low; C 663
Classics grow in popularity, the. B. Friedl and I. Ehrenpreis; S 671
Darlan appeals to French people to support Vichy; EP 709
German participation in French business. K. Hutchison; S 752
Gestapo at work in the. C. a Prato; S 720; see also EP 739
Laval and Pétain reconciled; EP 86
Life in nazi-occupied Paris 64
Nazi treatment of French colonial prisoners of war in internment camps. H. Habe; S 232; see also C 419
Nazis press for reinstatement of Laval at Vichy; EP 486
Nazis use Laval to force Vichy's collaboration with Hitler; EP 142
Nazis tighten screws for complete collaboration in war effort; EP 514
Paris demonstrates in favor of de Gaulle 64
Peace-seeker's progress, the. Low; C 65
People resist Vichy propaganda against Britain; E 656
Poem from, a. J. O'Brien; S 587
Prominent German social democrats delivered to Gestapo; EP 198
Receives food and propaganda from Germany; EP 310
Refugees in forced labor battalions. H. Pol; S 527
Spanish refugees in France. See Spain—Refugees
Terms of the Franco-German agreement; EP 627; see also EP 739
Threatens use of navy to break British blockade; EP 282
Tremendous payments to Germany may lead to financial breakdown; EP 394 Underground opposition, the. L. Dolivet; S 554
Vichy honors H. Bergson. B. Barzin; C 223; see also C 391; C 392
Vichy seeks excuse for active collaboration with Germany; E 312
War with Britain? EP 681
Weygand opposes Franco-German peace; Laval is Germany's pawn 64
Winnipeg, with Germans aboard, seized by British; EP 682
See also Food for Europe; Franco-American relations
Francis, H. C.
Letter on criticism of the OPM; C 707; see also 519, 550, 575
Franco, General Francisco. See Spain
Franco-American relations
Aid for the people of France. F. Kirchwey; S 625
Danger to America shown in presence of German agents on seized Winnipeg; EP 682
France must be regarded as a German possession. F. Kirchwey; S 600
State department snubs Vichy's ambassador, the. I. F. Stone; S 687
Vichy-Berlin agreement raises questions about French western hemisphere islands; EP 599
See also Food for Europe
Frank, Waldo
Hispano-American's world, the; S 615
Frankfurter, Justice Felix
Hutchison case, opinion in. I. F. Stone; S 175
Upholds injunction in Chicago milk vendors' case. I. F. Stone; S 203
Franklin, Benjamin; views on federal union. W. H. Taylor; C 652
Freedom, academic. See Academic freedom
Freedom of the press
British Daily Worker suppressed; EP 113
Press relations in national defense centers. J. Daniels; S 21, 76, 130, 642

- Validity of "uncensored" reports from nazi-occupied territory; E..... 62
- French 19th century art; exhibit. P. Rosenfeld; A..... 250
- Friedl, Berthold C. and I. Ehrenpreis
Classics fight back in France, the; S.... 671
- Fullmer bill, for aid to farmer, will raise living costs; EP..... 628
- Funk, Walter. See Germany
- G
- Gallup polls on the war issues; E..... 516
- Gaulle, General Charles de. See France;
- War, African
- General motors corporation; profits and defense. I. F. Stone; S.....519, 575;
see also correction..... 568
- Geopolitics, east and west. P. Stevens; S. 747
- Germany
- Art sports. C. Riess; S..... 237
- Art standards today. H. Read; S..... 437
- Assesses conquered countries for costs of occupation troops; EP..... 394
- Attitude toward colored colonial peoples.
H. Habe; S.....232; see also C..... 419
- Commercial treaty with Russia; EP... 57
- Crime marches on. Low; Ct..... 749
- Customer is always right, the. H. Roth;
Ct..... 752
- Economic exploitation of conquered countries. K. Hutchison; S.....128, 752
- Funk reports on war finance and currency; EP..... 366
- Hess—Hitler's alter ego. W. L. Shirer;
S.....604; see also EP.....569; EP... 598
- Hess's flight to Britain. J. Joesten; S. 606
- Hitler declares war now in final stage;
EP..... 225
- Hitler loses Greenland. J. Joesten; S... 471
- Hitler reports to the Reichstag on the war; EP..... 542
- Hitler ridicules idea of nazi threat to America; EP..... 682
- How fascist imperialism works. A.
Viton; S..... 345
- Letter from a German in an occupied country. R. M. W. Kempner C..... 391
- Moral arguments of nazism. A. Kolnai;
S..... 636
- Nazi plan for a "new order" in Europe.
K. Heiden; S..... 334
- New order, the. A. Guiterman; P..... 236
- "New order", the; quotations from German leaders334, 335, 336, 343, 346, 348, 357
- Pact with Yugoslavia may prove Pyrrhic victory; E..... 368
- Passive resistance of Scandinavia and Low Countries harasses nazis; EP... 254
- Plays Moscow against London. I. F.
Stone; S..... 659
- Preparations for invasion of Britain.
S. Possony; S.....94; see also Ct... 97
- Problem of oil supplies. K. Hutchison;
S.....296; see also EP..... 459
- Propaganda techniques in the Near East and Asia. P. Stevens; S..... 747
- Punishes inhabitants of Lofoten Islands for recent British raid; EP..... 282
- Räder, Admiral R., warns against American patrol system; EP..... 627
- Relations with Japan; E..... 285
- Responsible for Iron guard terror in Rumania; E..... 116
- Russo-German war. See Russo-German war
- Shifts whole populations to work for war machine. A. Field; S..... 433
- Spurs Vichy protests against British blockade to gain France as axis ally;
EP..... 282
- Utilizes influence of Spain in Latin America. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S.... 342
- War strategy: 1914 and 1941. A. Vagts;
S..... 581
- Why Hitler hesitates to attack Britain.
F. Kirchwey; S..... 174
- See also War, African; War, European; Balkan states
- Gibraltar. See War, European
- Giddings, John, conducts Berlioz requiem.
B. H. Haggin; M..... 649
- Gillette-Coffee resolution for an invest-tion of war trade with the axis, the.
I. F. Stone; S.....687; see also E.....572; C..... 707
- Gillis, James M.
Replies to H. Agar's article on appeas-ers; C.....419; see also..... 316
- Gittelsohn, Roland B.
Letter on B. Atkinson's "The decision is simple"; C.....392; see also..... 262
- Goll, Ivan
Elegy for James Joyce; P..... 133
- John landless at the final port; P..... 23
- Governmental agencies. See United States
- Graziani, General. See Italy; War, African
- Great Britain
- Anti-semitism in exile. W. Zukerman;
S.....579; see also C. 652; C. 708; EP... 710
- Change in policy toward Spain imperative. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S..... 521
- Churchill appeals to Italian people; EP... 2
- Churchill reports on the state of the nation; EP..... 169
- Civilian defense corps formed. P.
Strauss; S..... 207
- Colonel Bingham reprimanded for article on "school tie" in army; EP..... 114
- Communist-inspired people's convention helps Hitler. H. Laski; S.....176;
see also C..... 251
- Conscripts labor; EP..... 113
- Convoy out of London. M.B.; S..... 664
- Daily Worker and The Week suppressed; EP..... 113
- Eden, A., states war aims. F. Kirchwey; S.....686; see also C..... 734
- Figures on losses at sea. D. Mitchell;
S.....401; see also E, 369; EP, 422;
E, 459; EP..... 570
- Halifax and H. Dalton query American-Soviet relations. I. F. Stone;
S.....147; see also C..... 251
- Imperialism in the colonies. A. Viton;
S..... 345
- Is invasion possible? S. Possony; S... 94
- Labor's gains under E. Bevin, minister of labor. A. Hardy; S..... 260
- Labor party convention. F. Kirchwey;
S..... 686
- Letter on the London air-raids. M.
Harris; C..... 678
- Morale of captured nazi airmen. A.
Michie; S..... 349
- Must prepare way for a European revolution. H. Laski; S..... 458
- New budget; EP..... 458
- People's convention meets; H. Pollitt's role; E..... 62
- Prepares against poison gas. P. Brady;
S..... 668
- Quotations from public statements of
E. Bevin..... 351
- Reaction of the British countryside to the war, the. C. Duff; S..... 404
- Rejects Hoover plan for feeding Belgium; EP..... 281
- Rich pass through the eye of a needle,
the. Low; Ct..... 406
- Tory politics in war time. A. B. Lewis;
C..... 251
- War aims. M. Bennett; C..... 510
- See also Balkan states; Russo-German war. War, African; War, European
- Great lie, the. A. Bower; MP..... 508
- Greco, el; exhibition of paintings. C. Lazare;
A..... 137
- Greece
- Conquest of, opens way for nazi drive on Egypt; EP..... 513
- No sign of surrender to axis; E.....256, 284
- See also Balkan states
- Green, William. See American federation of labor
- Greenberg, Clement
Work of the abstract painters shown;
A..... 481
- Greenland
United States takes over, as base. J.
Joesten; S..... 471
- Greenwall, Harry J.
Axis collaboration in the Mediterranean;
S..... 148
- Guild, June Purcell
Letter on Nation editorial about seizure of axis ships; C.....483; see also EP... 394
- Guild, newspaper. See Newspapers
- Guiterman, Arthur
New order, the; P..... 236
- H
- H.R. 1776. See United States—Lend-lease bill
- Habe, Hans
Nazi plan for negroes; S.....232; see also
C..... 419
- Hagen, Paul
On role of political emigrés in America;
S..... 17
- Haggin, B. H.
Articles on music:
Aitken, Webster..... 306
- Anderson, Marian; recital..... 222
- Ballet theatre..... 306
- Beecham, Sir Thomas..... 509
- Blitzstein, Marc; music for "Valley town"..... 194
- Four saints in three acts..... 706
- Giddings, John, conducts Berlioz requiem; M..... 649
- Individual differences in interpretation of music..... 166
- Kipnis recital..... 222
- Lehmann, Lotte; recital..... 222
- Metropolitan opera productions..... 222
- Mitropoulos..... 166
- Museum of modern art concerts.649, 706
- New friends of music concerts..... 222
- Stiedry conducts the new friends of music orchestra.....332, 509
- Sziget, Joseph..... 82
- Use of in Fantasia..... 53, 566
- Music, recorded; S.....28, 82, 110, 138,
222, 247, 278, 332, 389, 418, 483,
509, 538, 593, 624, 649, 677, 706, 732,
762
- Halifax, Lord, on a horse. C. Sandburg;
S.....499; see also C. 568; C. 594
- Reply to the critics of. A. Lewis; C.... 251
- See also Great Britain
- Hamlin, Talbot
Comment on "How to invade Europe" by F. Kirchwey; C.....734; see also.. 625
- Happy days, the. J. W. Krutch; D..... 648
- Harding, T. Swann
America's food problem; S..... 209
- Hardy, A.
"Big boss" Bevin; S..... 260
- Harris, Muriel
Letter on the London air-raids; C..... 678
- Harrison, Charles Yale
Leviton strike, the; C..... 734
- Harrison, Pat, dies; EP..... 739
- Haskell, Douglas
Architecture of the TVA; Arc..... 592
- Hayes, Raphael
Faust before the mirror; P..... 48
- Hearst, William Randolph
Objects to "Citizen Kane." A. Brower;
S..... 192
- Heiden, Konrad
Europe under the "master race"; S.... 334
- On role of political emigrés in America;
S..... 19
- Heinz case; decision of supreme court; EP.. 58
- Henderson, Leon. See Defense, national
- Hendley, Charles J.
Reply to editorial on American federation of teachers; C.....307;
see also.....228; correction..... 255
- Hess, Rudolf. See Germany
- High, Stanley
Liberals and the war; S.....691;
see also C..... 764
- Hilborn, Rita S.
Books for southern workers; C..... 196
- Hilferding, Rudolf; delivered to the gestapo;
EP..... 198
- Hill, Ruth E.
Dairy farmers protest increase in fluid-milk price classification; C..... 484
- Management deserves censure in strikes;
C..... 510
- Hillman, Sidney
Role in new office for production management. I. Stone; S..... 63
- See also Defense, national
- Hispano-American literature. See Literature, new world, a
- Hitler, Adolf. See Germany
- Hobbs bills; Committee for protection of foreign born urges protest. H. De Lacy; C..... 540
- Defended by Solicitor general Francis Biddle; EP..... 655
- Hoellering, Franz
On role of political emigrés in America; S..... 18
- Seventh anniversary of Austrian workers' uprising; S..... 173
- Holland. See Netherlands
- Hollywood. See Moving pictures
- Holman, William S., criticizes A. Bower's article on screen extras. A. Bower;
S.....676; see also..... 453
- Holmes, John Haynes
Aid for H. T. Tsiang; C..... 708
- Holway, C. P.
Proposes American advertising campaign to combat fifth column; C..... 55
- Hoover, Herbert
Britain rejects his food plan for Belgium; EP..... 281
- Native appeaser. H. Agar; S..... 316
- Proposes plan for feeding Belgium; EP... 199
- Hoover, J. Edgar
Report on Bridges likely to embarrass Jackson; Hoover's "card index"; EP... 3
- Horabin, J. F.
Letter to the league of American writers; EP..... 684
- Hospital workers
Need "baby Wagner act". F. Louis; C. 224
- Housing
Additional appropriation needed in defense centers; Palmer seeks aid of private enterprise; EP..... 170
- And defense. J. Daniels; S.....186, 547
- CIO plan to end shortage, in defense centers; E..... 117
- Economics of. C. Willson; C..... 167
- Living conditions of negroes in Connecticut. J. Daniels; S..... 410
- Palmer, C. F., new defense housing coordinator; E.....117; see also EP.... 283

- Pomeroy, H., asked to resign from defense housing commission; EP...283; see also E..... 117
- Unsatisfactory defense-housing bill reaches senate; E..... 370
- Howe, Herbert L.
Books for the merchant seaman; C.... 455
- Howell, Frank T.
Public whipping; C..... 252
- Hughes, Charles Evans, retires from the supreme court; E..... 685
- Hull, Cordell. See United States—And the war
- Humphrey-Weidman dance repertory. S. Conrad; S..... 109
- Humphries, Rolfe
Man on the Isle of palms, a; P..... 533
- Hunter, Howard
Acting WPA administrator estimates needs for coming year. F. Rhylick; S 155
- Hutcheson case decision limits anti-trust actions against labor. I. F. Stone; S. 175
- Hutchins, Robert M.
Native appeaser. H. Agar; S..... 316
Views on the war. S. High; S..... 691
- Hutchison, Keith
Bankers oppose SEC ruling on competitive bidding; S..... 472
Economy for a new world; S..... 353
General electric head maps a new deal program for business; S..... 184
German economy exploits conquered nations; S.....128, 752
New defense bonds, the; S..... 529
Oil for the axis; S..... 296
Pricing policy and mass production; S. 19
Profits, prices, wages; S..... 379
Proposed abolition of tax-exempt bonds; S..... 73
Railroads miss the train; S..... 695
Record of the RFC; S..... 584
Salients on the price front; S..... 640
Steel capacity; S.....239; see also C. 483; EP...255; EP...515; E...629; EP..... 654
- I
- Imperialism
British and German. L. Corey; S..... 661
Old and new. A. Viton; S..... 345
- In the wind, 20, 46, 74, 101, 129, 157, 185, 212, 240, 270, 297, 326, 380, 409, 435, 473, 500, 530, 558, 585, 613, 641, 669, 696, 724, 753
- India
And the war. J. Nehru; S..... 121
Indian people's struggle for freedom, the. E. Karawina-Hsiao; C..... 596
Russia's threat to. W. Lucas; S..... 632
- Indian, American, arts: exhibition. J. Charlot; A..... 165
- Indo-China
Border fighting between Thailand and French Indo-Chinese forces; EP..... 58
French reported to have yielded bases to Japan; EP..... 142
Japanese demand on Vichy for naval bases in; EP..... 114
Japanese entrenched in bases near Singapore; EP..... 254
Japan presses Vichy for concessions; EP 226
- Industry. See Business
- Inflation. See Business
- Inman, Samuel Guy
Chile's new deal faces an election; S. 235
- Institute of international education
Summer school in Chile. D. Field; C 512
- Insurance, life
Abuses scored by temporary national economic committee; E..... 286
Final TNEC report and recommendations. I. F. Stone; S..... 463
- Iraq
British victory in; EP..... 653
Nazi-spurred clash is serious British problem; EP..... 541
- Ireland
Can it remain neutral? E..... 88
Defense of. Low; Ct..... 40
Significance of German bombings; EP... 30
- Italian consulate orders sabotage of Italian ships in American waters; EP..... 394
- Italy
Albanian campaign reveals breakdown of military morale; EP..... 421
Bills Franco for aid given to insurgents. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S..... 258
Collapse of the East African empire; EP...141; see also EP...253; EP. 598
Face at the window. Low; Ct..... 126
Mediterranean outlook. Low; Ct..... 150
Movement of American newspapermen and diplomats rigidly controlled; EP 198
Mussolini praises nazi aid in Balkan campaign; EP..... 225
Names king of Croatia; EP..... 598
Place in the axis strategy; E..... 5
Split between General Graziani and Mussolini reported. H. Greenwall; S. 148
- Thanks British for protecting Italians in Addis Ababa; EP..... 421
- Two consulates in America closed by state department; EP..... 282
- Weakened regime bolstered by nazis in police and propaganda departments; EP..... 421
See also War, African; War, European
- Ivy, James W.
Comment on H. Habe's article, "Nazi plan for negroes"; C.....419; see also..... 232
- J
- Jackson, Robert H., appointed to the supreme court; EP..... 711 Embarrassed by FBI report on Bridges case; EP..... 3
- Japan
And the tri-partite alliance. R. Barnett; S.....492; see also E.....488; C... 539
Behind Thailand-French Indo-China hostilities; EP..... 58
Considers entry into the Russo-German war; EP..... 738
Effect of war on living standards. B. Paine; S..... 153
Matsuoka consults axis powers on Japanese parallel action in Pacific; E... 398
Mediation allows for domination of Indo-China and Thailand; EP..... 254
Objectives in the far east; EP...2; see also E..... 200
Pacific outlook; E..... 488
Pictures the world after a nazi victory. F. Kirchwey; S..... 546
Pressure on French Indo-China; EP..... 114, 226
Trade demands on Batavia rejected by Dutch; EP.....682; see also EP... 711
Wants axis aid against British in southwest Asia; E..... 285
Will use Indo-Chinese bases to dominate southeastern Asia; EP..... 142
- Japanese-American relations
American economic aid maintains Japan as threat in Asia and aid to axis; E. American fleet movements might alter Japanese designs on Dutch East Indies; EP...682; see also EP... 711
American oil shipments to Japan. I. F. Stone; S.....231, 491, 687
Continued trade helps to conquer China. F. Kirchwey; S..... 600
Exports to Japan declining. I. F. Stone; S..... 400 Far eastern moves bring threat of war; E. 200
Gillette-Coffee resolution on war trade. I. F. Stone; S.....687; see also E.....572; C..... 707
Increased trade in war materials; E... 4
Interview with T. Shiratori. R. Barnett; S...492; see also E...488; C... 539
Japan fears American intervention in Pacific; EP..... 226
War in the Pacific? I. F. Stone; S. 659
Washington stories hint at further appeasement of Japan; EP...711; see also EP..... 654
- Japanese-French relations. See Indo-China
- Japanese-Soviet relations
Interview with T. Shiratori. R. Barnett; S..... 492
Japan's position little improved by pact; E..... 488
Possible agreement to end Chinese war; E..... 146
Russia wants a pact with Japan; E... 229
Russian conditions for treaty with Japan; E..... 285
- Java. See Dutch East Indies
- Jews
Anti-semitism of Polish exiles in Britain. W. Zukerman; S.....579; see also C...652; C...708; EP..... 710
Palestine's army. N. Diamond; C.419; see also C..... 651
Senator Wheeler's anti-semitism. I. F. Stone; S..... 284
- Joesten, Joachim
Hesse's flight to Britain; S.....606; see also EP..... 598
Hitler loses Greenland; S..... 471
Hitler's grip on Finland; S..... 716
Panama's president Arias moves toward totalitarianism; C..... 279
Visa racket exploits refugees; S..... 124
- Johnson, Lyndon B.; senatorial candidate in Texas. R. Young; S..... 722
- Jones, Jesse H. See Reconstruction finance corporation
- Journalism. See Newspapers
- Joyce, James
Committee organized for aid to family. M. Marshall; S..... 475
Elegy for. I. Goll; P..... 133
- Jugoslavia. See Yugoslavia
- K
- Kandinsky; abstract painter's show. C. Greenberg; A..... 481
- Karawina-Hsiao, Erica
Urges American help in India's fight for freedom; C..... 596
- Kempner, R. M. W.
Letter from a German friend in occupied Europe; C..... 391
- Kenyon Review. M. Marshall; S..... 22
- King, Emory L.
Reply to Noyes and Strauss on making America produce; C..... 56
- Kipnis, recital. B. H. Haggin; M..... 222
- Kirchwey, Freda
Ambassador Dodd speaks; S..... 118
America must act in 1941 to prevent fascist victory; S..... 6
Balkan scramble, the; S..... 489
Blitzkrieg and dismay; S...462; see also EP..... 485
Defeating Hitler is the issue; S..... 518
Hitler moves in Balkan states; S... 201
How to invade Europe; S...625; see also C..... 734
If Lindbergh is right; S..... 546
Keep cool on labor; S..... 713
Lend-lease bill, opposition to; S..... 89
Luce thinking; S...229; see also C... 419
Now we must act; S..... 600
President's message to congress, the; S. 34
President's "national emergency" speech, the; S..... 658
Russo-German war: our aim is to defeat Hitler; S..... 740
Tribute to S. Anderson; S..... 313
Wars and rumors of peace; S..... 686
Why Hitler hesitates; S..... 174
- Klan. See Ku klux klan
- Kline, Max
Letter on Nation's editorial, "Communists and unions"; C.....456; see 228; correction..... 255
- Knudsen, William S.
Role in new office for production management. I. Stone; S..... 63
Should resign. I. F. Stone; S...519, 550, 575; see also EP...515; correction; 568; E...545; EP...655; C... 707
See also Defense, national; Strikes
- Kohn, Hans
Nazi echoes from Japan; C.....539; see also..... 492
On role of political emigrés in America; S..... 17
- Kolnai, Aurel
Fate or freedom? S...636; see also C. 736
- Konikow, Antoinette F.
Critiques J. Daniels' article on F. Beal; C...195; see also C..... 196
- Kramer, Dale
Machinery evicts the farmer; S..... 497
- Krivitsky, General Walter; suicide questioned; EP..... 199
- Krutch, Joseph Wood
Reviews of plays:
Arsenic and old lace..... 108
Beautiful people, the..... 537
Claudia..... 221
Crazy with the heat..... 136
Cream in the well, the..... 136
Doctor's dilemma, the..... 331
Eight o'clock Tuesday..... 81
Happy days, the..... 648
Lady in the dark..... 164
Liberty Jones..... 192
Mr. and Mrs. North..... 108
Native son..... 417
Night of love..... 81
Out of the frying pan..... 221
Talley method, the..... 277
Tanyard street..... 192
Watch on the Rhine..... 453
- Ku klux klan, growth of, in 1940..... 45
- L
- Labor
Canners unsuccessful in obtaining further exemptions from wages and hours law; EP..... 283
Congress presses for anti-labor legislation in defense industries; EP..... 395
Conscripted in Britain; EP..... 113
Demands representation in defense production. R. Stein; S..... 526 Employer demands for freezing wage scales. P. Meigs; C..... 594
Hospital workers need "baby Wagner act". F. Louis; C..... 224
Increased wages and increased prices. K. Hutchison; S..... 379
Labor education service aids immigrant trade unionists. T. Sender; C..... 140
Position of, on longer work-week; EP... 58
Stake in a British victory. G. S. Counts; S..... 360
Supreme court rules on child-labor and wage-hour provisions of fair labor standards act; EP..... 170

- Workers defense league conducts letter contest on rights of I. Taylor; C. 168 Workers' living standards threatened by rising prices; E. 657; see also C. 763
 See also Defense, national
- Labor party, American. See American labor party
 Labor party, British. See Great Britain
 Labor relations board. See National labor relations board
- Labor unions
 American federation of teachers executive council moves to oust communists; E. 228; see also correction. 255; C. 307; C. 308; C. 456
 And the defense mediation board. R. Stein; S. 374; see also EP. 283; E. 369; EP. 395
 Association of catholic trade unionists. R. H. Rovere; S. 11; see also correction. 140; C. 224
 Big business versus big unions. J. Daniels; S. 697
 Brophy, J., states CIO policy on the war; EP. 599
 CIO-British labor conference proposed to speed aid to Britain; EP. 366
 Disney, Walt, and the screen cartoonists' guild. A. Bower; S. 565; 676
 Ford signs a union contract; EP. 739
 Green, W., claims AFL majority in Ford plants. I. F. Stone; S. 147; see also EP. 143
 In the film industry. A. Bower; S. 249
 Justice Frankfurter upholds injunction in Chicago milk venders' case. I. F. Stone; S. 203
 Need for education of members in growing unions. J. Daniels; S. 102
 NLRB hears auto workers' petition for Ford election. I. F. Stone; S. 427
 NLRB report shows increase in contracts and bargaining agreements; EP. 254
 Oppose bill to legalize wire-tapping; EP. 227; see also E. 257
 Senator Norris asks CIO and AFL action against exorbitant union initiation fees; EP. 367
 Targets of corporation lawyers' device to circumvent Norris-LaGuardia act; EP. 171
 Teachers union ordered to surrender membership lists; EP. 143
 Union gains for Hollywood extras. A. Bower; S. 453; 460 Victory at Ford River Rouge plant; E. See also Strikes; names of unions
- Ladd, Edward T.
 Comment on the "war aims" speech of A. Eden; C. 734
 Lady Eve, the. A. Bower; MP. 305
 Lady from Cheyenne, the. A. Bower; MP. 454
 Lady in the dark. J. W. Krutch; D. 164
 La Farge, Christopher
 Defense contract racket, the; S. 407
- La Follette committee
 Report on the "little steel" strike; EP. 394
 La Guardia, Fiorello H. and Tammany hall. W. Chazan; S. 465; see also C. 567
 Backs the Wicks bill; EP. 457
- Land, Admiral Emory S., fails to use idle shipyards. I. F. Stone; S. 631
- Lania, Leo
 On Alvarez del Vayo's proposal for a council of the emigration; C. 84
- Lapica, Roman
 Calls Nation's exposure of Ukrainian nationalists inaccurate; C. 83
- Largo Caballero, Francisco; reported delivered to Spain by Vichy government; EP. 31
- Lash, Joseph P., and the youth movement. R. Spivack; S. 71
- Laski, Harold J.
 Britain must prepare way for a European revolution; S. 349
 How British communists work for Hitler; S. 176; see also C. 251
- Latin America
 Caribbean policy of the United States. W. Roberts; S. 428
 Economic cooperation with, and the national defense. L. Corey; S. 67 Effect of a German victory on J. Alvarez del Vayo; S. 342
 Fascist foreign minister of Argentina to visit Washington; EP. 542
 Good neighbor relations and proposed United States import bans; EP. 422
 Hispano-American's world, the. W. Frank; S. 615
 Hollywood's pan-American campaign. A. Bower; S. 192
 Influx of German "tourists"; EP. 682
 Modern poetry of America Hispana. A. Reyes; S. 376; 411
 Nazi aims in; quotations from "Mein Kampf" 343
 Novel in Indo-America, the. L. A. Sánchez; S. 323
 Responds unfavorably to American films about itself. A. Bower; S. 622
- River Plate conference on hemisphere economic cooperation; EP. 142
 Sees an exhibit of American art. P. Rosenfeld; A. 649
 Summer school in Chile. D. Field; C. 512
 Young writers of America Hispana, the. E. Mallea; S. 502
- Lauterstein, Lincoln
 Draft as an anti-strike weapon, the; C. 594
- Laval, Pierre. See France
 Lazare, Christopher
 Exhibition of El Greco paintings; A. 137; see also C. 168
 Opening of the national gallery; A. 588; see also C. 678
- League of American writers
 Letter from J. F. Horrabin; EP. 684
- Lease lend bill. See United States
 Léger, abstract painter's show. C. Greenberg; A. 481
- Lehmann, Lotte; recital. B. H. Haggin; M. 222
- Lend-lease bill. See United States
 Lenrow, Elbert and others
 Reply to editorial on American federation of teachers; C. 307; see also 228; correction. 255
- Lerner, Max
 On the future of American democracy; C. 36; see also C. 111; C. 167; C. 455
- Lewis, Alfred Baker
 Appointment of Lord Halifax, the; C. 251
- Lewis, John L.
 Big business versus big unions. J. Daniels; S. 697
 Demands safeguards against accidents in soft-coal mines; EP. 311 Remains silent on the CIO-communist issue. R. Stein; S. 715; see also E. 684
- Lewis, Joseph
 T. Paine's words to the army at Valley Forge; C. 540
- Liberal party; history of. B. Croce; S. 467
- Liberals and the war. S. High; S. 691; see also C. 764
- Liberties, civil. See Civil rights
 Liberty and action. B. Croce; S. 467
- Liberty Jones. J. W. Krutch; D. 192
- Life insurance. See Insurance
 Lincoln, Abraham; views on democracy mis-stated by M. Hart. P. Stern; C. 280; see also EP. 227
- Lindbergh, Colonel Charles A.
 Proposes "negotiated peace"; E. 115
 Views on the outcome of the war. F. Kirchwey; S. 546; see also E. 516
- Literature
 Classic-baiting in America. M. Marshall; S. 475
 Literary tastes in France since the war. B. Friedl and I. Ehrenpreis; S. 671 Stern's study of the detective story. M. Marshall; S. 475
- Literature, new world, a
 I. Novel in Indo-America, the. L. A. Sánchez; S. 323
 II. Modern poetry of America Hispana. A. Reyes; S. 376; 411
 III. Young writers of America Hispana, the. E. Mallea; S. 502
 IV. Hispano-American's world, the. W. Frank; S. 615
- Litvinov, Maxim. See Union of soviet socialist republics
 Lochard, Metz T. P.
 Negroes and defense; S. 14
- Loeb, James, Jr.
 Comment on editorial about American federation of teachers; C. 307; see also 228; correction. 255
 Union for democratic action states its policy on strikes and labor's rights; C. 763
- Lofoten Islands. See Norway
 Louis, F.
 Hospital workers need "baby Wagner act"; C. 224
- Louisiana primary case; supreme court decision; EP. 655
- Low, cartoons
 Ciel! Can't you see by the flag we're French? 663
 Crime marches on. 749
 Defense of Ireland. 40
 Face at the window. 126
 Family group. 314
 German tourist season in Balkans. 211
 Hullo. Going my way? 525
 Hundred yard sprint. 238
 Jairmany calling. 690
 Mediterranean outlook—visibility bad. 150
 Peace-seeker's progress, the. 65
 Preparations for the invasion. 97
 Rich pass through the eye of a needle, the. 406
 Wait, maybe I don't go. 469
 Water jump mirage. 13
- Lowell, Kenneth J.
 Answers H. J. Laski's article on the British communists; C. 251; see also 176
- Lucas, W. E.
 Hitler eyes Portugal; S. 495; see also EP. 485
 Russia's threat to India; S. 632
- Luce, Henry
 Program for American domination of world trade. F. Kirchwey; S. 229; see also C. 419
- M
 M. B.
 Convoy out of London; S. 664
- MacLeish, Archibald
 To the class of '41; S. 717
- MacNeal, Kenneth
 Analyzing the annual reports of American corporations; S. 151
- Madden, John T.
 SEC hearings reveal subsidies from public utilities; EP. 115
- Magazines. See names of magazines
 Magnesium. See Aluminum company of America
 Major Barbara. A. Bower; MP. 565
- Malinowski, Wladyslaw
 On "Anti-semitism in exile" by W. Zukerman; C. 652; see also. 579; C. 708
- Mallea, Eduardo
 Young writers of America Hispana, the. S. 502
- Man hunt. A. Bower; MP. 732
- Man on the Isle of Palms, a. R. Humphries; P. 533
- Mané-Katz, exhibition. P. Rosenfeld; A. 82
- Maritime commission. See United States—and the war
 Markham, R. H.
 Yugoslavia yields; S. 289; see also E. 284
- Marshall, Margaret
 Decision; S. 272
 Fitzgerald, F. S., death; S. 159
 Flight to the west; D. 53
 Joyce, J., fund organized; S. 475
 Literature-baiting in America; S. 475
 Modern age's low-priced book experiment fails; the case for lower prices; S. 755
 Notes on a spring journey; S. 587
 Pal Joey; D. 81
 Postal rate for books; S. 475
 Readers club formed; S. 159
 Rourke, C., artist and citizen; S. 726
 Soviet press comment on Mikhail Sholokhov's "The Don flows home to the sea"; S. 532
 Stern's study of the detective story; S. 475
 Survey of literary quarterlies; S. 22
- Marshall, Verne
 Reveals 1939 "peace mission" of W. R. Davis; EP. 30
- Martin, Ben
 United States in a fascist world, the; Ct. 341
- Martin, W., will not seek draft deferment. J. Daniels; S. 298
- Mather, Frank Jewett, Jr.
 Criticizes "The national gallery" by Christopher Lazare; C. 678; see also 588
- Matsuoka, Yosuke. See Japan
 Maverick, Maury
 Chances for reelection. C. Munz; S. 557
- McKenna, Norman
 Letter on "Labor's catholic bloc" by R. Rovere; C. 224; see also 11; correction. 140
- McReynolds, Justice James C.
 Retires from supreme court; EP. 115
- Mediterranean sea. See War, European Meet John Doe. A. Bower; MP. 390
- Meigs, Peveril
 Employer demands for freezing wage scales; C. 594
- Mellon interests. See Aluminum company of America Men of boys' town. A. Bower; MP. 508
- Metropolitan opera productions. B. H. Haggin; M. 222
- Mexico
 Case of the Spanish jewels, the. L. Fischer; S. 470; see also EP. 266
 From Cardenas to Camacho. H. Block; S. 231
 Oil shipments to the axis. I. F. Stone; S. 231
 Protests violation of Vichy-Mexican refugee agreement; E. 461
- Meyer, Ruth
 Tribute to Harold Rugg; C. 541
- Michie, Allen A.
 Luftwaffe behind bars; S. 694
- Migratory workers
 Housing conditions in Connecticut. J. Daniels; S. 410 Public assistance for, urged in defense centers; EP. 284; see also EP. 423
 See also Agriculture
 Military training. See Selective service
 Milk price increase protested by dairy farmers. R. Hill; C. 484
- Millis, Walter
 Notes on the United States, 1950; S. 337

- Milton, George Fort
Comment on "Luxury or liberty" by M. Stewart; C.....763; see also..... 610
- Mine workers. See United mine workers of America
- Mining, coal; demands for safeguards against accidents; EP..... 311
- Southern coal strike settled; EP..... 515
- Minorities on the move. A. Field; S..... 433
- Miró; abstract painter's show. C. Greenberg; A..... 481
- Missouri
Has no governor. I. Dilliard; S..... 183
- State criminal-syndicalism and sabotage bill attacked by St. Louis Post-Dispatch; EP..... 227
- Mitchell, Arthur W.; supreme court decision in case of; EP..... 542
- Mitchell, Donald W.
Battle of the Atlantic; S..... 401
- Attack on convoys, the; S..... 523
- Progressive army command needed; S..... 92
- What's wrong with our army? S..... 750
- Mitropoulos, B. H. Haggin; M..... 166
- Modern age books; low-price experiment fails. M. Marshall; S..... 755
- Mohammedans
Germans inciting Moslem holy war against Britain. R. Aglion; S..... 607; see also EP..... 597
- Monopolies
Aluminum company of America
And the aluminum shortage. I. F. Stone; S..... 603; see also E..... 629
- Indicted with German trust; EP..... 143
- Refusal to obey the power act aggravates drought. J. Daniels; S..... 670
- American medical association convicted under Sherman anti-trust act; EP..... 423
- Coca cola and the courts. J. Spingarn; S..... 666
- Federal communications commission curbs station control by big companies; E..... 544
- Final TNEC report and recommendations. I. F. Stone; S..... 315, 463
- Supreme Court decision in Hutcheson case limits anti-trust actions against labor. I. F. Stone; S..... 175
- Utility and banking affiliations. K. Hutchison; S..... 472
- Montaigne in conquered France. B. Friedl and I. Ehrenpreis; S..... 671
- Moslems. See Mohammedans
- Moving pictures
And national defense. A. Bower; S..... 390
- Annual awards of Academy of motion picture arts and sciences. A. Bower; S..... 305
- Attacks on aliens in Hollywood. A. Bower; S..... 249
- Block booking replaced by new system. A. Bower; S..... 193
- Christian front shows nazi film in Boston; EP..... 683; see also..... 747
- Dieterle, W., gives a party. A. Bower; S..... 454
- Disney's labor troubles. A. Bower; S..... 565
- Fantasia; use of music in. B. Haggin; S..... 53, 566
- Hearst, W. R., objects to "Citizen Kane". A. Bower; S..... 192
- Hollywood extras and the screen actors guild. A. Bower; S..... 453, 676
- Hollywood's pan-American campaign. A. Bower; S..... 192
- Labor unions in the film industry. A. Bower; S..... 249
- Latin Americans hostile to American films on their countries. A. Bower; S..... 622
- President Roosevelt's speech to industry. A. Bower; S..... 305
- Soviet union bans foreign distribution of anti-nazi films, the. A. Robin; C..... 734
- Theater owners meet in Hollywood. A. Bower; S..... 732
- Value of music for documentary films. B. H. Haggin; S..... 194
- Women's club threaten boycott of actors supporting Bridges. A. Bower; S..... 565
- See also Bower, A. (for reviews)
- Mr. and Mrs. North. J. W. Krutch; D..... 108
- Munz, Charles Curtiz
Maury Maverick faces reelection; S..... 557
- Munoz Marin, Luis. See Puerto Rico
- Murray, Philip
Worker and defense, the; S..... 745
- See also Congress of industrial organizations
- Muscle Shoals land racket. A. Stevens; S..... 693
- Museum of modern art concerts. B. H. Haggin; M..... 649, 706
- Music (articles by B. H. Haggin)
Aitken, Webster..... 306
- Anderson, Marian; recital..... 222
- Ballet theatre, the..... 306
- Beecham, Sir Thomas..... 509
- Blitzstein, Marc; music for "Valley town"..... 194
- Ciddings, John, conducts Berlioz requiem..... 649
- Individual differences in interpretation of Kipnis recital..... 222
- Lehmann, Lotte; recital..... 222
- Metropolitan opera productions..... 222
- Mitropoulos..... 166
- Museum of modern art concerts..... 649, 706
- New friends of music concerts..... 222
- Stiedry conducts the new friends of music orchestra..... 332, 509
- Szigeti, Joseph..... 82
- Use of, in Fantasia..... 53, 566
- Music, recorded. See Haggin, B. H.
- Mussolini, Benito. See Italy
- My sister Eileen. R. Bendiner; D..... 53
- N
- N.L.R.B. See National labor relations board
- Nation, The
Answers B. Stolberg's attack in Saturday Evening Post; E..... 200
- Attacked by Senators Cox and Smith; EP..... 86
- Comment on the special supplement. G. S. Viereck; C..... 419
- Government employee subscribers investigated by FBI; EP..... 656
- Statement of purpose of March 22 supplement..... 333
- National association of manufacturers
Disassociates itself from Robey textbook investigation; EP..... 227; see also C..... 280
- National defense. See Defense, national
- National defense mediation board. See Strikes
- National labor relations board
And Bethlehem steel corporation; EP..... 395
- And H. Ford; E..... 88
- Circuit court ruling in A. Fahy case; EP..... 171
- Hearing on Ford election petition. I. F. Stone; S..... 427
- Justice Stone interprets Wagner act in Heinz case; EP..... 58
- Report reveals increase in board settlement of strike disputes; EP..... 254
- Smith committee investigation and minority report; E..... 33; see also EP..... 86
- Supreme court interprets Wagner act provisions on child labor; EP..... 170
- Supreme court reduces sweeping order against Express publishing company; EP..... 283
- Vinson bill would repeal the Wagner act; E..... 487; see also E..... 657; C..... 763
- National nutrition conference discusses income and adequate diet; EP..... 628
- Native at large (articles by J. Daniels) 21, 47, 75, 102, 130, 158, 186, 213, 241, 271, 298, 327, 381, 410, 436, 474, 501, 531, 586, 614, 642, 670, 697, 725, 754
- Native son. J. W. Krutch; D..... 417
- Nazism. See Fascism and nazism; Germany
- Near east. See War, European
- Negrin, Juan. See Spain
- Negroes
And the poll tax. H. Collins; C..... 483
- Attitude toward national defense and the war. M. T. P. Lochard; S..... 14
- Connecticut, Georgia of the north. J. Daniels; S..... 410
- Dabney, V., changes his opinion on the O. Waller case; C..... 168; see also C..... 223
- Death of negro soldier held from public by army press section. J. Daniels; S..... 642
- Discrimination against, in national defense industries. J. Daniels; S..... 158, 614; see also EP..... 87; C..... 594
- Nazi treatment of French colonial prisoners of war. H. Habe; S..... 232; see also C..... 419
- Spell, J., acquitted; EP..... 143
- Supreme court decision in Mitchell case sanctions segregation; EP..... 542
- Weaver, Dr. R., heads OPM division to place Negroes in defense industries. J. Daniels; S..... 614
- Nehru, Jawaharlal
India and the war; S..... 121
- Netherlands; anti-German riots; EP..... 254
- German control of Dutch business. K. Hutchison; S..... 752
- Netherlands East Indies. See Dutch East Indies
- Neuberg, Richard L.
Gerrymandered states will probably ignore new census figures; S..... 127; see also C..... 195
- New deal, the. See Roosevelt, F. D.—Administration
- New friends of music, concerts. B. H. Haggin; M..... 222
- New school of social research
Receives permanent New York state charter; EP..... 486
- New York city
Can Tammany come back? W. Chasan; S..... 465
- Photographs of, by R. Carson. P. Rosenfeld; A..... 191
- Reforms in the sheriffs' offices. L. Carson; C..... 567
- School appropriation drastically cut; EP..... 423
- New York Daily News
Demands a negotiated peace; E..... 516
- New York state
School appropriation drastically cut; EP..... 423
- New York Times, distorts president's statement on strikes in defense industry; EP..... 282
- Newspapers
American newspaper guild
Activities of catholic trade unionists in. R. Rovere; S..... 11; see also correction..... 140; C..... 224
- Case study, a; E..... 742
- Circuit court decision in A. Fahy case; EP..... 171
- Exaggerate strikes in defense industries; EP..... 198; see also C..... 252; EP..... 255; EP..... 282; EP..... 422; E..... 460
- Press relations in national defense centers. J. Daniels; S..... 21, 75, 130, 642
- Validity of "uncensored" reports from nazi-occupied territory; E..... 62
- See also Freedom of the press; names of newspapers under names of cities
- Nice girl. A. Bower; MP..... 305
- Niebuhr, Reinhold
Comment on editorial about American federation of teachers; C..... 307; see also..... 228; correction..... 255
- Moral implications of a nazi defeat; S..... 357
- Night of love. J. W. Krutch; D..... 81
- No foreign war committee. See Marshall, V.
- Nomad, Max
Protests editors' additions to article in Jewish encyclopedia; C..... 420
- Norris, George W.
Asks CIO and AFL action against exorbitant union initiation fees; EP..... 367
- Norris-La Guardia act; corporation lawyers circumvent provisions of; EP..... 171
- Norway
British and Norwegian navy raid on Lofoten Islands; EP..... 282
- Passive resistance to German occupation. T. Broch; S..... 98
- Novels. See Books
- Noyes, Charles E. and H. Strauss
Reply to article on "Make America produce". E. King; C..... 56
- O
- OPM. See Defense, national
- O'Brien, Justin
Poem from France, a; S..... 587
- O'Daniel, W. Lee; senatorial candidate in Texas. R. Young; S..... 722
- Office for production management. See Defense, national
- Oil
American shipments to the axis powers. I. F. Stone; S..... 231; see also 491, 687
- Balkan campaign endangers nazi supply; EP..... 459
- Germany's supplies. K. Hutchison; S..... 296
- Government pipe line concessions to the oil monopoly. I. F. Stone; S..... 491
- Ickes, H. L., named coordinator of the oil industry. I. F. Stone; S..... 659
- Increase in shipments to Japan; E..... 572
- Jairmay calling. Low; C..... 690
- Old acquaintance. R. Bendiner; D..... 137
- O'Mahoney, Joseph C. See Temporary national economic committee
- One night in Lisbon. A. Bower; MP..... 622
- Organization for the rebirth of the Ukraine. See Fascism and nazism
- Ostrow, F. J.
Proposals for defense financing; C..... 456; see also..... 178
- Out of the fog. A. Bower; MP..... 732
- Out of the frying pan. J. W. Krutch; D..... 221
- P
- Pacifism in the present war. S. High; S..... 691; see also C..... 764
- Enemy of freedom. A. Kolnai; S..... 636; see also C..... 736
- Paine, Barbara
What war has done to Japan; S..... 153
- Paine, Thomas
Words written to the army at Valley Forge. J. Lewis; C..... 540
- Paintings. See Art
- Palestine
Britain appeases the Arabs. J. Trachtenberg; C..... 651
- Jewish volunteers for British army. N. Diamond; C..... 419
- Pal Joey. M. Marshall; D..... 81
- Palmer, C. F. See Defense, national—Housing
- Panama
President Arias moves toward totalitarianism. J. Joesten; C..... 279
- Paris. See France
- Partisan review. M. Marshall; S..... 22

- Passports, refugee, to nowhere. J. Joesten; S 124
 People's convention. See Great Britain
 Pepper, George
 Futsch in Java; S..... 295
 Pétain, Marshal Henri Philippe. See France
 Phonograph records. See Haggin, B. H.
 Photography. See Art
 Picketing. See Strikes
 Plays. See Krutch, J. W., Bendiner, R., Marshall, M. (for reviews)
 Poems
 Crete. B. R. Redman..... 724
 Elegy for James Joyce. I. Goll..... 133
 Faust before the mirror. R. Hayes..... 48
 How long ago the home. K. J. Shapiro 48
 John landless at the final port. I. Goll
 (translated by W. C. Williams)..... 23
 Man on the Isle of Palms. R. Humphries..... 533
 New order, the. A. Guiterman..... 236
 Rats, lice, and history. R. P. Blackmur 559
 Song. W. H. Auden..... 382
 Soul of collaboration, the. Translated by J. O'Brien..... 587
 Poetry
 Modern, of America Hispana. A.
 Keyes; S..... 376, 411
 Pol. Heinz
 Vichy's slave battalions; S..... 527
 Poland
 Life under the Germans. W. Zukerman; S..... 579; see also C..... 652;
 C..... 708
 Poll tax
 And dictators. J. Daniels; S..... 213
 Corruption. H. Collins; C..... 483
 Roll of, in case of O. Waller. V.
 Dabney; C..... 168; see also C..... 223
 Pollitt, Harry. See Great Britain
 Pomeroy, Harold. See Defense, national—Housing
 Portugal
 And the war. W. E. Lucas; S..... 495;
 see also EP..... 485
 Possony, Stefan Th.
 Can Britain be stormed? S..... 94
 Post-Dispatch, Saint Louis. See Saint Louis Post-Dispatch
 Prato, Carlo a
 Gestapo at work in France, the; S..... 720;
 see also EP..... 739
 Press. See Newspapers
 Press, freedom of. See Freedom of the press
 Pribichevich, Stoyan
 Yugoslav explosion; S..... 399
 Prices. See Business
 Prieto, Indelacio. See Spain
 Profits. See Business
 Propaganda, German, floods France; EP..... 310
 Anti-semitism in the Polish press in Britain. W. Zukerman; S..... 379; see also C..... 652; C..... 708; EP..... 710
 Public finance. See Finance, public
 Public utilities
 SEC hearings reveal subsidies to New York university professors; EP..... 115
 Case for the Saint Lawrence waterway.
 B. Putney; S..... 577; see also EP
 367; E..... 712
 Defense and the Saint Lawrence waterway. I. F. Stone; S..... 631
 Seattle's model electric service; EP..... 712 Shortage of electric power impedes defense industries; EP..... 655
 Utility and banking affiliations. K.
 Hutchison; S..... 472
 Puerto Rico
 New deal in; progressives win election.
 L. Blanco; S..... 100
 Putney, Bryant
 Saint Lawrence seaway bottleneck, the;
 S..... 577
 R
 Radio
 Federal communications commission
 curbs monopolistic station control; E. 544 Repercussions of the FCC rulings. D.
 Saunders; S..... 634
 Success of the Lone Ranger program.
 C. B. Boutell; S..... 44
 Rage in heaven. A. Bower; MP..... 305
 Railroads; freight-car needs for defense. K.
 Hutchison; S..... 695
 Rapp-Coudert committee
 Obtains teachers' union lists; EP..... 143
 Schappes, M., indicted for perjury in testimony before the committee; EP..... 367
 Rats, lice, and history. R. P. Blackmur; P. 559
 Rauschning, Hermann, explains Hess's flight;
 EP..... 598
 Read, Herbert
 Culture and liberty; S..... 437
 Readers' club to distribute best-seller books.
 M. Marshall; S..... 159
 Reconstruction finance corporation
 Bill would provide funds for entering business in the interests of defense;
 E..... 629
 Growth of. K. Hutchison; S..... 584
 Recorded music. See Haggin, B. H.
 Redman, Ben Ray
 Crete; P..... 724
 Refugees
 Contradictory claims of the American rescue ship mission; EP..... 58
 Contribution to American education; EP 486 Exploited through visa racket. J. Jo-esten; S..... 124
 France bans departure of Spaniards for Mexico; E..... 397
 Largo Caballero reported delivered to Spain by Vichy government; EP..... 31
 One hundred and fifty shot in French concentration camp; outsiders to be returned to Franco; EP..... 486
 Prominent German social democrats in France delivered to Gestapo; EP..... 198
 Replies to Alvarez del Vayo on the role of political émigrés in America. 16,
 17, 18, 19; see also C..... 53; C..... 56;
 C..... 83; C..... 84; C..... 139; C..... 140
 Spain to stop boats leaving France with Spanish; EP..... 114
 Spanish, in colonial France; E..... 32 Spanish, of military age not allowed to leave France; Vichy-Mexican accord broken; E..... 461
 Valtin, J., charges political refugees are Nazi agents; EP..... 656
 Vichy agrees to turn all remaining Spaniards over to the nazis for work on the trans-Sahara railway; EP..... 739
 Vichy's slave battalions. H. Pol; S..... 527 Wealthy Europeans in the United States; EP..... 487
 Reissig, Herman F., praises A. Kolnai's
 "Fate or freedom"; C..... 736; see also. 636 Representation, state and federal; need of revision on basis of census. R. Neu-berger; S..... 127; see also C..... 195
 Republican party, warned by Willkie, W., against isolationism; EP..... 198
 Reuther, Walter P. See Aviation
 Revolution by consent. H. Laski; S..... 349
 Reyes, Alfonso
 Modern poetry of America Hispana;
 S..... 376, 411
 Reynolds, Richard S., testifies on the aluminum shortage. I. F. Stone; S..... 603;
 see also E..... 629
 Rhylic, Frank
 WPA is defense; S..... 155
 Riess, Curt
 Sports and defense; S..... 237
 Rieth, Kurt; "financial mission" in the United States; EP..... 628
 Rights, civil. See Civil rights
 River Plate conference. See Latin America
 Roberts, W. Adolphe
 Strategy in the Caribbean; S..... 428 Robey, Ralph. See National association of manufacturers
 Robin, Andy
 Soviet union bans foreign distribution of anti-Nazi films, the; C..... 734
 Robin Moor; strong American action on sinking indicated; EP..... 709
 President terms sinking an act of piracy; armed protection of American ships may follow; EP..... 738
 Rockefeller, John D., Jr.
 Advocates use of convoys; EP..... 515
 Roosevelt, Franklin Delano Administration
 Appoints D. Acheson to state department; EP..... 115
 Assails German "acts of piracy" on the high seas; EP..... 738
 Budget; E..... 60
 Effect of the emergency powers, the.
 F. Kirchwey; S..... 658
 Inauguration; EP..... 86
 Message to congress. F. Kirchwey; S. 34
 Opposes jurisdictional strikes in defense industries; EP..... 283
 Orders freezing of axis assets and closing of German consular and propaganda offices; EP..... 710 Press interview acts as curb on defense strike hysteria. I. F. Stone; S. 427 Radio speech on America's stand on the war; EP..... 1
 Speech to the motion picture industry.
 A. Bower; S..... 305
 Tactical errors on lend-lease bill; E. 59
 "Unlimited emergency" speech, the.
 I. F. Stone; S..... 659
 Urged to inform public of nation's situation. F. Kirchwey; S..... 462;
 see also EP..... 485
 Urged to order investigation of nation's productive capacity; E..... 602
 Use of army in the North American aviation strike. F. Kirchwey; S. 713;
 see also E..... 684
 Warns axis that aid to Britain will be speeded; EP..... 309
 Wheeler-Roosevelt feud; EP..... 169
 WPA appropriations; president's views on. F. Rhylic; S..... 155
 Rosenfeld, Kurt
 On Alvarez del Vayo's proposal for council of the emigration; C..... 140
 Rosenfeld, Paul
 American art exhibit goes to Latin America, an; A..... 649
 Carson, Robin; photographs of New York; A..... 191
 Exhibition of 19th century French art;
 A..... 250
 Rosinski, Herbert
 Military analysis of the Greek campaign.
 F. Kirchwey; S..... 489
 Ross, W. L.
 American workers' views on the war; C 510
 Roth, Harry
 Customer is always right, the; Ct..... 752
 War and industrial mobilization; Ct..... 552
 Rourke, Constance, dies; EP..... 568
 Artist and citizen. M. Marshall; S..... 726
 Rovere, Richard H.
 Labor's catholic bloc; S..... 11; see also correction..... 140; C..... 224
 Rugg, Harold
 Tribute from a former student. R.
 Meyer; C..... 541
 Ruiz-Guinazau, Enrique. See Argentina
 Rumania
 Germany responsible for iron guard terror; E..... 116
 See also Balkan states
 Russia. See Union of soviet socialist republics
 Russo-German war
 British planes engage nazis on western front; EP..... 738
 German forces strike at the Ukraine;
 EP..... 737
 Hitler marches east. L. Fischer; S..... 743
 Our aim is to defeat Hitler; aid for Russia and Britain. F. Kirchwey; S. 740
 Rumors of war between Russia and Germany flood European centers; EP. 710
 Strength of the red army; EP..... 737
 Western nations should help Russia, the.
 N. Angell; S..... 744
 Will Japan enter the war? EP..... 738
 S
 SEC. See Securities and exchange commission
 Sabotage
 Missouri's model state criminal syndicalism and anti-sabotage bill; EP..... 227
 Norway's passive resistance to German occupation. T. Broch; S..... 98
 Saint Lawrence waterway
 And defense. I. F. Stone; S..... 631 Case for. B. Putney; S..... 577; see also EP..... 367; E..... 712
 Saint Louis Post-Dispatch; attacks Missouri criminal-syndicalism and sabotage bill;
 EP..... 227
 Salaries. See Labor
 Salvemini, G.
 On Alvarez del Vayo's proposal for council of the emigration; C..... 56
 Sánchez, Luis-Alberto
 Latin-American novelists; S..... 323
 Sandburg, Carl
 Lord Halifax on a horse; S..... 499;
 see also C..... 568; C..... 594
 Saturday Evening Post
 Restates its position on foreign policy;
 EP..... 629
 Saunders, D. A.
 Judgment day for radio; S..... 634
 Scandinavia
 Passive resistance of Norwegians and Danes harasses nazis; EP..... 254
 See also names of countries
 Schappes, Morris U.
 Indicted for perjury before Rapp-Coudert committee; EP..... 367
 Schomer, Howard
 Waiver of exemption clause for clergymen and divinity students under draft; C..... 55
 Schools
 For children in defense centers. J.
 Daniels; S..... 327
 SEC hearings reveal two New York university professors subsidized by public utilities; EP..... 115
 Townsend Harris and other schools threatened by state cut in educational appropriation; EP..... 423
 Schram, Emil
 Named head of the New York stock exchange. K. Hutchison; S..... 584
 Schuman, Frederick L.
 On the future of American democracy;
 C..... 36; see also C..... 111; C..... 167;
 C..... 455
 Schuyler, George S.
 Comment on Hans Habe's article, "Nazi plan for negroes"; C..... 419; see also..... 232
 Schuyler, Jack
 Chemicals for war; S..... 291

- Scott, Edward William, deported from Panama. J. Joesten; C. 279
- Sears, Charles B.; to preside at the trial of H. R. Bridges; EP. 311
- Seattle
Model electric service; EP. 712
- Securities and exchange commission
Bankers oppose rule on competitive bidding. K. Hutchison; S. 472
- Electric bond and share hearings reveal subsidies to two New York university professors; EP. 115
- Selective service
As an anti-strike weapon. L. Lauterstein; C. 594
- Death of Private F. Hall. J. Daniels; S. 642
- Head of New York stock exchange will not seek deferment. J. Daniels; S. 298
- Legal aid for conscientious objectors. E. Thomas and others; C. 84
- Morality in camp areas. J. Daniels; S. 586
- Need for recreational facilities, the. J. Daniels; S. 754
- Northern draftees and southern belles. J. Daniels; S. 381
- Rejections for physical defects. J. Daniels; S. 531
- Waiver of exemption clause for clergymen and divinity students. H. Schomer; C. 55
- Weaknesses in the draft procedure; EP. 599
- "Work-or-fight" form of administrator Hershey. F. Kirchwey; S. 713
- Sender, Toni
Labor education service reorganizes teachers' registry; C. 140
- Sforza, Count Carlo
On Alvarez del Vayo's proposal for council of the emigration; C. 139
- Shapiro, Karl Jay
How long ago the home; P. 48
- Share-croppers. See Agriculture
- Shining victory. A. Bower; MP. 677
- Shiratori, Toshio. See Japan
- Shirer, William L.
Hess—Hitler's alter ego; S. 604; see also EP. 598
- Sholokhov, Mikhail
Soviet press comment on his "The Don flows home to the sea". M. Marshall; S. 532
- Sidi Barrani. See War, African
- Simovich, General Dusan. See Yugoslavia
- Sinclair, Upton
Naval aid to Britain; C. 707
- Reply to American first committee; C. 56
- Smearing of U. S. I. the. J. Daniels; S. 725
- Smith committee investigation of NLRB minority file report; EP. 86
- Omissions in majority report; E. 33
- Snow, Edgar
Reports internal dissension in China; E. 61; see also EP. 113
- So ends our night. A. Bower; MP. 193
- South, the America's number 1 defense problem. J. Daniels; S. 501; see also C. 594
- Books for workers. R. S. Hilborn; C. 196
- Dictators and poll taxes. J. Daniels; S. 213
- Plight of the tenant farmer. J. Daniels; S. 474
- Poll-tax corruption. H. Collins; C. 483
- South America. See Latin America
- Southern Review. M. Marshall; S. 22
- Southern summer school for workers, appeals for books. R. Hilborn; C. 196
- Soviet Russia. See Union of soviet socialist republics
- Sowers, D. C.
Letter on war trade with the axis; C. 707; see also 572
- Spain
Britain, United States, Argentina appease Franco; EP. 59
- Case of the Spanish jewels, the. L. Fischer; S. 470; see also EP. 459
- Franco consults the axis. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S. 202
- Franco purges the army and police; EP. 570
- Nazis seek French permission to move troops to the Spanish border; EP. 486
- Nazis will decide entry into war. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S. 521
- Next possible nazi annexation; EP. 485
- Possible source through which axis powers can obtain American oil. I. F. Stone; S. 231; see also 687
- Prisons in 181
- Receives Italy's bill for cost of aid given insurgents. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S. 258
- Refugees in France
France bans departure for Mexico; E. 397
- Largo Caballero reported returned to Spain; EP. 31
- One hundred and fifty shot, others to be returned to Franco; EP. 486
- Rescue ship mission; EP. 58
- Spain to intercept boats leaving France with; EP. 114
- Treatment in colonial France; E. 32
- Turned over by Vichy to the nazis to work on the trans-Sahara railway; EP. 739
- Vichy-Mexican accord on, broken; E. 461
- Sparkman, John J.
Introduces resolution for continuance of Tolan committee; EP. 284
- Spell, Joseph, acquitted; EP. 143
- Spingarn, Jerome H.
Of coca cola, and the courts; S. 666
- Spivack, Robert G.
New trends in the youth movement; S. 71; see also C. 168
- Student defenders of democracy seek funds; C. 652
- Stalin, Josef. See Union of soviet socialist republics
- Stamps, food, plan should be extended. T. S. Harding; S. 209
- Steel
Alloy shortage felt; EP. 255
- Bethlehem provokes strikes through employee representation plan election; EP. 395
- Defense officials face difficulties in dealing with shortage. I. F. Stone; S. 259
- Henderson fixes price ceiling; E. 488
- La Follette committee report on the "little steel" strike; EP. 394
- Needs for national defense. K. Hutchison; S. 239; see also EP. 255; C. 483; EP. 515; E. 629; EP. 654
- Proposal for coordination of the steel industry; E. 145
- Steel workers. See Bethlehem steel corporation
- Steele, Wayne H.
Totalitarian dictatorship assures continuance of democracy; C. 455
- Stein, Rose M.
Ingledwood's backwash; Murray faces the communist bloc; S. 715
- Labor and the national mediation board; E. 374; see also EP. 283; S. 369; EP. 395
- Murray plan, the; S. 526
- Working conditions at Ford's; C. 707
- Stern, Philip Van Doren
Corrects M. Hart's statement on Lincoln; C. 280
- Study of the detective story. M. Marshall; S. 475
- Sternberg, Fritz
American production for defense; S. 552
- Stevens, Alden
Muscle Shoals land racket; S. 693
- Stevens, Peter
Bulgaria on the eve; S. 211
- Can Vichy hold Syria? S. 688; see also EP. 681
- Nazi propaganda techniques in the Near East and Asia; S. 747
- Turkish-Bulgarian pact; S. 294; see also EP. 226; E. 284
- Will Turkey fight?; S. 431
- Stewart, Maxwell S.
How to meet defense expenditures; S. 178; 610; see also C. 456; C. 763
- Stiedry conducts the New friends of music orchestra. B. H. Haggin; M. 332
- Stocks; annual investment reports. K. MacNeal; S. 151
- Stokowski, Leopold. See Fantasia
- Stolberg, Ben; reply to his article "Muddled Millions" in Saturday Evening Post; E. 200
- Stone, Justice Harlan F.
Holds that wage-hour and child-labor provisions of fair labor standards acts are constitutional; EP. 170
- Interpretation of Wagner act in Heinz case; EP. 58
- Named chief justice of the supreme court; EP. 711
- Opinion in Express publishing company case; EP. 283
- Stone, I. F.
Allis-Chalmers strike vote, the; S. 427; see also E. 425
- Aluminum monopoly, the; S. 603; see also EP. 87; E. 629
- American oil exports to the axis powers; S. 231
- Chungking and Washington; S. 400
- Community pools as an aid to national defense; S. 575
- Defense officials split on ways of meeting defense shortages; S. 259
- Ickes, H. L., named coordinator of the oil industry; S. 659
- Interviews Wheeler on proposals for peace; S. 35
- Justice Frankfurter upholds use of injunction in Chicago milk vendors' case; S. 203
- Lend-lease bill hearings reveal lack of candor; S. 91
- Machine-tool shortage; S. 550, 575; see also E. 545
- Mobilizing science for defense research; S. 7
- National defense advisory commission becomes office for production management; S. 63
- NLRB hearing on Ford election petition; S. 427
- Pipe lines and profits; S. 491
- President's speech on unlimited emergency, the; S. 659
- Report of the committee investigating governmental agencies; S. 120
- Report of the temporary national economic committee; S. 315, 463
- Roosevelt's answer to hysteria; S. 427
- Shipping shortage and idle shipyards, the; S. 631
- State department opposes the Gillette-Coffee resolution; S. 687
- State department snubs Vichy's ambassador; S. 687
- Supreme court decision in Hutcheson case limits anti-trust actions against labor; S. 175
- Threat of war in two oceans; S. 659
- War department rejects Ford defense contract bid; S. 147
- What Mr. Knudsen thinks; S. 371; see also C. 483
- Wheeler's Cliveden set; S. 287
- Why Knudsen should go; S. 519, 550, 575; see also EP. 515; correction, 568; E. 545; EP. 655; C. 707
- Strauss, Harold and C. Noyes
Reply to their article on "Make America produce." E. King; C. 56
- Strauss, Patricia
Britain's citizen defenders; S. 207
- Strawberry blonde. A. Bower; MP. 249
- Strecker, Joseph G.
Held for deportation proceedings; EP. 87
- Strikes
Allis-Chalmers strike, the. I. F. Stone; S. 427; see also E. 396; E. 425
- And draft deferment. L. Lauterstein; C. 594
- Anti-strike hysteria in congress; EP. 395; see also E. 460
- At Bethlehem steel's Lackawanna plant. J. Wechsler; S. 269
- Bethlehem steel corporation's policy is deliberate provocation; EP. 395
- CIO strike at Ford's River Rouge plant. J. Wechsler; S. 426; see also C. 707
- Coal miners return to work pending negotiations; EP. 515
- Industry deserves public censure for. R. Hill; C. 510
- Jurisdictional; supreme court decision in Hutcheson case. I. F. Stone; S. 175
- Knudsen and Hillman opposed to anti-strike legislation; EP. 227
- Knudsen proposes compulsory mediation in labor disputes; EP. 255
- Knudsen's attitude on, in defense industries. I. F. Stone; S. 371
- Leviton strike, the. C. Y. Harrison; C. 734
- National mediation board for defense industries. R. Stein; S. 374; see also EP. 283; E. 369; EP. 395
- New York Times distorts president's statement on strikes in defense industry; EP. 282
- NLRB report shows increase in number of labor disputes settled by board; EP. 254
- North American aviation strike; Murray versus the communists. R. Stein; S. 715; see also E. 684, 713
- Press exaggerates stoppage in defense industries; EP. 198; see also C. 252; EP. 255; EP. 422; E. 460
- Roosevelt's press interview acts as curb on hysteria. I. F. Stone; S. 427
- Trouble threatens as cost of living rises; E. 657; C. 763
- Union for democratic action outlines ways of avoiding; J. Loeb, Jr.; C. 763
- Victory at Ford River Rouge plant; E. 460
- Vinson bill, proposes compulsory arbitration; E. 487; see also E. 657; C. 763
- Wicks bill aimed at transport workers' right to strike; EP. 457
- Student defenders of democracy; seek funds, R. Spivack; C. 652
- Student league for progressive action
New trends in the youth movement. R. Spivack; S. 71; see also C. 168
- Student union. See American student union
- Sumners, Hatton W.
Advocates electric chair for defense strikers; EP. 395
- Sunny. A. Bower; MP. 677
- Supreme court, United States
Byrnes, J., and Jackson, R., named to fill vacancies; EP. 711
- Candidates for vacancy left by retirement of Justice McReynolds; EP. 685
- Chief justice Hughes retires; E. 685
- Express publishing company case, decision in; EP. 283
- Hutcheson case decision limits anti-trust actions against labor. I. F. Stone; S. 175

U

- Majority and minority views on the Louisiana primary case; EP..... 655
 Mitchell decision sanctions segregation; EP..... 542
 Rules on child-labor and wage-hour provisions of fair labor standards act; EP 170
 Stone, Justice Harlan F., named chief justice; EP..... 711
 To rule if communist membership is grounds for deportation; EP..... 87; EP..... 199; EP..... 311
 Upholds conviction of E. R. Browder; EP..... 199
 Upholds injunction in Chicago milk vendors' case. I. F. Stone; S..... 203
- Syria
 British attack moves slowly; Arab sentiment not crystallized; EP..... 709
 Germans ask right to occupy bases and airfields; EP..... 570
 Nazis use bases in; EP..... 597
 Showdown between Britain and Vichy; nazi activity in. P. Stevens; S..... 688; see also EP..... 681
 Szigeti, Joseph. B. H. Haggin; M..... 82
- T
- TNEC. See Temporary national economic committee
 TVA. See Tennessee valley authority
 Taft, Robert A. See Appeasers
 Talley method, the. J. W. Krutch; D..... 277
 Tammany hall. See Democratic party
 Tanyard street. J. W. Krutch; D..... 192
 Taxation. See Finance, public
 Tax-exempt bonds
 Treasury proposal to abolish. K. Hutchison; S..... 73
 Taylor, Decms. See Fantasia
 Taylor, Isabel
 Workers' defense league conducts letter contest on labor's rights; C..... 168
 Taylor, W. H.
 Franklin, B., and federal union; C..... 652
 Temporary national economic committee
 Report and recommendations. I. F. Stone; S..... 315, 463
 Scores abuses of life insurance companies; E..... 286
 Tennessee valley authority
 Architecture of D. Haskell; Arc..... 592
 Tenor, T. A.
 Asks immediate American action against the axis; C..... 678
 Texas
 Senatorial election campaign, the. R. Young; S..... 722
 Thailand
 Border skirmishes with French Indo-Chinese forces; EP..... 58
 Makes truce with Indo-China; EP..... 114
 Pressure being exerted for Japanese "protection"; EP..... 254
 That Hamilton woman. A. Bower; MP..... 390
 That night in Rio. A. Bower; MP..... 390
 That uncertain feeling. A. Bower; MP..... 454
 Theater. See Krutch, J. W., Bendiner, R., Marshall, M. (for reviews)
 Thielemann, Leland
 Comment on S. High's "The liberals' war"; C..... 764; see also..... 691
 Thomas, Evans W., and others
 Legal aid for conscientious objectors; C 84
 Thompson, Dorothy
 Approves H. Luce's formula for American domination of world trade. F. Kirchwey; S..... 229; see also C..... 419
 Tight shoes. A. Bower; MP..... 732
 To the class of '41. A. MacLeish; S..... 717
 Tobacco road. A. Bower; MP..... 305
 Tolan committee on conditions of migratory workers; continuance urged; EP..... 284
 Totalitarian states. See Fascism and nazism
 Trachtenberg, Joshua
 Britain appeases the Arabs in Palestine; C..... 651; see also..... 419
 Trade. See Business
 Trade agreements
 Latin American countries map new domestic concessions; EP..... 142
 Transport workers' union
 Wicks bill aimed at; EP..... 457
 Treaties, trade. See Trade agreements
 Trial of Mary Dugan, the. A. Bower; MP..... 249
 Tsiang, H. T., legal aid for. J. Holmes; C..... 708
- Turkey
 Friendship treaty with Russia; EP..... 365
 Nazis increase pressure on, to reach Egypt; EP..... 513
 Policy in Balkans undefined; E..... 256
 Possibilities of entry into the war. P. Stevens; S..... 431 Reaction to the pact with Bulgaria. P. Stevens; S..... 294; see also E..... 284; EP..... 226
 Will Russia aid Ankara against nazis? EP..... 514
- U.S.S.R. See Union of soviet socialist republics
 Union for democratic action, the, formed; EP 544
 Policy on strikes and labor's rights. J. Loeb, Jr.; C..... 763
 Union of soviet socialist republics
 Aids Germany in breaking blockade; EP 57
 Bans foreign distribution of anti-nazi films. A. Robin; C..... 734
 And sports. C. Riess; S..... 237
 Finland as a nazi thumbscrew to extort concessions from Stalin. J. Joesten; S 716
 German pressure on Dardanelles is direct threat; EP..... 514
 Litvinov and Madame Molotov removed from central committee; EP..... 226
 Press comment on M. Sholokhov's "The Don flows home to the sea". M. Marshall; S..... 532
 Reaffirms Turkish friendship treaty; EP 365
 Removal of the American moral embargo against. L. Fischer; S..... 146; see also E..... 144
 Russo-German war. See Russo-German war
 Stalin gets a new job; Russia in the German vise. L. Fischer; S..... 573
 Russian views on Europe's war; E..... 229
 Threatens India. W. Lucas; S..... 632
 Wait, maybe I don't go. Low; Ct..... 469
 See also Japanese-Soviet relations; United States—And the Soviet Union
- Unions, labor. See Labor unions
 United automobile workers of America
 Ford contract marks a great step in the growth of; EP..... 739
 See also Ford motor company
 United mine workers of America
 Coal strike settled following operators' delay; EP..... 515
 Proposals for new contract; EP..... 311
 United service organization; campaigns for recreational facilities for soldiers; J. Daniels; S..... 754
- United States
 Acheson, D., named to state department; EP..... 115
 Agencies, governmental; report of investigating committee. I. F. Stone; S 120
 And China
 Chungking and Washington. I. F. Stone; S..... 400
 Hull promises end of extra-territoriality; EP..... 654
 Treasury releases funds to; EP..... 514
 United China relief drive launched; EP..... 423
 And France. See Franco-American relations
 And Japan. See Japanese-American relations
 And Spain
 Franco to be appeased; EP..... 59
 And sports. C. Riess; S..... 237
 And the Soviet Union
 Halifax queries state department on Russian transshipments to Germany. I. F. Stone; S..... 147
 Removal of moral embargo may result in improved Russo-Japanese relations; L. Fischer; S..... 146
 Russia sends American-bought goods to Germany; E..... 144
 Russo-German war. See Russo-German war
 And the war
 Action in Washington can restore confidence. F. Kirchwey; S..... 686 Administration stand needs further clarification. F. Kirchwey; S..... 462; see also EP..... 485
 America must act in 1941 to prevent fascist victory. F. Kirchwey; S... 6
 America must conquer its fear. J. Daniels; S..... 271
 American oil shipments to the axis. I. F. Stone; S..... 231
 American shipping aid to Britain. D. Mitchell; S..... 401; see also E..... 369; EP, 422; E. 459; EP, 541; C..... 707
 America's Caribbean policy. W. A. Roberts; S..... 428
 America's role in post-war world; EP 197
 Appeasement versus action. F. Kirchwey; S..... 600
 Appeasers call for negotiated peace; E..... 516
 Britain must have convoys. F. Kirchwey; S..... 518
 Budget for 1941 reflects world struggle; E..... 60
 "Buy-something-British" movement; EP 684
 Case for convoys, the. D. Mitchell; S..... 523
 Convoys and Admiral Land's letter on British shipping losses; EP..... 570
 Financing defense; E..... 517
 Future, in the event of a German victory. W. Millis; S..... 337
- Future of American democracy. Letters by F. Schuman, L. Dennis, and M. Lerner; C..... 36; see also C..... 111; C..... 167; C..... 455
 Germany is anxious to check American aid. A. Vagts; S..... 584
 Germany warns against use of American patrol system; EP..... 627
 Gillette-Coffee resolution on war trade with the axis, the. I. F. Stone; S..... 687; see also E..... 572; C..... 707
 Greenland taken over as defense base. J. Joesten; S..... 471
 How to invade Europe. F. Kirchwey; S..... 625; see also C..... 734
 Hull sees economic peace only after the defeat of Hitler; EP..... 599
 Hull. Going my way? Low; Ct..... 525
 Increased bomber production partly answers the convoy problem; EP..... 598
 Italian, German and Danish ships seized under right of angary; EP..... 394; see also C..... 483
 Letter calls for immediate action to defeat the axis. T. A. Tenor; C..... 678
 Maritime commission ordered to assemble shipping tonnage for aid to Britain; EP..... 541
 Japan's picture of America in a Nazi-dominated world. F. Kirchwey; S. 546
 Lindbergh's plan for a "negotiated peace"; E..... 115
 Luce, H.; formula for American domination of world trade. F. Kirchwey; S..... 229; see also..... 419
 President assails German "acts of piracy"; armed protection for American ships may follow; EP..... 738
 President assumes emergency powers, the. F. Kirchwey; S..... 658
 President orders closing of German consular and propaganda offices; axis assets frozen; EP..... 710
 President's message to congress; F. Kirchwey; S..... 34
 President's radio address on America's position; EP..... 1
 President's "unlimited emergency" speech. I. F. Stone; S..... 659
 Program for American labor. G. Counts; S..... 360
 Robin Moor incident indicates blocking of all American sea trade; EP. 709
 Rockefeller advocates use of convoys; EP..... 515
 Seized axis boats may be used for transport of defense materials; EP..... 394; see also C..... 483
 Sinking of the Zamzam; EP..... 598
 Threat of war in two oceans. I. F. Stone; S..... 659
 Union for democratic action, the, formed; EP..... 544
 United States in a fascist world, the. B. Martin; Ct..... 341
 Wheeler explains his peace proposals. I. F. Stone; S..... 35
 Worker's view, a. W. Ross; C..... 510
 See also Defense, national; Food for Europe
- Army
 Progressive high command needed. D. Mitchell; S..... 92
 What's wrong with our army? D. Mitchell; S..... 750
 Use of, in North American aviation strike. F. Kirchwey; S..... 713; see also E..... 684
 Congress considers bill to legalize wiretapping; EP..... 227; see also E..... 257
 Diplomatic appointment; EP..... 86
 Housing bill meets strong opposition in senate; E..... 370
- Lend-lease bill
 And British needs; E..... 256
 Becomes law; EP..... 281
 Criticism of; E..... 59
 Defense expenditures greatly exceed aid to Britain; E..... 311
 Delay in passage; EP..... 141
 Hearings reveal lack of candor. I. F. Stone; S..... 91
 Opposition to. F. Kirchwey; S..... 89
 President asks appropriation to implement; EP..... 309
 Reaches floor of senate; EP..... 197
 Report on first quarter's operations show lag in aid to Britain; E..... 712
 Resignations from Descendants of American revolution over action on bill; C..... 223; see also C..... 308; C..... 391
 Senator Austin supports, but asks for British peace aims; EP..... 197
 Treated in Congress as partisan measure; E..... 172
 Wheeler-Roosevelt feud; EP..... 169
 Wheeler's opposition bloc. F. Stone; S..... 287; see also EP..... 253
- Navy
 Officials charge Walsh-Healey act impedes defense; EP..... 87

- Shift of the Pacific fleet to the Atlantic urged by isolationists; EP... 682
 State department closes two Italian consulates; EP... 282
 Trade, foreign. See Business
 United States supreme court. See Supreme court, United States
 Utilities, public. See Public utilities
 Utley, Freda
 Replies to M. Lerner on the future of American democracy; C... 167; see also... 36
- V
- Vagts, Alfred
 German strategy: 1914 and 1941; S... 581
 Valley town, music for. B. H. Haggin; M... 194
 Valtin, Jan
 Charges political refugees are nazi agents; EP... 656
 Deportation proceedings against; EP... 543
 Vamhery, Rustem
 America is puzzling; C... 510
 On role of political emigrés in America; S... 18
 Vayo, Julio Alvarez del. See Refugees
 Vichy government. See France
 Vidarte, Juan S.
 De Gaulle at Dakar; S... 205
 Vienna. See Austria
 Viereck, George Sylvester
 Comment on Nation's special supplement; C... 419
 Vinson bill, and the Wagner act; E... 487; see also E... 657; C... 763 Virginia Quarterly Review. M. Marshall; 22
 Visas. See Refugees
 Viton, Albert
 Imperialism, old and new; S... 345
- W
- WPA. See Works progress administration
 Wages. See Labor
 Wages and hours act. See Labor
 Wagner act. See National labor relations board
Wall Street Journal
 Charges squeeze play forced rejection of Ford bid; EP... 171
 Waller, Odell
 Dabney, V., changes his opinion about the case of; C... 168; see also C... 223
 Walsh-Healy act; navy officials charge act impedes defense; EP... 87
- War
- And American youth. A. MacLeish; S... 717
 And the moral issues confronting democracy. B. Atkinson; S... 262; see also C... 392; C... 420
 And the use of poison gas. P. Brady; S... 668
 Chemicals and national defense. J. Schuyler; S... 291
 What does "short of war" mean? W. Willcox; C... 112
- War, African
 Addis Ababa taken by the British; EP... 421
 British capture Bardia; EP... 29
 British forces harry Italians in Eritrea and western Ethiopia; EP... 310
 Collapse of Italy's East African empire; EP... 253; see also EP... 598
 Consequences of Italian defeat in North Africa; E... 5
 De Gaulle's campaign against Dakar. J. Vidarte; S... 205
 Importance, in conduct of the war. F. Kirchwey; S... 489
 Italians forced back on Bengazi; hopes of Egyptian campaign smashed; EP... 141
 Mussolini admits reverses in Libya; EP... 225
 Nazis prepare for Egyptian campaign; EP... 513
 Probable Italian surrender in Ethiopia; EP... 393
 Water jump mirage. Low; C... 13
 Wavell's campaign against Sidi Barrani. R. Aglion; S... 372
- War, European (see also names of countries and regions)
 Aids Japan's aims in East Asia. R. Barnett; S... 492; see also C... 539
 Axis plans for spring campaign; EP... 225
 Balkan blitzkrieg and American opinion. F. Kirchwey; S... 462 Battle for Crete, the; EP... 627
- Blockade
 American food shipments to France aid Germany; E... 397
 And food for Hitler's victims; EP... 199
 Britain permits passage of flour shipment to France; EP... 365
 Britain refuses to lift blockade for food shipments to Belgium; EP... 281
 Russia aids Germany to break; EP... 57
 Vichy seeks American wheat and demands passage through blockade; E... 312
 Vichy threatens to use French navy to convoy foodships; EP... 282
- Weakened by American trade with Russia and Japan; E... 144
 Britain must prepare way for a European revolution. H. Laski; S... 349
 British and Germans intensify air raids; EP... 309
 British defeat Italian fleet in Ionian sea; EP... 393
 Churchill appeals to Italian people; EP... 2
 Churchill warns neutral countries; EP... 169
 Conquered countries heavily assessed by nazis; EP... 394
 Consequences of Italian defeat in Mediterranean; E... 5
 Convoy out of London. M. B.; S... 664
 Crete, loss of; EP... 653
 German objectives in eastern Mediterranean. F. Kirchwey; S... 201
 German pressure on Suez increases; EP... 458
 German strategy: 1914 and 1941. A. Vagts; S... 581
 Germans bomb British ports; English strike at industrial Hamburg, Bremen, and the Rhineland; EP... 569
 Germans stir anti-British feeling among Moslems. R. Aglion; S... 607; see also EP... 597
 Germany shifts populations to work for war machine. A. Field; S... 433
 Hood and the Bismarck, the; EP... 627
 How to overthrow Hitler on the continent. F. Kirchwey; S... 625; see also C... 419
 Industrial preparation for, in Germany and Britain. F. Sternberg; S... 552
 Is invasion of Britain possible? S. Posony; S... 94
 Italo-German collaboration in the Mediterranean. H. Greenwall; S... 148; see also EP... 85
 Jairmany calling. Low; C... 690
 Japan pictures the outcome. F. Kirchwey; S... 546
 Matsuoka consults axis powers on Japanese entry into the war; E... 398
 Nazi campaign for French collaboration against Britain; EP... 142
 Nazis want French fleet to close western Mediterranean; EP... 514
 Near east is next probable German objective; EP... 570
 Notes on, from the diary of Ambassador Dodd. F. Kirchwey; S... 118
 Oil for the axis war-machine. K. Hutchison; S... 296
 Palestine Jews volunteer for British army. N. Diamond; C... 419
 "Peace" efforts of W. R. Davis; EP... 30
 Possible Turkish aid to Britain. P. Stevens; S... 294
 Road to Asia Minor; E... 284
 Rumors of peace. F. Kirchwey; S... 686
 Spain and axis designs on Gibraltar. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S... 521
 Things to come. Low; C... 354
 War at sea; British shipping losses. D. Mitchell; S... 401; see also E... 369; EP... 422; E... 459
 Why Hitler hesitates. F. Kirchwey; S... 174
 Will Iberian campaign follow Balkan? EP... 485
 See also War, African; Russo-German war
- Washington letter; articles by I. F. Stone, 7, 35, 63, 91, 120, 147, 175, 203, 231, 259, 287, 315, 371, 400, 427, 463, 491, 519, 550, 575, 603, 631, 659, 687
- Watch on the Rhine. J. W. Krutch; D... 453
 Wavell, General Archibald. See War, African
 Weaver, Robert C., heads OPM division to place Negroes in defense industries. J. Daniels; S... 614
 Wechsler, James A.
 Bethlehem steel strike; S... 269
 CIO strike at Ford River Rouge plant; S... 426; see also C... 707
- Wedgwood, Josiah, Jr.
 Letter on the Lerner-Schuman-Dennis correspondence; C... 455; see also... 36
- Weygand, General Maxim. See France
 Wheeler, Burton K.
 Allows use of franked material by J. McWilliams; EP... 683
 Attacked by President Roosevelt for his stand on lend-lease bill; EP... 169
 Attacks supporters of lend-lease bill; EP... 253
 Explains his peace proposals. I. F. Stone; S... 35
 Native appeaser. H. Agar; S... 316
 Speeches on war guilt; EP... 458
 Wheeler's Cliveden set. I. F. Stone; S... 287
 Whipping, public. F. Howell; C... 252
 Whitman, Digby B.
 Letter on "Lucre thinking" by F. Kirchwey; C... 419; see also... 229
 Wicks bill, the, and the right to strike; EP... 457
 Wiesner, Arthur P.
 Urges compulsory mediation in strikes; C... 763; see also E... 657
 Willcox, W. B.
 What does "short of war" mean? C... 112
- Willcox, Walter F.
 Approves R. Neuberger's article on need for revising state and federal representation; C... 195; see also... 127
- Willkie, Wendell L.
 Supports lend-lease bill; E... 172
 Warns republican party against isolationism; EP... 198
- Willson, Corwin
 Housing economics; C... 167
- Wilson, Charles E.
 General electric head maps a new deal program. K. Hutchison; S... 184
- Winant, John G.
 Appointed ambassador to Great Britain; EP... 86
 Winnipeg, seizure of; EP... 682
- Wintringham, Tom
 Letter from England, a. M. Bennett; C... 510
- Wireless. See Radio
 Wire-tapping; Congress considers bills to legalize; EP... 227; see also E... 257
- Woman's face, a. A. Bower; MP... 622
- Workers' defense league conducts letter contest on labor's rights. I. Taylor; C... 168
- Works progress administration
 WPA is defense. F. Ryhlick; S... 155
- World order, a note on. W. H. Auden; S... 131
- Writers. See Authors
- Y
- Young, Roland
 Senatorial election campaign in Texas, the; S... 722
- Young, William
 Youth branch of committee to defend America by aiding the allies formed; C... 596
 Youth and the war. A. MacLeish; S... 717
 Youth congress. See American youth congress
 Youth branch of committee to defend America by aiding the allies formed. W. Young; C... 596 Youth reorganizes. R. Spivack; S... 71; see also C... 168
- Yugoslavia
 Appears to have rejected excessive German demands; EP... 310
 Background of the Simovich coup. S. Pribichevich; S... 399; see also E... 395
 Mixed composition of peoples makes it easy prey for nazis. R. H. Markham; S... 289; see also E... 284
 Pact with Germany meets opposition among people and cabinet members; E... 368
 Prepares to sign pact with Germany; E... 256 Reported ready to capitulate to Germany; EP... 458
- Z
- Zamzam, fate of; EP... 598
- Ziegfeld girl. A. Bower; MP... 508
- Zimmer bill, protects union lists against seizure; EP... 143
- Zukerman, William
 Anti-semitism in exile; S... 579; see also C... 652; C... 708; EP... 710

BOOK REVIEWS

Books are indexed under author and title, and in some cases under subject.

The following explanatory letters are used in the index:

B Book review
 AN Brief annotation
 R Reviewer

A

- Abend, Hallett
 Japan unmasked; B... 701
 Aftermath. J. Romaine; B... 160
- Agar, Herbert, and others
 City of man; the: A declaration on world democracy; B... 104
- Alcott, Amos Bronson, biography. D. McCuskey; AN... 28
- Aldington, Richard
 Life for life's sake; B... 134
- Allenby, A study in greatness. General Sir A. Wavell; B... 446
- Always the land. P. Engle; AN... 164
- Ambassador Dodd's diary, 1933-1938. Edited by W. Dodd, Jr., and M. Dodd; B... 272; see also... 118
- America and total war. F. Pratt; B... 702
- America can win. Major M. Wheeler-Nicholson; B... 702
- America next. F. Markham; B... 24
- American cause, the. A. MacLeish; B... 506
- American English grammar. C. Fries; AN... 26
- American fiction: 1920-1940. J. Beach; B... 646
- American renaissance, art and expression in the age of Emerson and Whitman. F. Matthiessen; B... 672

- America's lost plays. Edited by D. L. Hunt; AN 417
 And still the waters run. A. Debo; AN 26
 Angell, Norman
 Why freedom matters; AN 761
 Angell, Norman; R 214
 Arena. H. Flanagan; B 187
 Army of the future, the. General C. de Gaulle. With a foreword by W. Millis; B 477 Articles of confederation, the. M. Jensen; AN 26
 Atkins, Elizabeth
 Holy suburb; AN 676
 Aubry, Octave
 Second empire, the; B 50
 Auden, W. H.
 Double man, the. Poem; B 440
 Auden, W. H.; R 24, 756
- B
- Background of the revolution in Maryland, the. C. A. Barker; AN 26
 Baldwin, Hanson W.
 United we stand! Defense of the western hemisphere; B 561
 What the citizen should know about the navy; AN 481
 Banking, two books on, B 190
 Banse, Ewald
 Germany prepares for war; B 383
 Barker, Charles Albro
 Background of the revolution in Maryland, the; AN 26
 Bartlett, Captain Sir Basil
 My first war; B 673
 Barzun, Jacques
 Darwin, Marx, Wagner: Critique of a heritage; B 618
 Barzun, Jacques; R 561, 674
 Bates, Ralph; R 106, 562, 645, 673
 Battle for Asia, the. E. Snow; B 215
 Battle for the world, M. Werner. Translated by H. and R. Norden; B 645 Battle of Britain, the. Official British air ministry record; B 673
 Bauer, Catherine
 Citizen's guide to public housing, a; AN 508
 Beach, Joseph Warren
 American fiction: 1920-1940; B 646
 Becker, Carl
 Modern democracy; B 441
 Begin here. D. Sayers; B 218
 Behind God's back. N. Farson; B 218
 Behind the lines. Poems by A. A. Milne; AN 26
 Behind the rising sun. J. Young; B 701
 Bell, Howard M.
 Matching youth and jobs; AN 417
 Bemelmans, Ludwig
 Donkey inside, the; AN 108
 Benét, Stephen Vincent, and others
 Zero hour: A summons to the free; AN 108
 Between two worlds. U. Sinclair; B 386
 Big business, efficiency, and fascism. K. Simpson; B 620
 Bigland, Eileen
 Into China; B 188
 Birdsall, Paul
 Versailles twenty years after; B 383
 Bishop, John Peale
 Selected poems; B 447
 Bishop, John Peale; R 189
 Blood, sweat, and tears. W. Churchill; B 533
 Blunden, Edmund
 Poems 1930-1940; B 189
 Bogan, Louise; R 441
 Bottom, Phyllis
 Mansion house of liberty; B 673
 Bowman, Eleanor, L. Mitchell, and M. Phelps
 My country 'tis of thee; AN 508
 Braatoy, Bjarne; R 79
 Brinton, Crane
 Nietzsche; B 449
 Britain speaks. J. B. Priestley; AN 26
 Brittain, Vera
 England's hour; B 214
 Broken span, the. Poems by W. C. Williams; AN 221
 Bronson Alcott, teacher. D. McCuskey; AN 28
 Brooks, Van Wyck
 On literature today; B 532
 Bryan, George S.
 Great American myth, the. The true story of Lincoln's murder; AN 136 Buck, Pearl S.
 Of men and women; B 698
 Today and forever; AN 81
 Burnham, James
 Managerial revolution, the. B 505; see also C 651
 Burton, Jean
 Sir Richard Burton's wife; AN 761
 Butler, Pierce
 Origin of printing in Europe, the; AN 26
- C
- Caldwell, Taylor
 Earth is the Lord's, the; B 191
 Call the new world. J. Jennings; AN 648
 Captain from Connecticut, the. C. S. Forester; AN 705
 Captain Paul. Commander E. Ellsberg; AN 648
- Carl Milles: An interpretation of his work. M. Rogers; B 329; see also C 484
 Carlson, William S.
 Greenland lies north; AN 108
 Cash, W. J.
 Mind of the south, the; B 414
 Castle, the. F. Kafka. Translated by E. and W. Muir. Preface by T. Mann; B 217
 Chandruang, Kumut
 My boyhood in Siam; AN 108
 Chapman, John and G. Eliot, biography. G. Haight; AN 28
 Chiang Kai-shek, Madame; biography. E. Hahn; B 478
 Christianity and power politics. R. Niebuhr; B 24
 Churchill, Winston
 Blood, sweat, and tears; B 533
 Citizen's guide to public housing, a. C. Bauer; AN 508
 City of man, the. A declaration on world democracy. H. Agar, and others; B 104 Closed door, the. R. Douglas; AN 221
 Cobb, Irvin S.
 Exit laughing; B 590
 Collier, John
 Presenting moonshine; AN 136
 Conrad, Sherman; R 187, 301
 Corey, Lewis; R 51, 505, (see also C 651), 620
 Country notes in wartime. V. Sackville-West; B 673
 Cousin Honoré. S. Jameson; AN 108
 Croce, Benedetto
 History as the story of liberty; B 699
 Crowther, J. G.
 Social relations of science, the; B 413
 Crusader in crinoline: The life of Harriet Beecher Stowe. F. Wilson; B 384
 Cummings, E. E.
 Fifty poems; B 591
 Czechoslovakia: Twenty years of independence. Edited by R. J. Kerner; B 387
- D
- Dam, the. J. Ellison; AN 705
 Daniels, Josephus
 Editor in politics; B 760
 Darby, Hugh H.; R 162, 413
 Darkest hour, the. L. Lania; B 731
 Darkness at noon. A. Koestler. Translated by D. Hardy; B 620
 Darwin, Marx, Wagner: Critique of a heritage. J. Barzun; B 618
 Davis, Hassoldt; R 700
 Dawn over Chungking. Adet, Anor, and Meimei Lin; B 415
 Debo, Angie
 And still the waters run; AN 26
 Deep, the. K. Klitgaard; AN 648
 Delilah. M. Goodrich; AN 135; see also 412
 Democracy and finance. W. Douglas; B 48
 DeSmet, Pierre Jean, biography. H. Magaret; B 51
 Deutsch, Babette; R 591, 672
 Devil of the machine age, the. J. Smith; B 476
 Diary of Gino Speranza, the. Italy, 1915-1919. Edited by F. C. Speranza; B 729
 Dodd, William E.; diary, 1933-1938. Edited by W. E. Dodd, Jr., and M. Dodd; R 272; see also 118
 Donkey inside, the. L. Bemelmans; AN 108
 Double man, the. Poem by W. H. Auden; B 440
 Douglas, Ronald MacDonald
 Closed door, the; AN 221
 Douglas, William O.
 Democracy and finance; B 48
 Dryden, John, biography. J. Osborn; AN 761
- E
- Earth is the Lord's, the. T. Caldwell; B 191
 East by day. B. Niles; AN 247
 Economics of force, the. F. Munk; B 106
 Editor in politics. J. Daniels; B 760
 Edman, Irwin; R 618
 Eliot, George, and J. Chapman, biography. G. Haight; AN 28
 Ellison, Jerome
 Dam, the; AN 705
 Ellsberg, Commander Edward
 Captain Paul; AN 648
 England's hour. V. Brittain; B 214
 Engle, Paul
 Always the land; AN 164
 Englishman, an
 How to win the war; B 330
 Essay on nature, an. F. Woodbridge; AN 81
 Evans, B. Ior
 Tradition and romanticism: Studies in English poetry from Chaucer to Yeats; B 105
 Everyone's children, nobody's child. J. Polier; AN 761
 Exiles' anthology, the. Edited by H. Neville and H. Roskolenko; AN 277
 Exit laughing. I. Cobb; B 590
- F
- Farson, Negley
 Behind God's back; B 218
 Father DeSmet: Pioneer priest of the Rockies. H. Magaret; B 51
 Fifty poems. E. E. Cummings; B 591
 Fight for the Pacific, the. M. Gayn; B 701
 Firbank, Thomas
 Clough a mountain; B 506
 Fischer, Louis
 Men and politics: An autobiography; B 559
 Fisher, Alfred Young
 Ghost in the underblows, the. Poem; AN 221
 Fitzell, Lincoln
 In Plato's garden. Poems 1928-1939; AN 221
 Fivefold aid to Britain. F. Sternberg; B 90
 Flanagan, Hallie
 Arena; B 187
 Fletcher, John Gould
 South star; B 704
 Flotsom. E. M. Remarque; B 533
 Flynn, John T.
 Men of wealth; B 700
 Focus on Africa. R. Light. Photographs by Mary Light; B 621
 For whom the bell tolls. E. Hemingway. Comment on review by M. Marshall; S 160; see also 242
 Ford, Harvey S.
 What the citizen should know about the army; AN 481
 Ford, Harvey S.; R 304, 477, 702
 Forester, C. S.
 Captain from Connecticut, the; AN 705
 Forgotten, E. S.; R 51
 Foundations of American population policy. F. Lorimer, E. Winston, and L. K. Kiser; B 50
 France my country, through the disaster. J. Maritain; B 643; see also C 763
 Frank, Waldo; R 643; see also C 763
 Frankenberg, Lloyd; R 704
 Franz, Kafka miscellany. Translated by S. Fremba; B 217; see also C 279
 Fries, Charles Carpenter
 American English grammar; AN 26
 From thirty years with Freud. T. Reik. Translated by R. Winston; B 416
- G
- Galbraith, Winifred
 In China, now; B 163
 Gannett, Lewis; R 559
 Gard, Roger Martin du World of the Thibaults, the; B 244
 Gardner, Charles
 First blood for the R.A.F.; B 673
 Gaulle, General Charles de
 Army of the future, the. With a foreword by W. Millis; B 477
 Gayn, Mark J.
 Fight for the Pacific, the; B 701
 Generals and generalship. General Sir A. Wavell; AN 761
 George Eliot and John Chapman. G. Haight; AN 28
 Germany prepares for war. E. Banse; B 383
 Germs and the man. J. Hill; B 80
 Ghost in the underblows, the. Poem by A. Fisher; AN 221
 Giant Joshua. M. Whipple; B 160
 Gibbs, Philip
 Sons of the others; AN 81
 Gilson, Mary Barnett
 What's past is prologue. Reflections on my industrial experience; AN 417
 Glasgow, Ellen
 In this our life; B 382
 Glassblower and other poems, the. J. Struther; AN 221
 Glendower, Owen, biography. J. C. Powys; B 103; see also C 484
 Golden gate: The story of San Francisco harbor. F. Riesenberger, Jr.; AN 26
 Goodrich, Marcus
 Delilah; AN 136
 Parody on "Delilah". G. Highet; S 412
 Gordon, Manya
 Workers before and after Lenin; B 384
 Graves, Robert, and A. Hodge
 Long week end, the; B 673
 Gray, Stanley
 Half that glory; AN 648
 Great American myth, the. The true story of Lincoln's murder. G. Bryan; AN 136
 Great Britain, three books on; B 214
 Great Britain at war, thirteen books on; B 673
 Greenberg, Clement; R 219, 730
 Greenland lies north. W. Carlson; AN 108
 Guérard, Albert; R 160
 Guillotine at work, the. G. Maximoff; AN 28
- H
- H. M. Pulham, Esquire. J. Marquand; B 272
 Haggin, R. H.; R 448
 Hahn, Emily
 Sonnets sisters, the; B 478
 Haight, Gordon S.
 George Eliot and John Chapman; AN 28
 Half that glory. S. Gray; AN 648
 Hall, David
 Record book, the; B 674
 Hallgren, Mauritz A.
 Landscape of freedom; B 416

- Halstead, Ivor
Wings of victory; B. 673
- Harris, Bernice Kelly
Portulaca; AN. 648
- Harwood, H. M., and F. T. Jesse
London front; B. 673
- Hauser, Ernest O.
Honorable enemy; B. 701
- Heide, Dirk van der
My sister and I: The diary of a Dutch boy refugee. Translated by A. Deventer; AN. 136
- He looked for a city. A. S. M. Hutchinson; B. 105
- Hemingway, Ernest
"For whom the bell tolls"; comment on review by M. Marshall; S. 160
- Parody on his "For whom the bell tolls".
G. Hight; S. 242
- Herbst, Josephine
Satan's sergeants; B. 646
- Hight, Gilbert
Parody on "For whom the bell tolls" by Hemingway; S. 242
- Parody on M. Goodrich's "Dehlah"; S. 412
- Hill, Justina
Germs and the man; B. 80
- Hilton, James
Random harvest; B. 219
- Hindus, Maurice
To sing with the angels; AN. 537
- Hindus, Milton; R. 703
- History as the story of liberty. B. Croce; B. 699
- Hodge, Alan, and R. Graves
Long week end, the; B. 673
- Hoellering, Franz; R. 77
- Holcombe, Arthur N.
Middle classes in American politics, the;
B. 51
- Hold autumn in your hand. G. Perry; AN. 247
- Holden, Arthur C.
Money in motion: The social function of banking; B. 190
- Holding, Eileen; R. 384
- Hollander, Frederick
Those torn from earth; AN. 705
- Holmes-Pollock letters: The correspondence of Mr. Justice Holmes and Sir Frederick Pollock, 1874-1932. Edited by
M. Howe; B. 589
- Holy suburb. E. Atkins; AN. 676
- Honorable enemy. E. Hauser; B. 701
- Housing for defense; AN. 705
- Howe, Quincy
News and how to understand it, the; AN. 26
- How to win the war, "An Englishman"; B. 330
- Hutchinson, A. S. M.
He looked for a city; B. 105
- Hutchison, Keith; R. 218, 330, 446,
476, 506, 621, 700
- I
- I bought a mountain. T. Firbank; B. 506
- I must have liberty. I. de Palencia; B. 106
- Idea-Ida (parody on "Ida" by Stein). J.
O'Brien; S. 214
- In China now. W. Galbraith; B. 163
- Ingersoll, Ralph
Report on England; B. 214
- In my father's house. J. Street; AN. 481
- In Plato's garden. Poems 1928-1939 by L.
Fitzell; AN. 221
- Inquiry into meaning and truth, an. B. Russell; B. 275
- In this our life. E. Glasgow; B. 382
- Into China. E. Bigland; B. 188
- Invasion in the snow: A study of mechanized war. J. Langdon-Davies; B. 304
- J
- Jackson, Robert H.
Struggle for judicial supremacy, the; B. 273
- Jameson, Storm
Cousin Honoré; AN. 108
- Janeway, Eliot; R. 48
- Japan, four books on; B. 701
- Japan unmasked. H. Abend; B. 701
- Jarrell, Randall; R. 440
- Jenkins, D. Raymond
Letter on L. Salomon's review of J. C.
Powys' "Owen Glendower"; C. 484; see also 103
- Jennings, John
Call the new world; AN. 648
- Jensen, Merrill
Articles of confederation, the; AN. 26
- Jesse, F. Tennyson, and H. M. Harwood
London front; B. 673
- Job's house. C. Slade; AN. 417
- Joel, George; R. 590
- John Dryden. Some biographical facts and problems. J. Osborn; AN. 761
- Johnson, Burgess; R. 563
- Johnson, Samuel; biography. Edited by H.
Kingsmill; B. 187
- Johnson, Samuel
Lives of the poets, the; AN. 159
- Johnson without Boswell. A contemporary portrait of Samuel Johnson. Edited by H. Kingsmill; B. 187
- Jones, Alfred Winslow
Life, liberty, and property; B. 450
- Journey to the world's end. H. Mielche; AN. 247
- Juggernaut over Holland. E. van Kleffens; B. 79
- K
- Kabloona, G. de Poncins; B. 299
- Kafka, Franz, writings of. Translated by S.
Prombaum; B. 217; see also C. 279
- Castle, the. Translated by E. and W.
Muir. Preface by T. Mann; B. 217
- Kane, Harnett T.
Louisiana hayride; B. 728
- Kapstein, I. J.
Something of a hero; B. 700
- Kaup, Elizabeth Dewing
Not for the meek; AN. 136
- Kirchwey, Freda; R. 90
- Kiser, Louise K., F. Lorimer, and E. Winston
Foundations of American population policy; B. 50
- Kleffens, E. N. van
Juggernaut over Holland; B. 79
- Klitgaard, Kaj
Deep, the; AN. 648
- Knollenberg, Bernhard
Washington and the revolution: A reappraisal; B. 78; see also C. 195
- Kober, Arthur
My dear Bella; AN. 705
- Koestler, Arthur
Darkness at noon. Translated by D.
Hardy; B. 620
- Kohn, Hans; R. 300, (see also C. 420), 383, 333
Kronenberg, Louis; R. 161, 382, 333
- Krutch, Joseph Wood; R. 187
- Kung, Madame H. H.; biography. E. Hahn;
B. 478
- L
- Labor and national defense; B. 478
- Landscape of freedom. M. Hallgren; B. 416
- Langdon-Davies, John
Invasion in the snow: A study of mechanized war; B. 304
- Lania, Leo
Darkest hour, the; B. 731
- Lanterns on the levee. W. Percy; B. 644
- Lazarus, H. P.; R. 477, 646
- Leiser, Clara, and E. Roper
Skeleto of justice; B. 703
- Lengyel, Emil
Turkey; B. 507
- Letters from Jim. Edited by C. Roberts;
B. 673
- Life for life's sake. R. Aldington; B. 134
- Life, liberty, and property. A. Jones; B. 450
- Life of Richard Wagner, the. Volume three, 1859-1866. E. Newman; B. 448
- Light, Richard Upjohn
Focus on Africa; B. 621
- Lin, Adet, and others
Dawn over Chungking; B. 415
- Lives of the poets, the. S. Johnson; AN. 159
- Living and the dead, the. P. White; B. 276
- London front. F. T. Jesse and H. Harwood;
B. 673
- Long week end, the. R. Graves and A. Hodge;
B. 673
- Lorimer, Frank, E. Winston, and L. K. Kiser
Foundations of American population policy; B. 50
- Loth, David
Woodrow Wilson: The fifteenth point; B. 533
- Louisiana hayride. H. Kane; B. 728
- Love and death. L. Powys; AN. 648
- Love and need. Collected poems 1918-1940, by
J. Untermeyer; AN. 221
- Love in the western world. D. de Rougemont;
B. 756
- Lyle, Jeanetta; R. 536
- M
- MacLeish, Archibald
American cause, the; B. 506
- Time to speak, a; B. 506
- Magaret, Helene
Father DeSmet: Pioneer priest of the Rockies; B. 51
- Managerial revolution, the. J. Burnham;
B. 505; see also C. 651
- Mansion house of liberty. P. Bottom; B. 673
- Maritain, Jacques
France my country, through the disaster;
B. 643; see also C. 763
- Markham, Peter
America next; B. 24
- Markham, R. H.
Wave of the past, the; B. 589
- Mark Twain in eruption. Edited by B.
DeVoto; B. 161
- Marquand, John P.
H. M. Puhham, Esquire; B. 272
- Marshall, Margaret; R. 22, 160, 244, 272, 299, 532, 643, 698
- Martin, Ben
Mr. Smith and Mr. Schmidt; B. 22
- Masefield, John
Nine days' wonder, the; B. 673
- Some memories of W. B. Yeats; AN. 676
- Matching youth and jobs. H. Bell; AN. 417
- Matthiessen, F. O.
American renaissance, art and expression in the age of Emerson and Whitman; B. 672
- Maugham, W. Somerset
Up at the villa; B. 534
- Maximoff, G. P.
Guillotine at work, the; AN. 28
- McCullers, Carson
Reflections in a golden eye; AN. 247
- McCuskey, Dorothy
Bronson Alcott, teacher; AN. 28
- McIlwaine, Lucy Atkinson
Nor fire nor ice. Poems; AN. 26
- Men and politics: An autobiography. L.
Fischer; B. 559
- Men of wealth. J. Flynn; B. 700
- Menninger, Karl; R. 80, 480
- Men of the mountains. J. Stuart; AN. 508
- Middle classes in American politics, the.
A. Holcombe; B. 51
- Mielche, Hakon
Journey to the world's end; AN. 247
- Milles, Carl; an interpretation of his work.
M. Rogers; B. 329; see also C. 484
- Milne, A. A.
Behind the lines. Poems; AN. 26
- Mind of the south, the. W. J. Cash; B. 414
- Mitchell, Lucy Sprague, E. Bowman, and M.
Phelps
My country 'tis of thee; AN. 508
- Modern democracy. C. Becker; B. 441
- Moén, Lars
Under the iron heel; B. 299
- Monetary proposals for social reform. M.
Myers; B. 103
- Money in motion: The social function of banking. A. Holden; B. 190
- Mower, Edgar Ansel; R. 272
- Mr. Smith and Mr. Schmidt. B. Martin; B. 22
- Multiple human births. H. Newman; B. 162
- Munk, Frank
Economics of force, the; B. 106
- Munz, Charles Curtis; R. 644, 728
- Murrow, Edward R.
This is London; B. 673
- Must we grow old? B. Newman; B. 480
- My boyhood in Siam. K. Chandruang; AN. 108
- My country 'tis of thee. L. Mitchell, E. Bowman, and M. Phelps; AN. 508
- My dear Bella. A. Kober; AN. 705
- My first war. Captain Sir B. Bartlett; B. 673
- My sister and I: The diary of a Dutch boy refugee. D. van der Heide. Translated by A. Deventer; AN. 136
- Myers, Margaret G.
Monetary proposals for social reform; B. 103
- N
- Nature and destiny of man, the: A christian interpretation. I. Human nature. R.
Niebuhr; B. 328
- Neff, Emery
Revolution in European poetry, a: 1660-
1900; B. 441
- Nehru, Jawaharlal
Toward freedom; B. 244
- Neilson, William Allen
We escaped; B. 562
- New directions in prose and poetry, 1940.
Edited by J. Laughlin; B. 133
- New poems: 1940. An anthology of British and American verse. Edited by O.
Williams; B. 730
- Newman, Barclay
Must we grow old? B. 480
- Newman, Ernest
Life of Richard Wagner, the. Volume three, 1859-1866; B. 448
- Newman, Horatio Hackett
Multiple human births; B. 162
- News and how to understand it, the. Q.
Howe; AN. 26
- Niebuhr, Reinhold
Christianity and power politics; B. 24
- Nature and destiny of man, the: A Christian interpretation. I. Human nature;
B. 328
- Niebuhr, Reinhold; R. 441, 506, 699
- Nietzsche, C. Brinton; B. 449
- Night over Europe: The diplomacy of Nemesis, 1939-1940. F. Schuman;
B. 300; see also C. 420
- Niles, Blair
East by day; AN. 247
- Nine days' wonder, the. J. Masefield; B. 673
- Nomad, Max
On L. Corey's review of "The managerial revolution" by J. Burnham;
C. 651; see also 505
- Norden, Ruth; B. 107
- Nor fire nor ice. Poems by L. McIlwaine;
AN. 26
- Not by strange gods. E. M. Roberts; B. 758;
see also AN. 537
- Not for the meek. E. Kaup; AN. 136
- Noyes, Charles E.; R. 106

- O'Brien, Justin
Parody on "Ida" by Stein; S. 214
O'Brien, Justin; R. 244
Of men and women. P. Buck; B. 698
Oliver Wiswell (pamphlet attacking historical accuracy, by A. Loring Richards).
M. Marshall; S. 643
On literature today. V. W. Brooks; B. 532
Origin of printing in Europe, the. P. Butler;
AN. 26
Orrick, James; R. 50, 414, 760
Ortega y Gasset, José
Toward a philosophy of history; B. 444
Osborn, James M.
John Dryden. Some biographical facts and problems; AN. 761
Other worlds, the. Edited, with an introduction by P. Stong; AN. 648
Out of the night. J. Valtin; B. 77
Owen Glendower. J. C. Powys; B. 103; see also C. 484
- P
Paassen, Pierre van
Time is now, the; B. 755
Paassen, Pierre van; R. 299
Palencia, Isabel de
I must have liberty; B. 106
Pardners, the. J. Veld; AN. 277
Percy, William Alexander
Lanterns on the levee; B. 644
Perry, George Sessions
Hold autumn in your hand; AN. 247
Phelps, Mary, L. Sprague, and E. Bowman
My country 'tis of thee; AN. 508
Poems 1930-1940. E. Blunden; B. 189
Poetry of Dorothy Wordsworth, the. Edited by H. Eigerman; AN. 26
Polier, Justine Wise
Everyone's children, nobody's child; AN. 761
Poncins, Contran de
Kabloom; B. 299
Portulaca, B. Harris; AN. 648
Powell, Hickman
What the citizen should know about the coast guard; AN. 481
Powell, Thomas Reed; R. 273, 589
Powys, John Cowper
Owen Glendower; B. 103; see also C. 484
Powys, Llewellyn
Love and death; AN. 648
Pratt, Fletcher
America and total war; B. 702
Presenting moonshine. J. Collier; AN. 136
Priestley, J. B.
Britain speaks; AN. 26
- R
Rahv, Philip; R. 133, 217; see also C. 279, 646
Random harvest. J. Hilton; B. 219
Rauschnig, Hermann
Redemption of democracy, the; B. 274
Record book, the. D. Hall; B. 674
Redemption of democracy, the. H. Rauschnig; B. 274
Reflections in a golden eye. C. McCullers; AN. 247
Reik, Theodor
From thirty years with Freud; B. 416
Remarkable Andrew, the. D. Trumbo; AN. 164
Remarque, Erich Maria
Flotsom; B. 533
Report on England. R. Ingersoll; B. 214
Revolution in European poetry, a: 1660-1900. E. Neff; B. 441
Richards, Augustus Loring, attacks K. Roberts' "Oliver Wiswell". M. Marshall; S. 643
Riesenberg, Felix, Jr.
Golden gate: The story of San Francisco harbor; AN. 26
Roberts, Elizabeth Madox
Not by strange gods; B. 758; see also AN. 537
Roberts, Kenneth
"Oliver Wiswell" attacked by A. L. Richards, M. Marshall; S. 643
Rochester, Anna
Why farmers are poor; B. 25
Rogers, Lindsay; R. 561
Rogers, Meyric R.
Carl Milles: An interpretation of his work; B. 329; see also C. 484
Romains, Jules
Aftermath; B. 160
Roper, Edith, and C. Leiser
Skeleton of justice; B. 703
Rosinski, Herbert; R. 755
Rougmont, Denis de
Love in the western world; B. 756
Rougmont, Denis de; R. 328, 444
Rugg, Harold
That men may understand; B. 563
Russell, Bertrand
Inquiry into meaning and truth, an; B. 275
- S
Sackville-West, V.
Country notes in wartime; B. 673
Salomon, Louis B.; R. 103, (see also C. 484), 191, 219, 276, 386, 620
Salvemini, Gaetano; R. 729
Satan's sergeants. J. Herbst; B. 646
Sayers, Dorothy L.
Begin here; B. 561
Schulberg, Budd
What makes Sammy run? B. 477
Schuman, Frederick L.
Night over Europe: The diplomacy of Nemesis, 1939-1940; B. 300; see also C. 420
Science in progress, second series. L. Stadler, and others. Edited by G. Baitsell; B. 536
Search for financial security, the. R. Warren; B. 190
Second empire, the. O. Aubry. Translated by A. Livingston; B. 50
Second wind. C. Zuckmayer. Introduction by D. Thompson; B. 107
Selected poems. J. P. Bishop; B. 447
Seton, Ernest Thompson
Trail of an artist naturalist; autobiography; AN. 108
Shelley, N. White; B. 301
Silent drum, the. N. Swanson; AN. 81
Simpson, Kemper
Big business, efficiency, and fascism; B. 620
Sinclair, Upton
Between two worlds; B. 386
Sir Richard Burton's wife. J. Burton; AN. 761
Skeleton of justice. E. Roper and C. Leiser; B. 703
Slade, Caroline
Job's house; AN. 417
Slochow, Harry
On review of F. Kafka miscellany; C. 279; see also. 217
Smith, J. Russell
Devil of the machine age, the; B. 476
Snow, Edgar
Battle for Asia, the; B. 215
Snow, Edgar; R. 415
Social relations of science, the. J. G. Crowther; B. 413
Some memories of W. B. Yeats. J. Masfield; AN. 676
Something of a hero. I. J. Kapstein; B. 700
Sons of the others. P. Gibbs; AN. 81
Soong sisters, the. E. Hahn; B. 478
South star. J. Fletcher; B. 704
Stadler, L. F., and others
Science in progress, second series. Edited by G. Baitsell; B. 536
Stein, Gertrude
Parody on her "Ida". J. O'Brien; S. 214
Stein, Rose M.; R. 450, 478, 758
Sternberg, Fritz
Fivefold aid to Britain; B. 90
Stewart, Maxwell S.; R. 25, 50, 163, 188, 215, 701
Stowe, Harriet Beecher, biography. F. Wilson; B. 384 Street, James
In my father's house; AN. 481
Streit, Clarence K.
Union now with Britain; B. 383
Structure of art, the. C. Thurston; B. 219
Struggle for judicial supremacy, the. R. H. Jackson; B. 273
Struther, Jan
Glass-blower and other poems, the; AN. 221
Stuart, Jesse
Men of the mountains; AN. 508
Sumner-Boyd, Hilary; R. 105
Sun Yat-sen, Madame; biography. E. Hahn; B. 478
Swanson, Neil E.
Silent drum, the; AN. 81
Sweezy, Paul M.; R. 103, 190
- T
That men may understand. H. Rugg; B. 563
Their finest hour. Edited by A. A. Michie and W. Graebner; B. 673
This is London. E. Murrow; B. 673
Thomas, Norman
We have a future; B. 758
Those torn from earth. F. Hollander; AN. 705
Thou tellest me, comrade (parody on "For whom the bell tolls" by Hemingway). G. Highet; S. 242
Thurston, Carl
Structure of art, the; B. 219
Thwaites, John Anthony
Letter on M. Zabel's review of M. Rogers' "Carl Milles"; C. 484
Time is now, the. P. van Paassen; B. 755
Time to speak, a. A. MacLeish; B. 506
Today and forever. P. Buck; AN. 81
To sing with the angels. M. Hindus; AN. 537
Toward a philosophy of history. J. Ortega y Gasset; B. 444 Toward freedom. Jawaharlal Nehru; B. 244
Tradition and romanticism: Studies in English poetry from Chaucer to Yeats. B. Evans; B. 105
Trail of an artist naturalist. E. Seton; AN. 108
Trumbo, Dalton
Remarkable Andrew, the; AN. 164
Turkey. E. Lengyel; B. 507
Twain, Mark; autobiography. Edited by B. DeVoto; B. 161
- U
U.S.S. Jezebel (parody on "Delilah" by Goodrich). G. Highet; S. 412
Under the iron heel. L. Moën; B. 299
Union now with Britain. C. Streit; B. 383
United we stand: Defense of the western hemisphere. H. Baldwin; B. 561
Untermyer, Jean Starr
Love and need. Collected poems 1918-1940; AN. 221
Up at the villa. W. S. Maugham; B. 534
Utley, Freda; R. 384
- V
Valtin, Jan
Out of the night; B. 77
Vamberg, Rustem; R. 24, 104, 387, 449, 507, 589
Vamberg, Rustem
Letter on H. Kohn's review of F. Schuman's "Night over Europe"; C. 420; see also. 300
Van Doren, Dorothy; R. 105, 134, 416, 758
Versailles twenty years after. P. Birdsall; B. 383
Vivas, Eliseo; R. 275
- W
Wagner, Richard; biography. E. Newman; B. 448
Wales, Nym; R. 478
War letters from Britain. Edited by D. Forbes-Robertson and R. Straus, Jr.; B. 214
Warren, Robert B.
Search for financial security, the; B. 190
Washington and the revolution: A reappraisal. B. Knollenberg; B. 78; see also C. 195
Wave of the past, the. R. Markham; B. 589
Wavell, General Sir Archibald
Allenby: A study in greatness; B. 446
Generals and generalship; AN. 761
We escaped. W. Neilson; B. 562
We have a future. N. Thomas; B. 758
Weld, John
Pardners, the; AN. 277
Werner, Max
Battle for the world. Translated by H. and R. Norden; B. 645
What makes Sammy run? B. Schulberg; B. 477
What's past is prologue. Reflections on my industrial experience. M. Gilson; AN. 417
What the citizen should know about the army. H. Ford; AN. 481
What the citizen should know about the coast guard. H. Powell; AN. 481
What the citizen should know about the navy. H. Baldwin; AN. 481
Wheeler-Nicholson, Major Malcom
America can win; B. 702
Whipple, Maurine
Giant Joshua; B. 160
White, Newman Ivey
Shelley; B. 301
White, Patrick
Living and the dead, the; B. 276
Whistle stop. M. Wolff; AN. 648
Why farmers are poor. A. Rochester; B. 25
Why freedom matters. N. Angell; AN. 761
Williams, William Carlos
Broken span, the. Poems; AN. 221
Wilson, Forrest
Crusader in crinoline: The life of Harriet Beecher Stowe; B. 384
Wilson, Woodrow, biography. D. Loth; B. 533
Wings of victory. I. Halstead; B. 673
Winston, Ellen, F. Lorimer, and L. K. Kiser
Foundations of American population policy; B. 50
Wolff, Maritta M.
Whistle stop; AN. 648
Women of Britain. Introduction by J. Struther; B. 673
Woodbridge, Frederick J. E.
Essay on nature an; AN. 81
Woodrow Wilson: The fifteenth point. D. Loth; B. 533
Woodward, B. E.; R. 78; see also C. 195
Wordsworth, Dorothy, poems. Edited by H. Eigerman; AN. 26
Workers before and after Lenin. M. Gordon; B. 384
World of the Thibaults, the. R. M. du Gard; B. 244
- Y
Young, James R.
Behind the rising sun; B. 701
- Z
Zabel, Morton Dauwen; R. 329, (see also C. 484), 447, 534
Zero hour: A summons to the free. S. V. Benét and others; AN. 108
Zilhoorg, Gregory; R. 416
Zuckmayer, Carl
Second wind. Introduction by D. Thompson; B. 107

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 152

NEW YORK · SATURDAY · JANUARY 4, 1941

NUMBER 1

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

EDITORIALS:

Tasks Before Congress

Still Partners with Japan

Suez to Spain

Order of the Year by Freda Kirchwey

Brains for Defense by I. F. Stone

The Choice for the Americas by Lewis Corey

Labor's Catholic Bloc by Richard H. Rovere

Negroes and Defense by Metz T. P. Lochard

On "The Duty of the Emigré" Comments by Pierre Cot, Hans Kohn, Norman Angell, Bjarne Braatoy, Paul Hagen, Max Ascoli, Rustem Vamberg, Franz Hoellering, Konrad Heiden

EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS by Keith Hutchison

IN THE WIND

A NATIVE AT LARGE by Jonathan Daniels

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Notes by the Way by Margaret Marshall

John Landless at the Final Port by Ivan Goll

The European Lesson by Rustem Vamberg

Tract for the Times by W. H. Auden

Marx and the American Farmer by Maxwell S. Stewart

IN BRIEF

RECORDS by B. H. Haggin

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor
ROBERT BENDINER

Literary Editor
MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON MAXWELL S. STEWART I. F. STONE

Dramatic Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager and Director of Circulation
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MURIEL C. GRAY

PULLING NO PUNCHES AND DEFYING THE wrath both of the dictators and of their conscious and unconscious tools in this country, the President has voiced the determination of the American people to assist to the utmost the efforts of Britain and its Allies to overthrow Hitlerism. With unanswerable logic he proved that this course was necessitated by vital national interests, and he showed how impossible it would be for America to remain at peace in a Nazi-controlled world except by the sacrifice of everything for which it stands. It will be interesting to see how the dictator powers reply to this challenge. We do not expect them to break off relations, for they will not wish to deprive themselves of the advantages derived from their horde of diplomatic agents in this country. More probable is an attempt to minimize the importance of the speech, accompanied by a mixture of threats and protestations that the Axis cherishes no designs against the Americas. To the British the President has brought a message of hope at a moment when his plea for greater speed and effort was being underlined by a devastating raid on London. We must now see that deeds do not lag behind words.

★

GERMAN TROOP MOVEMENTS INTO RUMANIA are being so well advertised that it is reasonable to suspect an attempt to cover up plans for a blow in a totally different direction. Heightened vigilance along the British coasts and intensified attacks by the RAF on the invasion ports suggest a belief in London that a new attempt to cross the Channel may be imminent. If this is not the danger point, then an expedition through Spain and the seizure of Portugal may be in the wind. Nevertheless, even though the numbers involved are being exaggerated, it is certain that considerable reinforcements have been added to the German army of occupation in Rumania. One of their tasks is to strengthen the Nazi grip on that country, which has been "softened" by Iron Guard anarchy and is now ready for a greater degree of "protection." But reports of concentrations on the Russian, Yugoslav, and Bulgarian borders suggest additional objectives. These military gestures are no doubt intended to buttress diplomatic pressure on Yugoslavia and Bulgaria and to prepare the way for later demands for a right of passage. Berlin has certainly noted with displeasure the increase of Russian influence in Sofia. Moreover, the Bulgarian Assembly has now formally declared against adhesion to the Tripartite Pact, and the Premier and War Minister have pointedly denied the necessity for "outside protection." German moves near the Russian border have renewed speculation about a possible Nazi invasion of the Ukraine. Nothing seems more unlikely to us, but Hitler may well think it worth a few divisions to keep Moscow worried, and he may also believe that a latent threat to Russia's western frontier will assist negotiations for a Russo-Japanese agreement.

★

WINSTON CHURCHILL'S APPEAL TO ITALY was well timed, coming as it did immediately after Graziani's dispatch describing the parlous position of his army. The publication of this exceedingly frank document was no doubt an attempt to offset rumors about the extent of the disaster suffered in Africa. It attempted to reassure Italians and at the same time to give a plausible explanation for an undeniable defeat. Reading between the lines we find a devastating criticism of the Rome government, which ordered the advance into Egypt without being able to provide adequate supplies or insure safe communications. Churchill's speech sought to capitalize on the uneasiness of the Italian people, who never wanted war, who cannot fail to know that Mussolini's bombast is being pitilessly exposed, and who regard their Nazi partners with fear and suspicion. News of the British Premier's appeal is spreading. It cannot be altogether suppressed, and that is why the Italian government has made public a carefully edited version which significantly omits the passages blaming Mussolini alone for taking Italy into war and the text of the remarkable last-minute message which Churchill sent in May, hoping to prevent a severance of relations. But such suppressions cannot render less acute the dilemma which Churchill brought into sharp relief: Is Italy to "stand up to the battery of the whole British Empire . . . or, on the other hand, call in Attila over the Brenner Pass . . . to hold down and protect the Italian people"? The "protectors" are already seeping in, but so far only in small numbers. The dispatch of stronger forces is impeded by the difficulty of transporting troops by road through the Alpine passes under winter conditions. Movement by rail is easier, but it requires sixty-four trains to carry a division of German troops with equipment. Thus, apart from political considerations, there are physical obstacles to Nazi reinforcement of Italy.

★

THE LONG-AWAITED JAPANESE DRIVE TO THE south appears to be taking shape. But instead of a swift sortie against the Dutch East Indies or Burma, as anticipated several months ago, it seems likely to be a cautious advance dependent upon diplomatic rather than military measures. Added pressure has been brought against the French authorities of Indo-China for naval and air bases which would be useful for an attack on the Malay States, Burma, or the Philippines. Plans are also being pushed for the establishment of Japanese air bases in Thailand. The sporadic border skirmishes between Thailand and Indo-China seem to have been instigated by the Japanese in order to provide a pretext for intervention should such a step prove desirable. Meanwhile, as a means of consolidating its position in the southern part of China, the Japanese have launched a drive into north Kwangtung which for the moment appears to be successful. This is the first important offensive action undertaken by the Japanese in China in the past six months, and has as its avowed purpose the cutting of Chinese supply lines through the small South China ports still in Chinese hands. The extent of Chinese resistance to this drive will, along with the outcome of present Japanese negotiations with the Soviet Union, probably determine the speed with which the new program of Japanese expansion to the south unfolds in the early weeks of 1941.

★

THE REUTHER PLAN FOR MOBILIZING THE excess capacity of the automobile industry for the mass production of pursuit planes, first news of which was published in The Nation on December 21, is being given serious consideration by the New Supreme Defense Board. We hope the board and its technical advisers will be able to examine it in a really objective manner and will not allow it to be thrust aside because of fears that it might temporarily have adverse effects on the profits of the aircraft and automobile industries. Mr. Reuther's proposal is not just a hastily conceived brain-wave but a carefully worked-out scheme embodying a great deal of research. It shows conclusively that the automobile industry, even when operating at a comparatively high rate, as it has done in the past twelve months, is capable of a huge expansion in output. It has modern machine tools available which could be adapted to aircraft manufacture in a shorter time than the building of new tools for new factories would require. And it has thousands of highly skilled tool-and-die makers, partly or wholly idle, who could be put to work. Aircraft specialists, however, have already raised the cry that the plan is technically unsound even though the Reuther memorandum answers many of their objections in advance. We have yet to hear from the chiefs of the automobile industry. We hope they will not cold-shoulder the plan because its success would enhance the prestige and authority of the Automobile Workers' Union. It is a real token of the anxiety of responsible labor organizations to cooperate in making the defense program fully effective, and as such it must not be lightly dismissed.

DESPITE PUBLISHED REPORTS TO THE CONTRARY, the new Ford contract for $1,400,000 in midget military cars has not yet been signed, and from all that can be learned in the War Department Ford has not yet met the specifications of the contract. Thus the President still has an "out" through which he can prevent the award of another contract to our foremost Wagner Act violator. The Nation was the first to reveal, in its issue of December 14, the curious background of this new contract, the fact that other sources of supply were available, and that the Defense Commission had gone out of its way to favor Ford. As a result of the protests which followed, the Adjutant General on December 17 issued an order stating that all future War Department contracts were to be let with the understanding that a condition of the contract was compliance with all federal labor laws. It is understood in the War Department that a provision to this effect is to go into all future contracts, but Ford representatives have been boasting in Washington that Ford will not sign the new contract if it contains such a provision. Another special privilege being asked for Ford is that the army change the specifications for the midget military car to make it easier for the Ford Company to meet them.

★

J. EDGAR HOOVER SEEMS TO BE TRYING TO act as attorney general as well as director of the FBI. His statement at Miami Beach on the Bridges case seems calculated to embarrass Mr. Jackson and force him to act as Hoover desires. The Hoover report on Bridges was submitted to the Attorney General on November 28; nothing has been done about it because—despite Hoover's claims—it contained little evidence that had not already been found untrustworthy or perjured by James M. Landis in his special hearing on the Bridges case for the Department of Justice. An open hearing on the FBI report is likely to embarrass Mr. Jackson, but Mr. Hoover seems intent on forcing his superior's hand. The hounding of Bridges is in sharp contrast to the failure of both the FBI and the Dies committee to make a thorough investigation into Bridges's documented charges of Nazi "plants" in West Coast aviation factories. They are interested not in protecting defense against sabotage and spies but in doing the bidding of the powerful California shipping and banking interests which want Bridges deported because he organized labor on the waterfront and helped organize it in the agricultural valleys. Mr. Hoover also called attention again to his mysterious card index of "subversives." He has already shown that he can't tell a red from an anthropologist, and his index is a great potential menace to liberty in war time.

Tasks Before Congress

NO CONGRESS since the close of the last war has been confronted with issues of such gravity and complexity as those facing the session of the Seventy-seventh Congress which opens this week. The Congress which just ended set a record for defense appropriations in peace time. The new Congress has the much more fundamental task of deciding how the defense equipment now being created can most effectively be used and how it can be paid for.

Foremost among the issues before Congress is, of course, our policy with respect to the war and aid for Britain. The President's radio address has set the keynote, but it remains for Congress to make the basic decisions. It is evident that the Neutrality Act will have to be either revised drastically or repealed. Of the two alternatives repeal seems the most honest and the safest, since it would restore the traditional basis of international law as a guide for American foreign policy. Repeal of the Johnson Act may not be necessary to carry out the President's plan of lending arms to the British, but it is a bad law, and its existence only serves as an inducement to subterfuge or lack of realism in facing the immediate problems of foreign policy. It should be repealed.

With regard to the Far East no immediate legislation is essential. The President already has it within his power to cut off all trade with Japan, including both imports and exports. But the apparent unwillingness of the Administration to take the action desired by an overwhelming majority of the population may again deposit this problem on the doorstep of Congress.

On the domestic front the main task of Congress is to formulate a program for financing the extraordinarily heavy defense obligations assumed during the past year. There was no time to work out such a program during the hectic days of last summer. Defense plans had to be laid, and money appropriated to start the process in operation. But the means that are adopted to finance defense will determine, to a large extent, the future of our democracy. If the defense program is to be financed primarily by loans we shall not only experience inflation, with its intolerable burden on manual and professional workers, but a situation in which the well-to-do, who lend money to the government, will have a mortgage on the nation's revenues for many years to come. If, on the other hand, defense financing is placed on a pay-as-you-go basis, it is of utmost importance that the new taxes be progressive rather than regressive in character. The broad outlines of a program were set late in November at a White House conference attended by Treasury officials and Congressional leaders. They are said to include a sharp increase in income-tax rates, a strengthening of the gift-tax provisions, and removal of tax exemption on future government bond issues. Although this may be said to represent a start toward a realistic and progressive tax policy, it is evident that the Administration has not yet faced the full social and economic implications of large-scale borrowing for defense.

On matters of defense itself Congress's responsibility should be less heavy than during the last six months. A deficiency appropriation of about $1,000,000,000 will come up for immediate action. Revision of the Selective Service Act is being discussed in some quarters, but no drastic change in the law is anticipated at this session of Congress. Conservatives have served notice that they will seek revision of the Walsh-Healey, Fair Labor Standards, and Labor Relations acts under the guise of strengthening defense. This drive may take on serious proportions, but it obviously has little to do with defense. On the other side of the tracks, labor will ask that Congress adopt legislation making it illegal to give defense contracts to firms violating existing labor laws.

The development of the defense program has created the necessity for emergency legislation in such fields as housing, public health, and social security. The housing situation is admittedly critical. Skilled workers are being kept out of vital armament industries by the shortage of dwellings. Prompt action is also essential to deal with critical health problems that have arisen in connection with the building of new army cantonments and in the overcrowded areas surrounding the new defense industries. This would seem to be the time to enlarge the activities of the United States Public Health Service as proposed by the National Health Conference two years ago. The Social Security Act needs overhauling to protect drafted men against loss of status with regard to unemployment and old-age benefits. Two years have passed since the last revision of this act, and it is high time that its fundamental benefits be extended to the groups now excluded.

Still Partners with Japan

DESPITE much-discussed embargoes and licensing systems—and the increased aid given to China—the United States continues to be Japan's chief source of war supplies. A report on our trade with Japan and China prepared by the Department of Commerce shows a sharp increase in exports during October as compared with September and notes that this increase—from $17,778,000 to $26,195,000—was due "primarily to increased shipments of gasoline (other than aviation gasoline), refined and scrap copper, and metal-working machinery." It represented in other words, increased exports of basic war materials, and in at least one of these—metal-working machinery—we already have a serious shortage.

Machine tools represent one of the most serious bottlenecks in the defense program, but we go on shipping them to Japan. In 1937 we sold Japan $11,904,000 worth. In 1938 the amount rose to $23,000,000, and in 1939 to $26,000,000. For the first nine months of this year the figure was $19,756,000, or $132,000 more than for the first nine months of 1939. Although there is now supposed to be a virtual embargo on machine tools, sales of power-driven metal-working machinery totaled $1,410,000 in October as compared with $676,000 in September. Another defense bottleneck is in the supply of aluminum, and although shipments to Japan have fallen, we sold it 1,109,000 pounds in the first ten months of this year.

Our embargoes on aviation gas and scrap iron have easily been circumvented by increased Japanese purchases of ordinary gasoline and other petroleum products and of iron and steel in other forms. Japan's purchases of petroleum products during the first ten months of this year totaled almost $38,000,000, or $2,000,000 more than in the first ten months of 1939. In iron and steel, it got 148 tons of scrap in October as in September, but paid $2,643,000 for it in October as against $2,521,000 in September. This was only half as much scrap as the Japanese took from us in October a year ago, but they made up for the decrease by enormous increases in their purchases of certain types of steel. Their imports of iron and steel bars and rods rose from 47,000,000 pounds in the first ten months of last year to 227,000,000 pounds in the first ten months of this year. They took 5,614,000 pounds of iron and steel plates in the same period this year, as against 1,478,000 pounds last year. Exports to Japan of black steel sheets for the ten months rose from 75,000 pounds to 1,101,000 pounds. The rise in strips, hoops, and bands was from 10,000 pounds to 37,923,000 pounds. In tinplate the increase was from 359,000 pounds to 20,568,000 pounds. Japan's purchases of iron and steel forgings doubled. Yet we are having difficulty in filling defense orders for steel promptly, and an actual shortage of capacity is a possibility in the near future. Similar sharp increases are shown in Japanese purchases of copper, another basic war material.

We are spending billions to prepare ourselves for war. One of our possible enemies in that war is Japan, which has already bound itself to intervene in the Pacific if we become engaged in the Atlantic. The more war materials we sell to Japan, the higher their cost and the greater their scarcity at home, and the greater our need for them against a Japan we have ourselves strengthened. There are profits to be made in this process, coming and going—for our copper, steel, and oil barons. These gentlemen have entirely too "international" an outlook to suit us. How much longer is our government going to confront Japanese aggression with strong words—while winking at the profitable back-door business of supplying the weapons of that aggression?

Suez to Spain

IN ORDER to estimate the probable consequences of the Italian defeats in the North African and Mediterranean campaigns it is necessary to examine Italy's place in the grand strategy of the Axis and the reasons for its entry into active warfare against Britain. Undoubtedly the Italian dictator had imagined not only that Britain was likely to withdraw from the war but that this would throw the French empire in Africa into the market. Failing to obtain territories from Hitler under the armistice, he launched the Egyptian campaign in September, while Britain was still weak, without due consideration of the difficulties or even of the true nature of the war as it would be. By entering a struggle between a land and a sea power he drew upon himself the main weight of battle at the precise point, and the only point, where British sea power and land power could effectively support each other.

So much General Graziani rather bluntly hints in his recent report to Mussolini when he draws attention to the unsolved problem of supply, which in great measure halted his offensive. The difficulties arose from inability to safeguard communications between Italy and Libya. But having chosen to attack, without naval superiority, in an area in which Britain was bound to make a powerful counter-effort, Mussolini found himself left with no way of escape.

If Alexandria had been occupied and the British navy had lost its principal base, the Suez region—and this includes Egypt and the Sudan—would have fallen under Axis control. What this would have meant can be appreciated if it is recalled that the British colonization of the East African coast and hinterland proceeded apace after the construction of the Suez Canal. The Italian East African army would have become a vitalized force able to extend its operations to Kenya and Tanganyika and other regions. Even though the Axis powers do not, at present, possess administrative means for drawing the richest profit from Africa, the consequences for Europe would have been enormous. The rearrangement of trade routes, the opening up of new areas of economic support in Africa, combined with those of western Asia, where valuable supplies of oil are to be obtained, would necessarily have poured content into the New Order. The relief of distress and the means of purchasing additional support from Spain and the Balkan countries would have been within Hitler's power.

The sum total of the Italian effort has been both to weaken the right-wing Axis advance to the Suez (through the Balkans) and to shatter the left (in Egypt). For though the British were compelled to weaken their prepared offensive at Sidi Barrani in order to help their Greek allies, the Greek successes in themselves were of great help in the grand strategical sense. The possession of Crete, neutralizing the Dodecanese bases to some extent, seals Britain's grip on the Mediterranean.

It is worth while glancing at the tactical facts of the North African battle. Despite Graziani's denial, his forces were surprised not only by the timing of the blow but by the quantity and quality of the mechanized equipment at General Wavell's disposal. The shortcomings of the Italian effort to adapt the system of defense in depth to open desert country were quickly revealed. Once the mechanized British spearhead had been thrust between the numerous but isolated strong points, the advance to Bardia resembled the unstringing of a chain of beads, each fort falling inevitably to an identical maneuver.

Again one sees that a total numerical superiority in a strategical area is useless if local superiority cannot be established. The British, in the sum inferior, were able to concentrate a greater number of troops at each isolated fort. There is nothing to indicate that this cannot be done as far as Tobruk and even Derna. The Italian high command, unless it risks battle against the British navy, will run great risks in strongly garrisoning those points, for, in the event of their fall, far too few troops would be left at the admittedly formidable base at Tripoli. The unstringing of the chain can therefore probably continue. By now the British command has taken measure of the qualitative inferiority of Italian material. This can hardly be rectified by Hitler, except in the air, for large convoys have little hope of reaching Libya. Even air support must be limited by the inadequate supplies on Libyan soil. It will be long before General Graziani can organize a counter-thrust, for the loss of 40,000 men, not including the 20,000 in Bardia, will have disorganized his entire army.

A power holding North Africa and possessing, at the same time, a secure foothold in the Balkan Peninsula can threaten southern Italy with a pincer movement. Thus if Greece can complete its triumph in Albania, and Britain obtain a firm hold on Libya, Mussolini will be menaced on his own soil. A good deal of ground must be covered before these conditions are fulfilled, but the threat has been made by Mr. Churchill; the plan, therefore, probably exists. Meanwhile the Italian high command is undoubtedly expecting a German counter-blow which will do something to reestablish the strategical balance. Where is this most likely to fall? In the Balkans? Perhaps, but the removal of the Italian threat to Egypt doubles the difficulties and dangers of a great flanking movement through Turkey and Syria. In Spain? Hitler may now force Franco to pay his political debt, but the Italian defeat will surely encourage Franco to try to stall a little longer. It would not be surprising, therefore, if the Axis, thwarted at the periphery of the empire, should swing back to the center and renew its efforts to stage a successful invasion of Britain.

Order of the Year

BY FRED KIRCHWEY

THE President's magnificent defiance of the dictators should serve as an intellectual catharsis for the nation. He expressed our inner feelings and resolved our doubts and told us plainly what we face. It was as if everything we had sensed darkly, even unconsciously, had suddenly emerged into the light of objective certainty. Now we feel, with a sort of self-satisfaction, that we knew it all the time. Perhaps we did. Because what we've got to do is, of course, very simple—not simple to do but simple to recognize. We've got to merge ourselves—as people, as institutions, as a nation—in the defense of freedom. We've got to prevent a fascist victory.

Of course we must also win a democratic victory; but that will come later. At present Hitler has the initiative; at present he is ahead. The job today is to keep the war going long enough to prevent him from winning. Then we can begin to talk about defeating him. The effort to prevent Hitler from winning is likely to take all our strength—and all of 1941—to accomplish.

So far we have scarcely tackled it, although the President spoke encouraging words about our industrial progress. We have sent Britain a few airplanes—1,500 or so—and other supplies. And we have started to create a defense of our own. But we have only begun to sense what lies ahead if Hitler is to be stopped. We still think, for example, that we can go on turning out as many automobiles for you and me as we did before the war and still build enough planes and tanks and other war machines for Britain, and Greece, and China, and our own defense program. Some of our biggest industrialists believe that. It is nonsense, and Mr. Roosevelt said as much. If we have all that capacity for producing automotive machines, we'd better double or treble the quantity put out for the purpose of fighting Hitler. It won't be too much or be ready too soon.

The fall of France taught Britain the meaning of totalitarian war. Up to that moment the English people coasted along about as we are doing today. They hoped for the best and, inexorably meeting the worst, kept stumbling over themselves in belated attempts to catch up. They didn't ever catch up. Denmark was occupied and Norway fell. And they were still arguing about why they had neither anticipated nor adequately countered the attack on Norway when the invasion of Holland began, and total catastrophe followed a few weeks of nightmare horror. Only then did Britain begin on all fronts to move into action. Only then did planning take the place of haphazard methods of production and procurement. Only then did Britain's effort to draw upon the vast potential—but wholly uncoordinated—resources of the United States become vigorous and partly effective.

Today our own failure to foresee and prepare constitutes Britain's greatest danger.

Are we going to continue to repeat the errors of the British? Are we going to pretend that we are free to choose whether we want convertible coupés or tanks, bathroom fixtures or turbines? Are we going to wait until England has gone down in disaster and then jerk into desperate action—with the whole burden of resisting Hitler left in our unready hands?

If the menacing nonsense talked by Senator Wheeler and the No Foreign War Committee and the America First Committee and the American Student Union were taken seriously by the Congress or the people, we should stand an excellent chance of doing just that. These people have adopted a trick which is of utmost value to Hitler. They try to center all discussion on the danger of our going into the war as a belligerent. By this tactic, relentlessly pursued, they drive even intelligent men—like William Allen White, who understands perfectly the need of multiplying and speeding and broadening our aid to England—into earnest denials that they want war. This shifts the argument and forfeits the ball to the isolationists—and to Hitler.

Most determined anti-fascists are also anti-interventionists, as the President himself is. They know that we are totally unprepared to wage active warfare against a distant enemy on land or sea or in the air. They fear that if we were to declare war, the psychological pressure to play a belligerent role would deflect our energies into strategically unwise activities. They think we can best accomplish the essential job of equipping ourselves and pouring arms into Britain if we remain technically at peace.

But most of these same people admit that in certain circumstances we may have to declare war. It may be necessary to send air and naval units to England to prevent British defeat. It is more likely that we shall have to convoy supply ships across the Atlantic, running the risk of Nazi attack. It is also possible that we shall never fully wake up to the necessity of a planned and intensified production of war supplies until we become a partner—de jure as well as de facto—in the struggle against fascism. And it is evident that the legal obstacles to full material aid may be hard to wipe out as long as we cling to our neutrality. But at the moment the odds favor non-belligerent support of Britain, and as Mr. Roosevelt insisted, the more generous and swift the support, the better the chance that it will continue to be non-belligerent. In any case the emphasis ought to be kept where it belongs. We cannot afford to let appeasers and isolationists, or Hitler himself, switch the discussion to the danger of possible American participation in the war. That isn't the point. The point is the defense of freedom. That, in sum, is what the President said, and on that point a majority of the American people are with him.

Brains for Defense

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, December 27

THE papers are full of stories about the shortage of aluminum. One aircraft plant has had to curtail its activity because of the shortage, and the curtailment has disclosed a situation that has become typical in the defense program. Familiar elements fall into a familiar pattern: a monopoly that has no interest in making aluminum plentiful; Defense Commission assurances that make pleasant headlines but prove to be disingenuous. Mr. Stettinius said we had enough ingot capacity in aluminum for the present and the near future. He failed to mention the shortage in finishing capacity. This is the bottleneck that is holding up work at the Northrop Aircraft Corporation and will soon hold up work at others. On this I propose to hang a story that came to me a few weeks ago. Last week from Washington and the week before from Detroit I wrote of idle machinery and idle man-power. This is about idle brains.

One way to end the bottleneck in aluminum, which is likely to become more serious, and at the same time to speed production of planes would be to develop a new, light stainless-steel alloy to replace the duraluminum now used so largely in planes. The advantage of duraluminum, a compound of aluminum and duralium, is its lightness. One disadvantage is the relative scarcity of aluminum. Another is the greater scarcity of duraluminum. A third lies in the character of duraluminum, which is not an easy alloy to handle. Stainless steel is much more malleable, and discovery of a stainless-steel alloy of sufficient lightness would make it easier to adapt existing stamping machinery to the job of fashioning plane parts. It would also make it easier to adapt existing skills to the new task.

The way to find that stainless-steel alloy would be to bring together every scrap of information bearing on the problem. No doubt a number of men in different plants are working on it. Other men in other laboratories in the course of other work have no doubt stumbled on facts which could contribute to the solution of this metallurgical puzzle. But we have no effective way to gather and correlate information buried in the files of scattered academic and industrial laboratories. Nor have we any effective way to break the problem down into its constituent elements and parcel these out among scientists with special backgrounds for these special problems. The world of science is a world full of duplicated effort and unused skills. Scientists learn what other scientists are doing from scientific publications, but these print only a small part of the news on work accomplished and little on news in progress, and what they do print sees the light only after a long and tedious delay.

Last August the most courageous man in the President's Cabinet submitted a memorandum on this problem. It has never been published and I am not at liberty to publish it now, but it suggests the appointment of an office of scientific liaison. This office would establish a card-index system covering every scientist and every scientific laboratory in the country. The Civil Service Commission and the National Resources Planning Board are now taking a census of scientists, the Roster of Scientific and Specialized Personnel, but the card-index system proposed would go beyond that census. It would be a clearing house providing not merely general information on scientists and their specialties but concrete information about the problem on which each is working. It would seek to tap the huge files of unpublished papers in every college laboratory and industrial laboratory in the country, and to keep up to date on all work in progress. The idea is that when any problem comes up in connection with defense the office will be able immediately to correlate all the information available and to bring to bear the special experience of experts. The Germans, I am told, obtain continuous reports on work in progress from their scientific societies, and these societies aim to be and are all-inclusive rather than exclusive, as are so many of our own.

We have a National Academy of Sciences, established by Congress in 1863, a year after the battle of the Monitor and the Merrimac showed the military importance which could attach to a single technical advance. But the academy today is an honorary institution, and asking it to act on some minute but important technological problem is like asking the French Academy to prepare a snappy press release. I have before me a copy of its latest publication, Volume XXIII, Third Memoir. It is a monumental study called "Observations for Measurements of the Members of the National Academy of Sciences," and it contains such vital information as this, "Mustache, beard, hair of the body.—A proper study of the mustache and especially that of the beard was impossible, for more than one-half of the members of the academy wore no mustache and but a few wore a full beard." We have a National Research Council, established by the academy at President Wilson's request in 1916. It did good work in the last war and has some good men on it, but it has just been coming out of a long hibernation.

We have a National Defense Research Committee in the Defense Commission, and Charles F. Kettering, who is the outstanding genius of the automotive industry, heads a new National Inventors' Council in the Department of Commerce. But so far these bodies have produced little more than publicity. There are 100,000 people engaged in scientific work in this country. The memorandum to which I have referred estimates that only some 500 are in contact with these governmental scientific bodies.

The Administration memorandum originated in an idea that Dr. Lyman Chalkley was trying to put over in Washington all last year. Dr. Chalkley, now a lecturer on marketing at New York University, has a long background of experience as research chemist for Standard Oil of Indiana, industrial fellow of Bakelite Corporation, and assistant professor of industrial research at Penn State. For a time he had an office of his own in New York as an adviser in research planning for industrial corporations. Dr. Chalkley thinks we ought not only to know what all our scientists are doing but to help plan and support their work. Most universities today lack funds for research and must depend on special grants. Judging from a recent statement by Frank Jewett, president of the academy and head of the Bell Telephone Laboratories, the government does not seem to be spending through the academy more than two or three hundred thousand dollars on special defense research, or about what one big soap company has been spending in trying to develop an "antiseptic" soap with which to play on the hypochondriac susceptibilities of the American consumer. England, too, had its honorary societies, its scientific stuffed shirts and yes men. If any reader is interested in learning how they fumbled the job of mobilizing Britain's scientific brains for defense, I recommend a little volume published by the Penguin Press in England a few months ago, "Science in War," a symposium by twenty-five anonymous scientists. It isn't on sale in this country, but it ought to be, for it indicates that the British made the same mistakes that we are making. I hope we shan't wait as long as they did to correct them.

The Choice for the Americas

BY LEWIS COREY

I. Imperialism or Cooperation

AS GERMANY multiplies its activities in Latin America and the "New Europe" begins to take shape, the need for hemisphere defense becomes increasingly clear. At the same time it becomes clear that this defense cannot be limited to military alliances and naval and air bases. Hitler wages social and economic as well as military war, and there is always the danger that economic pressures in Latin America may break open the floodgates of fascism. The basis of hemisphere defense must be economic cooperation. All this was recognized at the Havana conference. Although its economic decisions have been criticized as "disappointingly vague" they formulated the right problems and moved in the right directions: orderly action on surpluses, more industrialization and diversified production in Latin America, greater inter-American trade and consumption, increased economic self-sufficiency for the Americas. Bureaus have been set up in Washington and some steps taken to implement the conference's decisions; at the same time Latin Americans, aware that it is a two-way proposition, have swung into action to improve their economic relations and trade.

Yet economic cooperation lags. The ideas and the plans are there, but as the hard-headed enthusiasts in the bureaus will tell you, there is "not enough action," and correspondents report that Latin America is still waiting to see how the United States implements the Havana decisions. Among the makers of policy there is a tendency to see cooperation too much in defense terms, although final success depends on the economic program. A master plan and swifter action are needed. For a revolution is going on in Europe that will permit neither piddling action nor a return to the old ways, no matter who wins. It is still in the balance whether hemisphere cooperation will be a magnificent achievement or a dismal flop.

Cooperation is endangered by open or concealed opposition in the United States and Latin America. All the Republican members of the Senate Banking and Currency Committee voted against the bill to grant $500,000,000 to the Export-Import Bank to implement the Havana decisions; they said it was "futile, wasteful, unwise." Monopoly corporations with imperialist interests in Latin America either oppose cooperation or try to distort it to promote their own ends. Big business fears the increasing government economic activity without which fruitful cooperation is impossible. Appeasers do not want a policy that may disturb their dream world, where "we must learn to live with Hitler." In Latin America, too, there is opposition—most of it mistaken, some of it malicious. And everywhere, in all the Americas, Nazis and Communists, in their drive to make the world safe for totali-tarianism, denounce hemisphere cooperation as "the mask of Yankee imperialism."

There are even some men of good-will who fear that cooperation may mean Yankee imperialism. Theirs is an honest fear, which totalitarian elements can exploit. Much has been done to allay it by the Good Neighbor policy, whose most recent expression was the withdrawal of the United States from control of the Dominican customs; more must and will be done. Many Latin American liberals, including some Socialists who forget what the Nazis do to socialism and unionism, neglect the Hitler agents working under their noses and cry, "No danger of Nazi invasion; Yankee imperialism is the danger." As I listen to the liberals and radicals in this country who cry "imperialism" I feel that in their view any Latin American policy of the United States must be imperialist. Yet if this were so, the United States should have gobbled up Latin America long ago; it should have sent troops into Mexico when Cárdenas expropriated the oil companies. That was not done. Why? Because there are alternatives to imperialism. Our economic relations with Latin America may become imperialist. But they can be democratic.

The significance of one fact should be considered—the fact that imperialists show no enthusiasm for the democratic economic cooperation that is now being shaped. Imperialists dislike the policy because it is the opposite of imperialism; appeasers and fascists dislike it because it means a struggle for democracy. An all-American program of democratic economic cooperation is part of the social war that democracy must wage against the totalitarian challenge.

The alternatives for Latin America are Nazi imperialist domination or cooperation with the United States. Latin America cannot go it alone. That is the Nazis' trump card when they urge "cooperation" with Germany and the "New World Order." Disunited, without the United States, it would be impossible for the twenty Latin American republics to resist the economic domination of a Nazi Europe. Not even the problem of surpluses would be solved. A Nazi Europe would strive to become more self-sufficient economically; a master industrial Germany would force a de-industrialized France and other vassal states to produce foodstuffs and would develop Africa as a source of the tropical products that Latin America exports. A Nazi Europe would use trade as a political weapon, imposing an economic bondage to "soften" Latin America for fascist bondage. For our neighbors in the south the economic cooperation of the Americas is the support of democracy.

Since the United States cannot and would not permit a Nazi Latin America, it must choose between democratic cooperation and imperialism. The United States cannot let Latin America alone. If Hitler wins, imperialist big business and the appeasers and fascists who now oppose democratic cooperation will yell, "We must live in the same world with Hitler; let him have Europe, let Japan have Asia (where our economic stake is small and our trade could be diverted), let us take Latin America." A new and tougher imperialism might be inaugurated, based on a theory of "continental Lebensraum" and using the military power forged for national defense to strike down our southern neighbors. That would be bad for the neighbors and bad for us. The older financial imperialism is dying where it is not dead. It was sprawling and competitive; it cherished profits beyond political interests, allowed the development of liberal democratic forces that disintegrated imperialism. Fascist imperialism makes a political monopoly of imperialist power, revives the bloody colonialism of early capitalism, destroys all economic independence and freedom, and makes slave labor universal. Imperialism today can flourish only if it uses fascist techniques. American imperialism means American fascism.

Is democratic cooperation possible? It is. Arguments to the contrary are unrealistic and defeatist. An understanding of the nature of imperialism gives us the elements of a non-imperialist policy. Imperialism exploits backward countries, makes their economy disastrously dependent on the movements of the world market, and deprives them of economic independence. It overdevelops their production of foodstuffs and minerals for export. As a result they find themselves with a lopsided economy which rests on one or two crops or minerals—for example, coffee, sugar, rubber, oil. Naturally, terrific dislocations are experienced when there is a world crisis: prices fall, demand dries up, and purchasing power vanishes. Such dislocations are largely responsible for the economic prostration of Latin American nations. Imperialism discourages industrialization in the countries it controls; it wants no competition with home manufactures. It invests its capital primarily in the extractive industries and in transportation and public utilities that produce services, not goods. Of $5,113,000,000 worth of foreign corporate securities floated in the United States up to 1929, only $460,000,000 was for manufacturing enterprises; to come nearer home, three-quarters of the $1,265,000,000 of American capital invested in Mexico ten years ago was invested in oil, mining, smelting, and railroads. A non-industrial country which produces raw materials and imports manufactures cannot resist imperialist penetration. Strategic industries come under foreign control and are used to promote imperialist profits, not local production and consumption. Wages, salaries, and purchasing power are kept low. Imperialism is feudalism in a capitalist form.

The exact opposites of the practices of imperialism provide the elements of a policy of economic cooperation. These are:

1. Economic diversification and balance—which means ending Latin American dependence on the production and export of one or two crops or minerals; limiting the output of foodstuffs and minerals to what the world market can reasonably absorb; emphasizing intensive industrialization.

2. National economic independence. This can be secured by the investment of foreign capital in Latin America on a functional basis and not for imperialist or political ends; by the encouragement of local manufactures whether or not they compete with foreign goods; by the investment of capital, through state cooperation and planning, in a form that leaves ownership and control within Latin America. The increase of Latin American purchasing power and consumption, not imperialist profits, must be regarded as the object of economic activity.

3. Encouragement of diversified reciprocal trade; the end of unequal trade in which a few highly industrial nations force their goods and terms on many agricultural nations.

4. The withdrawal of direct imperialist controls where they still exist.

It is interesting to note that most, not all, of the elements of a non-imperialist policy were embodied in the Havana decisions—their first acceptance by a great power like the United States.

Now this is not altruism, and it means more than hemisphere defense. A non-imperialist policy is as much in the interest of the people of the United States as in the interest of Latin America. An old-style bureaucrat said to me: "The United States is not the guarantor of the economic well-being of the Americas." That is true. But it misses the point, which is that cooperation for mutual well-being is the alternative to imperialism. Purchasing power and consumption are kept down by imperialist exploitation, by its restrictive practices, its low prices for colonial producers and high prices for industrial consumers, its high profits. If by following a non-imperialist policy we help the Latin American nations to obtain economic independence and balance by means of industrialization, they will be able to buy more goods from us and we shall be able to buy more from them. That means greater production and consumption, higher standards of living for all.

Industrialization is the heart of the problem. It is clear that Nazi domination of Latin America would discourage industrialization. The Nazis' policy is to deprive other peoples of industrial power, which is military power. If they plan to keep non-German nations in Europe as colonial agrarian dependents of a master industrial Germany they will not do the opposite in Latin America. Fascism reintegrates imperialism on a new basis—de-industrialization and totalitarian slavery for subject peoples. Its attitude was expressed in the plan to attack

Uruguay, which, according to that country's government, "contained measures tending to insure the functioning of our country as a German agricultural colony."

It is one of our advantages over the Nazis that the United States can encourage Latin American industrialization. Where there is no drive for imperial domination there is no need to destroy the industrial power of other peoples. Moreover, continental resources and great inner markets make it economically unnecessary for the United States to force exports upon colonial dependents. This fact is beginning to be recognized. I showed a Washington official the following words which appeared in the London New Statesman and Nation:

There is neither strategy nor tactics that will enable us to end this war as we began it, an easygoing island people living off the fruits of empire. We must turn our restrictive monopoly economy into an expanding consumption economy, raise the purchasing power of raw-materials countries within and outside our empire, and by enriching the world as a whole lighten the burden of war on our people.

The response was emphatic: "That's it. And if the British propose to do it while at war we can surely do it while at peace."

It can be done. It is the final answer to fascism. If the Nazis win the war, the colonial possessions of European nations must be taken over by the American nations. But that is not enough. The Latin American property of European nationals must be expropriated; upward of $5,000,000,000 of investments in Latin America would give Hitler a tremendous power. And if Britain wins, the destruction of imperialist controls in Latin America must be part of the peace, of a new democratic world order in which "an expanding consumption economy" will be the unbreakable barrier to a resurgence of fascism.

A handful of imperialist monopoly corporations in this country are already on the job trying to impede and distort the democratic economic cooperation of the Americas by their influence over personnel and plans. To recognize their interests is to destroy cooperation. Everywhere in Latin America, from Mexico to Argentina, the governments are breaking imperialist controls in order to regain economic independence. The most recent illustration is the new Cuban constitution, in effect since October 10, which calls for a national bank to end the foreign banking monopoly (Canadian and United States) and for measures "to cause the land to revert to Cuban ownership" and to break up the large estates owned mainly by United States sugar companies. Imperialist corporations will resist; they will impose boycotts and spread slanderous tales. Mexico was branded as fascist when it was forced by the boycott of United States and British corporations to sell oil to Italy, Germany, and Japan. Nothing is better calculated to destroy economic cooperation than government protection of plundering corporations that got their properties for very little in the first place and have already made immense profits on their investment. Nothing is better calculated to further the Nazis' game; while monopoly oil corporations carried on a boycott against Bolivia the Nazis proposed to barter Bolivian tin for German equipment and technicians to make more efficient the expropriated oil industry. Cooperation must not be conditional on the settlement of Latin American debts; the money that would pay the interest should be used to promote the industry and trade of the Americas.

The larger implications of hemisphere defense and cooperation fit into the economic needs of the Americas and the trend of the times. That trend is toward greater economic unity and self-sufficiency of regions and continents. Hitler did not create the trend but he exploits it. If the Nazis win they will impose an oppressive economic unity in the form of a totalitarian "federation" of Europe; if Britain wins there must be a free federation, the democratic United States of Europe, or else chaos will come and a resurgence of fascism. The war is transforming the old economic order; there is no going back; the choice is totalitarian or democratic transformation. Those who see in Hitlerism merely "a danger to international free competition and natural price levels" are dead wrong, for those conditions were already being destroyed by monopoly capitalism and imperialism. The world moves toward greater economic unity; cooperative planning and action are needed to create an expanding consumption economy that is the opposite of imperialism or fascism.

Already Latin Americans use the words "a continental economy by means of continental economic agreements." Within the larger continental unity there should be regional cooperation and agreements between groups of Latin American nations and among those nations singly, integrated by cooperation and agreements with the United States. That would mean a mutually complementary American economy that fully used all its resources, in which no part exploited the other parts and all gained from democratic cooperation. Out of that should arise an American League of Nations for continuing discussion of economic, military, political, and cultural problems. Such an American League would have a strength that the world League did not have—a strength derived from an economic program drawing the member nations together in cooperative action.

[This is the first of two articles. In an early issue Mr. Corey will discuss concrete economic measures of cooperation.]

Labor's Catholic Bloc

BY RICHARD H. ROVERE

ONE day in the spring of 1937 salesgirl strikers trudging up and down in front of the F. W. Woolworth store on Union Square were joined by some outsiders who bore a banner with a strange device—a placard inscribed with a quotation from the Quadragesimo Anno encyclical of Pope Pius XI. The newcomers were not Communists from the nearby American Kremlin seeking to prove that the Holy See, like Daniel Boone, belonged to them, but members of a small band of Roman Catholic unionists and labor sympathizers who had just formed the first national organization of Catholic workers in America. The demonstration of sympathy with the Woolworth girls was their first official act. Today, after almost four years of rapid growth, the Association of Catholic Trade Unionists is in the labor movement with all the energy and self-assurance the Roman faith can call up in its adherents, and the organization has taken its place as one of the most considerable of labor's pressure groups. Since its aim is to win all Catholic wage-earners for unionism and all Catholic unionists for the A. C. T. U., labor leaders—some encouraged, some deeply disturbed—are watching it closely.

The A. C. T. U. is not, for the present at least, an effort to set up autonomous and exclusive unions for Catholic workingmen on the European or Canadian model. Indeed, most of its leaders go out of their way to assert that such a development, so often anticipated and feared by non-Catholics, has no part in their plans. It is an organization of Catholic members of all bona fide unions in America except the Workers' Alliance, which the church considers too hopelessly dominated by Communists for Catholics to join.

The mandate for the existence of the A. C. T. U., its leaders say, springs from the present state of capitalist society and from the social strictures of church doctrine, particularly as expressed in the political encyclicals of Leo XIII and Pius XI. Leo, it will be remembered, set down in the famous Rerum Novarum the right of Catholic workers to organize into unions and urged that, wherever it was feasible, strictly Catholic unions be formed. The late Pius XI, in the Quadragesimo Anno, written for the fortieth anniversary of Rerum Novarum in 1931, said that in "neutral" countries like the United States Catholics should join the secular labor organizations, but that "... side by side with these trade unions, there must always be associations which aim at giving the members a thorough religious and moral training, that these in turn may impart to the labor unions to which they belong the upright spirit which should direct their entire conduct." These words were the direct inspiration of the A. C. T. U.

In its present form, therefore, the A. C. T. U. parallels the structure of A. F. of L. and C. I. O. unions, in which it has a strong representation. There is a pyramid of organizations, and there are national committees in which general principles and strategy are determined. Each large industrial city has its own branch. By far the major portion of the members' activity, however, is in the union locals to which they belong. Operating in the manner which has proved so effective for the Communists in achieving power in the labor movement, a similarity which it admits is intentional, the A. C. T. U. seeks favor for its principles first of all by making itself useful to the union and its members. Realizing that the Communists win a following because they are energetic and self-sacrificing participants in day-to-day labor struggles, the Catholics are following suit.

Needless to say, they are a group well equipped to do so. They man picket lines, set up soup kitchens and strike-relief agencies, solicit moral and financial support from their priests and their laity. Catholic lawyers, who together with priests are the only non-union members of the A. C. T. U., maintain the Catholic Workers' Defense League, which defends wronged workers with far less religious and political partiality than the Communists' International Labor Defense, of which it is an obvious imitation. With these activities as tokens of good-will, the Catholics look to their own interests. The "fraction" supports or opposes union administrations on the basis of compatibility with A. C. T. U. principles, secures Catholic priests as speakers and chaplains for union meetings, proselytizes for both the church and its own organization. A national organ, the Labor Leader, is published bi-weekly in several sectional editions. In many unions A. C. T. U. members get out "shop papers." More than a dozen A. C. T. U. schools, training members in the arts of parliamentary procedure and labor leadership, have been set up throughout the country.

The policies which the A. C. T. U. fosters in the labor movement are familiar enough to those who have followed the more progressive wing of the church in larger political arenas. Roughly, its position is that of the liberal Catholic weekly, the Commonweal, one of whose editors was among the founders of the A. C. T. U. Although it has on occasion made common cause with radicals of all persuasions, it is basically opposed to Marxism. Most of its fire is reserved for the Stalinists, but it makes slight distinction between them and groups that are not so far left, like the Social Democratic Federation. It is against all manifestations of Coughlinism, though it fights these with somewhat less vigor and attention than it musters against communism. Opposition to racketeering extends to Catholic racketeers like Joe Ryan of the New York longshoremen and the many Catholic leaders in the International Brotherhood of Teamsters. As yet, it has taken no sides on conscription, war, or the issues of the national Presidential campaign. It puts the most radical interpretations possible on the papal decrees, presenting them, in effect, as an expression of the medievalist guild socialism that so many of the Catholic intelligentsia have espoused. Some may point out that the majority of Catholics have a different view of the encyclicals, but A. C. T. U. leaders will answer that this is only because many Catholics, particularly the property-owning laity, have become unfortunately "Protestantized" in their social thought.

The precise strength of the A. C. T. U. is not easy to estimate. Its mass membership is less than 10,000, but like other such organizations its strength does not flow from its numbers. More effort is directed toward training leaders and extending hegemony over approximately four million Catholics in the C. I. O. and A. F. of L. than toward winning dues-paying members. Most important, of all, the A. C. T. U. has members and friends in high places. Philip Murray, new head of the C. I. O., is a practicing Catholic, and, whether or not he is a member of the A. C. T. U., he has frequently collaborated with it and praised its work. Thomas Kennedy and John Brophy of the United Mine Workers, Van A. Bittner and David MacDonald of the steel union, Thomas Burns of the United Rubber Workers, R. J. Thomas and George Addes of the United Automobile Workers are all either members or close friends of the organization. The head of the New York chapter is George R. Donahue, general manager of the United Retail and Wholesale Employees and one of the most intelligent and farsighted young labor leaders in the city. Harry Read, who led the American Newspaper Guild strike against Hearst, is president of the Chicago chapter. The Rev. John P. Boland, chairman of the New York State Labor Relations Board, is an enthusiastic member of the A. C. T. U. and teaches regularly at one of its four schools in New York.

The work that the A. C. T. U. has done thus far in the labor movement is, on the whole, commendable from almost any point of view. At a critical period it showed labor that organized Catholics could work for ends other than those of Father Coughlin. It has become an increasingly valuable ally in combating racketeering in the A. F. of L. Although it is obvious that it does not speak for the whole church on industrial relations, it has made what is by far its most valuable contribution in lining up behind labor sections of the church previously antagonistic or non-committal. Perhaps the best example of this was in the auto workers' strike against Chrysler Motors late in 1937, a few months after the A. C. T. U. was founded. For a while, owing to serious tactical blunders on the part of union leaders, the strike lagged, and it seemed that, if Chrysler won, the U. A. W. A. would lose most of the gains it had made in the preceding months. At the lowest point the A. C. T. U. leaders conferred with Archbishop Mooney and members of the Michigan hierarchy. A few days later the Michigan Catholic, diocesan organ, came out with an editorial that blasted Chrysler and praised the C. I. O. organizing effort. The A. C. T. U. got busy and spread the message to Catholics throughout the automobile center. A meeting was held in Cadillac Square at which Catholic workers were exhorted to pitch in and help win the strike. The strike was won, and there was little doubt in the minds of most observers that credit for reversing the trend belonged to the Catholic unionists. The stock of the A. C. T. U. shot up.

Despite the fact that its sincerity is generally respected and its good work appreciated, there is, I have found, a good deal of uneasiness and suspicion of the Catholic excursion into unionism in the minds of many labor leaders. Some of this, to be sure, is not unrelated to the kind of Know-Nothing prejudice that has long worked unjustly against Catholics in national politics, but behind much of it there are more deep-seated and reasoned doubts. Religious splits have contributed to the ruin of whole labor movements in other countries, and the A. C. T. U., although it is not a dual union, is the first large-scale attempt to set up a religious grouping within the national labor organizations. The introduction of any religious issues divides authority and always brings a reaction among partisans of other faiths. Already there is talk in many Protestant circles of combating the influence of Rome with an Association of Protestant Trade Unionists. In such a case, the United Hebrew Trades, which never extended beyond strictly Jewish neighborhoods and has been dormant for years, might be revived. Such division would bring subdivision and the result might well be unions built along religious lines and the virtual Europeanization of the American labor movement.

There is another distressing aspect to the problem. The A. C. T. U., as has been noted, resembles the Communists in the methods it uses to win support among the workers. But the resemblance goes much deeper. Catholics, like Communists, are often controlled by forces beyond the vision of most Americans; Rome, like Moscow, has its own interests, and although its political control over its followers is less absolute than Moscow's, it is always difficult to tell which way it plans to jump, particularly in the midst of a world in crisis. Moreover, the approach of both Catholics and Communists to the labor movement is millennial. While most labor leaders look to the here and now or to a plainly visible future in determining strategy, Catholics and Communists look to goals far in the distance, and the ends of both are so grandiose that almost any means seem justified for their attainment.

WATER JUMP MIRAGE

Communist maneuvers in the labor movement are well known, but the fact is that the A. C. T. U. has on occasion made alliances no less cynical, sometimes with the Communists themselves.

In the New York Newspaper Guild, for example, A. C. T. U. members work both sides of the street and some of the corners. About a year ago some of the Catholic leaders negotiated with the opposition group known as the Guild progressives, which consists of Socialists, Social Democrats, and independents who believe that Communists dominate and discredit the Guild leadership. The A. C. T. U. joined this opposition movement, but no sooner was it in than it set up a caucus of its own to maintain contact with some A. C. T. U. members on the other side of the fence and to advance the A. C. T. U. within the opposition. Thus the A. C. T. U. cooperated with the opposition against the non-Catholics in the administration and with the Catholics in the administration against the opposition. When the ballots were counted at the Memphis convention of the Guild last spring, the opposition found that its Catholic support had practically disappeared, most of it going to fellow-Catholics on both sides.

It would not be fair to suggest that the experience of the Guild is universal. In a large local of the Building Service Employees' International in New York, Catholics moved into the opposition and pushed through a reform slate of six, only two of whom were Catholics. Many of the leaders are aware of the dynamite in a religious quarrel. Nevertheless, the tendency to divide along religious lines is always present among zealous members.

Whatever irritations the A. C. T. U. may cause in the labor movement, its continuance and growth are inevitable. The Catholic church seems to have cast off its almost absolute hostility to unionism that marked the period of the Knights of Labor and the early days of the A. F. of L. After all, the church in America is not a large owner of productive property, and its revenue depends to a great extent on the maintenance of high wages for its working-class membership. If the A. C. T. U. can work as a friendly liaison agent between the church and the unions, the alliance will have its value.

Negroes and Defense

BY METZ T. P. LOCHARD

THE attitude of the Negro toward national defense and the European war must be examined in the light of a growing, subtle nationalism that conditions the thought-process of the leadership of America's thirteen million blacks. Unable to integrate himself fully into the social and economic pattern of American culture, the Negro has attempted to formulate a doctrine of separatism as a rational escape from the rigors of race prejudice and discrimination. The very nature of the social situation has forced him into acceptance of the fallacy that his people are a "nation within a nation." This may explain why the strident cry for national preparedness leaves him unresponsive; he fears that he may be unable to exact appreciable guaranties from the national government as a condition for his support. His habitual emotionalism is conspicuously restrained in the midst of a contagious war hysteria.

The Negro is nevertheless fully aware of the dangers that threaten democracy, and he is not disposed to minimize the gravity of the circumstances that call for defense and unity as measures of national security. Isolationist propaganda has had no effect on him. He believes in some form of intervention in the European war as an inescapable alternative to actual engagement. Aid to Britain is conceived to be a necessary expedient in the present emergency, though the Negro nurses no inborn love for England. The unmitigated exploitation of black labor in the Crown colonies in Africa, the suppression of fundamental political rights in the West Indies, the refusal of the Secretary for the Colonies to place before the British Parliament the aspirations of the natives of West Africa with respect to universal education, political suffrage, and abolition of child labor—these and many other instances of rapacity and imperialism have not endeared Britain to the hearts of black men. Realizing, however, that the fall of England, in this crisis, cannot but foreshadow a total eclipse of democracy and of representative government, the Negro is willing to cast aside his traditional Anglophobia.

More than any other racial minority, Negroes have a stake in democracy. Under a system in which they could not exercise the power of the ballot they would lose every vestige of human rights. Certainly they could cherish no hope in a fascist society that relegated them to the status of "auxiliary" or "subhuman" race, as Hitler puts it in "Mein Kampf." The Italian invasion of peaceful Ethiopia and the ruthless dismemberment of that last independent African kingdom in 1935, the recent expulsion of all people of African descent from German-occupied France, the Nazis' destruction of all French monuments to black soldiers as "insults to the dignity of the white race" have thoroughly awakened the Negro masses to the dangers of fascism. While the absorption of Austria, Czechoslovakia, Poland, Norway, Denmark, Holland, and Belgium excited little emotional feeling among American Negroes, the invasion of France brought quite a different reaction. For France, with its historic declaration of the Rights of Men, with its traditional liberalism and racial tolerance was, in the sight of all black men, the living symbol of democracy.

The Negro sees in the conflict between fascism and democracy a serious challenge to those political principles through which he has been hoisted out of chattel slavery and through which true social justice may eventually be attained in America. He recognizes, therefore, that the present emergency imposes upon his race the necessity of retreating from the untenable position of a "nation within a nation." But if he is willing to forgo the defensive attitude into which he has been forced, he does so in order to secure a more equitable participation in the affairs of this republic. The determination not to surrender his democratic rights even under the stress of a national emergency is based upon past experience.

In October, 1918, a month before the signing of the Armistice, the War Department sent Dr. Robert R. Moton—the late principal of Tuskegee Institute—to France to advise Negro soldiers who had had a glimpse of real democracy not to press the government upon their return for extension of hard-earned democratic rights. In fact, Secretary Baker informed Dr. W. E. B. DuBois, then editor of the Crisis, "We are not trying by this war to settle the Negro problem."

The Negro problem is a major problem of American democracy. If the black man is called upon to defend this democracy, he has a legitimate claim to those rights which are guaranteed by the fundamental laws of the form of political government which he is urged to protect. If this be an incorrect view, the Negro has no reason, except human compassion, to be exercised about a war fought by white folk, for the exclusive benefit and glorification of white folk. He should be given the unconditional choice between fighting as a slave for the perpetuity of a nefarious system and fighting as a free man for free institutions.

In 1917 the War Department, after tenaciously refusing to train Negro officers in established military centers, finally provided, upon the plea of Joel Spingarn, chairman of the board of directors of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, a Jim Crow officers' training camp at Des Moines, Iowa. The man eminently qualified to head this camp was Charles Young, a black man, then lieutenant colonel in the regular United States army. He had a splendid army record. He had accompanied General Pershing in the Mexican foray and received high commendation from the man who later became commander-in-chief of the American Expeditionary Force. He was in good health, and only forty-nine years of age. In the accelerated scheme of war-time promotion he would have attained the rank of a general in the army by 1918. But a black general in the United States army was too much of a nightmare for the brass hats in Washington.

The Des Moines camp was established in May. When Young came up in June for examination for promotion to a colonelcy, the medical board retired him for "high blood pressure." An entire corps of white officers was appointed to train the colored cadets.

Fear of a repetition of a chain of ugly incidents led recently to a White House conference at which Walter White, secretary of the N. A. A. C. P., A. Philip Randolph, president of the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters, and T. Arnold Hill of the National Youth Administration submitted a seven-point memorandum to President Roosevelt. This memorandum urged that Negroes be used as reserve officers and that the same training opportunities be given to Negroes as to others. It requested that existing units of the army be required to accept officers and enlisted personnel on the basis of ability instead of race or color. It asked for the abolition of racial discrimination in the navy and recommended the appointment of competent Negro civilians as assistants to the Secretaries of War and the Navy. Some of these requests have been granted, but in the main the War and Navy departments are still clinging to their policy of discrimination—a policy based on traditions of caste and social life in a professional army and navy.

In the hope of lifting his status beyond the limitations of a theoretical citizenship, the Negro has made sacrificial offerings in every major struggle in which this nation has been engaged. Four thousand Negro soldiers served with the Continental army during the American Revolution. Andrew Jackson had no compunction about mobilizing black men in the War of 1812. He said in his proclamation to them, "Through a mistaken policy you have heretofore been deprived of participation in the glorious struggle for national rights in which your country is engaged. This no longer shall exist. As sons of freedom you are now called upon to defend your most inestimable blessing." Some 178,000 Negroes served in the Civil War. Black troops acquitted themselves creditably at Las Sussinas, El Caney, and San Juan Hill in the Spanish-American War. Of the 400,000 Negro soldiers mobilized for action during the first World War, 40,000 were on the firing line.

Despite this impressive record, black men are still discriminated against in the caste-ridden United States army. Not a single Negro officer is on duty with regular-army troops. Not a single Negro reserve officer is serving in the regular army. Under the Thomason Act Congress this year made provision in its regular appropriation for training 650 reserve officers, drawn from schools and colleges, with units of the regular army. Howard University in Washington, D. C., and Wilberforce University in Ohio are two Negro institutions with senior ROTC units. The War Department has completely ignored them.

The only Negro troops in the United States army with full combat status are in the Twenty-fifth Infantry. The Twenty-fourth Infantry and the Ninth and Tenth Cavalry, which have distinguished themselves in many engagements, are serving in training schools as laborers and personal servants. At present, of the total strength of 229,636 officers and enlisted men only 4,451 are Negroes. There are fewer Negro troops in the National Guard today than there were on the eve of the first World War. The first separate Negro battalion of the 372d Infantry, assigned to the District of Columbia, is kept on a skeleton basis with only Company A mustered in and that company denied the facilities of training and housing. Companies in Tennessee and Connecticut have been dissolved. The Negro citizens of West Virginia have been attempting to form a National Guard regiment in their state but have had, so far, no success. In the case of an established battalion in New Jersey, the War Department has flatly refused to grant it federal status.

According to General George C. Marshall, Chief of Staff, the National Guard has a shortage of men. Yet the army refused to take additional Negro units, which could have been inducted into the service in the new categories required in the program of expansion. All these facts and figures were presented recently to the House Subcommittee on Military Affairs by two eminent Negro scholars—Dr. Rayford Logan, of the Department of History of Howard University, and Dr. Charles Houston, former dean of the Howard Law School.

On June 5, 1939, the Secretary of War, testifying before a subcommittee of the House Committee on Appropriations, stated that the War Department was studying ways to provide training for Negro pilots. As yet no Negro is being trained for service in the army air corps as either a flying cadet or an enlisted mechanic. The Secretary of War designated a school at Glenfield, Illinois, but the War Department has refused to accept Negroes in that corps. On October 11, Garland F. Pinkston, a Negro, received the following letter signed by Herbert M. West, Jr., First Lieutenant, United States Air Corps, Recorder:

Dear Sir: Through the most unfortunate circumstances, your application was allowed to be completed because of our ignorance of your race. At the present time the United States Army is not training any except members of the white race for duty as pilots of military aircraft.

Thirteen million Negroes, representing a vast reservoir of possible war material, are being ignored and in some instances openly humiliated. It is therefore not surprising that Negro citizens are without enthusiasm for national defense. They can have no faith in the leadership of an army or a navy that denies them the right to serve their country on an equal footing with other citizens.

On "The Duty of the Emigré"

[The interest and controversy aroused by J. Alvarez del Vayo's recent article on the role of the political émigré in America led the editors of The Nation to invite opinions from a number of leading European anti-fascists living in this country. The comments which follow offer a fairly representative cross-section of nationalities and points of view. Count Carlo Sforza, former Foreign Minister of Italy, who was also asked to contribute, expressed his interest and promised to write a brief article on the same general subject for an early issue.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

PIERRE COT

Air Minister in several French Cabinets, including the Popular Front government of Léon Blum

ALVAREZ DEL VAYO has issued a call to all those who have emigrated from Europe to the United States and are anxious to continue the fight against fascism (The Nation, December 14). In the name of the French democrats who have remained faithful to the spirit of the French Revolution, I declare myself in complete accord with him. But I want to make clear the conditions that must govern common action on the part of the anti-fascist émigrés.

First, we are political refugees benefiting from the hospitality of the United States. This obliges us never to do anything which might in any way interfere with the actions of the United States. This requires us to abstain from all intervention in the internal politics of the United States and from any act which might be inopportune or dangerous to the government of the United States. Second, we have left a very extensive field of action. We know the means employed by fascist propaganda to tear apart the moral unity of the democracies; we can enable America to profit from our experience. Third, certain anti-fascist émigrés belong to nations whose prestige has remained great in Latin America. It is their duty to use this influence to denounce everywhere Hitler and Mussolini as enemies of civilization and of the liberty of peoples. Fourth, by our knowledge of the European political personnel we can contribute to the enlightenment of American public opinion and prevent the creation of certain legends. For quite a while English and American "appeasers" believed that it was possible to separate Mussolini and Franco from Hitler. They made this same error with respect to Pétain and Weygand. Our duty is to explain to them why their attitude is erroneous.

America must know that the immense majority of the French people remain faithful to the ideals of the French Revolution. The policy of Marshal Pétain, who dishonored himself in giving up political refugees to Hitler and to Franco, will create the same popular reaction that was aroused by the policy of Louis Philippe, the policy of Napoleon III, or that of Marshal MacMahon. The only difficulty is to know what form this reaction will take. France will not get rid of Pétain in order to accept another dictatorship and to follow another reactionary and conservative policy. French conservatives are largely behind Pétain on account of their hatred of democracy and socialism. But the conservatives are a minority which is every day being more thoroughly discredited by their acts. With the fall of Hitler the Pétain regime will disappear. And it will disappear through the uprising of popular forces. To reason otherwise would be to ignore both the history of France and the social—perhaps revolutionary—character of the present European conflict. This is the kind of information that a French democrat, knowing French politics and measuring the strength and the weakness of fascism in Europe, can contribute to the American public.

But let us come back to Del Vayo's proposition. I am for it in that it can help me to pay my debt to American democracy, which is as interested in the defeat of fascism as is French democracy.

HANS KOHN

Professor of European history at Smith College and author of "Revolution and Dictatorships" and "Not by Arms Alone"

I THINK that Mr. Del Vayo's suggestion of a union of all anti-fascist forces in a single fighting front is of the utmost timeliness and importance. It is most regrettable that at a time when fascist forces are strongly united and are cooperating, in spite of some divergences of interest and theory, in what is to them the one fundamental task—the world-wide liquidation of democracy—anti-fascist forces should be divided by differences of interest and theory which are entirely secondary to their one main task, the defeat of fascism. The triumph of fascism has been and will be secured by the inability of the democracies, and of the different groups within each democratic movement, to cooperate and to relegate their differences of interest and ideology for the time being to the background.

NORMAN ANGELL

British economist; author of "America's Dilemma" and co-author of "You and the Refugee"

DEL VAYO'S article makes it clear that the Allies have hardly begun to learn the use of that non-military weapon which Hitler has used with such amazing success, without which, indeed, he could never have succeeded in his military effort. That weapon is, of course, the manipulation of political opinion among his enemies—the manipulation of opinions, differences, rivalries, internal hostilities in such a way that military forces built up for the purpose of resisting him are handed over to him for the promotion of his own ends. By playing upon the cupidities, fears, personal resentments, passions, retaliations of 10 per cent, or less, of the French people he has been able to use the resources of France to enslave the French. But while he can use 10 per cent of the people for the enslavement of the whole, we seem to be quite unable to use the 90 per cent for the purpose of their own liberation. The truth is that we have been blindly skeptical about the possibilities of this weapon; we have not shown in its use an energy, patience, persistence, skill, or ingenuity at all comparable to that of the Nazis.

Does not the present situation of Italy, for instance, suggest opportunities which Hitler would have known how to use? The Italian people know full well that if they call for German aid, it is the end of Italian independence; Italy becomes a German province. Defeat by Britain would not make Italy a British province. The situation, therefore, is that the Italian people would, in fact, far rather be conquered by their enemy than aided by their ally. And already in Spain the threat of German invasion is drawing together Spaniards who yesterday were bitter enemies. Hitler would have known how to use such a situation. Do we?

BJARNE BRAATØY

Norwegian author and journalist; member of the Norwegian Shipping and Trade Commission in the United States

DEL VAYO'S proposal for a "sort of Central Council of the Emigration" is attractive. But his article raised more questions than it answered. He apparently sees the council as a political organ. In that case the problem of representation alone becomes nearly insoluble, even if he excludes those nations whose governments continue to be recognized by the United States although their countries have been overrun. The political authority of such a council would be doubtful in the extreme, whatever the past record of its members.

The duty of the émigré is to justify himself with reference to the problems of the present and the future. A Central Council of the Emigration might provide him with the opportunity if it would take example from the efforts of certain American organizations, such as the Commission to Study the Organization of Peace, the Council on Foreign Relations, the American Committee on International Studies, the American Committee on European Reconstruction. For some time past they have been actively considering the problems of relief, reconstruction, and the "new world order." The vexatious problems of representation and political authority would be avoided if the émigrés would similarly pool their undeniable resources in knowledge and experience of the many countries concerned. By doing so they would be playing a perhaps more modest role, but might in the end contribute more to the struggle against fascism than by giving advice to men whose past record may, indeed, include a "Munich" but who are actually fighting this war.

PAUL HAGEN

Representative of the German anti-Nazi political movement "Neu Beginnen"

A COUNCIL of the current European emigration in America could be very useful if it limited its activity to specific tasks—namely, coordination of rescue work, coordination of information, encouragement of victims inside occupied territories, and a certain amount of preparation of future plans. A council of émigrés planning to rectify the "margin of errors" of larger forces and to lead Europe to revolution—"the people who today are living under Hitler's terror must be led to revolt against his intolerable despotism"—would be utopian.

The reason that we do not have such a council already is not found in emigrant jealousies, timidity in presenting "courageous visions," or the like. Such and other shortcomings of the émigré are not the cause but the product of his difficulties. Like previous emigrations, we who have come from Hitler's Europe represent the tradition of our defeats, the immaturity of the movements to which we belonged, more than the potentiality of future victories. Our chance to participate in future victories depends very little on ourselves. The key which will close the door on appeasement and open it to the kind of political warfare which might still hinder a Nazi victory is not in our hands, not even in the hands of the exiled governments. It is in the hands of the British and their American reserve. Whether there shall be democratic revolutions in Europe after the war depends on the Labor Party, on Churchill, and on the United States.

Independent revolutionary movements existed during the last war, but in the present world situation such movements can be developed only after a victory over the totalitarian machines. Therefore the independent preparation of such movements by any center operating from Britain, America, or elsewhere is today a different job from what it was in the last war. Success is dependent on a British victory, and inspiring "visions" or positive criticism will be spoken in the air if they do not have the strength to convince the British first.

MAX ASCOLI

Dean of the Graduate Faculty of the New School for Social Research; formerly on the faculty of several Italian universities

OF COURSE I agree with Del Vayo's article on The Duty of the Emigré and with his proposal for a Central Council of the European Emigration. The article was more than timely; it was overdue. The idea has been milling for months in the heads of a number of people, and once we have contributed our reactions and qualifications to Del Vayo's proposal, we should start working.

Incidentally, I must say that I hate the word "émigré." It has a distinct taste of Coblenz, of people who cling desperately to habits and ways of thinking belonging to a past that is hopelessly gone. Exile, I think, is a much better word, and I think that the first duty of the exiles is exactly that of not being émigrés. All of us who have been uprooted from our countries because of our political beliefs should first of all search with all possible energy for the causes that brought us to defeat. In this country we have now the representatives of every oppressed European nation and of every disbanded European political group. If we exiles do not profit from the opportunity offered by American democracy for discovering, each one for himself, the narrowness of the European nationalisms, the dogmatism and the petty shrewdness of European democratic politics, then I think we have a very poor future ahead of us—the future of men who are useless to the land they came from and to the country that gives them a chance to start life over again.

This is the reason that Del Vayo's proposal is so good. But in joining forces the representatives of the various European political and national groups should realize that it is up to them to give shape to the first nucleus of a renewed, united Europe, and to set the example for it. The Central Council of the Emigration must accomplish a work of European statesmanship—if it does not want to be an association of shipwrecked intellectuals and politicians.

I am sure Del Vayo realizes that the best way of informing and influencing American public opinion is by showing the American people that Europe is not an eternal, hopeless mess and that a new order can be envisaged and prepared for Europe by men who have found new homes in the United States. Those of the exiles who have already become American citizens can best prove their loyalty to American democracy by working for a new, united, and democratic Europe.

RUSTEM VAMBERY

Hungarian criminologist; lecturer at the New School for Social Research

COMMON SENSE and plain logic are powerful seconders of Mr. Del Vayo's praiseworthy motion calling upon the émigrés to participate in the struggle against fascism. It is the duty of its victims to fight against a movement which offers no other alternative but extermination or submission to a brainless and soulless tyranny. Tolerance and protection of civil liberties are the strongest ramparts of any democracy. When this precious American inheritance is at stake the refugee must not remain a bystander watching complacently how others bear the brunt of the attack. The least that may be expected from any refugee is an offer to render voluntary service in the sixth column that must be organized to make the fifth innocuous.

All this, however, presupposes that the American authorities at last discriminate between refugees who just want to save their skin after fascism has put a spoke in their wheel and those others who, like Mr. Del Vayo himself, fought for democracy in Europe until it became impossible to continue the battle. I don't think that the majority of Americans would disdain the assistance even of aliens in the defense of American ideals. What we can offer them is our experience of how it happened over there. Thank God, there are not many who want it to happen here.

FRANZ HOELLERING

Former Austrian journalist; author of "The Defenders"

WITH his proposal of a "sort of Central Council for the Emigration" Mr. Del Vayo touched upon a vital problem of many facets. Its positive solution might well influence what will follow after the war. Surely it would be a great thing if the émigrés could present a sound idea of the Europe to come and demonstrate by action that their program is no mere Utopia. So far, alas, they have given few signs of being able to organize themselves in a political sense. The fact of being against Hitler does not even unite nations at war with Hitler, as we have seen.

Mr. Del Vayo speaks of a program of action that will "lay the basis for the new United States of Europe." What does this mean exactly? I hope his appeal will be widely discussed and thus clarified. Once concrete, convincing, and practical ideas are put forward, then an effective organization of the emigration will follow swiftly. To tackle the job the other way around would be a serious and retarding mistake.

KONRAD HEIDEN

Formerly on the staff of the Frankfurter Zeitung; author of "Hitler," a biography

APPEALS for union are usually a symptom of helplessness. Unfortunately this is true also for the article by Alvarez del Vayo. Union for what? Del Vayo did not say, urging merely a "union against"—against Hitler. This is a well-known trouble, this perpetual negation; it is painfully visible in the term "anti-fascist." Positive goals, above and beyond anti-fascism, are today the prerequisite of any discussion.

Such goals, however, cannot be reached through a vague "union." Del Vayo made this clear, if unwittingly. He formulated no program; indeed, he could not. Any serious outline for a program would immediately arouse violent quarrels, thus proving the irreconcilability of those differences which he wishes to compose. And that is right. For these differences are not the evil force they are usually supposed to be. They represent life. All emigrations are made up of varying national units with their contrasting interests and ideals. A totalitarian dictatorship does not drive one single party into opposition but the nation as a whole. Thus sooner or later a total opposition is created, and this opposition cannot be "united"; it must be heterogeneous. If this opposition is alive it embodies various fighting forces. The successful emigrations of former times showed the deepest schisms, and these endured for the most part to the eve of victory and even beyond it—just because the emigration contained genuine forces. The force which has the greatest future will come through and stifle the others. It can do nothing more fatal to itself than to unite with weaker forces. Genuine political goals cannot be blended.

Del Vayo thus confines himself to suggesting a program for action; in other words, he urges unity about the course without unity about the goal—an inner contradiction which has wrecked all "popular fronts." Del Vayo's suggestion really means, in essence, a new popular front, international in scope, like the League of Nations. It is the fusion, on the rather fictitious soil of emigration, of two experiments which have failed in the past. Better not.

He wants to form a "Central Council of the Emigration," but what is he really going to form? At best a new party within which the individual national emigrations form sections. The Central Council is to be a new kind of International. But if a new party is to be created it ought to have a more far-reaching aim than simply to unite existing parties. The task is not how to unite existing forces but how to arouse new ones. The glueing together of weaknesses creates no force, but existing forces attract new ones. Here it is not union that makes for strength, but strength which unites.

In conclusion, I wish to ask Mr. Del Vayo a practical and very earnest question. He excludes certain trends from his plan for union. American usage terms them "appeasers." Does this also exclude those appeasers who have made non-aggression pacts with Hitler, who for this purpose invited von Ribbentrop to Moscow, who later sent Molotov to Berlin, and who still designate American aid to England a capitalist maneuver?

Everybody's Business

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

Success Story

EVER since I began to write this column nearly two years ago I have again and again dwelt on the relationship between rigid prices and restricted production. Nor do I apologize for harping on this theme, for I believe that it lies at the heart of our economic troubles. We live in an era of rapid technological change, of constant improvements to machinery which result in lower manufacturing costs. But we have made all too little progress in the solution of distribution problems and have failed to keep purchasing power in step with our capacity to produce.

Yet without mass consumption mass production cannot achieve its full potentialities. In factories using repetitive processes a large proportion of costs are incurred before actual output starts. In an automobile plant designed to turn out half a million cars annually a terrific loss would be inevitable if only a few thousand were driven off the assembly line. For each unit, in addition to the actual labor cost, would have to carry the expense of dies, of depreciation of machinery, and of other overheads, which, if the plant were fully occupied, would be divided by 500,000.

This is the most elementary fact in modern industrial economics, and every industrialist is familiar with it. Yet when it comes to pricing policy, all too many manufacturers ignore the logic of their own engineering achievements and arrange their schedules so as to cancel part of the benefits of mass production. They may fix prices, for instance, at a level which will mean they break even at 50 per cent of capacity and make a fair profit at 60 per cent. They then hope that luck and good salesmanship will give them a larger share of the market and enable them to collect the jam represented by the steady increase in margin between cost and price obtained as output rises above 60 per cent. They fail to recognize that technological improvements which lower labor costs also reduce pay rolls and therefore purchasing power unless the savings are passed on to consumers and an additional demand is thus created.

In a state of perfect competition every manufacturer would be compelled to pass on economies in production, but in all too many of our industries prices fixed by administrative methods are influenced only feebly and slowly by the pressures of the market-place. However, competition is not entirely dead, and at this season of good-will I should like to celebrate two recent examples of its beneficial effects.

Early in 1940 the Kelvinator-Nash Corporation threw a bombshell into the refrigerator industry by announcing price cuts of from $30 to $40. It was done by concentrating production on the larger models, by a change in distributive methods which reduced charges, and by a cut in unit profits. At the same time production schedules were doubled, thus permitting a decrease in unit costs provided that the planned output could be sold. Other leading makers, who had previously published price schedules practically unchanged from 1939, were forced to meet this challenge. Quotations for "stripped" six-foot models were brought down even below those announced by Kelvinator, which in turn made a further revision in prices.

To what extent the total market for refrigerators has been enlarged by these added inducements to purchasers cannot yet be ascertained. In 1939 domestic sales totaled 1,925,000 units, and in 1937, the record year, they reached 2,310,000. At the beginning of 1940 there were 13,700,000 electric refrigerators in use, and with less than 25,000,000 wired homes in the country it was estimated that the saturation point would be reached at about 16,000,000 units. However, the replacement market was growing in importance and was expected to account for 500,000 models this year. There can be no doubt, however, that as the result of lower prices a drastic revision of the saturation point is necessary. Final figures for 1940 are not yet available, but an estimate in a recent issue of the New York Times places sales at the record-shattering goal of 2,800,000.

With such an output it would not be surprising to learn that the industry, as a whole, increased its earnings in spite of price cuts and smaller profit margins. It is pleasant to record that Kelvinator, which launched the campaign, has not gone unrewarded. Its 1940 sales have been reported as two and a quarter times those of the previous year, which means a healthy excess over its planned output. Moreover, the Kelvinator-Nash Corporation, which recorded a loss of $1,573,524 in the twelve months ending September 30, 1939, shows a profit of $1,505,151 for the year ending September 30, 1940. The accounts do not show how much of this profit was due to the refrigerator division of the business, but the president of the company has stated that the contribution was substantial. It is interesting to note, also, that a similar pricing policy is now being followed in respect of the Nash car.

My other example of healthy competition is in the phonograph-record industry. In August, 1940, the Columbia Recording Company, after a reorganization of its business, neatly cut the price of classical records in two, thus bringing the works of the great masters played by leading artists and orchestras within reach of a whole new range of purchasers. The RCA-Victor Company quickly followed suit, and as a result sales have bounded forward and appear likely to get within striking distance of levels untouched since the industry was invalidated by radio competition in the middle twenties. It has been estimated that Columbia's sales of discs in the Masterworks division have been multiplied by five since the price cuts took effect. Nor have earnings suffered, for an official of the company tells me that while the unit margin is naturally much smaller, the per cent of gross carried to profits shows a very satisfactory increase.

Here, then, we have two instances of the way in which lower prices have made possible lower costs and higher output, with benefit to consumer and producer alike. It is to be hoped that the lesson will sink home. In the coming year purchasing power will expand owing to defense expenditures, and in industries where competition is weak there will be a temptation to hoist prices on the theory that the traffic will be able to bear a little more. I believe such a policy would be shortsighted in the extreme and that even if it brought about a temporary increase in profits it would recoil eventually on its pursuers.

In the Wind

WATCH FOR a change in Henry Ford's "foreign policy." As a result of widespread reports about his alleged pro-Nazism, he has left the "America First" committee. Ford's man Bennett—chief spokesman for the corporation—now tells visitors to River Rouge that he's for "kicking hell out of the Nazis when we're fully prepared."

IT HAPPENED AGAIN. A fortnight ago this column reported that the Detroit News had buried an item about Wendell Willkie on the obituary page. The St. Petersburg Independent, it now appears, ran the following United Press item from New York on December 13: "Wendell Willkie returned from a Florida vacation today and is expected to confer with state leaders of the Willkie clubs to discuss the future of the organization." It appeared in the obituary column.

DR. H. E. CHRISTENBERRY, member of the Knoxville school board, recently protested that "tots two and four years old of both sexes are allowed to use toilet facilities at the same time." Said Dr. Christenberry: "We have no place in our school system for the practices that have been reported. The lowering of moral defense in just such instances has caused the downfall of such countries as France, and I am not in favor of it."

MERWIN K. HART published a half-column denial in the New York Times after Harold Ickes accused him of being associated with the fascist fifth column here. Will Mr. Hart deny that a couple of weeks ago he privately met with one of the defendants in the recent Christian Front trial?

ALONG WITH information on how to call the police, the fire departments and the hospital, the New York Telephone Directory now gives special listing to the phone number of the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

RALPH INGERSOLL, publisher of PM, has sent a memo to his staff asserting that Communists are now "ganging up" on the paper because it has criticized the C. P. line. The memo describes shifts in the party's attitude toward the paper.

THE WASHINGTON MERRY-GO-ROUND'S report that Phil Murray has abandoned the idea of purging the C. I. O. of Stalinists is discounted in informed C. I. O. circles. The purge is coming, but it will be slow and unspectacular.

EVIDENCE IS mounting that Robert Jackson and J. Edgar Hoover don't see eye to eye, although no public break is likely. Tales of friction are reported widely in Washington.

A HOLLYWOOD movie company is planning to do a life of Winston Churchill.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

A Native at Large

BY JONATHAN DANIELS

IN PENSACOLA, where the sky above the "Annapolis of the Air" is filled every day with the stubby yellow training planes of the young air cadets, citizens on their way to work recently saw a plane crash into the bay. Hours later that afternoon I read the story in the Pensacola News. It was written as a man might cover a ball game from outside the fence, with the people inside the fence being rigidly reticent about the whole matter. But it was not a ball game. It was a serious story and legitimate news. Such details as the navy possessed, I thought then and think now, should have been made promptly available to the press. But increasingly, as I talk to newspapermen on newspapers close to naval and military posts, I get the complaint that officers in charge of press relations are too often ignorant, arrogant, or both.

Any sensible citizen or reporter moving about the country understands the necessity in time of crisis for increasingly strict regulations about entry into important defense positions and projects. Few of the reporters I know expect any intelligent officer to distribute information of a secret nature possibly valuable to some foreign power which might be involved in future war against us. Most men understand the menace of the saboteur, the danger in a time of crisis from foreign agents of every sort.

Even the TVA, which made it an important part of policy to bring the people as close as possible to the projects in its big regional plan for the people, has closed its power plants, boarded up vantage points on the bridges across its dams, and made its employees carry identification cards bearing their photographs. Every precaution against anybody blowing up a power house has been taken, even though the new procedure interferes with the old plan of creating the sense of public participation in the whole job. But TVA keeps its information office going full swing in the work of creating good-will.

Obviously the army and navy in their new rush projects should not be held to the standards in press relations of TVA and other peace-purpose agencies, even if TVA was designed for defense purposes also. TVA has had eight years in which to understand and develop its public-relations job. Working out the press relations of military and naval posts absolutely galloping in increase is a far less simple business. Fortunately, as it may seem to some, the present popularity of defense, and of the army and navy, makes a good press fairly easy—too easy maybe. Some officers can in effect tell inquiring reporters to go to hell—or lie to them in transparent complacency—without stirring any disturbing newspaper attack upon them. The newspapers are anxious to help defense in every way, and so far it makes little difference that local working reporters are often irritated and angered.

The situation is by no means uniformly bad. In some camps sensible officers under sensible command are working hard and harmoniously with the reporters of the papers around their posts and stations. In others, men trained in soldiering who have assumed the duties of press relations have been more ignorant of their jobs and frightened in them than intentionally condescending and obstructive. But one officer at one post at least, in an off-the-record speech at a press meeting, stated that in his view the whole job of the press is taking what it is given and liking it.

The difficulties seem greater away from Washington than in it. In some of the little towns where big camps and stations and projects have grown, the local press is as much at a loss in meeting the expanded problem as the officers are. There have been cases of bad reporting for which the press and not the officers were to blame. But when there is trouble away from Washington, local officers—when they give any explanation for unnecessary reticence about entirely legitimate news—pass the responsibility for it back to Washington itself. As in all buck-passing, nobody can quite determine the absolute truth.

Wherever the responsibility is, some attention is needed. Even Germany has understood the importance of the press to power. In a democracy which is preparing its own defense an intelligent press relationship for the services is not only a more important problem but a different one. And away from Washington it begins to look like one of the major bottlenecks in the defense program. It does not show its danger now. Uncritical patriotism is a policy of many newspapers. The army and navy may get away with stupid press relations for a long time, but they are preparing for trouble when they fail to recognize that the country demands from them the honest, intelligent, prompt provision of legitimate news on all its big posts and projects.

The press understands the necessity for secrecy about secret matters. It is time the army and the navy understood the necessity for prompt and full publicity about matters of legitimate public concern. The job of defense in America depends on letting the public in as much as on keeping the spies out.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Notes by the Way

THE drawings on this page are taken from "Mr. Smith and Mr. Schmidt," a picture book by Ben Martin (Vanguard Press, $1.25) in which he reduces to very simple sentences and very funny line drawings that solemn text The Advantages of Living in a Democracy. Mr. Smith, says Mr. Martin, isn't particularly happy, because he has a lot of responsibilities, whereas Mr. Schmidt doesn't have to do any thinking—he only has to work, march, cheer, sing, burn books, do a little dying now and then, and pay homage to his peerless leader.

Physically They Are Much Alike

over a book about d—y vs. f—m.

I THINK it's interesting that three of the four literary quarterlies which come to my desk are published at universities in the South or on its edge—the only other important university quarterly that comes to mind is issued at Yale. The Virginia Quarterly is probably the one best known to Nation readers. Each issue contains several articles on current social or political problems, but its main emphasis is on literature and the humanities. The winter issue, which is the first to be published under the direction of its new editor, Archibald Bolling Shepperson, who replaced Lawrence Lee, features a discussion of The Dilemma of Democracy by Carl Becker. A supplement contains a full-length play by D. H. Lawrence, hitherto unpublished. Its autumn issue led off with an excellent analysis of the Vatican in world politics by Lawrence Fernsworth and also included a delightful reminiscence of Norman Douglas by his son. For the rest there are stories, poems, and reviews of books. The Virginia Quarterly is well edited, well written, and always lively.

The Southern Review, issued at Louisiana University, operates a good deal farther behind the journalistic lines, and I find it rather piquant not only that it comes out of Huey Long's bailiwick but that both contributors and subjects often veer to the left. The most recent issue contains a symposium on literature and the professors—the other five papers in the symposium are to be found in the autumn issue of the Kenyon Review; it also contains a discussion of What Is Living and Dead in Marxism by Sidney Hook, an article on Trotsky as Scholastic by Max Eastman, a long short story, and a group of poems. It would be called "highbrow" I suppose; yet because of its catholicity it has a quality of unexpectedness that is certainly one of the prime requisites of good journalism. Incidentally it is very attractively printed.

The Kenyon Review, published at Gambier, Ohio, under the imprint of Kenyon College, describes itself as the only quarterly devoted exclusively to arts and letters. The devotion is a little reminiscent of academic cloisters, but it has printed some extremely good articles and reviews. Its managing editor is Philip Blair Rice, who has written many excellent reviews for The Nation.

The Partisan Review, published in New York, is a bi-monthly rather than a quarterly. And in other respects as well it is in a category by itself. Its point of view in both literature and politics is Marxist. Marxist literary criticism has hit some very low points in literalness and ignorance in the past decade, but the articles in the Partisan Review by such writers as Philip Rahv, Meyer Schapiro, and others demonstrate once more how fruitful and illuminating the Marxist approach to the arts can be in the hands of intelligent writers. The poems and stories printed in the Review are original and experimental. On the literary side there is the sense of a fresh wind blowing through; fewer windows are open on the political side, but though I find the literary manifestations of the Partisan Review's Marxist approach far more persuasive than the political, its occasional editorials on current issues have the merit of being well written—usually by Dwight MacDonald, who is one of the few bright young men to have escaped alive from Time, Inc.

All of these magazines, as a Nation editor might say, "deserve support." But I have a general complaint—which applies also, I admit, to The Nation's literary section. They fail, in varying degrees, to communicate a sense of the pleasures of literature, music, and art, which must surely be one reason why their editors edit literary magazines. It is understandable that the Morleyization of the arts in this country, plus the vestigial Puritan in all of us, has driven us literary editors into acting as if culture were a solemn crusade instead of a continuous adventure of discovery and satisfaction, both intellectual and emotional. Last spring in Mexico I read a number of issues of Romance, a fortnightly magazine founded by a group of Spaniards and Mexicans. I suppose it might better be called a newspaper; its format is that of a tabloid. It takes all culture for its province—Watteau appears along with Orozco and articles about Goethe along with report of the newest Hollywood film—though it pays special attention to both new and established Latin American writers and artists. It is designed to be a "popular" magazine—its circulation was said to be 15,000 then—though there is no vulgarization. It is quite different, in scope and purpose, from the magazines I have mentioned in this brief survey, but the feeling it conveys, of excitement and even gaiety about the arts as experience, need not be alien to more eclectic magazines.

Mr. Schmidt's Peerless Leader

Where Books Are Read, Not Burned

I AM glad to report that I find the second issue of Common Ground, publication of the Common Council for American Unity, much livelier than the first. Pictures have been introduced; and it contains some good reading, including The Anatomy of Prejudice by Henry A. Davison, an appealing autobiographical sketch by Younghill Kang which begins with the telescopic sentence, "I was born in Korea in 1903, when the minds of the people were greatly perplexed," and an article about William Saroyan by John Fante which is very entertaining, despite the fact that so many entertaining articles about Saroyan have already been written. Saroyan's idiosyncrasies make good copy, and Mr. Fante doesn't neglect them. He says, among other things, that it is almost impossible to find an unautographed copy of Saroyan. "Undoubtedly there are out of the way towns where this condition does not exist, but it must also be said that with the success of his plays Saroyan is richer now and able to traverse the hinterlands with the thoroughness of a politician seeking office. Time will come when collectors will be bidding for unautographed copies." But Mr. Fante makes it clear that Saroyan has never indulged his love of attention at the expense of his integrity. He tells the story of how Saroyan turned up once at the Crowell offices in New York with a story which the staff read, thought hilariously funny and wonderfully written. They decided, however, that it needed a slight change at the end. Saroyan refused, though he had to borrow money the next day to get back to California. Saroyan, says Fante, "would give his life for the cause of justice and fair play; it is a passion you sense in him. Undoubtedly he would prefer to make this supreme sacrifice in the presence of a lot of people—but that's Saroyan." By the way, Saroyan's newest book, "My Name Is Aram," was published last week by Harcourt, Brace ($2.50).

Mr. Smith Has Many Responsibilities

IVAN GOLL is the author of the poem Chanson de France, which appeared some time ago in The Nation. "Jean Sans Terre" (John Landless) is the title and "hero" of a book by Mr. Goll of which three volumes have already appeared in France. Another selection from it was printed in the July-August issue of the Partisan Review. I suggest that readers who are interested get a copy of that number, not only for the poem but for an illuminating "Note on Jean Sans Terre" by Louise Bogan.

THE FARM SECURITY Administration maintains a photographic project and file documenting the living and working conditions of America's rural lower third. Some 142 of these photographs are presented in "Home Town," for which Sherwood Anderson has written the text (Face of America Series, Alliance Book Corporation, $2.50). There are some excellent photographs by Walker Evans, Arthur Rothstein, Dorothea Lange, and many others; Mr. Anderson knows his small town and writes about it with feeling and intelligence. It is a frankly nostalgic book, and though I doubt that it will send the residents of New York or Chicago back where they came from, it would make a tactful gift for the folks back home.

But He Has More Fun

MISCELLANY: Speaking of the pleasures of literature, I don't see why more bells weren't rung about Edmund Wilson's "To the Finland Station." . . . The New York Public Library has at present in active circulation over 350 copies of "Uncle Tom's Cabin." . . . Havelock Ellis's monumental "Studies in the Psychology of Sex" may now be had in two volumes (Random House, $7.50). . . . From a folder suggesting Time magazine as a gift: "This Christmas your gift is the whole world of 1941." May I send it back with a rejection slip?

MARGARET MARSHALL

John Landless at the Final Port

BY IVAN GOLL

(Translated by William Carlos Williams)

John Landless in a keelless boat

Having sailed many oceans without shore

A dawnless day at a townless port

Landed and knocked at a houseless door

He knows of old this woman without face

Before a mirrorless wall who combs her hair

This sheetless bed this fireless embrace

This dastard love without despair

He knows these rusted galleys without oars

These mastless bricks these steamless steamers

These barless streets windows without women

Sleepless nights docks haunted by no fears

And what of these men who battle

With gestures of the old gladiator's art

Arms without fists revolvers without slugs
Pitiless eyes and pledges without heart

And why do these ships go on loading
From dock to ship unloading from ship to dock?
Why the voracious hunger of these cranes
Which faithless seek high heaven to unlock?

These hides will never sole a shoe
This cotton never clothe the naked
This wood will never give off sparks
This grain to holy bread be baked

What is this port at which none lands?
Where this cape lacking a continent?
Which is this merciless lighthouse?
Who this traveler missing punishment?

The European Lesson

AMERICA NEXT. By Peter Markham. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $2.75.

ONE of the townfolk in the scene Before the Gate in Goethe's "Faust" is telling his friend:

On Sundays, holidays there's naught I take delight in,
Like gossiping on war and war's array,
When down in Turkey, far away
The foreign people are a-fighting.

Envisaging current events from the same viewpoint some journalists hope to transmute their beats and scoops into contemporary history by having them reprinted in octavo size. From this deluge of books on Europe not only monsters of ignorance but pearls of erudition, too, emerge. This book falls in the second category.

Mr. Markham, neither a journalist nor a scholar but a sharp-sighted ex-officer and American business man, watched the mene tekel as it appeared on the walls of various countries with unerring judgment. He offers no sensational "news behind the news," only his thorough knowledge of the background from which all this horror arose. We learn why the feeble leaders of British Tory democracy, whose "lack of imagination was not only stupid but criminal," were unable to desert the time-worn "safe middle course." England, cleansed through fire, eventually "revealed to the wondering world the unconquerable strength of a united nation." A victim of its 200 families, France fared much worse. Geared to Sitzkrieg rather than Blitzkrieg, with capital and labor lining up at two extremities, its influential papers bought by Nazis and Fascists, "a house divided against itself," France underwent a collapse that shocked the world but that did not surprise Mr. Markham. When we learn that the Nazis with the assistance of big industrialists built a fifty-billion-mark war machine against Sir John Simon's "cheap war" it seems comprehensible that at Soissons the Germans moved up a thousand tanks and the French only two.

However, it is an overstatement that Hitler has spread communism with his sword. All Danubian countries, true, are more or less Nazi provinces and have a low standard of living. But pauperization is not communism, not yet.

Poland's tragedy the author explains by the forced unification of the Westernized upper crust and the Easternized masses, the ownership of 40 per cent of the land by 1 per cent of the population. This to a lesser extent is true of Hungary as well. Whether Hitler has fooled not only the democracies, not only his Axis partner, but, as Mr. Markham believes, Russia, too, remains to be seen.

Hitler has certainly learned that neither war nor safety can be won by balancing the budget or by limiting the national debt, but with oil and iron only. Europe's downfall, we are told, offers another lesson: that "some people feared the rise of the underprivileged or the loss of property which might result from war more than the Nazi domination." In case of a German victory America obviously must face Hitler's demand for food and raw material on his terms, but there still are Americans who, in Mr. Markham's view, either underrate "the military strength and skill of the Germans" or else aspire to be an American Gauleiter.

Whether one agrees with Mr. Markham or not, his warning that this country badly needs planes and tanks instead of appropriations and blueprints must be taken seriously. "The challenge is now" and not when the two-ocean navy is ready.

Mr. Markham dedicates his book to the American people. This, I presume, includes isolationists, appeasers, and even those who still call the President "that red in the White House." It is a book so honestly and so lucidly written that even they will understand it, provided their emotions do not bar the way to arguments.

RUSTEM VAMBERY

Tract for the Times

CHRISTIANITY AND POWER POLITICS. By Reinhold Niebuhr. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.

MR. NIEBUHR has long been known as one of the most gifted writers on the relation of Protestant Christianity to politics. His latest book is a tract for the times, a vigorous attack on the Pelagianism of the pacifist movement. The core of his argument is best stated in his own words.

The Western democracies are the spiritual children of the Renaissance rather than the Reformation. . . . For Roman Catholicism man is a sinner, involved in self-love and incapable of doing good, but he is capable of loving God and his neighbor once sacramental grace has been infused. The Reformation rightly challenged this too simple view of sanctification. It recognized the continued possibility of sin in the life of the redeemed. . . . The Renaissance, on the other hand, saw human history as a realm of infinite potentialities, but forgot that it is a realm of evil as well as of good potentialities. In both its rationalism and its mysticism the Renaissance thought that it had found methods of extricating the universal man from the particular man, imbedded in the flux of nature. . . . As a consequence the tragic character of human history, in which man is perennially betrayed to use his freedom for destruction as well as construction, is not understood.

Pacifism, he points out, blasphemes by denying original sin and pretending that perfection can be acquired in a progressive school. "Christianity and Power Politics" is lucid, just, and, I believe, theologically unexceptionable, and yet it leaves me a little uneasy. As an orthodox theologian must, the author scents the dangers of reacting from this romantic optimism of liberal Protestantism into the pessimistic dualism of Barth; but orthodoxy, the middle way, has its spiritual dangers, too, and it is a sense of these that one misses here, the sense as Kierkegaard puts it, of always being out alone over seventy thousand fathoms.

A brother once came to one of the desert fathers saying, "My mind is intent on God." The old man replied: "It is no great matter that thy mind should be with God; but if thou didst see thyself less than any of His creatures, that were something." I am sure Dr. Niebuhr knows this: I am not sure, though, that he is sufficiently ashamed. The danger of being a professional exposé of the bogus is that, encountering it so often, one may come in time to cease to believe in the reality it counterfeits.

One has an uneasy suspicion that, were Dr. Niebuhr to meet the genuine, he might be as embarrassed as an eighteenth-century bishop or as an army chaplain. The question is: Does he believe that the contemplative life is the highest and most exhausting of vocations, that the church is saved by the saints, or doesn't he?

Recent history is showing, I think, and Dr. Niebuhr suggests here and there that he would agree with me, that man cannot live without a sense of the Unconditional: if he does not consciously walk in fear of the Lord, then his unconscious sees to it that he has something else, airplanes or secret police, to walk in fear of.

W. H. AUDEN

Marx and the American Farmer

WHY FARMERS ARE POOR. By Anna Rochester. International Publishers. $2.75.

AMERICAN agriculture has been seriously depressed since 1920. Farm families, as Miss Rochester points out, constitute about one-fourth of our population but obtain only about 9 per cent of the total national income. Although the situation is not as acute as it was at the depth of the depression in 1931-33, it has not changed fundamentally. Miss Rochester attempts to portray in terms of Marxian economics the basic nature of the problem and its link to the general decay of capitalism. No other book, so far as I am aware, has so thoroughly demonstrated the interdependence of agriculture and industry. The relative decline in agriculture's share in the reward for its product is attributed to the greatly superior opportunities for growth in industry, which, permitting a much more rapid accumulation of capital, have forced agriculture into the position of a debtor and weakened its bargaining power in marketing its product. Transportation, distribution, and financing costs have been maintained at artificially high levels by powerful interests.

Largely as a result of technical advance and the creditor-debtor situation just referred to, agriculture has undergone a marked transformation in recent years. The number of farms has declined; there has been a tendency toward larger units of production, greater specialization, and—particularly in the last decade—increased use of wage labor. There has also been larger use of farm equipment, but Miss Rochester insists that this is not the primary index of development toward completely capitalist farming. It is secondary to the increase in wage labor on farms. Wage labor, she declares, is the decisive factor in the farmer's ability to accumulate wealth. "Value transferred from buildings, implements, livestock, and feed," she maintains, merely incorporates into the farmer's product "value which he had previously purchased or borrowed or which he has created by his own labor, or taken from wage workers in past years. The only new value created during the current year is that produced by the farmer and his family, plus the value created by wage workers."

This may seem a technical and somewhat abstruse point, but it is central in the author's analysis of the factors accounting for the increasing exploitation of farm workers and the increasing financial difficulties of the middle farmers. Agricultural statistics—of which this book is a mine—seem to bear out this point. Yet common sense tells us that the proper use of stored-up labor in the form of equipment, coupled with scientific technique, should yield higher profits than mere exploitation of labor.

Apart from this one somewhat dubious point, the book rests on secure foundations. Farmers are the outcasts of capitalism. As debtors, their interest charges are far in excess of those paid by business. They are at a disadvantage in marketing their products. High rents and land values levy a disproportionate toll on the return from farm products. All of this, Miss Rochester concludes, lines up the farmer on the side of those whose interests are opposed to a continuation of the capitalist system. But unfortunately only a very few thousand of our five million farmers are likely to read this formidable book.

MAXWELL S. STEWART

READ:

"HOW THE POPES TREATED THE JEWS"

by Dr. L. H. Lehmann

in the January issue of

THE CONVERTED CATHOLIC

A Monthly Magazine Devoted Exclusively to the Field of Catholic Controversy. Beginning Its Second Year

EDITED BY FORMER ROMAN CATHOLIC PRIESTS

Up-to-date, Authentic Information on the Political, Social and Religious Activities of the Catholic Church

Hundreds of Nation Readers Are Already Subscribers to The Converted Catholic

Order your copy now!

Subscription $1.00 a Year

THE CONVERTED CATHOLIC
229 West 48th Street, New York, N. Y.

For the enclosed $1.00, please send me The Converted Catholic for one year, beginning with the January issue.

Name.....

Address.....

IN BRIEF

THE POETRY OF DOROTHY WORDSWORTH. Edited from the Journals by Hyman Eigerman. Columbia University Press. $2.

Extracts from the Journals of Dorothy Wordsworth cut up and printed as though they were imagist poems—which they are not. The subtle rhythm of Dorothy Wordsworth's prose is thereby interrupted, the context is lost, and even in the midst of the extracted passages phrases essential to the meaning are omitted. The compilation has nevertheless been a labor of love, and it will have served some purpose if it sends more readers to the Journals.

NOR FIRE, NOR ICE. Poems by Lucy Atkinson McIlwaine. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.

If ever one of Ellen Glasgow's unreconciled Virginia maiden ladies had, in her spare time, attempted to write poems the result would be very like this little volume. Miss McIlwaine died last year before the publication of the book.

BEHIND THE LINES, By A. A. Milne. E. P. Dutton and Company. $1.75.

According to the dust cover, "here is the ever-lively, brilliant mind of one of the world's great masters of light verse playing thoughtfully upon the vexing problems of his time." According to this American reader here is the English gentleman at his silliest and most fatuous, and, what is worse, pretending to be even sillier and more fatuous than he is. I understand there is a censor in England, and while I have never yet recommended a book to a censor, I do suggest that in the interest of England he see that no more of Mr. Milne's work gets across the Atlantic until the war is over.

AMERICAN ENGLISH GRAMMAR. By Charles Carpenter Fries. D. Appleton-Century Company. $2.50.

This report of an investigation financed by the National Council of Teachers of English on "The Grammatical Structure of Present-Day American English with Special Reference to Social Differences or Class Dialects" assumes that "usage or practice is the basis of all the correctness there can be in language." This is a point of view always held by sensible people but only just dawning on most teachers of English. The author of this admirable monograph not only recognizes that there are many kinds of "correct" American English, but actually allows you to say, as anyone who talks naturally does say, things like "It is me" and "Who did you call?"

THE NEWS AND HOW TO UNDERSTAND IT—In Spite of the Newspapers, in Spite of the Magazines, in Spite of the Radio. By Quincy Howe. Simon and Schuster. $2.

Though satirical, Mr. Howe's admirably lucid guide is not so satirical as its title. For Mr. Howe really gives some very practical hints on how to get the most out of the purveyors and interpreters of news with the least margin of error. He seasons his advice with some delightful parodies of our major news agencies, columnists, and commentators. He finds his King Charles's head, of course, without much trouble between nearly every two lines he reads. But since the cause of Britain looms so large in the consciousness of us all just now, that is not hard for him to do.

THE ORIGIN OF PRINTING IN EUROPE. By Pierce Butler. The University of Chicago Press. $1.50.

This book is labeled a "Study in Library Science" and is by the professor of bibliographical history in the University of Chicago, but any general reader interested in the history of culture will be doing himself a disservice if he passes it up unread. It not only explains technical matters which, though they underlie our whole civilization, are a closed book to most laymen, but gives a really remarkable interpretation of the social significance of the "invention" of printing. A "humane" achievement. It is appropriately illustrated with diagrams and facsimiles.

AND STILL THE WATERS RUN. By Angie Debo. Princeton University Press. $4.

The story, never fully told before, of what happened to the "Five Civilized Tribes" of Oklahoma, who trusted in treaties with the United States government, is given here without sentiment or embellishment and with full documentation. The resulting book is both important and moving, but the difficulty of summarizing accurately the impression it makes is increased by Oliver La Farge's irrelevant statement that it is "a first-rate literary treatment of history." Literary is one thing it is not, thank heaven; but Miss Debo has done a first-rate job of investigation and reporting, which is at the same time an implied, and pretty final, judgment of value from a historical point of view.

THE BACKGROUND OF THE REVOLUTION IN MARYLAND. By Charles Albrow Barker. Yale University Press. $3.50.

One of the Yale Historical Publications written by an assistant professor at Stanford University. It traces thoroughly the social, economic, and political developments which provided a sample of what led up to the Revolution. Mr. Barker does full justice to the special flavor of Maryland while remaining objective. It is not for the casual reader, but specialists will find it highly readable.

GOLDEN GATE: THE STORY OF SAN FRANCISCO HARBOR. By Felix Riesenbergs, Jr. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.50.

Mr. Riesenbergs, who inherits a knowledge of ships and harbors and a racy way of writing about them, has a magnificent subject. He has produced a readable, vivid surface picture of the changing history of America's raciest port. One can enjoy it all and understand why San Francisco has always been such an interesting city. Some readers will be inclined to regret the fictional style which is frequently used in the narrative of events. The twenty-seven illustrations are splendid.

BRITAIN SPEAKS. By J. B. Priestley. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

Based upon the radio talks which Mr. Priestley has made to America through the British Broadcasting Company, this book reflects the day-to-day attitude of the British people. It tells what they are doing and thinking, and does so with considerable freedom of comment.

THE ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION. An Interpretation of the Social-Constitutional History of the American Revolution, 1774-1781. By Merrill Jensen. University of Wisconsin Press. $3.

The author's thesis—and this book is quite obviously a thesis though a model one—is that the Articles of Confederation "were not the result of either ignorance or inexperience. On the contrary, they were a natural outcome of the revolutionary movement within the American colonies"—as distinguished, that is, from the revolutionary movement against Great Britain. As such they did not find favor with the conservatives, Another "Nation" Scoop!

"All the News That's Fit to Print."

The New York Times

VOL. XL, No. 30,284.

Entered as Second-Class Matter,
Postoffice, New York, N. Y.Copyright, 1940, by The New York Times Company
NEW YORK, MONDAY, DECEMBER 23, 1940.

500 PLANES A DAY
BY AUTO PLANT USE
PROPOSED BY C. I. O.

Murray Will Offer Roosevelt
Plan Designed to Start Production in Six Months

'UNUSED' CAPACITY CITED

Union Reports Idle Presses, Space, 'Many' Idle Workers
—Urges Air Board of Mine

By LOUIS STARK
Special to The New York Times
WASHINGTON, Dec. 23.—Philip Murray, president of the Congress of Industrial Organizations, is expected to take up with President Roosevelt tomorrow a plan to utilize the unused capacity of the automotive industry which the union leader says would produce, after six months of preparation, 500 of the most modern fighting planes each working day or about 150,000 a year. Based on a study of the industry by the C. I. O.'s United Automobile Workers of America, the plan would bring to the production of airplanes the mass production methods which the automotive industry has successfully employed for decades. According to the union, the automotive industry is capable today

Santa Eills Bag for Refugees Too; Fifth Avenue Church

Big

624

Labor's Plan: 500 Planes a Day

BY I. F. STONE

Detroit, December 15—ing all private interests to the one job of getting out the planes. The battle cannot be won without casualties—the price of planes and the capital values the aircraft industry has built on that price. For the success of this plan would cut in half the cost of making planes, a development which the aircraft industry as a whole dreads far more than the defeat of Britain.

The job of getting out the planes requires, first of all, skilled mechanics, and the first shocking fact that inquiry uncovers here is that roughly a third of the skilled mechanics in this country are out of work and most of the rest are working less than a full forty-hour week. There are more than 15,000 skilled mechanics in Detroit and its environs—tool-and-die makers, jig and fixture makers, pattern makers and designers. Estimates of the number either totally unemployed or working on production jobs that less skilled men could fill run from 5,000 to 8,000. Fisher Body Plant No. 23, the largest tool-and-die shop in the world, has employed as many as 4,800 at one time and has machinery enough to work March to November of this year, most of them on a forty-eight-hour week. It now has 400 men on its payroll, and they are working only thirty-two hours a week. The tool-and-die shop of General Motors are on a short

$1,000

S FROM PLAIN
S HAL

he Interna
members attacked many in six countries last night and yesterday London announced. Port facilities at W. Cologne, Mannheim, St. Colaba, Flushing, Herdman and Loria the Bergen-O. hit and one square the Alps. Malphers no British reports. ma 8.) Liverpool were und attack last night consecutive night that on. Battle ombers had done image to Live on attacked London and Bristol. 1.) Marshal Grau Museum's the

ON December 23 the metropolitan dailies headlined the C. I. O. or Reuther plan for large-scale airplane production. But on December 15—eight days earlier—The Nation's Washington editor, I. F. Stone, had filed the same story, and on December 19 The Nation appeared with the inside account of what Dorothy Thompson has called "the most important event of the last days." A weekly journal had "scooped" the daily press.

This is only one of The Nation's recent "scoops" from the capital. In rapid succession have come Mr. Stone's stories of the Navy Department's squeeze on Mexico through a high-bid award to Standard Oil; of the new Ford contract in which the six-time violator of the Wagner Act failed even to meet specifications; of the aviation industry's sitdown strike for higher profits.

If you want to be ahead of the news, the kind of news that really matters, order your weekly copies of The Nation now by filling out and mailing the order form below today.

THE NATION, 55 5th Ave., N. Y.

Please enter my Nation subscription for the term checked below for which I inclose $.....

☐ 1 YEAR $5 ☐ 2 YEARS $8

☐ 3 YEARS $11

—INTRODUCTORY OFFER—

☐ 13 WEEKS $1

NAME.....

STREET.....

CITY.....

STATE.....

Canadian and Foreign postage—$1 a year extra who evidently put over the idea that the adoption of a new constitution was the only alternative to chaos. The author proves his thesis—itsself a natural, or at any rate academic, outcome of Professor Beard's theories about our Constitution.

1-4-41

BRONSON ALCOTT, TEACHER. By Dorothy McCuskey. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

Miss McCuskey confines herself completely to the educational activities of the great Amos Bronson Alcott: transcendental seer, inspiration to Emerson and Thoreau, apostle of culture, and father of Louisa May. In her anxiety to show Alcott's pioneering efforts in integrating education, making school-rooms pleasant, and teaching children to think rather than memorize, the author has completely missed the man himself—surely one of the most amazing figures in American letters. Even granting the author her self-imposed limitation, a knowledge of the experiments in education now being performed by the Gestalt psychologists would have increased her understanding of much of Alcott's work. The book is an expanded doctoral thesis, and reads like one.

GEORGE ELIOT AND JOHN CHAPMAN. With Chapman's Diaries. By Gordon S. Haight. Yale University Press. $2.75.

Yes, it's true what they say about the Victorians. Come with Mr. Haight into this literary parlor of mid-Victorian London and find out. You will hear much talk about "culture" and "self-culture." You will meet John Chapman, publisher of the Westminster Review, and his earnest literary "helpmate," Miss Marion Evans. Chapman, the chief subject of the book, was as helplessly devoted to ladies as he was to less tangible beauties of "a higher plane." Homely Miss Evans, who edited the Westminster for a time, was not helpless at all and forged a very solid reputation for herself under the name of George Eliot. An informative, if rather academic, literary study.

THE GUILLOTINE AT WORK. By G. P. Maximoff. The Chicago Section of the Alexander Berkman Fund. $3.50.

Reproducing official documents and letters from political exiles, Mr. Maximoff gives a bloody picture of terrorism in Soviet Russia. He differs, however, from most anti-Soviet writers in that his chief attack is directed at Lenin. It was Lenin, he says, who established the system of inquisitional violence which Stalin has merely continued. And behind Lenin, so runs Mr. Maximoff's thesis, the authority for this disregard for human life lies in the brutal determinism of Marxism itself.

RECORDS

THE only question about the new Columbia set of Beethoven's String Quartet Opus 131 (Set 429, $5.50) is whether Columbia has done a good recording job with the Budapest Quartet's performance; and the answer is that it has—which makes this one of the great sets of this year and all years.

To this Columbia adds several other fine things. Most of the sacred and secular music of the twelfth to the seventeenth centuries recorded by Yves Tindayre (Set 431, $4.50) I find very beautiful, and beautifully sung. Bach's Suite No. 3, which contains some enjoyable dance movements in addition to the superb melody that is known to most of us as the Air for G String, is excellently recorded by Weingartner with the Paris Conservatory Orchestra (Set 428, $3.50). Guiomar Novaes has recorded sensitive, sparkling performances of some delightful eighteenth-century clavier pieces: Scarlatti's Sonatas Nos. 8 and 487 (Longo Edition), Couperin's "La tendre Nanette," Daquin's "L'hiron-delle" (17229-D, $.75). And Mahler's rather charming song, "Ich atmet' einen linden Duft," gains from Suzanne Sten's lovely voice and fine musical taste; but in his "Hans und Grete" the voice is mostly tremolo (17241-D, $.75). Commette's record of Bach's Prelude and Fugue in E minor for organ has not yet arrived.

While Columbia has managed to do a good recording job with the Budapest Quartet its record (19003-D, $.75) of Barbiroli's performance of Smetana's Overture to "The Bartered Bride" distorts the sound of the New York Philharmonic in the way the set of Brahms's Second Symphony did; and though the recording (Set 432, $6.50) of Stokowski's performance of Tchaikovsky's "Pathétique" with the American Youth Orchestra doesn't have that fault it has others which make it one of the worst Columbia has turned out: the orchestral sound is strangely unbalanced, unsubstantial, and fragmentary, what with some of its components being either indistinct or completely inaudible. This result may in part represent Columbia's inability to cope with Stokowski's eccentricities; for the performance itself is one of the worst of all the abominations he has perpetrated on defenseless pieces of music.

There is distortion of the orchestral sound also in the recording (70704-D, $1) of Barlow's performances of Rossini's Overture to "The Barber of Seville" with the Columbia Broadcasting Symphony, which is in any case nothing one would choose while Toscanini's version was still to be had. Again, the sound of the Chicago Symphony is hollow and wooden in the otherwise excellent set (X-182, $2.50) of Saint-Saëns's Cello Concerto No. 1 made by Piati-gorsky. And some of the detail of Brahms's Rhapsodies Op. 79 Nos. 1 and 2 and Op. 119 No. 4 for piano (Set X-183, $2.50), well played by Egon Petri, is lost through recording which has the weakness of treble that was noticeable in the set of Franck's Prelude, Chorale and Fugue. The Saint-Saëns music is facile; the Brahms is labored; and neither is anything I care much about.

B. H. HAGGIN

CONTRIBUTORS

LEWIS COREY is the author of "The Decline of American Capitalism," "The House of Morgan," and "The Crisis of the Middle Class." He recently contributed to The Nation a series of articles called Marxism Reconsidered.

RICHARD H. ROVERE is a free-lance writer living in New York. He was formerly on the staff of the New Masses.

METZ T. P. LOCHARD was for many years a member of the faculty of Howard University. He is now chief editorial writer of the Chicago Defender and a frequent lecturer at the University of Chicago.

W. H. AUDEN, the English poet, is at present in this country. His latest volume of verse is entitled "Another Time."

RUSTEM VAMBERY, Hungarian criminologist and sociologist, has written extensively on European problems. He is a lecturer at the New School for Social Research.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 55 Fifth Ave., New York. Price 16 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $6; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 152

NEW YORK · SATURDAY · JANUARY 11, 1941

NUMBER 2

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

EDITORIALS

- Forestalling Inflation 31
Victims of Vichy 32
The Smith Committee: Stale Lies and a New Trick 33
President Roosevelt Reports by Freda Kirchwey 34

ARTICLES

- Munichman from Montana by I. F. Stone 35
Who Owns the Future? by Frederick L. Schuman, Lawrence Dennis, and Max Lerner 36
Hi-Yo, Silver Lining! by C. B. Boutell 44
Within the Gates 45
In the Wind 46
A Native at Large by Jonathan Daniels 47

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

- Faust Before the Mirror. A Poem by Raphael Hayes 48
How Long Ago the Home. A Poem
by Karl Jay Shapiro 48
Bill Douglas, Fighter by Eliot Janeway 48
Napoleon III by James Orrick 50
Long-Range Planning by Maxwell S. Stewart 50
The Life of Father DeSmet by E. S. Forgotson 51
Middle Class and Democracy by Lewis Corey 51
Drama by Margaret Marshall and Robert Bendiner 53
Music by B. H. Haggin 53

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

29

31

32

33

34

35

36

44

45

46

47

48

48

48

50

50

51

51

53

53

55

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor
ROBERT BENDINER

Literary Editor
MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON MAXWELL S. STEWART I. F. STONE

Dramatic Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager and Director of Circulation
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MURIEL C. GRAY

Published weekly and copyright, 1941, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 65 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 18, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y. under the act of March 3, 1879.

The Shape of Things

WHEN STATESMEN OF SMALL NATIONS VISIT Germany for their health and see "Surgeon" Hitler or his assistant, Ribbentrop, a drastic operation is usually indicated. It would hardly be surprising, therefore, to learn that Premier Philoff of Bulgaria has returned from Vienna with proposals for the grafting of a Nazi army on to the body of his country. During the past week Berlin has kept suspiciously quiet about the Balkans, but its agents in Belgrade, Budapest, and other centers have assiduously spread rumors designed to harass Bulgaria's nerves. And it would appear that these methods are succeeding once again, for there is less talk of resistance in Sofia, although hopes of Russian intervention still linger. The reported recall of Soviet ministers in the Balkans for a conference in Moscow attracted a good deal of attention, but the Kremlin has not broken its loud silence. In Belgrade the Germans are talking confidently about an understanding with the Soviet government, which is said to have agreed to leave Bulgaria in the lurch in return for the Rumanian province of Moldavia and a free hand in Finland. Considering the source, such reports must be taken with a large grain of salt. Nevertheless, it is highly improbable that Russia would go beyond diplomatic support for Bulgaria. There is no reason to suppose that Stalin is any more ready to risk war with Germany than he was when the Nazis marched into Rumania. Nor is he likely to have missed the significance of the Hungarian mobilization, which is undoubtedly the result of orders from Berlin. The only possible reason for this action is to provide protection for the northern flank of the Nazi army facing Bessarabia.

★

SKILLED COORDINATION OF LAND, AIR, AND naval forces have again brought victory to the British in North Africa. The capture of Bardia gives General Wavell's army a strong base from which to pursue Graziani's depleted and dispirited command. Mussolini had ordered that this stronghold should be retained at all costs, and the Italian press is unable to minimize the extent of the defeat. Preparing the public, Giovanni Ansaldo, the well-known Fascist editor, said in a radio speech: "If Bardia has fallen, this will be a new British success, local if you like, but still a considerable one and a sad piece of news for us." The British forces are now expected to attack the much more important town of Tobruk, where Graziani has been feverishly preparing new defenses. However, the fall of Bardia has come too quickly to afford him time to make the position impregnable, especially as the work has been constantly interrupted by the R.A.F. His chief hope is that the German Luftwaffe can send enough planes to check the British, for there is little chance that any appreciable military reinforcements will be able to run the British naval gauntlet in the Mediterranean. German aircraft are reaching Italy in considerable numbers, but it remains to be seen whether there are sufficient fuel reserves in Libya for them to be used there in a decisive fashion.

BURLINGTON

★

WHY HAVE GERMAN BOMBS BEEN DROPPED on the studiously neutral land of Eire? It has happened too frequently to be a mistake, especially inasmuch as Dublin is a beacon of light in contrast with the darkened shores on the other side of the Irish Sea. Is it a preliminary to invasion, or an attempt to force Eire to take sides, or a taste of the terror to come should the naval bases be yielded to British importunities? The last explanation is the most feasible, but it seems a risky game to play with a people as high-spirited as the Irish. Eire is under increasing economic pressure from Britain, which is limiting severely the allotment of shipping for Irish needs. This brings home the fact that Great Britain is experiencing greater difficulty in coping with the German blockade without the Irish bases which proved so useful in the last war. But there has been no sign that Mr. de Valera's government is considering a reversal of its stand on this question. Continued air raids, however, might disabuse the Irish of their fond hopes of remaining a museum of independent democracy in a Nazi Europe and bring about a sharp change in public opinion, which so far has favored the strict-neutrality policy. While the government of Eire has sent a strong protest to Berlin, it has denied any intention of breaking off diplomatic relations.

★

VERNE MARSHALL, THE LOQUACIOUS GENIUS of the No Foreign War Committee, told the press on December 30 that William Rhodes Davis, wealthy oil magnate, had offered to underwrite his group. He went on to give a strange tale of an "agenda" for peace, initiated by Göring, which was brought back by Davis from Berlin in the fall of 1939. Interviewed in his turn, Mr. Davis refused to say anything about his alleged mission to Germany but released a letter he had written to Senator Wheeler, as chairman of the Senate committee to investigate interferences with the defense program, asking to be allowed a hearing on his relations with foreign governments. We hope Senator Wheeler will gratify this desire promptly, for there are several aspects of Mr. Davis's adventurous and litigious career which demand public illumination. Meanwhile, we note that Mr. Davis and Mr. Marshall, while agreeing in their isolationism, contradict each other on one important detail: the former denied any financial or other connection with the No Foreign War Committee. He also denied the report, mentioned by our Washington editor on November 2, that he financed John L. Lewis's radio indorsement of Wendell Willkie. This report is under investigation by a federal grand jury. Accompanying his letter to Senator Wheeler is an autobiographical sketch which starts a new mystery. Mr. Davis claims that on his mother's side he is "a direct descendant of Cecil Rhodes," famous British imperialist. Standard biographies of Rhodes, however, fail to mention either marriage or children. It is a small point, but unless satisfactorily cleared up it may throw some light on Mr. Davis's credibility as a witness.

★

THE NATION IS IN A POSITION TO DENY THE authenticity of the widely published report that the Reuther plan for producing 500 planes a day has been "reluctantly" rejected by Defense Commission experts. The Associated Press story quoting a "high" but anonymous production expert to that effect was written in good faith, but it has been disavowed by the Defense Commission as neither authorized nor true, and the anonymous expert has yet to come forward in defense of his story. A door-to-door survey made at the offices of the commission in Washington last week, to check all possible sources of the story, from Production Chief Knudsen down to the commission's public-relations man, Robert Horton, elicited a series of denials. Some commission or War Department expert no doubt tried to kill off the Reuther plan with this anonymous and irresponsible story. When Mr. Reuther spoke at an "off-the-record" luncheon given him by the National Press Club in Washington last Friday, he received an enthusiastic reception, and among those who came to hear him were Assistant Secretary of War Patterson, Mr. Knudsen, and Leon Henderson. The news that the United States produced few more than 6,000 military planes last year and will be hard put, with present methods, to build 12,000 this year should stimulate interest in labor's plan to utilize idle automotive capacity for plane production instead of waiting for the construction of new factories.

★

"DOES THE SENATOR HIMSELF CONTEND," Senator Wagner asked Senator Taft on January 2, "that it is a sound policy to give a contract, which is in the nature of a favor from the government, to one who willfully violates the laws of the nation?" The answer was, "Yes, I do; frankly." Senator Taft gave the answer in the middle of the long and rambling speech with which he tried to block confirmation of J. Warren Madden's appointment to the Court of Claims. In all but candor the War Department's position seems to be that of Senator Taft. Despite its repeated pledges that defense contracts would be let subject to compliance with the labor laws, the War Department stubbornly insists on giving Henry Ford the much-discussed contract for $1,400,000 worth of midget military cars. Evasive answers were made by Assistant Secretary of War Patterson at a press conference last week when he was asked whether this accorded with the pledges made to labor last September and whether Ford had met the specifications of the contract. Ford's failure to meet specifications would give the War Department an easy way out of its hastily made award. In the meantime, the War Department is again "discussing" the question of whether to insert a clause in future defense contracts stipulating compliance with the labor law. So far, its promises to labor have been worthless.

★

TWO WEEKS AGO IT BECAME KNOWN THAT Francisco Largo Caballero, former Prime Minister of Spain, had been imprisoned with other Spanish Republican leaders in the unoccupied zone of France. A report reaching this country within the last few days indicates that he may already have been delivered to Franco. If the report is true, Caballero's fate is easy to guess; he is not likely to be treated more leniently than was Luis Companys, the former President of Catalonia, who met death by garrotting at the hands of Franco's executioners. It is generally believed that the Spanish dictator would take special satisfaction in executing the seventy-three-year-old labor leader who headed the Popular Front government in the early months of the war. Republican Spain's other two war-time leaders, Señor Giral and Dr. Negrín, are out of reach—in Mexico and London. If Caballero is to be saved it will only be through the swift intervention of other governments, particularly our own. President Batista of Cuba has been credited with bringing about commutation of the death sentences against Rivas Cheriff and Carlos Montilla; certainly a strong protest from the State Department in Washington would have as much effect in this latest case. Nor should the complicity of the Vichy government be overlooked. In its agreement with the Mexican government concerning the transfer of Spanish Republicans to Mexico, the French authorities promised "respect for the lives and liberties of the Spanish refugees, limiting exclusively to crimes of common law having no political significance all extradition measures, and excluding any form of repression save that within the jurisdiction of the French courts." By no possible interpretation could that provision be stretched to permit either the imprisonment of Largo Caballero or his delivery to Franco.

Forestalling Inflation

CURIOUS misconceptions about the basic economic philosophy of the New Deal have been revealed in comments on the new program for monetary control issued by the Federal Reserve System. In some quarters the proposals of Mr. Eccles and his colleagues are being treated as a slap at the Administration and a confession of past errors. This of course is sheer nonsense. Objections may be raised by the Treasury and other government departments to certain details of the Federal Reserve report, but informed supporters of the New Deal will certainly not carp at the general principle that a managed monetary system must restrain inflation as well as combat deflation.

During most of the past eight years our economy has been acting in a sluggish manner which called for stimulants. The New Deal prescription was a mixture of cheap and plentiful credit with government investment to sop up idle savings. It has often been argued that this was the wrong medicine because it failed to restore the patient to ruddy health. It is our belief, however, that full recovery was inhibited because the doctors, attempting to placate the opposition of older and more orthodox practitioners, never increased the dosage sufficiently. All along their critics voiced dire warnings of inflationary complications, refusing to accept the diagnosis of such men as Mr. Eccles, who said just a year ago: "I do not see how it would be possible to have a dangerous general inflation so long as we have a large amount of idle men and unused resources."

The fact that Mr. Eccles now is looking toward an inflationary situation and is seeking stronger powers to forestall the danger does not mean that he has shed his belief in a compensated economy. On the contrary, it means he recognizes a sharp change in conditions which may call for a restriction of stimulants and an injection of sedatives. This change has of course been brought about by the defense program. A year ago the government was engaged in pump-priming by financing civilian projects out of borrowed money on a comparatively modest scale. Today it is pouring money into defense without limits except those imposed by the country's capacity to produce. We have already seen the results in sharply increased production, a steady fall in unemployment, and a considerable expansion in consumer purchasing power. The program is still in its early stages, but before the end of the current year we may well reach a point where excess capacity to produce has shrunk to nominal proportions and the flow of incomes tends to outrun the available supply of goods. At this stage the upward pressure on prices becomes hard to resist, and some means of damping down demand becomes essential if inflation is to be avoided. Various measures are already being taken by the Administration to check such a development. Efforts are being made to restrain price increases of key commodities and to expand production facilities in those industries which threaten to become bottlenecks.

The control of credit is a necessary complement to these activities. At the present time excess reserves of Federal Reserve member banks amount to $6,620,000,000 and are expected to reach $7,000,000,000 as currency in circulation shrinks after the holiday demand. On this basis a credit expansion in excess of $40 billion is theoretically possible. Under its present powers, the Federal Reserve Board can increase reserve requirements from 22¾ per cent to 26 per cent in central reserve cities, from 17½ per cent to 20 per cent in reserve cities, and from 12 per cent to 14 per cent for country banks. The effect would be to lop about a billion off excess reserves. The Federal Reserve authorities can also resort to "open-market operations" by selling government securities. This would absorb an equivalent amount of excess reserves, but the system's holdings are only about $2,200,000,000, and they cannot be wholly liquidated since they are its main earning asset. Thus the maximum use of present powers would still leave excess reserves at a dangerously high level if the development of an inflationary atmosphere led to a sharp increase in the demand for credit. Moreover, it must be remembered that one of the chief causes of the expansion in excess reserves has been the inflow of gold from abroad, and there is no reason to believe that this movement is at an end.

The principal proposal of the Federal Reserve System is that it should be given power to raise reserve requirements to a maximum of twice the present statutory levels. This power would not necessarily be used all at once, but it would enable excess reserves to be tapered off in accordance with the demands of the situation.

Limitations of space prevent more than brief mention of other suggestions in this report. They include cancellation of the President's power to revalue the dollar further; repeal of the Treasury's power to issue $3,000,000,000 worth of "greenbacks"; repeal of the power to monetize silver; and the neutralizing of future gold imports. We see little to criticize in these proposals, except the last, which would involve borrowing by the Treasury for the purpose of sterilization and would thus impose on the country an unnecessary expense. Nor do we quarrel with the recommendation that "as the national income increases a larger and larger proportion of defense expenses should be met by tax revenues rather than by borrowing." We have been staunch defenders of deficit financing as an aid to recovery, but we agree that "whenever the country approaches a condition of full utilization of its economic capacity . . . the budget should be balanced." It is equally important, however, that the burdens of taxation should be so distributed that they do not hinder full production or add to the cost of necessities.

Victims of Vichy

A REPORT has come to hand which demands immediate publication. It describes the inhuman treatment of Spanish Republicans interned in concentration camps in Algeria and French Morocco and constitutes a shocking indictment of the Vichy government, which is directly responsible. We urge the facts it reveals upon the attention of the government, which has an inescapable duty to use its good offices in Vichy to obtain a mitigation of these horrors. The report reached us through a source in which we place complete confidence. The most significant passages follow:

With the exception of a certain number who because of their physical weaknesses have been placed in other concentration camps, Spaniards who came to Algeria from Spain at the end of the war and those who came from French concentration camps have been placed in "foreign labor companies" scattered over Morocco and Algeria.

Life in these labor companies is similar to life in prison. Members sleep in shacks without beds. Each one has a chilaba to wear and two narrow cotton coverlets for the cold desert nights. They are waked up before dawn by the bugler, formed into companies, and marched to their tasks, often many kilometers away. They labor on railroad construction under a burning sun with a temperature that often in the summer reaches 69 degrees centigrade. They are given a stint that must be finished; if they fail, they are placed in disciplinary battalions. In these they are guarded by armed native soldiers and subjected to all kinds of mistreatment. They are insulted and beaten mercilessly for the slightest infraction of the rules, even for stopping work a second when exhausted by the heat and the killing pace. These districts are poorly supplied with food and water, and sanitary measures are virtually non-existent.

Medical aid is in the hands of recently demobilized military doctors who have hired themselves out to the private company in charge of the construction on which the refugees work. Often there is a conflict between the professional duty of these doctors and their employer's interest; it is difficult for a refugee laborer to get permission to stay away from work however sick he may be. One Spaniard with a bad heart was forced to work and fell dead on the job.

The punishments meted out to the prisoners are unworthy of a civilized nation. One of them consists in tying the prisoner's hands together with a rope the other end of which is tied to a horse's tail; the horse is then made to run with increasing speed until the prisoner falls and is dragged through the desert sand. Another consists in forcing a prisoner into a barrel which is then rolled down a hill. In the "punishment of the tomb," the most ferocious of all, the man under discipline is forced to dig a grave; he is then made to lie motionless in the grave for several days, exposed to the heat of the sun and the cold of the night, under the constant vigilance of an armed native, and not allowed to alter his position in the slightest, even for the demands of nature.

A complaint or a request though made in the most courteous tone is quickly punished; many a Spaniard has found himself in the disciplinary battalions after he asked for a favor for himself or an ailing friend.

The plight of the Spanish Republican refugees in France was miserable enough before the Vichy regime took over. But today these men—the vanguard of the democratic resistance—are treated like convicts by the latest victims of fascist aggression.

Most of the people imprisoned in North Africa are professional men—doctors, teachers, and writers. Some could make their way to safe territory if the French authorities would allow them their freedom and if they could get valid travel papers. Neither is now possible. Several of them—men who have been demanded by Franco—are being held pending extradition hearings. Others are detained, ironically enough, as a result of the Vichy-Mexican agreement providing for the shipment of Spanish refugees to Mexico. Vichy will grant no exit permits until a ship is sent and the Mexican government is prepared to issue a blanket visa. Meanwhile the refugees continue to suffer not only the hardships of unjustifiable imprisonment, but also punishments and cruelties which would be inexcusable if they were dangerous criminals instead of innocent men and courageous anti-fascists.

Stale Lies and a New Trick

WE DO not have the space at this time to disentangle and answer all the stale lies and shabby calumnies rehearsed in the final report of the Smith committee. But we should like to make two points before the report is used as a springboard for Congressional oratory in favor of amending the Wagner Act out of existence. The first deals with the committee's procedure in writing and publishing its report; the second, with that report's most revealing omission.

A great deal is said in the report about "the American way of life." The National Labor Relations Board, for example, is accused of "seeking to legalize as part of the American way of life the infamous anarchistic sit-down strikes." We should have supposed that a basic principle of that "American way of life" was a readiness to let the other fellow have a hearing. Yet nowhere in the committee's published final report, filling fifty-one triple-columned pages, will one find any reference to the fact that it does not represent the views of the entire committee, that the committee of five was split three to two on these findings, and that the two minority members disagree completely with the report.

The committee's majority of three dared make no reference to the existence of a dissenting minority. To have done so might the sooner have called attention to the unprincipled way in which the report was prepared. The three members of the majority, Chairman Smith and Representatives Halleck and Routzohn, kept the preparation of the report a secret from the two members of the minority, Representatives Arthur D. Healey and Abe Murdock, the latter now a Senator. These two were given no opportunity to make their own views heard. The filing of the report was delayed until four days before the close of the session, leaving the minority insufficient time to prepare a dissenting report. When Representatives Healey and Murdock asked the House for permission to submit their report after the close of the session, they found that technical rules denied them the opportunity. The minority intends to file a report of its own in the near future, but this report will have no formal status, and the official printed record of the Smith committee will contain no indication that there was a dissenting opinion. The Nation believes that the House of Representatives owes it to itself formally to rebuke Chairman Smith and Congressman Halleck (Routzohn was defeated for re-election) for this sort of underhanded procedure.

As significant as the committee's unwillingness to allow free discussion among its own members is its failure to answer the most important of the five questions originally put to it by the House. "What effect," the House wanted the Smith committee to find out, "has the National Labor Relations Act had upon increasing or decreasing disputes between employer and employee?" In all the 153 columns of type which make up the report there is but one sentence answering this question. Had the committee been able to bring forward evidence that the Wagner Act had increased the number of labor disputes, it would have had a powerful argument for amendment of the act, even for its repeal. The best the report can do is to say, "The committee finds that the solicitation of litigation by the board, the favoritism displayed by it toward the C. I. O., and the deliberate use of dilatory methods have induced and protracted a large number of industrial disputes." This is loose and irresponsible statement. The three members who make up the majority did not dare to go into the facts because the facts prove that the Wagner Act has lessened the number of industrial disputes. The facts demonstrate that the best way to cut down the number of strikes is to accord legal recognition to the right of collective bargaining. The three members of the majority were anxious not to uncover these facts but to conceal them.

The facts are well summarized in the statement rushed into print by the two members of the minority when they learned that a Smith committee report had been released

In the year 1940 there were fewer strikes than in any other year since 1935, fewer workers involved in strikes than in any other year since 1932, and fewer man-days idle because of strikes than since 1930. "The stabilizing influence of the [Wagner] act," Senator Murdock and Representative Healey declare, "is being clearly demonstrated during the current defense program. When this country entered its last great rearmament period in 1916, it was handicapped by chaotic industrial relations. During the five months June through October, 1916, there were nearly one and one-half times as many workers involved in strikes as during the same months in 1940, despite the fact that there were only four-fifths as many persons employed during that earlier period." Only two serious stoppages of work have occurred in defense industries, and neither of these was a major strike. Ten working days were lost in the Vultee strike and four working days in the Aluminum Company plant at New Kensington. How dare the three-man majority of the Smith committee end their report by saying that "the entire program of national defense" is jeopardized by enforcement of the Wagner Act? The Wagner Act alone makes it possible for workers to win in the courts what they formerly could have obtained only on the picket line.

President Roosevelt Reports

BY FRED KIRCHWEY

THE President's message to Congress on the state of the nation was really a report on the state of the world. It repeated, with effect and force, the substance of his radio talk a week earlier, and expanded it a little. But it failed to lay down specifications for additional aid to England or tell the new session exactly what he wants it to do in the matter of our defense program. Doubtless concrete proposals will come later in special messages, especially in the budget message this week. Until then we can only guess how many billions'-worth of planes, tanks, and guns are to be lent or rented to Britain, and just what "sacrifices" in the form of taxes will be demanded of the American people. We can be certain, however, that the billions will be many and the taxes heavy, for the President announced with absolute intransigence the determination of the government to back to the limit "those resolute people everywhere who are resisting aggression," and never "to acquiesce in a peace dictated by aggressors and sponsored by appeasers." Those are strong words, stronger and more direct, I think, than any he has spoken before. They seal the future of this country against plans now hatching in and out of Washington to limit our aid to England and to encourage a negotiated settlement on the basis of Hitler's present gains and his announced plans for a new European order.

Perhaps we can afford to wait for the specifications while we digest this sober and fateful commitment. It will arouse fierce opposition in the ranks of the isolationists because it surely implies that if American guns and tanks and planes fail to produce a decent peace, American armed force will help finish the job. This the President did not say, and I am sure he believes that only if we allow our non-belligerent efforts to slacken will war be forced upon us. The fact remains that even with all the speed and energy and efficient planning demanded by the President from every branch of American industry, the British and their allies may face defeat. If the President's words mean anything, we would fight to prevent that defeat—and the fascist peace that would follow it.

I stress this possible alternative because I believe it must be accepted as real and then used, not as an argument for inaction, but rather as a spur to a more intensive effort to pour weapons into Britain's arsenals. I stress it for another reason: We are all tempted to talk about the future in terms of a possible fascist victory. (This slightly perverse indulgence is one which particularly fascinates theorists, as readers of the three-cornered debate in this issue of The Nation will discover.) We consider ways of guarding our interests and those of this hemisphere in a world otherwise dominated by totalitarian powers. Or we consider the inner adjustments that will be necessary if we are to be able to compete successfully with a fascist Europe. Or we worry about the "time" that would be permitted us to prepare for an inevitable conflict. The President's formulation of American policy consigns such speculations to the realm of fantasy. We will not acquiesce in a fascist peace; we will prevent it if we have the power to do so. This means that no interlude will be permitted for more intensive rearming, no opportunity given for experiments in adaptation. Either the Nazis and their lesser allies will be stopped or they will conquer us along with the other resolute peoples who are resisting them. If they are victorious, our forms of "adaptation" will be determined for us and our arms will be taken away.

The only interlude we can count upon is the present period of British resistance. With our unstinted and efficient help that may be extended to the point of final victory; and we may be spared the agony of battle. But if we withhold the fullest measure of assistance we shall not only not spare ourselves the danger of active involvement; we shall precipitate ourselves into the conflict surely and promptly and in a state of miserable unreadiness. In any case let us forswear speculations about the effect on our own fortunes of a fascist victory in Europe; there can be no fascist victory until we too are defeated. This, whether he intended it or not, is the ultimate logic of the President's message.

Munichman from Montana

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, January 4

SENATOR WHEELER was dressed in the costume favored by statesmen—cutaway and gray striped trousers. When I went in he was sitting behind the small desk at which he works. As the conversation warmed up he rose and walked round and round the room, twirling his silver-rimmed spectacles in one hand with the solemnity of a college dean. He spoke of the huge volume of mail he received after his "peace" speech. He said that the network over which he broadcast had only a tenth as many stations as that over which the President spoke Sunday night. He thought the President probably had not received more than twice as much mail as he did. These comparative figures gave him great satisfaction. I began by saying that The Nation wanted me to ask him just how he envisaged a negotiated peace at this time.

The Senator replied by remarking that he thought the President ought to try to bring about peace. He did not agree with colleagues like Senator Clark who believed that Mr. Roosevelt's strongly anti-Axis speeches made it impossible for him to act as a mediator. Senator Wheeler also thought that before giving more aid to Great Britain we ought to know what its war aims were. Last time there had been Versailles, and Versailles had created Hitler. Could one, after the events of the past few years, expect a Hitler peace to be anything more than a breathing spell for new aggressions? "Let us assume," Senator Wheeler said, "that we can't believe Nazis promises." Nevertheless, peace now was better than continued slaughter.

He did not think the English could win. "I am one of those who don't want to see England annihilated," he said, but those who are encouraging the British to resist by intimating that we are going to enter the war are doing them a disservice. He was convinced the President would take us into the war if he could. He thought it doubtful that a resolution declaring war could be put through Congress. "I think Congress has gone just about as far as it will go along that line." Unless we enter the war the British, in his opinion, could not win, and there was a question in his mind as to whether we could. In order to defeat Germany we should have to land troops on the Continent. Every military and naval expert he had talked to—and he had talked to many—agreed on that point. "If Germany can't land troops twenty-two miles across the Channel," the Senator said, "it isn't likely that we can land troops on the Continent." Only an alliance of Russia, the United States, and England, he added, could defeat Germany.

"Consequently," he said, "Russia and the United States could do a great deal to bring about peace in Europe, perhaps not a just peace from the standpoint of England, or of Germany or Italy for that matter, but surely the effort should be made." Some day there was going to be a negotiated peace. Almost every peace had been a negotiated peace. Why not try for one now? I suggested that Hitler had been underestimated here and abroad from the beginning. Wasn't it about time to begin to take him at face value? Hitler said he wanted to rule the world. "This talk about Hitler wanting to dominate the world, as he expounded it in 'Mein Kampf,'" the Senator answered, "doesn't impress me any more than did the boasts of Lenin and Trotsky a few years ago that they were going to make a world revolution. These are fantastic boasts by unpractical egotists. Japan boasts that she's going to rule the world. There are people in the United States who think that we, or at least the English-speaking peoples, should dominate the world."

"I appreciate the fact," the Senator continued, "that some fanatics who want to get us into war right away will brand me a Laval or something worse for what I have said. In some high circles there seem to be people who have the idea that those who are talking peace should be intimidated." We were not a totalitarian power, and some people talking blithely of tolerance and democracy were at the same time using "the very methods that Hitler, Stalin, and Mussolini used to maintain themselves in power." Those howling down the advocates of peace were "intolerant to the nth degree." They were breeding intolerance and racial and religious hatreds, which were always the forerunner of the destruction of democratic ideals. He had been attacked for his anti-war views by a Polish-American paper. He wasn't worried about what was going to happen to the Poles. He was concerned with what might happen to Americans. He had told some of his friends—he named some close Jewish advisers who share his isolationist views—that the backwash of the current hysteria was a rising tide of anti-Semitism. He feared a really virulent anti-Semitism if we became involved in the war. He wished some of the Jews in New York would have sense enough to keep their mouths shut. He felt they were being used by politicians for their own ends.

What kind of peace did the Senator think we could get? Would he take peace at any price? What would he consider terms impossible to accept? Well, he had been in Europe, and he felt then as he did now that a United States of Europe was the only way out. Did he think we could get a United States of Europe from Hitler? "I don't know," the Senator replied, "I'm not in his confidence. But there can be nothing lost in trying to bring about peace. Every American citizen from the President down ought to be working toward that end." Wouldn't a negotiated peace merely be an armed truce? "That," said the Senator, "is just a guess." Didn't he think the guess had some pretty good grounds after the events of the past few years? I didn't get an answer.

England, said the Senator, was opposed to a United States of Europe. "I don't think Hitler today would accept one either," he added. "Any peace in Europe," Senator Wheeler said, "has got to be based on letting the ordinary man live. That wasn't done when the Versailles treaty was written. I don't know that it can be done under Hitler." The Senator felt that peace could have been obtained in September, 1939, if Poland had given up Danzig, the Polish Corridor, and Silesia. He felt that the United States would be in a stronger moral position today if it had brought about peace then on those terms, and I kept coming back to, and the Senator kept getting away from, the issue of whether Hitler's signature on a peace treaty would be worth anything. The Senator said he thought we had to trust someone, that we had got along with tyrants in the past and would have to do so again in the future. If Britain was our first line of defense, he said, then we ought to go into the war immediately. But we weren't ready for war. High army and navy officers afraid to speak publicly had told him we weren't prepared. "The President," they said, "won't listen to us." The British, the Senator declared, were in a bad way. British labor's morale wouldn't hold up much longer. Wages were too low. "Talk about freedom," the Senator asked, "what of India, what of Hongkong?" By this time his secretary was at his elbow.

Who Owns the Future?

LETTERS BY FREDERICK L. SCHUMAN, LAWRENCE DENNIS, AND MAX LERNER

[We are glad to give space to the following comments on the future of American democracy by an intellectual defeatist, a champion of dictatorship, and a democrat. The correspondence was originally an exchange of letters between Mr. Dennis and Professor Schuman. Mr. Lerner, to whom the letters were shown, thought they threw a curious light on current thought processes and obtained permission to make them public along with his own reaction. We agree with Mr. Lerner's view of their importance and even more with his analysis.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

The Will to Survive

DEAR LAWRENCE DENNIS: Your last book, "The Dynamics of War and Revolution," is in all respects a most important one for anyone attempting to think through the world revolution in which we find ourselves. I have been considering writing you for some time to pay tribute to the insight and foresight you display in it, as in "The Coming American Fascism" and elsewhere, and to resume our old debate on a new level.

You will no doubt agree that if the fall of France confirmed part of your thesis, the reaction of America to the events of last summer demonstrates, contrary to your expectation and mine, that Americans can probably no longer be brought to fight for "democracy," or "England," or "foreigners," or any symbol or faith or cause of any kind—unless their hemisphere is invaded by armed force, their cities bombed, and their houses burned over their heads. And even in this case I suspect that many people in Maine, let's say, would be in favor of "keeping out of California's wars" and vice versa. The causes for this attitude have obviously nothing to do with the reasons you adduce so eloquently in support of an isolationist policy, but have to do with what looks very much like the sheer stupidity, cowardice, demoralization, and irresponsibility of a community already decadent.

To me it is clear—and if you will face honestly the strategic problem posed for America by contemporary Realpolitik you will, I think, agree—that the defenses of America were and still are in Western Europe. I was booed at Town Hall last March for saying that our frontier was on the Rhine. As soon as that frontier fell, our isolationist Congress frantically began pouring billions of dollars down the sewer in an effort at "defense" which is foredoomed to futility. The British fleet is the last remaining barrier between an invincible totalitarian war machine and an utterly indefensible Western Hemisphere. This is a simple fact of strategy and has nothing to do with ideologies or systems or causes or moral values. It is a problem of power. And this problem of power the government and people of this republic are clearly unwilling to face and unable to meet in any adequate fashion. Because of their irrational sympathies they will not "abandon" Europe and Asia—and also most of Latin America, which is economically, culturally, and strategically a dependency of Europe and not of the United States—and gird their loins to save themselves within an area where salvation might be a military possibility. Because of their irrational fears they will not go to war to save their outer defenses by smashing Germany and Japan. In purely material terms America, plus what is left of Britain, could of course smash Germany and Japan, and if there were sufficient vitality left in either country to offer promise of survival such a course would have been embarked upon long since. Either of these policies would “make sense” and save a good deal from the wreckage. Neither is within the realm of the politically possible.

The second course is “out” because the average American recoils in horror from the thought of fighting and insists upon constant reassurances from his political leaders that he will never have to fight. He is afraid to fight because he no longer knows what is worth fighting for. And since he no longer knows what is worth fighting for, he won't know what to fight for or what not to fight for in the Western Hemisphere or even in North America any more than he knows what to fight for or what not to fight for in Europe and Asia. He and his fellows will therefore repeat the appalling blunders of the British and French, who should have fought for Czechoslovakia and didn't, as you so ably point out, and who a year later fought for Poland when the game was already lost. By the same logic of illogic Americans wouldn't fight to save the Rhine frontier and may not fight to save the British fleet, though both of these strategic assets could have been saved by fighting in time. They will probably make a Munich and then fight later to save Brazil or the Philippines or Greenland or Venezuela or God-knows-what under strategic conditions which will insure defeat.

The first course, for which you could make out a far better case than Charlie Beard if you put your mind to it, is also “out” because, as you say, “it calls for a continuing exercise over European destinies which we are neither able to make nor willing to undertake.” I deny that we are “unable” to do this. America was in a position to remake Europe and the world in 1919 and again in 1939, but it couldn't because it wouldn't. I agree that we are “unwilling.” But this is not a defect of our collective power. It is a defect of our collective wisdom and our collective will.

All of this is symptomatic of a deep-seated malaise and raises issues which are far more fundamental than those of “isolationism” or “interventionism.” The basic issue raised is nothing less than that of the capacity for survival of those who are unwilling to abandon old habits in the face of new dangers.

I concur whole-heartedly that “the two needs of tomorrow's revolutionary leadership are, first, understanding of the situation and, second, a will to meet it. Hitler's revolutionary genius has consisted in understanding since the war, as no liberal democratic leaders anywhere have understood, that capitalism is doomed, and in having always a will to do concrete things about it.”

The West—by which I mean here everybody west of the Rhine—has lost all capacity to understand and act. No amount of pleading that “suicide is morally wrong” offers hope of reform. The trouble with your ethics and your politics—if you will permit me to say so, not as a carping critic or as a bankrupt liberal, but as a sincere admirer of your “realism”—is that you are still addicted to Bismarck's thesis (which is a liberal thesis) that politics is the art of what is “possible” and to John Dewey's thesis (which is bankrupt pragmatism) that rules of ethics should “work.” The central difficulty here is that the things which are possible and the rules which work depend upon human foresight and will-power. Hitler has accomplished the impossible by virtue of these qualities. The West cannot even contemplate things which are perfectly possible because it lacks these qualities.

I agree that “revolution” might save us—or save something or somebody. But I'd like to pose the issue a bit differently and solicit your comments on my formulation, if you care to comment. We have first to disentangle ourselves from useless vocabulary. I note that you have substituted the term “socialism” for the term “fascism” to describe the coming order. Perhaps it is better, but both terms are so charged with irrelevant emotional overtones that I wish we could find purely factual descriptive words devoid of all moralistic or ideological connotations. That is difficult. Oswald Spengler's vocabulary, however, possesses the advantages of ethical neutrality and historical perspective. Let us grant, to use his terminology, that “capitalism” and “democracy” are doomed by the rise of “Caesarism.” The state form of tomorrow is “Caesarism” with all that this implies in social and economic terms. Caesarism means both “socialism”—that is, military totalitarianism resting on a dynamic faith and a will to action—and “internationalism”—that is, the end of national sovereignty in favor of a world state or a small number of world empires. Both are necessary for the survival of Western civilization in the age of its fulfillment and decline. Both will come because both must come. Obviously both are coming. This, to Spengler, is “destiny”—that is, a product of laws of growth within a culture over which the people who comprise that culture and who imagine that they are the captains of their fate really have no control at all. This is simply another and better way of saying what many have long since said, first of all the Marxists: that the machine and the Industrial Revolution have created a set of circumstances throughout the Western world, and indeed all over the planet, in which the old patterns of competitive capitalism and individual initiative on the one hand and of national sovereignty and international power politics on the other are no longer compatible with what people want and need in an industrialized world society.

It seems to me that your statement of the "inevitability" of "socialism" is as effective as your neglect of the inevitability of "internationalism" is deplorable. I am convinced that the Western state system and the whole game of balance-of-power politics among national sovereignties is already at an end and that we face the advent of a world-state in some form or other, or at least of a community of great continental imperiums which may fight one another until the most powerful has finally imposed its will on its rivals and created a world imperium. This appears to me as inevitable as socialism. It is for this reason that Wilson was as "great"—that is, as cognizant of what must be—as Lenin, albeit he was less successful, and as the pan-German world conquerors who influenced the Kaiser, albeit he was more successful. And it is for this reason that, on paper at least, Clarence Streit and Adolf Hitler are also brothers under the skin. Both know that national sovereignty is dying and that the world must be united. I therefore quarrel with you when you say that the revolution "has to be carried out by each nation." Hitler is giving the coup de grâce not only to capitalism but also to the whole system of sovereign nation-states. His genius lies in his capacity to undertake both tasks simultaneously and successfully. Lenin also saw that the two tasks were inseparable. Wilson did not; Streit does not. The Western democracies cannot unify the world or impose their hegemony upon it, despite the enormous superiority of potential power at their disposal, because they are wedded to a decadent capitalism and are inhibited and paralyzed by the products of its decay from doing anything which is relevant or constructive or heroic. The same was true of the Athenians in the time of Demosthenes. You oppose Streit because "it can't be done." But you fail to state clearly why it can't be done. The "why" has nothing to do with "haves" and "have-nots" or with any question of 240,000,000 white British, French, and Americans versus 400,000,000 Germans, Russians, Japanese, and Italians. Numbers count for nothing. Fanatic faith, even in what "can't be done" counts for everything. Western liberals have no such faith. Communists once had it. Nazis have it now.

It seems to me unrealistic in the extreme to suppose that America is outside the stream of history or can be unconcerned with what other power groups do to one another on other continents. A dynamic America, joined to a dynamic Britain and France either through a military alliance or Union Now, could have imposed its will on all the world by force and brought unity to the planet, but it wouldn't and won't and can't for reasons already indicated. Therefore others who are eager to do the job and can do the job will do the job, and America will be gleichgeschaltet or take the consequences. By that I mean that America will continue to be formless and feckless and decadent, without faith or will to act, in which case America will be conquered; or America will also go "socialist" (totalitarian) and "internationalist" (imperialist) and clash with other totalitarian imperialisms, the fittest surviving and the devil taking the hindmost.

The issue of our day, in short, is who will do the job. Liberals have failed. The Nazis are succeeding. Liberals have demonstrated complete incapacity either to do the job themselves or to prevent the Nazis from doing it. Matters have now reached a pass at which nothing will save them or the communities in which they flourish except Union Now right away—meaning an immediate alliance for immediate war by a dynamic and revolutionized America and a dynamic and revolutionized British Empire. If the dynamism and the revolution could be conjured up out of the vasty deep, the arms and the material resources still at the disposal of the prospective allies could defeat Germany, Italy, and Japan, win Russian support (since the Russians respect strength), and remake the world in a fashion which might be preferable (to you and me as Americans) to the fashion in which the Nazis will remake it. But this of course is academic, since the dynamism and the revolution are not materializing in time and nothing of the sort is likely to happen. Britain may therefore go down, and America will be left alone with a hopeless problem of "national defense."

The question will then arise of who will do the job here. Perhaps nobody. In that case we shall become the booty of the conqueror. If the job is done, it will be done by those willing and able to do it. These do not include Mr. Roosevelt or Mr. Willkie or the New Dealers or the liberals or the business men. If no leadership emerges from the ranks of those who know what must be done, then it may emerge from among the Joe McWilliamses, the Father Coughlins, the Kluxers, the Holy Rollers, or some other group of fanatics who know or think they know what they want and how to get it. And this prospect bothers me, as the conquest of Europe and the world by the Nazis bothers me, not because of moralistic or humanitarian scruples, which I quite agree have nothing to do with the case, but because I lack confidence in the ultimate capacity of the new barbarians to complete wisely the job they have begun successfully. And if they can't complete it, the end will be utter chaos for everybody. A new dynamic élite, more farsighted, catholic, and "civilized" and less provincial, narrow, and neurotic, would offer a better hope. But perhaps it is the tragedy of our time that the "civilized" are ever doomed to frustration and that action is possible only for the barbarians.

My job under these conditions is no longer to try to get America into a war which is probably already lost and which Americans wouldn't get into even if it weren't. And your job is no longer to keep Americans out of such a war, since the pacifist and isolationist idiots are doing this job for you. Our job is either to retire into our respective ivory towers and await the Ice Age or else to do what we can to develop realism and leadership among those, if any, still capable of understanding the twentieth century and acting upon its imperatives. Personally I feel baffled, since I find little evidence among my fellow-citizens of any capacity for realism or leadership. I am therefore occupied with my writing, which at least affords certain intellectual satisfactions and will leave a more or less interesting record of the death of a world.

FREDERICK L. SCHUMAN

The Party-State and the Elite

DEAR SCHUMAN: I am flattered by your searching letter in which is expressed so much appreciation of my book "The Dynamics of War and Revolution." It takes clear thinking and writing to formulate debatable issues between us when we have so much in common in method, attitude, and conclusions. So far as I am concerned, the purpose of clarifying these issues is mainly self-improvement. After all, we are critical of the times rather than of each other; we are exchanging notes rather than trying to convert each other.

In general, I entirely agree with you that the American people won't fight for "democracy, or England, or foreigners, or any symbol or faith or cause of any kind—unless their hemisphere is invaded by armed force, their cities bombed, and their houses burned over their heads." And then, if they do fight, it will be too late because they will be in an advanced state of disintegration. Hitler would not attack us unless we had become a push-over by reason of internal dissension and decay. I agree further that the causes for this attitude are mainly, though not exclusively, to use your words, "the sheer stupidity, cowardice, demoralization, and irresponsibility of a community already decadent."

Here, however, on a relatively minor tangent, I deviate from your synthesis. We both agree that American culture and the American people are now decadent. Only I hasten to qualify this dictum by adding that American culture is capitalism, and that it is only because capitalism is in collapse that American culture is in collapse. I then go on to say that a people as favored as we with natural resources, geographical isolation from potential invaders, and sheer size in almost every measurable term, can again become dynamic under another system and need not flounder long between the departed glories of capitalism and the glories of a new revolutionary 'ism, whatever may be its name—and I am not one to boggle over definitions. Russia and China, besides our good selves, appear to me to be the only peoples sufficiently favored in respect to the power factors to be able to rise from the collapse of one system to the glories of a successor without being crushed by a foreign conqueror during the collapse phase.

So when you say that the defenses of America were and still are in Western Europe or that our frontier is on the Rhine, I side with you against the audience that booed you at Town Hall last March for saying this. But I hasten to add the following qualifications, which few Americans are aware of: (1) America is capitalism; wherefore whenever and wherever capitalism and anti-capitalism clash America is involved; wherefore the frontier of capitalism is the frontier of America; wherefore America must be at war with Germany, the chief anti-capitalist power now challenging capitalism. (2) If the American people were alive to their best interests they would not equate America with capitalism, a doomed system, but they would abandon the doomed system and seek to develop a successor which could survive the current phase. (3) The American people will not be made aware of their true interest in this respect until they have suffered far more than they have ever suffered up to now.

You say: "The British fleet is the last remaining barrier between an invincible totalitarian war machine and an utterly indefensible Western Hemisphere. This is a simple fact of strategy and has nothing to do with ideologies or systems or causes or moral values." I can't agree. If America had a dynamic culture for this era, a culture which would have to be some variant of an expansive totalitarian collectivism directed by a non-hereditary functional élite, then the Western Hemisphere would be far more secure than either Russia or Japan against Hitler.

You think America and Britain should and could smash Germany and Japan, but you correctly recognize that the American people have no kidney for the enterprise. You don't seem to recognize that there may be a good reason why the American people are not willing to fight Germany and Japan for capitalism, that is, Americanism, and that that reason may be that they do not really find capitalism worth the necessary sacrifices. They won't admit it, of course, but actions speak louder than words.

You are wrong, I think, about this being preeminently a strategic problem and not one of ideologies or systems. You would have had America form with Britain after the war a combination in perpetual restraint of Germany and Japan. You forget that capitalism, or Americanism, furnishes no ideological or moral imperative for such a combination. A great people cannot fight a major war or hold to a major line of foreign policy like Woodrow Wilson's League of Nations, really nothing more than an Anglo-Saxon combination in restraint of aggressors against the status quo, without an appropriate ideology and ethos. If capitalism had been true, Hitler and the fall of France could not have happened.

I disagree, therefore, with you that we were stupid and blind not to combine with the British plutocracy in restraint of the aggressors against the status quo. I agree with you that we are following a policy which can only culminate disastrously for us because the policy is neither fish nor fowl, or because it is founded on many patent fallacies. Soviet Russia, on the other hand, is following a foreign policy which will continue to enhance Russian territorial possessions and political strength. The explanation is not that the Russian people are less stupid than the American people. The explanation is that the Russian people have a domestic economy and a foreign policy appropriate to the current phase of the struggle for existence and that the American people have not. Intelligence and character in pursuing the wrong policy will merely accelerate the career to destruction.

Then, as you go on, I find our views again converging. You express agreement with me "that the two needs of tomorrow's revolutionary leadership are, first, understanding of the situation and a will to meet it." But you would have met the situation during the past few years by a combination with Britain to check the foes of capitalism, whereas I have said that it is futile to fight anti-capitalism or to fight for capitalism and that the thing to do is to scuttle capitalism for a system under which a people can today meet the requirements for survival in the struggle for existence. Capitalism is a system which today picks Chamberlains, Reynauds, and Willkies for its leaders, and fiscal equilibrium and more freedom for business for its battle-cry in the domestic sphere and "Down with the anti-capitalists" for its battle-cry in the foreign sphere. It isn't good enough. Therefore the anti-capitalists are bound to win out in the long run, and it may not be so long.

You say, "The West—by which I mean everybody west of the Rhine—has lost all capacity to understand and act." Then you attack my "realism" or "pragmatism," which you find of a piece with that of Bismarck, Dewey, and the liberals—the pragmatism that says politics is the art of the possible. You say that Hitler has achieved the impossible by virtue of human foresight and will-power. Aren't we here arguing over words rather than things? You are no more than I a believer in the supernatural. You are a believer in the super-traditional and the super-stupid. You would not, I believe, argue that any amount of faith, or fanaticism, or foresight, or will-power could have averted the crash of 1929 or the depression of the thirties. Hitler has accomplished not only the possible but what was logically indicated for a German leader to attempt. The leaders of the democracies have attempted only the obviously impossible and logically absurd, such as balancing the budget over here or doing Munich in September and guaranteeing Poland in April over there. The totalitarians are the rationalists, the democracies the irrationalists, these days.

The American faith, as you know, is essentially faith in a perpetual land boom. Nothing can revitalize that faith once the population curve which made the land boom for two centuries begins to flatten out. Faith in God is much better as a folkway than a faith in America or a faith in capitalism, which is essentially just faith in an eternal land boom. As there never can be objective proof of the existence of a God, so there can never be objective disproof of his existence. But faith in a perpetual land boom once had a basis in fact which is now being destroyed.

DEFENCE OF IRELAND

I accept your definition of the new revolution as the rise of a new Caesarism. I agree further that the new revolution is antithetical to the ideas, values, and procedures of nationalism, as we have known it since the Reformation. I cannot, however, go along with you in saying that a world-state is the logical or likely culmination of the prevailing trend. I agree that the extinction of the myriad small nations and the integration of the world into a few great systems are probably both inevitable and desirable for the welfare of the world masses. Personally, I share your predilection for a single, universal world order as a philosophical ideal. But I do not consider it inevitable or likely.

When I said that the revolution must be carried out by each nation, I should have added that I had in mind Russia, Germany, Italy, and Japan. I concur 100 per cent that Hitler is giving the coup de grâce to the sovereign national state, to nationalism as well as to capitalism. He is creating a new sovereign, along with Stalin—the sovereign Socialist Party, membership in which is the only significant citizenship. I agree with you that Clarence Streit and Hitler are brothers under the skin. Only I believe that Streit wants an Anglo-Saxon union to preserve the status quo and the property rights of the haves, which I deem impossible, whereas Hitler wants a Germanic union to aggrandize his party community, which I deem possible. The new community is to be the party-state instead of the nation-state. It has to be a larger community than that of any state smaller than say Germany or the United States. But it does not have to be a single, all-embracing, world party-state.

If Hitler conquers Britain, as I expect, and continues cooperative relations with the other dynamic totalitarians, as I also expect, events on this side of the Atlantic may conform to one of the following patterns: we may embark upon long-range military adventures in the Far East or Latin America with disastrous consequences, or we may merely string along with the defense hysteria, raising taxes, lowering living standards, disrupting our traditional social order, accentuating class struggle, discouraging private enterprise, paralyzing investor confidence, and generally demoralizing the people with the pursuit of a military policy intended to stop Hitler but calculated only to stop American progress. In either course of events we shall have disintegration and revolution. Hitler would probably intervene in the revolution just as the Bourbons intervened in the American Revolution.

As Lenin said, every revolutionist is a traitor. I am far more worried about what Americans are going to do to Americans in the next few years than about what Hitler is going to do to us. Hitler will be able to do us in only if and after we have done ourselves in by class war and foolish policies.

As you say, "the issue of our day, in short, is who will do the job"—the job of making the new order. I share your misgivings about the new barbarians. Only I feel a little more sanguine over the prospects of men of brains and good impulses sharing the direction of things in the new order. I agree with you that, for the moment, "our job is to retire into our ivory towers or to do what we can to develop realism and leadership among those, if any, still capable of understanding the twentieth century and acting upon its imperatives." I share your feeling of bafflement. Consequently, like you, I work it off mainly in writing for a limited public.

LAWRENCE DENNIS

The Dynamics of Democracy

DEAR FRED: When you showed me your exchange of letters with Lawrence Dennis, I felt that the letters raised issues so striking that they ought to be published. I am adding now a few notes of commentary as one who disagrees sharply with both of you.

My differences with Dennis are, of course, more profound than my differences with you. For Dennis's values scarcely differ from those of fascism. To be sure, he now talks of "socialism" where earlier he was a good deal franker. I can only explain the change by the need for protective coloration in an American climate of opinion still too harsh for fascism. I cannot go along with your bland view that the differences between the two are "irrelevant." If socialism and fascism are the same, then millions of blasted lives have had no meaning.

For Dennis to say socialism and fascism are the same is a matter of strategy (I can well understand why he is "not one to boggle over definitions"). For you to say it, however, is sheer confusion and blindness, unpalliated by your allusions to Spengler's Caesarism. The distance between the two is deep and wide and black as the pit. You say all this is "morals" and "ideology," and that they are intangibles that are brushed aside by the imperatives of history. And yet you were one of the first to say that Stalin's invasion of Finland would in the end be disastrous for Russia's cause, even in Machiavellian terms, because it did not reckon with the moral intangibles of policy. And your letter and Dennis's are drenched with emotional and moral terms—"cowardice," "irresponsibility," "decadence." I believe with you in the strategic factors of history. Yet, forgetting the enormous differences between socialism and fascism for the masses everywhere, for their living standards and their freedom, even in terms of strategy your insistence on calling all collectivism "Caesarism" is fatal.

Why so? You know how wholly I agree with you on the need for sending full aid to England, regardless of the risk of war. But I don't see how you expect people to follow you if the moral and ideological aspects of Nazism are unimportant. Men do not willingly die to have a choice between Tweedledum and Tweedledee.

Nor do they willingly die in a hopeless cause. As soon as you admit Dennis's thesis that fascism (your "Caesarism") is inevitable, he has the draw on you, shooting with both barrels. By embracing the "inevitability" of Caesarism, you render hopeless our common cause of aiding England in order to keep Nazism from America, and our common cause also of creating a democratic dynamism which will make America's role at home and in world affairs a great one. Not only will Americans be confused about what they are fighting for, but they will know that, whatever it is, it doesn't stand a chance. That's "wave of the future" talk you're both giving us, Fred. And the mere fact that it's couched in the grandiose phrases of Spenglerism rather than in the Smith English of Mrs. Lindbergh doesn't change its effect on the middle-class American mind. For that mind has always been a bandwagon mind. Dennis says the American faith is faith in a perpetual land boom, and that's a good sentence—just close enough to the truth to be brilliant. Relying on a land boom means hoping to get in on the ground floor of a "good thing." And if you tell the American people that the stars in their courses are fighting for fascism, they'll want to be with the stars in their courses.

Der Führer

There is room and to spare in the dynamic of history for a strong democratic state which is not Caesarism—which is, in Lincoln's phrase, neither too weak for survival nor too strong for the liberties of its citizens. Neither of you in his letter has made the emergence of this sort of democratic state part of the campaign of history. Yet democracy is the great force in the world today, whether as dream or reality—greater than capitalism, which was once a force, or liberalism, which has never been a real one, or communism, which has too early thrown its strength away, or fascism, which once it goes down the skids will go fast, or internationalism, which may yet emerge as a great force.

Oh, I know that there has been more drivel talked about democracy than about anything else in our universe.

And I know that crimes have been committed in its name. But these are signs of vitality. You don't imitate a shadow, and you don't speak in the name of a nullity. One of our heritages from Marxism is to think of democracy as the shadow of a substance—capitalism—which is disintegrating. But ours will be a ghastly blunder if we do not recognize that democracy is substance as well as dream. It is something to die for, to live by, to give our talent and energy to extending. If that sounds insubstantial for us, it is real enough for the Indian peasant who in his hut in Bolivia or Chile has a yellowed picture of Roosevelt on the wall, for Chinese coolie and intellectual alike, for the British common man and the French and Dutch and Poles and Norwegians who are staking their lives on democracy being real. Of course, we must be tough-minded if we are to survive. But especially if we are tough-minded we shall know how to value a dynamic force as powerful as the idea of a society in which men can shape their own destiny, and rise to their full height, and be comrades, and not be pushed about. Let's agree that God is on the side of the big battalions. But those battalions won't be worth a wooden pistol unless they are fighting for an idea that can somehow be made real to them.

What has so far limited us in doing this with democracy? Dennis says "capitalism"; you say "decadence." I agree more with Dennis here, but as usual he has stopped short where I want to go on. It is a capitalism thus far uncontrolled by the democratic forces of the people that has betrayed us, nationally and internationally. Dennis is wrong when he calls our whole economy stagnant. By public spending and lending, by the control of saving and investment, by anti-trust action such as is now being used to beat down prices, by trade-union organization, by planning, by a whole array of strategic controls, our economic system can be made to live and work for the mass of people more efficiently than the enslaved economy of the Nazis that Dennis so greatly admires. The "land boom" is already on the way to becoming an organized system of controls. We have plenty of knowledge of what to do with our economic machine. The snags lie not in economics but in politics—in the realm of class resistance and press distortions and in the realm of power.

So when you ask, Why don't Americans have the will to fight the Nazis? I accept neither your answer that it is because they are cowardly and decadent nor Dennis's that it is because they know there is nothing to fight for. My answer is that democracy in its fullest extension is what there is to fight for. The people are not decadent, nor cowards, nor fools. To be sure, they have been duped and doped by Congress and press. It is taking them long to slough off an isolationism deepened by the experience of the last war, but they are doing it—just as fast as they are being allowed to do it by the barons of opinion and the lords of appeasement and their Congressional isolationist liegemen. For the people cannot convince themselves that democracy is in as much danger from the Nazis as you and I know it is. They are waiting also to see whether Britain means its democracy genuinely, for its own workers and India as well as for the empire; and they are being confused by the talk of the "inevitability" of a Nazi triumph. They are waiting also to see whether we, in our labor policy and our defense policy, really mean democracy at home. Given this set of obstructions, the wonder is that mass opinion is not more confused than it is. Please, Fred, don't go reading the sickness of your Spengler into a culture which, at the end of a decade of depression and world crisis, is stronger than it was at the beginning.

But I agree with you when you say to Dennis that there are imperatives in history working in the direction of some form of internationalism. I believe completely that the chief "revolutionary" aspect of the present period is that it marks the breaking of nations. The small state, politically "sovereign" but economically helpless, will survive only as part of a larger economic unit and only as it surrenders part of its sovereignty to some federal system. The large states will have to do the same if their world is to be kept from chaos. But what kind of federal system? You mention Lenin, Wilson, Hitler, and Clarence Streit all in the same breath. That is why we must talk of more than just world federation. It must be democratic world federation, just as our internal socialization must be democratic socialization. And the two can only be achieved in connection with each other, as part of a single campaign.

Where shall we get the will to do both? Ultimately I agree with you when you say that the future belongs to those who are willing to do "the job." But what job? I think the job is to use the fullest resources of the machine process on the economic plane, the administrative process on the political, and the élan of the democratic idea on the ideological. And then the job is to smash Nazism, carry through the civil wars against it wherever it has gained power, organize the world on a working economic basis, and carry through a social reconstruction which can keep with the people the essential decisions that affect their lives. That job only a democratic dynamic can accomplish. If the job, however, is only the conquest and retention of power and the maintenance of "order" through coercion, it will be done—at least temporarily—by fascist gangsterism (Caesarism), fighting for naked power and loot and a place in a new social hierarchy. If we choose the first, as you and I do, it is because we know men can be tough-minded yet passionate with belief, because we know that there can be spunk and steel in them as well as fear and indecision. We know that under great leadership they can do the "impossible"—that is, extend the limits of achievement to the utmost by gauging rightly the boundaries of social and historical possibility. If you don't believe that, what's the use of calling on the democracies, as you do, to resist Nazism?

Dennis wants to get the will for his job from an élite. I think I know the assortment of primitivist business men, high-powered advertising-agency executives, adventurist priests, demoniac salesmen, and intellectual muscle men that would comprise that élite, if and when. And because Dennis scorns democracy he thinks your whole idea of internationalism is a pipe dream. He is for the single-party state. There is where his totalitarianism centers. You let him get away with it by speaking of the inevitability of "socialism" as "military totalitarianism resting on a dynamic faith." If you are saying what you seem to be saying, Dennis's way seems to me much simpler and more logical. Poor Streit: you put a big burden on him if you think that his plan or any like it is going to hold together a pack of totalitarian wolf-states, each with its own brand of military socialism worked out. Internationalism, in any sense in which you mean it, is possible only where the constituent units, by the inherent nature of their economies, their political systems, their ideologies, do not have the imperative drive for further expansion. If the principle is going to be military totalitarianism at home and economic imperialism abroad, then Dennis's party-state will win out. What you will have will be the "Socialist" (Nazi) Party organized in every nation and on every continent, using national machinery and traditions where convenient—how ingeniously Dennis and his friends could work out an ideology for an American Nazism—but using the international Nazi party line and the Nazi spirit to cement the various national units.

Winston Churchill

What a heavenly city that would be! The single-party system, the state monopoly of conscience, the purging of dangerous thoughts, the Aryanization of science, the robotization of the common man, political Alcatrazes dotting both our coastlines, the administrative machinery of the nation one vast FBI. I don't have to draw this picture for you who have for a decade been our most brilliant and persistent exposers of the barbarism as well as the danger of Nazism. I implore you, since our ends and values are so similar, to look to your means. The Dennises are not your comrades, although like you they talk the language of Machiavelli, Marx, and Spengler. They are the polite forerunners of the barbarians whom you so rightly see undertaking "the job" in our country if we do not. You say you are "bothered" by them not for moral reasons but because they won't be able to finish the job. I confess I am much more "bothered" by what they will do whether they botch the job or finish it: what they will do with this America of ours, which is not just landscape and fields of corn and skyscrapers and mines, but a living culture that we call democratic and humanist.

Dennis seems much less bothered by the barbarians. He thinks that "men of brains and good impulses" will share power with the Himmlers and Streichers and Coughlins and McWilliamses. Perhaps, with each of us, our dream of a "new order" is, after all, only a projection of the picture we have of ourselves in it. Let us leave him with his dream, sitting for the moment in his "ivory tower," writing for his "limited public," until the barbarians do with him what in Europe they have done with the Strassers and Rauschnings and other "men of brains and good impulses" who have cleared the way for them.

But you don't belong in an ivory tower. Most thinkers have some pet frustration, some feeling of having been an unheeded Cassandra. Nevertheless, our job is to fight—in market-place and statehouse, in schoolhouse and factory—for the world we wish to help fashion. And in that fight we are, as thinkers, not alone. We have the people as allies. In Spain, in Czechoslovakia, in Poland, in Norway, in Holland, in England, they have shown a knowledge of the meaning of the struggle and a desperate heroism in waging it. They have been betrayed by the capitalists, the politicians, the generals, the diplomats. But in the face of all that they have not let us down.

MAX LERNER

Hi-Yo, Silver Lining!

BY C. B. BOUTELL

MAN in the course of his written history has always dreamed of a Midas formula with which to transmute the base material of everyday life into the minted coinage of the Never-Never Land. The formula has been in operation for seven years in the form of the Lone Ranger and his subsidiary rights. The Lone Ranger—if you have never heard him—is the hero of some four thousand or more half-hour radio broadcasts—recordings, rebroadcasts, Canadian and Australian outlets, all contributing to the total. The Lone Ranger program sells commercially for seventeen bakeries and one oil company over ninety-five domestic radio stations, not counting Canadian and foreign broadcasts or domestic sustaining programs. Merchandise ranging from lollipops to pencils is sold by seventy-one companies, each licensed for a different Lone Ranger article; the Lone Ranger comics appear in eighty-four daily and Sunday papers, twenty-nine of them using both the daily and the Sunday feature. The spread is something to conjure with: Buenos Aires to Buffalo, Detroit to Durban (South Africa), Halifax to Harrisburg, Manila to Mexico City, Richmond to Rio, Toronto to Tulsa. All of this nets the originators of the Lone Ranger interests something in excess of half a million dollars a year. And there are Lone Ranger movies also!

Back in 1933 George W. Trendle and John H. King, both previously associated with the motion-picture industry, found themselves with a Detroit radio station sufficiently independent of the chains to be losing money hand over fist. Nothing but a good dramatic program could save WXYZ from its alphabetic end. Mr. Trendle found a solution: horse opera with overtones of "Pilgrim's Progress"—the Lone Ranger. The formula seems perfect. The Lone Ranger, sole survivor of a group of Texas rangers, becomes the Masked Rider of Justice. He acquires a white horse named Silver, with silver shoes, a staunch Indian friend named Tonto, and silver bullets for his six-gun. But unlike Robin Hood, Raffles, and the Lone Wolf, the Lone Ranger never operates counter to the law, only parallel to it when it is unenlightened. Result: action aplenty with no subversive effects on the tiny tots who, theoretically, listen to the program. I say theoretically because recent surveys show that probably at least 63 per cent of the current audience is adult. All the programs require hard riding, shooting, and suspense. The sound effects are superbly handled, and a surprising sense of reality is achieved. The plots are never elaborate, since they must be complete in each instalment so that the children will not worry. The Lone Ranger always rides off to further adventure safe and sound, and millions of children sleep the better for it. The programs are amply salted with the Ranger's now famous cry, "Hi-Yo, Silver!"—probably the most valuable signature in radio.

It seems simple enough, but the idea did not burst full-blown into being. Mr. Trendle outlined the general direction the program was to take and turned it over to Fran Striker, a script writer, who is largely responsible for the details. And Fran Striker has carried on from the beginning, developing, incorporating suggestions, doing the Ranger and various other scripts in the amount of about 50,000 words a week. When George Trendle wanted someone to write a weekly script for another dramatic broadcast, about the adventures of the Green Hornet, he turned, naturally, to the versatile Mr. Striker—and his formula.

The Green Hornet bears an astonishing resemblance to the Lone Ranger if you approach the program with the formula in mind. The setting is modern and metropolitan, but the Green Hornet travels about in his big black sedan for the benefit of the oppressed city dweller in much the same way that the Lone Ranger operates in the wide open spaces. The Green Hornet is doing famously.

The basic appeal of these two programs, of many imitations of them, and of the Lone Ranger comics in both the newspapers and those insidious, ubiquitous pulp-paper creations, "books" of comics, must lie in the wish-fulfilment they offer to those exposed to them. But an achievement of real social value must also be credited to the Lone Ranger's creators. The Lone Ranger Safety Clubs for boys and girls throughout the United States now have well over a million members. Various merchandising ideas, including give-aways of all sorts, have been used by the program. The first was the famous pop-gun incident. On May 16, 1933, when the Ranger was still a sustaining feature, the program offered a pop-gun to the first three hundred children to write in asking for one; 25,904 letters were received in two days. Only a few months ago a bakery offered a miniature newspaper. The total give-away ran to well over a million, with the retailers' trucks jamming the streets at the bakeries to pick up bread to meet the demand. And there is the classic story of the Ranger's one full-fledged public appearance at a school field day on Belle Isle at Detroit, when 70,000 children stormed the police lines. That was in 1933. Today the police would need the help of the National Guard. However, the Ranger does not need to appear in person. The safety clubs give the necessary check on popularity and secure the type of local support for which publicity men give their shirts. The mayor or at least the local police chief will always sound off for safety, sales of (insert name of product) go up, and accidents go down in the community. "Hi-Yo, Silver! Away . . .!"

As the Lone Ranger has become better and better known he has conquered one field after another. Soon he will invade the already crowded market for adult Western stories. Will the golden formula work? His debut is scheduled for this month. The book will be written by Fran Striker, it will be entitled "The Lone Ranger Rides," and it will present the first full-length adventure of the Ranger in this form. Once started, the books might go on indefinitely.

Results seem to prove that literally millions of Lone Ranger fans can listen intelligently and that they have children with money to spend for toy pistols, cowboy suits, leather wallets, games, silver-plated spoons, and bubble gum. If these same fans can read—and can be persuaded to do so from a book—the formula will indeed be perfect. "Hi-Yo, Silver!"

Within the Gates

DURING the last half of 1940 this column attempted to record the development of American fascism in the making. The incidents reported and the persons discussed had an immediate news value as well as historical significance. There were other incidents which were too unimportant in themselves to be noted but which have a cumulative significance in retrospect. Trends then too nebulous to analyze have now crystallized. Looking back upon the old year from the vantage point of 1941, we can add a few footnotes which may prove to be more important than the published text.

UNDER THE Imperial Wizardry of James Arnold Colescott, the former veterinarian, the Ku Klux Klan in 1940 became one of the most formidable units in the American fascismo. Its present membership of approximately 300,000 is at least 50 per cent larger than that of a year ago. The quantity and quality of its acts of violence have established a new high—or low. In Fulton County, Georgia, Klansmen killed three persons in one month. A county grand jury meeting in Atlanta listened to evidence of more than fifty floggings.

It is no longer true that the Klan is a purely American phenomenon indebted to a pioneer vigilante tradition rather than to a European ideology. Its fascist character was dramatized on August 18 when the New Jersey Realm held a joint meeting with the German-American Bund at the latter's Camp Nordland.

THE PROPAGANDA of American fascists during the latter part of 1940 indicates that the Catholic is to join the Jew as a scapegoat. Two factors contribute to this trend—the resurgence of the Klan and the increasing activity of certain fascist-minded leaders among religious Fundamentalists. As a matter of fact, there is a close connection between the two groups: Fundamentalists, who are by theology anti-Catholic and by nature intolerant, have always constituted a majority of the membership of the Klan. West of the Alleghenies, and particularly in the Mississippi Valley and the deep South, anti-Catholicism is a more deeply ingrained prejudice than anti-Semitism and is too rich a mine to be overlooked by would-be Führers.

As the influence of Protestant fundamentalism gained in the American fascist movement during the year, the strength of clerical fascism waned. This was due in part to the fact that the current code of the National Association of Broadcasters forbids member stations to sell time to individuals or organizations for the discussion of "controversial" subjects, and thus made it impossible for Father Coughlin to renew his radio contracts. The silencing of Father Coughlin, plus the trial of seventeen members of the Christian Front for conspiracy against the federal government, resulted in the dissolution of a number of the Front's units even though a majority of the members indicted were acquitted and the indictments against the others dismissed. Only in the Boston area are Coughlinites increasing in strength.

DURING 1940 the American fascist movement turned in the general direction of respectability. Some of the more blatant outfits either dissolved permanently or reorganized under new names. Führer John Henry Peyton of the shirted American Rangers, after a temporary eclipse, reappeared as the leader of an organization sententiously called Mobilization for American Needs. Hans Diebel, owner of a Bundist bookshop on the West Coast, began distributing propaganda in the name of the League to Save America First. Joseph McWilliams converted the discredited Christian Mobilizers into the political American Destiny Party. In November propagandists James True and Robert Edward Edmondson announced their intention to discontinue their publications. In December William Dudley Pelley discontinued publication of the anti-Semitic magazine Liberation, dissolved the Silvershirts, and moved his printing equipment to Noblesville, Indiana, where it will be used to publish a magazine called Friendship.

THE CONTINUED strength of the American fascist movement has confronted the country with the old dilemma: shall persons advocating anti-democratic forms of government be protected by democracy's civil liberties? No conclusive answer was reached in 1940, but there was a tendency to invoke existing restrictions against such persons and, in some instances, to impose new restrictions. Joseph McWilliams was arrested three times for making remarks tending to disturb the peace and twice convicted. Nine members of the German-American Bund and one non-member were indicted under a recently enacted New Jersey law which forbids acts promoting racial or religious hatred. A bill was passed by the House of Representatives requiring persons using the mails for printed matter to reveal their identities and backing. The Voorhis Act, which caused the Communist Party of the United States to sever its connection with the Third International, may be construed to apply to such groups as the Bund. A number of sedition and military-disaffection bills are pending in Congress. The trend toward further restrictions is clear. A Fortune poll last January revealed that 49 per cent of the persons questioned believed anyone should be permitted to speak on any subject. But six months later 70 per cent were in favor of "curbing, locking up, or deporting Communist and Nazi supporters."

In the Wind

THE STATE DEPARTMENT has filed a private protest with Franco's government objecting to its treatment of political opponents. The fact of the protest comes from an inside source, and nobody knows why it wasn't made public.

THE NLRB will not appeal the Circuit Court decision which gave Ford the right to distribute anti-union propaganda to his employees. Since the board was favored in the rest of the decision, it has decided not to complicate the case by keeping the "free speech" issue alive. It was Francis Biddle who insisted on this strategy.

THERE IS widespread resentment among New Dealers over the Defense Commission's appointment of John Lord O'Brian as general counsel. O'Brian is Tom Dewey's up-state leader; he is also Senator Mead's most serious political rival in Buffalo; and the appointment gives Dewey important patronage and prestige that may be used against Mead in 1942.

WYTHE WILLIAMS, Mutual's radio commentator, included a nice note in a recent broadcast, but it may have been inadvertent. He said: "Even today Germany has an Achilles heel. That heel is Mussolini."

DEPARTURE OF the middle-of-the-road National Student Federation from the American Youth Congress is a big blow to that organization. It is likely to be followed by defections among other groups which have heretofore strung along despite restlessness over the Congress's policies.

ANTI-FASCIST FILMS produced in the United States are running into trouble in Latin America. "The Dictator" has been banned in Argentina, and hostile demonstrations have been organized in other countries. Detailed reports of these incidents are being studied anxiously by film magnates.

ROBERT MAYNARD HUTCHINS recently told a Rotary Club audience: "I know nothing of the market-place except that once when I was working my way through school I sold a clothes-line reel to a woman in Elyria, Ohio, who was later committed to an institution for the feeble-minded. My success with her led me to devote my life to students and professors."

THE NEWSPAPER GUILD is having a stiff tussle at the New York Times as a result of the formation of the A. F. of L. Newswriters' Association there. Publisher Arthur Hays Sulzberger, never a booster for the Guild, isn't averse to the growth of the craft unit, and bargaining talks are getting more and more complex.

PRESS NOTE: The report of the Smith committee charging the NLRB with having increased labor troubles was featured on the front page of nearly every newspaper. Two days before the report came out, the Department of Labor published statistics showing that there was less labor conflict in 1940 than in any year of the previous decade. Its statement was buried or ignored.

WHAT ABOUT the Dies committee's promise that it was going to probe the Christian Front if the committee was kept alive? Insiders say nothing will happen—except more exposés of the Bund.

[Readers are invited to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. The $5 prize for the best item submitted in December goes to the contributor of the note about Rush Holt published two weeks ago.].

A Native at Large

BY JONATHAN DANIELS

A VISITOR from the country can see more clearly the new company in Washington. In this day of defense it is composed, not of soldiers and sailors, admirals and generals, but of well-dressed gentlemen who do not look like politicians or reformers but are in fact the growing army of the well-dressed, elegant-looking gentlemen in government. A good many of them are necessary in the defense program. Some have brought great talents to town. Some come for contracts and go home to fill them. But in the Carlton lobby and the Mayflower bar many of them have the look of the dollar-a-year men of the last war.

Anybody who was in Washington then remembers them. I was there, though young. I remember the huge parties they gave in 1917 and 1918 for their daughters from Chicago and Pittsburgh and New York. Washington was not only the military and financial capital of the land but the social one also, a capital which seemed to grow gayer as the guns grew louder beyond Verdun.

Democracy was very elegantly saved. It may be again. But ingrate though I may be—lovely as the daughters of the dollars-a-year were, excellent as was the music they imported, splendid as were the eggs and sausage with which they provided us in the dawn—I hope the dollar-a-year men may be dispensed with in this crisis and whatever lies beyond it. The country needs the talents of a good many of the best men like them. But a country undertaking to stand as the citadel of democracy needs to reject promptly any system which inevitably, if unintentionally, makes a special class of people who are rich enough to serve without pay while other men depend for a livelihood upon their wages for equally patriotic and essential service.

The United States government is not a mendicant. If it is able to pay billions for ships and planes, it is quite able to pay for the brains it needs to direct their acquisition and use. Perhaps the government, at regular government standards of pay, cannot give the best brains of business what they are worth. But how many buck privates, facing the dangers of actual combat, would regard the wages they get as adequate compensation for the risks they take? The important aspect of this matter is that nobody should be permitted to assume the airs of a philanthropist in a government job. Obviously for the very rich the salaries they are willing to wave aside in government service are petty in terms of the sacrifice involved. But no false distinction should be drawn between those who wave them aside and others in the government service whose work is as essential to American security and who need the pay.

Furthermore, while in the last war many of the ablest Americans gave indispensable service without salary, the offer to work without salary resulted in the cluttering up of a lot of Washington offices with dollar-a-year men whose contribution was hardly equal to the one-dollar wage they received when the value of desk space and elbow room was considered. With important exceptions, the rule is as sound in government as among individuals that you get what you pay for—no more, no less. Fortunately, the government in a crisis can take the services it needs. Few Americans would fail to respond to a real call to real service. But the government will do better if it takes what it wants in human material and not what is offered to it for nothing. The best rule for efficiency and democracy would be for the government to hire and pay. And nobody should be allowed to work for the government unpaid.

If war comes or the present crisis continues long in intensity, however, there is hardly anything which can be predicted with more certainty than that the dollar-a-year offers from would-be dollar-a-year men will increase in number. The capital is the exciting center. The hotels are crowded; noisy voices fill the bars. Those able to gather will be gathering there. The demand will grow again for places in the government service for the same sort of people who so long made diplomacy so stupid because the only brains available to it were the brains of the very restricted number of the well-to-do. Certainly no sensible person would bar men from the government service merely because they are rich. But there should be no place in the government service now or later for men who are merely rich and so are willing, in effect, to pay the government for their jobs by not requiring it to pay them for their work.

Now, before the pressure comes, more sense would be made out of our pretensions to democracy and more efficiency would be assured in government if every person, high or low, were put on the pay roll at what he is worth by government standards of pay and kept there or put out. If they are not worth paying, they are not worth having. No American is too rich to be hired by America. And no American in the government service of this democracy should be made to feel less noble in patriotic enterprise because he needs to draw his pay.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Faust Before the Mirror

BY RAPHAEL HAYES

I must be the last man to burn in hell
The last one terrified at the zero hour
When the windows shudder and the dogs howl
And the cloven hoof pounds up the street.

For I am the hero of incredible desires
The prodigal and the shallow smile,
The enameled lady in the electrician's dawn;
The brass fame,
 wet ashes of their failure,
And the playboy's dream,
The imitation Solomon in business clothes.
I am their equestrian shadow
Plunging its crooked mile from birth to death.

So I must be the last gambler to speak,
The epic lover,
 the giant memory of defeat,
Who took the longest chance
Since God with Adam or with Adam's bone,
Who now behold the burning and the ash,
The world's eighth wonder,
My own charred spirit in the glass.

How Long Ago the Home

BY KARL JAY SHAPIRO

How long ago the home
The custody of womb
How far far out of mind
In another dimension
The aberration
Of first information,
Goodbye to it, it must have been unkind.

Sister I teased you
Cousin I kissed you
Hid in the closet
In female odors
Above the disorders
Of grandfather's illness.
The confusing passion
For guilty action

The search for sadness
In the other's stillness
Were these but profits
Of an instant mood
Or the lust for pity
In the rising blood?

Bill Douglas, Fighter

DEMOCRACY AND FINANCE. By William O. Douglas.
Introduction by James Allen. Yale University Press.
$3.

MANY people admire Tom Dewey because he is young and tough, and, especially out West, they believe in his integrity and liberalism because "the interests counted him out at the Republican convention." Well, there was another fellow in Tom Dewey's class at the Columbia Law School who has gone farther in less time than anyone else in the class. This young man actually came out of the West—on the business end of a freight car. He is not just a perennial candidate, which is as much stature as a personable family man only forty-two years old might be expected to have achieved. Continuously for over five years he has held posts of high responsibility, as a maker, administrator, and interpreter of law. In them he has set a record practically without precedent in American history. His name is Bill Douglas.

This book is a collection of papers written by Douglas before he graduated from the SEC to the Supreme Court. They tell a great deal about him. Bill Douglas did not make his way by going into a silk-stocking district, or to a lawyers' dinner, and attacking gangsters—whom everybody is against (and, it is pertinent to add, whose civil liberties can be ignored by ambitious district attorneys). Instead, he went right into the Bond Club in 1937 to make the famous speech in which he served notice on Wall Street that "the economic utility of continuity of banking relationships is of unestablished value to anyone except the banker"; telling the bankers to go out and compete for their livings or else. As Mr. Douglas points out, fully two-thirds of the country's dividend and interest payments each year are handed to individuals or families living on incomes of $10,000 or less. These little people, he reminded the bankers in this speech, are "the real owners of [our] industrial empires." They have no confidence in the "mid-Victorian attitudes" of managements which forget their trustee obligations to labor, investors, and consumers, a fact which the 1940 election would seem to establish beyond question. "There can be in our form of corporate and industrial organization no royalism which can long dictate" to the people. As he told another meeting of New York business men in 1938, the New Deal's regulatory agencies are here to stay. They are part of the mechanism of democratic government whereby capitalism can discipline and preserve itself. This mechanism "is equipped to meet business on business terms. . . . With joint action it becomes an efficient business force; acting alone it becomes a police force. The choice rests in the hands of business."

Typical of his courage were Mr. Douglas's relations with the New York Stock Exchange, which he found a private club and left a public institution, collecting the scalp of Dick Whitney and the magic symbols of the Street's Elder Bankers in transit. While he was cracking the whip over the Exchange's Old Guard, he reminded the Street of the public's impression that "someone on the inside has a mirror . . . behind the backs of the investors who enter this market." "This," he said, "adds a casino element to what should be an old-fashioned open auction." In the course of this straight speaking Mr. Douglas told a story to explain to the Street the kind of change the country had in mind for it. The story was about an Indian out West who wanted to borrow $1,000 from a local bank and couldn't understand that the banker wanted some collateral. Finally he was persuaded to put up twenty ponies with the banker. Then he struck oil. He came to the bank with a huge roll of money, peeled off a $1,000 bill, and retrieved his ponies. The banker, seeing the large roll, suggested that the Indian deposit the money in his bank. "How many ponies you got?" asked the Indian. Mr. Douglas closed his speech by urging 1929-minded brokers to accept the new order of things and begin moving forward under it. "I offer you a police escort," was the somewhat cryptic thought with which he left his audience.

Another key front on which Mr. Douglas spoke prophetically and fought vigorously was that presented by the utilities. Two months before the Supreme Court's decision in the test Bond and Share case, Mr. Douglas made another characteristic challenge. He announced that the industry had become divided about the Holding Company Act, and that the realists in it had resolved to live and prosper under it. But, he added, these realists also live "under the whip hand of New York finance. . . . I have spent hour upon hour with leaders of companies who extol the virtues of the act yet are prevented by untold intangibles, such as the fear of offending New York investment bankers who hate the Administration, from participating in its health-giving benefits. . . . While the nation awaits restoration of its capital markets, financial leadership slumbers. An industry which its leaders say could use millions of dollars a year in capital . . . is stymied by a small group who stand squarely in its path intent on preserving their own intangible interests regardless of the costs" to the economy. The last campaign showed clearly how determined to vault back into the saddle were the forces Mr. Douglas challenged—how eager, as a punster said, to "re-Morganize" the government. But look at the industry today. Mr. Douglas's old enemy, Mr. Hopson, is a public spectacle, practically a public ward. The great Standard Gas system is also being reorganized. Other new deals of the same kind are in the making. The public has come to agree with Mr. Douglas that the "death sentence" is a "death sentence" for holding-company management only, and is bringing new vigor to the producers in the industry each year.

In addition to Wall Street and the utilities, innovations for which Mr. Douglas has been responsible include such vital matters as cleaning up corporate reorganizations and starting work on problems as pressing as those of small business, the country's derelict areas, the possibilities of developing regional capital markets, competition between insurance companies and investment bankers, revitalizing the investment trusts as sources of capital, and cleaning up the trustee business. This is a formidable list. On the Supreme Court his best-known decision has been the one in the Los Angeles Lumber case, in which he laid it down once and for all that when a company goes under, its public creditors come first and the insiders must either get out or buy their way back by putting up new money. Other decisions concern the problems of monopoly and of sick industries. Unfortunately, they are not reproduced here.

Mr. Douglas is a reformer and a fighter. He sits in the chair of Louis Brandeis, and provides as appropriate a continuation of that great man's career as he could ever have hoped for. But Douglas is a new kind of reformer. He is not out for reform for the sake of reform even though, as some say, it paralyzes our economy. He is for reform precisely because drastic reforms have been needed to revitalize both our economy and our national morale. Listen to him talk about "the forces of disorder." "These groups," he says, "collectively divorced from social responsibility, are the chief agents through which our economic and financial blunders accumulate until the next blood-letting process. This is called a crisis. But it is nothing more than the rhythmic breaking out of the pent-up forces of abuse, mismanagement, and maldistribution of economic effort and income. Academic economists have tried to endow cycles and crises thus created with natural attributes. In this way they have . . . washed the hands of high finance and excused it from social responsibility. But the cycles and crises thus created are not inescapable. We may in years to come look at them as monuments to the folly of the human race." Mr. Douglas is for reform because he is so practical.

One of the paradoxes of the New Deal revolution is that it has deposed the bankers, on whom responsibility could easily be fixed, and tended to let their power slip by default into the hands of the anonymous class of risers-through-promotion known as management. These leaders—all too rarely graduated from the wheel-turning, revenue-producing divisions of corporations—are different from members of the small-property class and from the owners of great fortunes; in fact, they are independent of each. Of their irresponsibility, if unregulated, Mr. Douglas says, "Enterprises . . . which command tremendous resources, which hold the fate of whole communities of workers in their hands . . . which dominate markets and control vast resources tip the scales on the side of prosperity or on the side of depression, depending on the decisions of the men at the top"—if they are left to themselves. Mr. Douglas is for regulation of these trustees—the corporate managements—because he is for protecting the property of their employers, the people in the brackets under $10,000 a year.

In this as in every statement of his in this book you can feel Mr. Douglas's belief that the kind of society we get is the kind of society we either tolerate or achieve. His attitude is fundamentally simple, a combination of morals and practicality. The law is fundamentally democratic; it must be enforced; still more laws must be written to equalize eco-conomic and social pressures; if democracy is not thus realized, capitalism will go under. This is, at bottom, the lesson fascism should have been teaching us these many years. In 1936 Mr. Douglas warned of the danger that a cartelized industrial hierarchy, operated by managements self-perpetuating and answerable to no one, may transform a nation of shopkeepers into a nation of clerks.

But in Mr. Douglas's pragmatic idealism, which fuses the great traditions of legal philosophy and old-fashioned populism with plain, tough know-how, we have as good a guaranty as any government can provide that we are not going to become a regimented or tired nation and that we know what we are arming to defend. For his is the kind of loyal and effective personality which this democracy has always managed to have on tap in adequate quantity for its great crises. We may count ourselves lucky that the present crisis finds Mr. Douglas still a very young man. ELIOT JANEWAY

Napoleon III

THE SECOND EMPIRE. By Octave Aubry. Translated by Arthur Livingston. J. B. Lippincott Company. $5.

"I HEAR the complaint," Napoleon III once remarked, "that things never go straight in my government. How could they? The Empress is a legitimist. Morny is an Orleanist. I am a republican. There is only one Bonapartist. That's Persigny—and he is crazy!"

At any rate, there was only one person with the power to resolve the confusion, and that was Napoleon III himself. That he increasingly failed to do so was due partly to progressive weariness and ill health. But it was also due, as has lately been forgotten but as M. Aubry reminds us, to the fact that "too many ideas were stirring around in the head of the second Emperor. They were noble, broadminded ideas most often, but the attempt to reconcile them the one with the other raised unsolvable problems." And back of it all was the inescapable fact that although "he stood forth as the mandatory of the people," he had achieved his position by a bloody coup d'état and maintained it by the exercise of absolute dictatorship and all that implies, or used to imply. For in the "liberal and progressive" nineteenth century even dictators could not imagine the return to the methods of the Inquisition which it was left for their twentieth-century successors to realize.

M. Aubry, who gives a survey of an era as much as the life of one man, recalls to mind the many good points of the Second Empire. It was on the whole a time of ordered prosperity, in which Paris, newly beautified into the sweeping capital of avenues and boulevards that we know, really became "la cité souveraine, le séjour du plaisir" which we also know. The very mediocrity which reigned in official circles, artistic and literary as well as political, gave more iconoclastic talents a medium in which to crystallize, even if, like Baudelaire, they risked judicial condemnation or went into exile like Victor Hugo. At the same time ambitious foreigners like Offenbach and Wagner came to Paris to achieve fame.

Paris was not only the capital of Europe in the artistic, intellectual, theatrical, and financial sense, but also undoubtedly in the political, until Napoleon III, thanks to the ideas trying to reconcile themselves in his head and also to the disunity indicated by the statement quoted above, threw away all his advantages. Largely for idealistic reasons he assisted in the unification of both Italy and Germany, while weakening Austria from less worthy motives. Too late, he saw that the real danger lay on the Rhine. But even then no adequate preparation was made for the inevitable showdown, and the crisis found everybody pulling in a different direction and the army, though full of seasoned fighters and brave men, at the mercy of politicians and incompetent generals. France was reduced from the dominant position in Europe to what was, when M. Aubry wrote his book, the lowest point in its history.

The present struggle had not broken out when this book was written; but had M. Aubry set out with the collapse of France in mind to draw a deadly historical parallel he could not have produced a more timely work. Solid, detailed, documented, detached, clear, and very readable, it will undoubtedly be an important book for some time to come—until it is possible to write a new study, which the author foreshadows in his last sentence, a study of Napoleon III as a European, "one of the forerunners, one of those forerunners whom fate betrays in their attempt to realize great conceptions." In the meantime France is once again faced with the fact which was Napoleon III's undoing; namely, that it does not seem possible for a German to attain political greatness except, like Bismarck, "by brutally destroying the European spirit."

JAMES ORRICK

Long-Range Planning

FOUNDATIONS OF AMERICAN POPULATION POLICY. By Frank Lorimer, Ellen Winston, and Louise K. Kiser. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

FEW persons realize the extent to which America's population is failing to reproduce itself. The continued increase in population in the past decade has blinded most of us to the fact that we are already well along in the spiral of declining population. In 1935 the reproduction rate of the white families was only 96 per cent of that necessary to maintain a stationary population. For Negroes it was slightly lower. The actual peak in population will be reached some time between 1955 and 1980, and by that time the change in age distribution will be such that a resumption in population growth would be unlikely even if the birth rate should suddenly rise. It is estimated that there will be eight million fewer persons under twenty years of age in 1980 than there were in 1930 and, at the same time, some fifteen million more of sixty-five years and over.

To a greater extent than most recent books on population, this brief, popularly written work deals with the social and economic consequences of current population shifts. The unemployment problem, it points out, has been intensified by the disproportionate number in the population who are now at the productive ages. Between 1870 and 1930 the total population doubled in size, but the labor supply tripled. In recent years an abnormally large proportion of the population has been coming of age each year; hence the so-called youth problem. The fact that large families are prevalent chiefly among unskilled workers and in agricultural regions where inadequate educational opportunities exist makes the absorption of these young people especially difficult in a highly mechanized society.

The authors are quite aware that what ordinarily is referred to as a "population problem" is really an economic problem. Given reasonable assurance of security, the birth rate would probably rise enough to check the decline in population. Given a more widespread distribution of wealth, we should no longer be plagued with concern lest the least fit and least trained swamp those who are well trained and of good stock. To meet the situation the authors present a fairly comprehensive program of reform. They point out that new means of facilitating investment and stimulating economic enterprise will be required, together with an increase in the general levels of consumption and a more rational coordination of economic activity through planning on a national scale. Such planning should place special emphasis on a more equitable distribution of economic opportunity in relation to the distribution of the population. Sound population trends, the authors maintain, are likely to appear only if society is motivated by social and cooperative ideals.

The book is a valuable contribution to the necessary integration of the social sciences and deserves wide reading.

MAXWELL S. STEWART

The Life of Father DeSmet

FATHER DESMET: PIONEER PRIEST OF THE ROCKIES. By Helene Magaret. Farrar and Rinehart. $3.

MISS MAGARET tells the story of a Belgian priest, Pierre Jean DeSmet, who first came to America as a young man of twenty in 1821 and who for more than fifty years thereafter was benevolently active among the Indians of the West. Father DeSmet's special ambition was to found peaceful and "uncivilized" agrarian communities of Christian Indians, along the lines of an earlier community, of brief existence, in Paraguay. He won a few temporary successes through the exercise of unusual tact and determination, but the times were dead against him, and in the end he saw his best hopes baffled: the tribes were everywhere outwitted, corrupted, and destroyed by the whites who flooded the West.

The general literary virtues of Miss Magaret's book, if they are not deeper than wells or wider than church doors, are enough and will serve. Accounts of events and scenes are rich in concrete detail, judiciously planted, and communicated without pretense or undue histrionics. Occasionally a stylistic absurdity is encountered ("Father DeSmet was usually awakened in the morning by the inaudible movements" of his servant), and occasionally we meet the blunderbuss cliché ("appalling misery," "the horror" of the scene), but on the whole the writing is solid and good. The character of Father DeSmet is conceived, no doubt, in a spirit of not too critical piety and within a limited range of analysis and understanding, but the conception, so far as it goes, is sincere and free from Y. M. C. A. catchwords and moralizings.

Yet when one has granted "Father DeSmet" its really considerable degree of dramatic and compositional excellence, one has not said all, for the book is, I think, guilty of a certain basic ambiguity of structure. What has Miss Magaret written, a biography or a novel? Superficially, in its technique, the book conforms to the ordinary canons of the modern novel. We are shown characters, major and minor, who are engaged in working out their destinies in collaboration with each other and their physical circumstances, and the author assumes her ability to tell us anything about these characters we ought to know, including both details of behavior and significant subjective occurrences that are not verbally communicated by the characters themselves. Yet Miss Magaret's manner of writing, coupled with the fact of her protagonist's historical existence, surely implies that we are to accept her material at the level of biography as well as of drama. Unfortunately, it is impossible to separate the biographical elements from the fictional, for the author's fictive additions, though one suspects that they are all-pervasive, cannot be systematically identified; and the extra-textual documentation is remarkably slight. Miss Magaret has made her book interesting and dramatic, but she has also left her audience somewhat in the dark. Caveat paedagogus, we may imagine her saying with a subtle smile.

E. S. FORGOTSON

Middle Class and Democracy

THE MIDDLE CLASSES IN AMERICAN POLITICS. By Arthur N. Holcombe. Harvard University Press. $2.50.

THE relation of the middle class to democracy and social change becomes constantly more significant and crucial. Yet the subject is curiously neglected, save for appeals to prejudice and passion. In this sober, thoughtful study Dr. Holcombe develops the thesis that the rural middle class was formerly "on the whole the dominant factor in national politics," that the urban middle classes are now the dominant factor, and that these classes are the foundation of democracy. The study offers many suggestive analyses and ideas; it throws considerable light on the influence of the middle class in American history, especially on how a small minority of middle-class delegates to the Constitutional Convention was able to get democratic provisions, and on the class nature of the sectional struggles from Jefferson and Jackson to the Civil War.

Yet the net result is disappointing because of serious shortcomings in Dr. Holcombe's historical analyses and approach. He tends to neglect the urban middle class of small independent enterprisers and the workers, overlooks the popular alliance between them and the farmers that was the strength of Jacksonianism and populism, and ignores altogether the part played by labor unions in broadening and deepening American democracy. Nor is it made clear that the old middle class was bound up with small-scale competitive capitalism; that its ideal was an economic democracy of small independent enterprisers—80 per cent of the American people in Jackson's day—who owned their own means of livelihood; and that the ideal, despite the middle-class "political dominance" that Dr. Holcombe stresses, was destroyed by the onswamp of industrial and monopoly capitalism that converted the majority of the American people into property-less dependents on the property of a small minority.

The economic basis of the old middle-class democracy was the identification of its functional interests and dominance with the relations of liberal competitive capitalism. Now that those relations are gone, or going fast, what is the economic basis of urban middle-class democracy? Dr. Holcombe does not say. Instead he emphasizes numbers and attitudes. Thus he cites a Fortune survey which shows that 80 per cent of the American people think they are middle class—as if, important as it is, what a man thinks of himself tells the whole story. By means of additions and subtractions Dr. Holcombe makes the middle classes greatly outnumber the proletariat—as if that weren't precisely what orthodox Marxists, whom he criticizes, do when they add and subtract to make nearly everybody a proletarian. (You can no more dispose of workers by calling them middle class than you can dispose of middle-class groups by calling them proletarian.) And just as Marxists speak of the "proletarian state," Dr. Holcombe speaks of the "middle-class state"; just as they ascribe a "historical mission" to the proletariat, he says it is "the mission of the middle classes to maintain freedom and justice." Dr. Holcombe makes a good "middle-class Marxist"!

Now that sort of thing is dangerous. It substitutes abstractions, into which one can pump different meanings, for the concrete analysis of functional relations and interests. The middle classes are significant for democracy and social change because they include, in the new middle class, the technical, managerial, and administrative employees who direct the activity of capitalist economic collectivism and who come to functional dominance as capitalism is transformed into a new order. It is not enough to say, as Dr. Holcombe does, that capitalist development has transferred "political dominance" from the rural middle class to the urban middle class. We must understand the relation of the new middle class to three major institutional pressures of economic collectivism and social change. These are:

1. Corporate industry, in which ownership is separated from management and management becomes a collective function of technical, managerial, and administrative bureaus, authorities, and commissions and their employees, increasingly uncontrollable by the millions of absentee "capitalist" stockholders.

2. The labor unions, which through collective bargaining (and politics) are constantly limiting capitalist rights in industry, and which develop managerial and administrative groups of their own.

3. The state, which is multiplying its economic functions and power, and which increasingly performs, through its collective technical, managerial, and administrative employees, the tasks of organization and management of industry formerly performed by capitalists.

These three forces are transforming capitalism. The transformation brings the new middle class of technical, managerial, and administrative employees to functional dominance as the capitalists are wholly or partly dispossessed under one set of conditions or another. Dr. Holcombe casually refers to the new middle class merely as "the more responsible and better-paid employees of capitalist enterprises," describes the enlarging powers of government in purely political terms, and altogether forgets the labor unions. Yet the whole problem of democracy and social change is the relation of those three forces to one another: whether they can combine in a democratic manner to let the new middle class come to functional dominance under conditions of democratic collectivism. It is within this framework that Dr. Holcombe's illuminating emphasis on the "political interpretation of history"—the influence of political ideas on institutions—becomes suggestive for program and action.

If the three forces that are transforming capitalism combine in one all-inclusive centralized power, we shall have the totalitarianism of the communist or fascist corporate state. If government usurps all power over industrial management and labor unions, totalitarianism is inevitable. Communism and fascism do not abolish unions, but deprive them of freedom and transform them into totalitarian institutions with a new type of "labor leader" to "manage" them for the corporate state. Middle-class elements who feel it is a good thing for government to control unions should remember that unfree unions are a mainstay of totalitarianism.

But the institutional forces of capitalist transformation need not combine in a totalitarian manner. They can combine in a democratic balance in which management, labor unions, and state have definite but limited rights and powers, and check one another in a constitutional economic setup. Dr. Holcombe is right: "collectivism presents possibilities for [democratic] economic and political forms," and the "independent influence of political ideas" allows us to choose and shape such forms. But under what conditions? Not if there is a middle-class struggle for "ascendancy." The proletariat swung to communism against the middle classes in Russia and got totalitarianism; the middle classes swung to fascism against the proletariat in Italy and Germany and got totalitarianism too. Capitalists are dispossessed or suppressed in the corporate state, the middle classes are ascendant: where is their "mission," in Dr. Holcombe's words, "to maintain freedom and justice"? Middle class and proletariat need each other; they can implement greater democracy and freedom if they recognize each other's functional interests and rights, and cooperate to build a new order. We must revive the people's alliance of middle class, workers, and farmers that shaped American democracy in the past, to shape a new democratic collectivism. The workers and free unions can be depended upon to struggle for democracy, for democracy gives them the chance to get freedom and justice. Can we depend upon the new middle class? Yes, if social change is not the expression of brute mechanical pressures, if there is awareness—itself a social force—of the conditions that bring the new middle class to functional dominance, if it is recognized that totalitarianism enslaves the middle classes too. While there are authoritarian elements in those classes, there is no inescapable connection between totalitarianism and the functional dominance of technicians, managers, and administrators. The destructive irrational ideology of totalitarianism distorts the constructive functional characteristics of the new middle class—the urge for economic efficiency and plenty, the instinct of workmanship evident in our technological marvels and in the new art of industrial design, the rational scientific approach, service in the performance of functional tasks. These characteristics can flourish only in a world of democracy, freedom, and peace.

DRAMA

IN "FLIGHT TO THE WEST" (Guild Theater) Elmer Rice has gathered together a group of contemporary characters, put them on a transatlantic plane bound from Lisbon to New York, and given them their heads, or rather their hearts. There is an American girl, daughter of a consul, who has just married a young American and is looking forward to settling down to a normal life after years of wandering among the wars from China to Europe. Her husband happens to be a Jew. There are an old friend of the two, a writer who is trying to make order in his own mind, a Nazi representative accredited to the embassy in Washington, a Russian émigré bound for the University of California, an American newspaper woman, a German refugee, a hysterical Belgian whose family has twice been shattered by the destruction of the library at Louvain; finally there is the oil man from Texas, who with his single-minded passion to "do business" and his conviction that Hitler has done some good things has come to be a stock character both in and out of books.

In the course of the first act, which is mostly talk, the girl who is trying to run away from Europe recognizes the Russian as a suspicious character she has met under another name in Palestine. The plot has to do with proving, by radiogram, that he is a Nazi spy. The proof is obtained by the newspaper woman; the plane makes a surprise landing at Bermuda, where the spy is turned over to the British authorities, to whom he tells the truth about the Nazi official in time for him to be met by a Department of Justice agent at New York. The rest of the dramatic excitement is provided by the attempt of the woman from Louvain to shoot the Nazi representative and the involuntary gesture of the Jew, Nathan, whereby he saves the life of the Nazi but is himself badly wounded.

Mr. Rice knows how to construct a play, and though this particular flight is somewhat slowed down at the beginning while the various characters define their roles and attitudes, it proceeds swiftly after that to a dénouement satisfactory in terms of the immediate situation. The girl (Betty Field) accepts the fact that a "normal" life is no longer possible and that her husband must take part in the fight; while he has cast out his fear of bringing another Jewish child into the world. The oil man is unregenerated and will probably be seen in many another play in the months to come.

If I seem less stirred than I should be by the slice of life Mr. Rice holds up to view it is because the writing and the thinking never rise above the level of average anti-fascist commentary. And when Mr. Rice reaches for a conclusion, he pulls one out of the air that would be disturbing if one took it literally. The writer, in his last speech, defines the struggle as one between the insane rationality of the Nazis and the healthy irrationality which causes Nathan to prevent the Belgian from killing the Nazi. So far so neat for purposes of epigram; but when he goes on, in effect, to advocate thinking with the feelings one has the unpleasant impression that Mr. Rice, in keeping his hearers suspended in supercharged emotional air for two hours and then landing them on a cloud, is unwittingly indulging in a little demagoguery himself.

The play is well acted throughout by an intelligent cast. The part of the German refugee is performed by a German actress, Frau Clara Rosenthal, who does not seem to be acting at all; the French actress, Lydia St. Clair, who plays the Belgian victim was formerly a star in Paris. Both performances are painfully convincing.

MARGARET MARSHALL

"MY SISTER EILEEN" (Biltmore Theater) is an amusing farce that should have been an even more amusing comedy. The material is all there. Two sisters, fresh from Columbus, Ohio, are high-pressured into renting a Greenwich Village basement "studio" equipped with beds you "wouldn't lie on in a morgue," ventilated by a street window which exposes them by day and by night to the rapt attention of drunks, dead-end kids, and policemen, and decorated by the ice-cream-parlor oils of Mr. Appopolous, the lecherous Greek landlord who steps out of his blue-and-green period long enough to nail the girls for a month's rent "on trial." Ruth is the plain but golden-hearted cynic who draws the sparkling gags, of which there are many, and Eileen is the pretty innocent who, Ruth says, wasn't really "prepared to leave Columbus." Prepared or not, Eileen has drawing power, and the apartment soon becomes a parade ground for all the happy crackpots who fill the stage in plays that bear the touch of George S. Kaufman. Some of these are believable and would have sufficed to give the show a high degree of hilarity without draining it of all plausibility. I gladly swallow the oafish football pro who lives in sin with the girl upstairs, ambles about in running trunks all day, and does the ironing for Ruth and Eileen in return for a few nights' refuge in their kitchenette while his girl's mother is in town. But couldn't Messrs. Fields and Chodorov, who wrote the play, or Mr. Kaufman, who collaborated, or Miss McKenney, on whose stories this gay froth is based, have been satisfied with a few semi-believable specimens of this sort? Did they have to have six Brazilian naval cadets snake-dance in and out of the apartment in pursuit of the fair Eileen? Did they have to drop the third-act curtain on the emerging figure of a subway riveter who has accidentally drilled his way up through the apartment floor? If restraint is lacking in the writing and direction of "My Sister Eileen," the same cannot be said of the performance, which is uniformly good and always on the side of understatement. Particularly enjoyable are Morris Carnovsky's Mr. Appopolous, Gordon Jones's domesticated football player, and the Ruth Sherwood (read McKenney) of Shirley Booth.

ROBERT BENDINER

[Joseph Wood Krutch will resume his regular drama column next week.]

MUSIC

IF "FANTASIA" were being shown in the way anything else of Disney's is shown—that is, just the sequences of images and music with no verbal introductions in the program or from the screen—one would take it as one takes anything else of Disney's: as something primarily and chiefly for the eye. One takes a Disney film in this way despite its occasional use of music; and one would take "Fantasia" in this way even though the music was by important composers and was used in the film sequences as it is in a ballet. And taking it in this way one would not be too upset when the music was misused.

One would, that is, note that in certain instances—the Chinese Dance and Russian Dance of Tchaikovsky's "Nutcracker" Suite, and Dukas's "L'apprenti sorcier"—the pictorial sequences had the feeling for the quality of the music that is revealed in the "Hand of Fate" pas de deux which Balanchine devised for Chabrier's music in "Cotillon." One would note in other instances the use of music without such feeling for its essential quality, and without regard even for specified programmatic meaning and for organic structure. Disney's Water Ballet may be charming, but Tchaikovsky's music is an Arabian Dance. The first and second movements of Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony have programmatic meaning, but only of a generalized sort—only as much as is embodied in the "pastoral" idiom of the first, the murmuring strings of the second, not Disney's charming pictures of flying horses in the first, nor his monkeyshines of centaurettes in the second; moreover the music establishes an emotional level for any imagery associated with it—a level which some of the centaur-centaurette details fall far below; and finally, with the country indicated by the "pastoral" idiom of the first movement, the emotions aroused by the country are embodied in a purely formal design which is not indicated in the pictures of "Fantasia" and is destroyed even in the music—the exposition of material being used without the development and recapitulation that make out of this material the organic sequence which is the first movement of Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony. One would note the similar inadequacy of the pictures to the content and quality of Stravinsky's "Sacre du printemps," and the fact that the work was not only chopped up but rearranged. One would note that Disney failed equally when he set out to be faithful to large-scale musical content and structure—when for the purely formal design of sounds in combination and motion in Bach's Toccata and Fugue he created a purely formal design of line, mass, and color in motion, a literal sight-for-sound translation (like Massine's of the final passacaglia movement of Brahms's Fourth) which did not even remotely represent the substance and organic development and structural complexity of Bach's music or exert anything remotely comparable with the power of the music's formal eloquence. But in the situation I have assumed, in which "Fantasia" would be offered as something for the eye, these things would not be anything to get upset about, as they are in the actual situation, in which "Fantasia" is offered as a presentation of the music—in the combined form of the sound itself and a pictorial representation of its meaning, quality, structure.

Actually, that is, one is handed a program which opens to a statement by Stokowski that "the beauty and inspiration of music must not be restricted to a privileged few but made available to every man, woman, and child. That is why great music associated with motion pictures is so important, because motion pictures reach millions all over our country and all over the world." This act of Stokowski's, in which he brings to the many what has been jealously withheld from them by the privileged few, was phony even ten years ago when with four one-hour broadcasts spread over months he first brought the beauty and inspiration of music to those who had been hearing Toscanini's two-hour broadcasts with the New York Philharmonic every Sunday. But even if one accepts Stokowski's assumption that the millions who will see "Fantasia" have never heard a broadcast of a symphony or an opera, then it is a matter of great concern that what is offered to them as the first movement of Beethoven's "Pastoral"—to consider only the music itself—is the exposition of material without the development and recapitulation which continue and complete the organic sequence; that they are offered Stravinsky's "Sacre" chopped up and rearranged, its essential quality falsified by things like the perfumed phrasing of the stark opening woodwind passages, the lush sonorities elsewhere; that Bach's Toccata and Fugue, played complete, is falsified by a performance which imparts to it the feverish excitement that Stokowski imparts to any music he conducts, and which makes of it the mere succession of dazzling effects of orchestral virtuosity and sonority that music is for him.

But "Fantasia" does not offer the music by itself; and a couple of pages further one reads that the "movements, situations, colors, and characters which the music painted on the canvas of [the Disney artists'] imaginations" should make the average listener "much less humble about his ability to understand good music." Images of movements, situations, colors and characters are properly the effect of program music; but not any and all such images; and it is a matter of some concern that millions of people should be given the idea that images like Disney's represent understanding of some of the program music in "Fantasia." Moreover, it is questionable whether from music with generalized programmatic significance like the first movement of the "Pastoral" Symphony one should derive anything more specific than the impression of "country" from the "pastoral" idiom, and whether, for the rest, the effect of the movement should not be that of its formal design. Of this formal design, obviously, representational images of characters and situations are not properly the effect; but neither are non-representational images, such as Disney offers with Bach's purely formal Toccata and Fugue. Speaking from the screen Deems Taylor introduces this sequence with the statement that "what you will see . . . is a picture of the various abstract images that might pass through your mind if you sat in a concert hall listening to this music." The fish swims, the woodpecker pecks, and Mr. Taylor—called on to speak about music—exercises his extraordinary capacity for subtly, and in effect treacherously, obfuscatory statement that gives error the appearance of reasonableness and truth themselves. I once cited an example worth recalling now—his statement that Walter Damrosch "never was a Karl Muck, and I don't believe he ever wanted to be one. He seems curiously impatient of ultra-subtle readings of the classics"—which converted the difference between Damrosch and Muck into a difference between simplicity and ultra-subtlety, and Damrosch's inadequacy into a defect in Muck. And in the present instance there are implicit in Taylor's statement, as though they were true, certain ideas that are false: the idea that the images which accompany Bach's Toccata and Fugue—images contrived by long and hard imaginative effort—are the kind that would pass through anyone's mind at a concert, or the ones that did pass through the Disney artists' minds in this casual way; the idea that these images can be taken as the proper effect of Bach's Toccata and Fugue; the idea, in general, that images are the proper effect of such music. It is cause for great concern that millions of people are to be given these ideas about music; and on this point there is more to say, but it will have to wait.

B. H. HAGGIN

Help Defend the Bill of Rights in Oklahoma

BENEFIT PERFORMANCE

Sunday Evening, January 12th

MARC BLITZSTEIN'S

"No for an Answer"

MECCA AUDITORIUM, 55th St.

(Between 6th and 7th Avenues)

Tickets on sale at the International Labor Defense office, 112 East 10th St. If tickets are purchased at Box Office, be sure to ask for I. L. D. tickets. Prices: $3.30; $2.75; $2.20; $1.65; $1.10—get the most expensive you can afford. Every dollar helps.

Next Week in The Nation

Henri Bergson

An Article by Irwin Edman

Letters to the Editors

Fight Fire with Fire

Dear Sirs: There can be few persons who still doubt that the Axis triumvirate is conducting a campaign within the United States to wean us from our democratic ways and make the "new world order" appear like a great new Land of Goshen. No one, except perhaps the Dies committee and the Federal Bureau of Investigation, knows how much money is being spent in the United States to support the Bund, the Communist Party, and all the other "fifth-column" organizations. Here and there we have moved in minor ways to curtail the activities of the most blatant of such groups. We need to do much more. We need to organize a tremendous counter-attack, to fight fire with fire.

We need an army of secret agents, and we need to spread this army across the face of the globe and to equip it with every device of persuasion and salesmanship we know—the radio, newspapers, magazines, books, pictures, advertisements.

We ought, in other words, to institute an overpowering American advertising campaign with just one thing to sell—the American way. The selling message should be just this: This is how America lives. These are the things Americans have. These are the freedoms, these are the opportunities that are every American's birthright. These are the things you can have, in your own country, in your own home, in your own time—if you want them. Compare all these things to what you have. Then choose.

Show the uninformed people of the Old World the real America. Show them the factory worker's new automobile, and tell them the price of gas. Show them the farmer's radio. Show them the bathrooms, the central heating, the endless variety of foods in magnificent plenty. Show them the clothes, the entertainments, the homes, the free schools, the open libraries, the free churches, the uncensored magazines, the uncontrolled newspapers.

Show them the wage scales for workers of every kind. Show them the prices in relation to these wages—the prices for butter, for milk, for sweets, for white bread, for cake, for fresh meat, for fresh vegetables, for fruits.

Show them the telephones, the refrigerators, the washing machines, the electric lights, the farm power plants, the sanitary systems, the highways.

Show them our utter ignorance of fear in writing and saying what we please. Show them the Constitution, the Liberty Bell, Independence Hall. Show them the free and secret ballot. Show them all these things. Then ask them this: which of these do you have and enjoy?

And then, do what every American advertiser does so well—go on, and tell them how they can get these things, in their own country, in their own homes, in their own time. That would be a fifth-column operation the like of which the world has never seen.

Our America is not perfect, to be sure. We should be the first to admit it. But the fact that we can admit it, shout it to the heavens, is undeniable proof of how near we have come to such a perfection in human relations. But now is no time to be apologetic. We have forged a reality of the greatest idea of a free life for man the world has ever had. We are certain of it. Yet we do not do a single thing to give its goodness to the world!

We have been playing a garden hose on a conflagration. What we need, and need now, is a roaring back-fire!

C. P. HOLWAY,

Director of Public Relations,
the Cramer-Krasselt Company
Milwaukee, Wis., December 29

Exemption Can Be Waived

Dear Sirs: A recent ruling by the Illinois administrators of the Selective Service System may be of interest to your readers, especially to the clergymen and lawyers among them. It was called forth by my refusal to register because I could not conscientiously accept the automatic exemption from service which I, as a minister, was granted. After I was arrested and arraigned it was learned that numerous divinity students and young ministers in various parts of the country were restive under their cloaks of immunity. Many who did not choose to take the radical step of refusing to register were yet of one mind with me in believing it morally impossible for them to continue indefinitely to accept a protected status. The exemption clause had been secured by Roman Catholic lobbyists and is consistent with the Roman Catholic conception of the priesthood, but in the opinion of many Protestants it is a direct contradiction of that cardinal principle of the Reformation, the universal priesthood of all believers. Therefore Protestants of various denominations will find relief in the draft administrators' announcement:

The Selective Service System has no desire to force a minister of religion or a theological student to accept automatic deferment by being placed in Class 4-d simply because the Selective Service law entitles them to that deferment. In case any registrant entitled to such specific deferment wishes to waive being classified in Class 4-d, he can accomplish his desire by making an appropriate notation in the "Registrant's Statement Regarding Classification" section, on the middle of page 7 of the questionnaire. . . .

Those who waive this "privilege" will obtain a "right," namely, that of serving as any other citizen in the military program of the government or securing classification as conscientious objectors if conscription and war are contrary to their principles.

If the precedent set by the Illinois board's action and approved by Director Clarence Dykstra is followed in all other states, the government will be spared much futile friction with the Protestant churches, and the churches will be free to practice their understanding of the Christian faith—that God teaches men his will by incarnating himself.

HOWARD SCHOMER

Chicago, December 19

Council of the Emigration

Dear Sirs: A statement published in The Nation of December 14 by J. Alvarez del Vayo, Minister of Foreign Affairs in the Spanish Republic, favoring the formation of a Central Council of the Emigration deserves careful attention. I take the liberty to offer a suggestion that applies to the many American groups and organizations that are dealing with the affairs of the nations that are victims of Hitlerism.

I think collaboration in a central body looking toward the solution of their main problems would add greatly to their effectiveness. All the arguments which Mr. Del Vayo advances in favor of his proposal apply with equal strength to this suggestion. It is true that some of the committees in question may have special nationality problems, but the defeat of the Axis powers is their main objective, and in their effort toward this aim they may well unite.

It is obvious that people in this country would get a much more accurate picture of what is going on if all the groups in this country representing the nationalities oppressed by Hitler—including democratic Germans, Italians, Spaniards, and Chinese—could become more closely associated. How about starting the activities of such a Central Committee with a manifestation on January 30, 1941, the anniversary of Hitler's coming to power?

MARTIN M. FARBER

New York, December 31

Dear Sirs: I am unable to understand what the Central Council of the Emigration proposed by Señor Del Vayo could do at the present time. Even if it were composed only of those men from the different European countries who have a record of struggle and a courageous view of the European situation, it should consist of at least one man for each European country—that is, of at least a dozen members, if we stop at Central and Western Europe. Each one would handle the problems of his own country and would have to accept the solution the others would elaborate for the problems of their own countries. And then what? Who in America can prepare revolt in Europe? Perhaps something might be done for Spain. But what about the countries which are controlled by the Axis?

I think that the first step should be to form as many societies as countries. Each society should work for a given country according to its lights and possibilities. When those societies have been created, a common council might be set up as a clearing house. But if the first basis is lacking, no central council would be of any avail.

G. SALVEMINI

Cambridge, Mass., December 27

On Making America Produce

Dear Sirs: The articles printed in The Nation of December 7 under the title Make America Produce were interesting and provocative. The totalitarian success in getting things done is an effective challenge to capitalist economy which will have to be met, one way or another.

Both Mr. Straus and Mr. Noyes say, in effect, that momentous sacrifices will have to be made. They offer previews of state control and collectivism in the form of superstructures added to our industrial economy. Many people will deny that a vast extension of state control could be worked democratically. Many will doubt the practicability of the regulatory taxation which Mr. Noyes advocates. Taxes, even if related to defense, will continue to be a focal point of resistance. The government might possibly succeed in regimenting industry, but our basic economic problem, the disproportionate distribution of wealth, would remain. It will remain, under our present system, as long as profit continues to be arrived at as percentage over cost. This method of arriving at profit is possibly the fundamental flaw in the capitalist economy. Were we to compute profit as a percentage upon pay rolls, capitalism might be preserved more or less intact. If employment became the basis of profit, production would acquire a new exuberance. Furthermore, capital and labor, at long last, would be yoked together and headed in the same direction.

There are profound reasons why we must review the situation with detachment. We ought to know that money power can and will thwart regulatory taxation. And planning boards, competent or otherwise, would be impossibly burdensome. Also let us not forget that consumer habits resist "freezing." Change in buying habits is "of the essence," and freedom of choice will last as long as democracy survives.

When Mr. Straus says "we" must delegate authority to command production, regulate it, decide from hour to hour what we will do with our goods, by the democratic process, he implies that business interests are something apart from the body politic. Thus he fails to face the real issue, which is: How many of us are pro and how many con?

The "profit motive," as we have known it, "does not," Mr. Straus says, "make men produce enough"; and he predicts that non-production based on bookkeeping reasons, will be ruled out. "We" are to effect this by rationalizing and extending the methods of the New Deal, an accomplishment possible, according to Mr. Straus, "under the fear of war." But is it true that the fear of war will render entrepreneurs amenable, that the "bleatings of business" will subside? Will the war scare override capitalistic interests and make them submissive to state control?

Mr. Straus declares, "There is no good reason why powers held to be necessary in the public interest cannot be democratically conferred, democratically controlled, and, if necessary, democratically revoked." If that is an academic exposition of the powers of democracy we must agree, but to put it to the pragmatic test we are compelled to ask, "By whom?"

EMORY L. KING

Ridgefield Park, N. J., December 26

First Aid to Nazism

Dear Sirs: It occurs to me that your readers might be interested in the following telegram which I have just sent:

Mark O. Prentiss, America First Committee, New York

I have your invitation to cooperate with your America First Committee. I see nothing you can hope to accomplish except to make certain of bringing war to America. You should call yourselves America First Aid to Nazism. I will not cooperate with you. I am for "America the Arsenal of Democracy."

UPTON SINCLAIR

Pasadena, Cal., December 30

CONTRIBUTORS

FREDERICK L. SCHUMAN, Woodrow Wilson professor of government at Williams College, has just published "Night Over Europe: The Diplomacy of Nemesis."

LAWRENCE DENNIS, editor of the Weekly Foreign Letter, is the author of "The Coming American Fascism" and "The Dynamics of War and Revolution."

MAX LERNER, professor of political science at Williams College, is the author of "It Is Later Than You Think" and "Ideas Are Weapons."

C. B. BOUTELL is on the staff of G. P. Putnam's Sons.

ELIOT JANEWAY has written extensively on economic subjects for Harper's, The Nation, and other magazines.

JAMES ORRICK was for many years on the staff of the Oxford University Press.

E. S. FORGOTSON has contributed to the Southern Review and other publications.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 55 Fifth Ave., New York. Price 16 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 152

NEW YORK · SATURDAY · JANUARY 18, 1941

NUMBER 3

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

EDITORIALS

- The President's Plan
- Billions for Defense
- China in Danger
- "Uncensored"
- Mr. Pollitt as Guide

ARTICLES

- From NDAC to OPM by I. F. Stone
- Paris in the Reich
- The Choice for the Americas. II. An All-American Economy by Lewis Corey
- Youth Reorganizes by Robert G. Spivack
- Everybody's Business by Keith Hutchison
- In the Wind
- A Native at Large by Jonathan Daniels

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

- Henri Bergson by Irwin Edman
- Soviet Agent by Franz Hoellering
- Washington as General by W. E. Woodward
- The Conquest of Holland by Bjarne Braatoy
- Man Against Bacteria by Karl Menninger
- In Brief
- Drama: One Kind of Unemployment by Joseph Wood Krutch
- Art: Mané-Katz by Paul Rosenfeld
- Records by B. H. Haggin

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

Editor and Publisher

FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor
ROBERT BENDINER

Washington Editor
I. F. STONE

Literary Editor
MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors

KEITH HUTCHISON MAXWELL S. STEWART

Dramatic Critic

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager and Director of Circulation

HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager

MURIEL C. GRAY

The Shape of Things

CONTINUED GREEK VICTORIES IN ALBANIA, British successes in Africa, and President Roosevelt's strong hand against the dictators appear to have stiffened Bulgaria's spine to resist Nazi demands. In a public address delivered Sunday Premier Philoff reaffirmed his government's determination to keep out of the war, but pledged resistance in case his country was attacked. The possibility that Bulgaria might keep this pledge was considerably strengthened by the promise of a high Turkish official that Turkey would declare war if German troops crossed the Rumanian frontier into Bulgaria. Added significance was given to the Turkish statement by the somewhat unexpected initiation of consultations between the Turkish and British military and air staffs. Not unrelated was the flat denial by Tass, the Soviet news agency, of reports that Germany had requested or obtained consent for the entry of German troops into Bulgaria. Tass also denied that Bulgaria had appealed for assistance against a German attack and had been turned down. Since Turkey could hardly have made its pledge of support to Bulgaria without consultation with Moscow, it may be assumed that the Soviets are continuing to give at least tacit backing to Bulgarian-Turkish resistance.

★

IS THE NEW GERMAN-RUSSIAN COMMERCIAL treaty simply an arrangement for the exchange of goods produced by the two countries, or does it include an agreement by which Russia acts as middleman in order to assist the Nazis in breaking down the British blockade? The second possibility is suggested by several circumstances, including the defiant tone of the Soviet press comments, which suggests that protests are expected. In its negotiations with the Soviets, so far abortive, Britain, we believe, has not sought to prevent the sale of Russian goods to Germany but has wished to check the resale of overseas products imported by the Russian government. Nevertheless, in an apparent effort to conciliate Moscow, it has not interfered with shipments into Vladivostok, although it is known that Germany is receiving a certain amount of material by this route. The new agreement, according to Berlin reports, covers additional purchases of cotton, of which Russia is said to have an increased export surplus. In this case, how are the recent large exports of American cotton to Russia to be explained except as replacements of fiber sold to Germany? We also note that Russia is to supply the Nazis with additional quantities of vegetable oils and that by a curious coincidence large-scale Soviet purchases of similar materials here and in the Philippines have been reported in the past few weeks. Again, in spite of the fact that a bumper harvest is said to have made possible increased sales of grain to Germany, Russian offers to buy large quantities of Argentine grain are rumored. There is reason to suspect, therefore, that Russia is allowing itself to be used by Germany to enlarge the gaps in the British blockade. If this is so, it is hardly possible to blame Downing Street for its alleged intransigence regarding the U. S. S. R.

★

BORDER FIGHTING BETWEEN THAILAND and French Indo-China has gradually intensified until it has taken the form of an undeclared war. Thailand has charged the French with an attempted air attack on Bangkok, and has threatened to retaliate against Saigon, Pnom Penh, and other French cities. Artillery duels and heavy fighting are reported in Cambodia, where Thai troops have crossed the border into French territory. Although Japan is generally recognized to be behind the Thailand demands—and to be the source of Thailand's munitions—Tokyo has so far made no open move to take advantage of the situation. It is probable that Japanese ambitions are directed in about equal measure against both countries. Pressure continues against Indo-China for a naval base in the south which could be used against Singapore or the East Indies. No demands, except of an economic character, have yet been presented to the Thailand government. But the encouragement given to Thailand is reminiscent of the encouragement which Hitler gave to Poland's demands against Czechoslovakia in 1938. If the struggle should develop into protracted conflict, and the belligerents seemed to be about evenly matched, Japan would be in a position to make another bloodless conquest.

★

WE SUSPECT ULTERIOR PURPOSES IN THE NEW drive for a six-day week in defense industries. The truth is that workers in eight defense industries, including machine tools and electrical equipment, are already working from forty-four to fifty-two hours a week. There has been no objection whatever from the unions to working more than forty hours a week provided two conditions are met. One is that the work be really of a kind in which there is a shortage of skilled hands, making longer hours necessary. The other is that overtime be paid. The unions have preferred that employers, instead of paying overtime, hire extra shifts at regular pay where unemployed men are available. This certainly seems sound policy to us. What some employers apparently want is to get rid of overtime pay. It is good in this connection to note the splendid speech made by Wage-Hour Administrator Fleming over an NBC network on January 8, in which he upheld the payment of overtime in reply to a recent speech made by Alfred P. Sloan of General Motors, asking for a longer working day and week. Production Chief Knudsen seems to agree with Colonel Fleming. The latter quoted Knudsen as saying, "What the National Defense Commission wants is more machine hours. Machines if properly cared for can work 168 hours a week. Men can't. I know from my own experience that ten hours a day is too much. The man who works at a machine ten hours a day is good for about eight and one-half hours' normal production."

★

THE PROTECTION AFFORDED WORKERS BY the Wagner Act is extended one crucial step further by Justice Stone's eloquent and persuasive opinion in the Heinz case. Justice McReynolds took no part in the decision, but the court was otherwise unanimously with Justice Stone in holding that an employer who refuses to reduce a collective-bargaining agreement to writing is guilty of violating the act. "A business man who entered into negotiations with another for an agreement having numerous provisions," Justice Stone wrote, "with the reservation that he would not reduce it to writing or sign it could hardly be thought to have bargained in good faith. This is even more true in the case of an employer who, by his refusal to honor with his signature the agreement which he has made with a labor organization, discredits the organization, impairs the bargaining process, and tends to frustrate the aim of the statute to secure industrial peace through collective bargaining." All but one of the Circuit Courts passing on this question have so held in the past, the exception being the Seventh Circuit in the Inland Steel case, a decision given far more publicity by the press than the final one in the Heinz case. The Wagner Act does not require an employer to reach an agreement. It is not a compulsory-arbitration law. But the court now upholds the Labor Board in declaring that where an agreement is reached it must be put in writing and signed.

★

THE AMERICAN RESCUE SHIP MISSION, HIT by a depth bomb last week, is still afloat but listing heavily to port. Founded for the announced purpose of rescuing some 200,000 Spanish Loyalists from internment camps in France, manned by a crew of exemplary citizens including particularly ministers, writers, college professors, and Helen Keller, launched in a blaze of expensive publicity, the mission was ultimately discovered to be operating under the not-very-remote control of Communists and their supporters. This fact by itself would have been interesting rather than important—interesting because it was so elaborately and effectively camouflaged. What disturbed other organizations working for the same ends was the exaggerated, misleading, contradictory claims made by the Rescue Ship organization. When these were fully exposed in an article by Frederick Woltman in the New York World-Telegram, the non-partisan members of the Rescue Ship crew began to scramble hastily over the side. A few, either too devoted or too innocent to desert, remain on board. But the ship, which was little more than a phantom at any time, is not likely to remain afloat much longer. Luckily the fate of the Spaniards in France does not hang on the success of this particular venture. Other organizations are working conscientiously if less spectacularly in their behalf, and their own representatives in the United States and Mexico have been trying desperately to obtain their release from the Vichy authorities and to arrange for their transportation.

★

FRANCO IS TO BE APPEASED EVEN THOUGH vigorous opposition to such a move has sidetracked an official government loan. It has been announced that the American Red Cross, with the full approval of the State Department, will dispatch a shipload of food to Spain late this month. The food is to be bought out of the $50,000,000 which Congress voted to the Red Cross for relief abroad. In line with its general appeasement policy toward Spain, Great Britain has granted permission for the ship, which will also bear condensed milk and vitamin concentrates for French children, to pass the British blockade. Meanwhile, Argentina is reported to be considering granting a $100,000,000 loan to Franco. This loan would equal in size the much-disputed credit which was not granted by the United States. It would be made possible by the $50,000,000 credit recently granted Argentina from the United States Stabilization Fund. In this case Britain has apparently not only agreed to pass Argentine products but undertaken to aid the clearing arrangements. Franco has not been asked to make any commitment with regard to entry into the war in return for the projected Argentine loan. The United States, it is believed, has demanded such a promise in return for the shipment of food, but since the decision for or against entering the war depends in the end on Hitler, and not on Franco, a promise means rather less than nothing. What the United States should demand as a minimum condition for sending relief is an end of Franco's indiscriminate persecution of Republican sympathizers. We should also insist that he withdraw all objections to the removal of Spanish refugees from unoccupied France to Mexico and other countries in the Western Hemisphere.

The President's Plan

THE people of the United States have set their President a tremendous task. They have asked him to provide aid to Britain on a scale which will enable that country to overcome the terrific odds against it, and they have asked that this end shall be accomplished without our physical involvement in the war. That is an assignment of an unprecedented nature, and if it is to be carried out with any hope of success Mr. Roosevelt must be given authority of an unprecedented kind. He must be enabled to act with speed and secrecy; he must be left free to decide on the quantity and quality of aid indicated by the course of events. If the dikes of European democracy, which are holding back the tide of war from our shores, develop a weakness at any particular spot he must be empowered to send swiftly whatever form of material aid is needed to reinforce that position.

These are the broad purposes of the new bill to "further promote the defense of the United States," and in the light of the world situation we do not think that the additional powers it confers on the President are excessive. But we think that Mr. Roosevelt might have been wiser in his manner of requesting these powers. In preparing the ground for the bill he moved with his usual sureness of touch. He waited until public opinion had matured to the point where he could sum it up with masterly clarity, and in so doing he elevated the whole question of our part in the war to a position above politics. But in the drafting of the bill, and still more in its method of introduction, Mr. Roosevelt seems to have made errors in tactics which reduce the effectiveness of his strategy. In particular, it is difficult to see why he failed to capitalize the non-partisan support he was receiving by omitting Republican Congressional leaders from the prior consultations, especially when Senator Austin, acting minority leader in the upper house, is one of the strongest advocates of aid to Britain.

A second mistake, we believe, was the absence of any time limit in the bill. Since the President is asking for extraordinary powers, which he himself recognizes can only be justified by the intensity of the emergency, a request limited to a definite period would have done much to disarm suspicion. At the end of, say, two years, either the bill will no longer be necessary or events will dictate its renewal. We hope, therefore, that Mr. Roosevelt will bow speedily and gracefully to the widespread demand for a time limit.

Another criticism of the measure which seems to us to carry weight is the failure to make definite provision for keeping Congress informed of the steps taken by the President to implement its purposes. Obviously military necessities may preclude prompt disclosure of some actions taken under the authority of the bill, but it would seem possible to provide for periodic reports to Congress.

In this connection, however, it should be noted that the bill confers general authority only and will have to be supplemented from time to time by appropriations which will afford Congress an opportunity for discussion and the exercise of general supervision. As a matter of tactics, it would have been wise to place more emphasis on this point.

While calling attention to such possibilities for strengthening the bill, we should like to make it clear that most of the attacks on it seem to us fantastic. The power which it will give to the President is intensive rather than extensive, for it is confined to the field of procurement of military supplies. It does not, as some of its wilder opponents aver, enable the President to upset the Constitution, suspend the Bill of Rights, or declare war. Only an irresponsibility literally blind could have led the Chicago Tribune to comment: "This is a bill for the destruction of the American Republic. It is a bill for an unlimited dictatorship with power over the possessions and lives of the American people, with power to make war and alliances for war."

We are sure that both Congress and the people will reject such violent distortions and that the bill will be enacted into law. Its importance is such that it demands full debate, but we hope that attempts to delay its passage by obstructionist tactics will be sternly resisted, for time is still snapping at our heels. The American people, to quote the London Economist, are "running a big enough risk in all conscience to expect the people of Britain to hold out with their own resources all through a year with such a grim augury as 1941. If the British people must not set their expectations any earlier than January 1, 1942, the American people must not set their expectations any later."

Billions for Defense

SEVENTEEN and a half billion dollars is a staggering sum, difficult to deal with mentally, for it is of the same order of magnitude as the distance to the sun or the speed of light. It is well to remember, therefore, that there is economic as well as astronomic relativity, and we can better grasp the significance of the budget total if we consider it as a proportion of that still vaster sum, the national income. By this we mean the whole amount of goods and services available for our consumption in a given period. In the year just closed, national income is estimated to have been approximately $74 billion; for the fiscal year 1941-42 a conservative guess would place it at around $85 billion, and it may easily reach $90 billion.

We see, then, that the $17½ billion which the President proposes to lay out in 1941-42 is equivalent to nearly one-quarter of the national income in 1940 but is only about one-fifth of the national income which we may reasonably expect during the period for which this expenditure is budgeted. Looking at it another way, we can deduct what the government will spend from the total goods and services produced, and we shall find that the amount available for civilian consumption will be greater than it has been in any recent year.

In citing these comparisons we do not intend to belittle the effort which a national expenditure of $17½ billion involves or to imply that a budget of this magnitude is a good thing per se. It is, as the President pointed out in his message, "the reflection of a world at war" and a burden which we accept only because of bitter necessity. Nevertheless, it is a burden which will be more easily handled if we retain a sense of proportion about it. And we may still count our blessings after reflecting on the much heavier load weighing upon other countries. In the current year Britain's war expenditures will amount to at least 60 per cent of the national income, and European neutrals, such as Sweden and Switzerland, are forced to meet, from incomes much reduced by the collapse of their foreign trade, defense bills proportionately much larger than our own.

In the coming year our chief fiscal problem will not be to keep within the limits of the budget but to spend the full sums provided. For a saving on the estimates can only mean, by and large, a lag in the production of the weapons we need for defense. During the second half of 1940 monthly expenditures under the defense program averaged nearly $300 million. According to the President, the first six months of this year should see this average stepped up to nearly $800 million, and the fulfilment of the program for the fiscal year 1941-42 calls for an average monthly outlay of $900 million. To attain these figures an enormous increase in the output of the defense industries will be necessary, and we must remember that they have also huge orders to fill for Britain. Success in this direction can only be achieved by arduous planning to avoid bottlenecks and by the inclusion in the defense program of all idle productive capacity. As President Murray of the C. I. O. and other authorities have been pointing out, there is a tendency to overload the major industrial units while neglecting smaller concerns capable in the aggregate of making a very important contribution to our needs.

The rapidity with which defense output is increased has a very considerable bearing on the extent to which it may be possible to reduce non-defense expenditures. In the budget message Mr. Roosevelt pointed out that nearly half the items in this category were fixed obligations, such as interest and pensions, or were required by legislative commitments. However, items susceptible to administrative action have been cut 15 per cent below last year's estimates. The largest reduction is a 50 per cent decrease in the proposed appropriation for the WPA. Critics have objected that this and other cuts are inadequate, but that is a matter which can hardly be decided until we learn by experience how rapidly defense production can be accelerated and how extensively it sops up unemployment. If during the next fiscal year defense expenditure achieves budget objectives, it is possible that the sums required for WPA will fall below estimates. But if industry lags behind schedule, the provision made for work relief may prove too small.

The President pointed out that employers could assist in the reduction of WPA costs by hiring unskilled or semi-skilled or older workers for jobs not requiring extensive training. Unfortunately there exists an unjustified prejudice against WPA workers in some quarters. Further, it is a disgraceful but proved fact that certain industrial concerns would rather suffer a shortage of labor than hire colored workers. While this attitude persists, WPA may be the only recourse for numbers of hard-working men who are denied an opportunity to contribute their labor to national defense.

We must expect that during Congressional consideration of appropriations attempts will be made to whittle down other items of social significance in the civil section of the budget. All such efforts must be carefully watched, for there are false prophets of economy in Congress who tend to regard all social expenditure as waste. The total defense of democracy, as the President pointed out, does not depend on weapons of war alone. We need those to defend us from external aggression. But we must also have "jobs, health, and security to strengthen the bulwarks of democracy." Those are the twin objectives which the budget message sets for the nation, and in reaching toward both we must be on our guard against uneconomic economies.

China in Danger

A HIGHLY pessimistic report of political and economic conditions in China is contained in a dispatch from Edgar Snow, one of the best-informed American journalists in the Far East, printed recently by the New York Herald Tribune. It would seem that despite the prospect of increasing aid from the United States China is threatened with defeat, not because of Japan's superior military power, but because of growing internal dissension. This dissension has its roots in the extremely difficult economic situation which has developed in free China. The full cost of three and a half years of war is now making itself felt. Prices have skyrocketed as much as 1,000 per cent since last March. Widespread profiteering and hoarding have intensified the shortages resulting from the war and blockade.

The existing discontent has found expression in a renewed conflict between right-wing elements in the Kuomintang and the Communists. Antagonism between these groups has been smoldering throughout the war. On several occasions it has flamed up in fighting that was close to civil war. But each time an open cleavage has been averted by the personal intercession of Chiang Kai-shek, who has recognized, if some of his subordinates have not, that a divided China could not hope to hold out against Japan. The present difficulties seem to have started in November, when Ho Ying-chin—the Minister of War whose anti-Communist bias nearly cost Chiang Kai-shek his life when the Generalissimo was kidnapped in Sian four years ago—demanded that the Communist Fourth Route Army withdraw from the rich Shanghai-Nanking area which it has recovered from the Japanese during the last three years. The Communists countered by renewing their long-standing demands for legalization of their party, release of Communists imprisoned by the Kuomintang, resumption of ammunition shipments to the Eighth and Fourth Route armies, and the summoning of a national people's conference to institute a more democratic rule in China.

Although details are not available, the most recent reports indicate that the Red Army leaders have given way all along the line. Major Carlson, who has just reached Hongkong after a four-month tour of nine provinces in free China, declares that although the friction between the right-wing elements in the Kuomintang and the Communists has been critical, the crisis has passed. This is disputed by Snow, who fears that the dispute may become intense enough to precipitate civil war in the spring. Unlike the earlier agreements between Chiang Kai-shek and the Communists, the present understanding does not seem to be based on reciprocity. The Communists, with some cause, feel that they have been unjustly treated, while right-wing elements are little better satisfied. The issues which divide the groups are basic and cannot be resolved in the midst of a life-and-death struggle with Japan. But it is clear that whatever happens unity must be maintained. By taking definite steps to extend political democracy within China, Chiang would provide a safety valve for all forms of domestic discontent. The right-wing leaders insist that a people's congress, if called at this time, would not be fully representative, because numerous delegates in Japanese-occupied regions would not be able to reach Chungking in time, thus leaving the field to the Communists. This may be true. But the announcement of definite plans to summon a conference on a more suitable occasion would help remove a serious element of conflict.

Of equal importance, if China is to be saved from defeat, are measures to relieve the acute economic situation. Here responsibility falls primarily upon the United States. Immediate assistance on a large scale—or even news that such aid was on the way—would lessen the discontent and prevent a collapse of Chinese resistance.

'Uncensored'

AT REGULAR intervals we wonder if there is anyone in the world quite so naive as a "hard-boiled" reporter. This time the wonder is aroused by an article in the Saturday Evening Post by Demaree Bess, who has been touring the "new Europe" with the permission of the German authorities and with their assurance that while his articles would be scrutinized to see that they did not "inadvertently" contain military information they would not be censored in any other way. Mr. Bess's first article contains the results of what he calls his "exploration" of Norway. The first third is devoted to a cozy description of how he obtained the cooperation of the Nazis for his venture and persuaded them that he should be allowed to send uncensored reports to the American public; then he introduces Major Vidkun Quisling and his police chief, Jonas Lie, and outlines at length their view that Germany is sure to win and that their careers as Nazi puppets will be justified by history.

In the course of his article he states that the majority of Norwegians do not support the Nazis' tools—"Quisling himself told me so"; and toward the end he says that Norway is experiencing a form of civil warfare. But he seems to accept the word of Lie and Quisling that no violence occurred in September when Norway was incorporated into the "new order," and he concludes peacefully: "Partly due to the restraining presence of the German army, partly as a result of the calm Norwegian temperament, this civil war has proceeded thus far with little violence. . . . Norway waits today . . . for others to settle its destiny."

The Post is sure of Mr. Bess's integrity but obviously skeptical of his picture. It points out that reports of sabotage and bombings anywhere in German-conquered territory presumably would be regarded as military information, and it cites the reports coming out of Stockholm, which, to say the least, do not substantiate Mr. Bess's view. These Stockholm reports are mostly hearsay, of course, but at least one of them is based on specific documentary evidence. It cites an article by Nils Flom, one of Quisling's henchmen, which appeared recently in Fritt Folk, Quisling's official organ. "Even Norwegian Nazis have a right to exist," writes Flom, and his article is described as one long appeal for help from Oslo in combating the opposition in western Norway, which "completely dominates the situation." This is only one item, but its point is sharp enough to prick Mr. Bess's balloon.

Mr. Bess's integrity may be unassailable, but we are willing to bet that, given his understandable journalistic desire to visit all of "German Europe" and send back "uncensored" articles, we shall now discover that every conquered country, thanks to the "restraining presence" of the German army and the "calm temperament" of its people is waiting, etc.

At regular intervals we wonder if there is anyone in the world quite so smart as the Nazis.

Mr. Pollitt as Guide

WHAT do those blind people of the left who find nothing to choose between the tyranny of Germany and the "so-called democracy" of England make of the People's Convention which met in London on January 12? Here in the bombed capital of a country fighting for life 2,200 men and women, under a floodlight of publicity, proposed to overthrow the British government and supplant it with one that would negotiate for peace with the German people. No storm troopers swept down on the convention hall; no delegates were packed into sealed freight cars bound for the pleasures of the concentration camp; no British executioner lopped off the head of Harry Pollitt or of any of his Communist and fellow-traveler colleagues who inspired and operated the convention. In fact, not a single policeman appeared on the scene. The tolerant attitude of the government reflects both the health of British democracy and the relative insignificance of the convention.

Few Britons, we suspect, will be taken in by the convention platform, which calls in effect for a civil war—when the country is on the point of invasion—in order to negotiate a peace with a German people's government that doesn't exist. If the movers of this gathering had the intentions they profess, they would apply their energies to the desperate struggle to overthrow Hitler and then employ their revolutionary strength and tactics to force the people's peace they talk about. They might even take as their guide the excellent statement issued by their own Harry Pollitt on September 14, eleven days after the outbreak of war. As general secretary of the Communist Party of Great Britain the Mr. Pollitt who is now a guiding spirit of the People's Convention wrote:

The Communist Party supports the war, believing it to be a just war which should be supported by the whole working class and all friends of democracy in Britain. . . . To stand aside from this conflict, to contribute only revolutionary-sounding phrases while the fascist beasts ride roughshod over Europe, would be a betrayal of everything our forbears have fought to achieve in the course of long years of struggle against capitalism. . . . The British workers are in this war to defeat Hitler, for a German victory would mean that fascism would be imposed on the defeated countries.

Then the new line, based on Russia's pact with the "fascist beasts," came through from Moscow, and in the twinkling of an eye Mr. Pollitt found himself fighting against an "imperialist war."

From NDAC to OPM

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, January 12

THE course of human affairs may not proceed with Euclidean neatness, but the bitter fight being waged here for control of the defense machinery will be better understood if we start with a few simple axioms. War increases the demand for labor and for capital. Capital in war time invariably seeks to use its increased bargaining power with government as a means of reducing labor's newly enhanced power to bargain with capital. Capital tries to prevent labor from "taking advantage of the crisis" while itself fully exploiting the improved bargaining position conferred on capital by the war-time market. The organized cry to outlaw strikes on defense contracts is proof of the one. The ease with which capital last year obtained repeal of profit limitations on defense contracts is proof of the other. For both purposes capital needs control of the defense machinery. Basically it is this which lies behind the alphabet soup reshuffle from NDAC to OPM, and it is this which accounts for the disappointment felt in business circles over the President's refusal to make William S. Knudsen the one-man boss of the new Office for Production Management. The executive order naming Sidney Hillman as Knudsen's associate was the greatest setback the dollar-a-year men have suffered since the election.

In a very real sense the behind-the-scenes fight over the executive order was an extension of the election campaign. The masters of enterprise are not content to cast a ballot once every four years. Their failure to instal a Willkie in the White House only made them the more eager to instal a Willkie in the defense machinery. They complain that the new OPM order divides authority between Knudsen and Hillman. They wanted to divide authority between Knudsen and Roosevelt. The division of authority between Knudsen and Hillman makes Mr. Roosevelt the final arbiter on defense matters. That is what they resent, and that is what they sought to avoid by a palace cabal. The President's intentions, despite claims to the contrary, were made quite clear in the December 20 press conference, at which he first announced the establishment of the OPM. At that time he decried talk of a one-man boss for production for defense, explaining that there were three elements in the productive picture, management, labor, and the buyer, and that he wanted all three equally represented in the OPM. Knudsen was to represent management, Hillman to represent labor, Stimson and Knox the army and navy as purchasers. Obviously this was quite different from the one-man setup proposed by the conservative press and from the three-man board made up of Knudsen, Stimson, and Knox which was suggested by the army and navy. The drafting of the executive order to carry out the President's instructions was left with Budget Director Harold Smith, White House Administrative Assistant William McReynolds, and Louis Brownlow, coauthor of the President's government-reorganization plan. To attribute what they did to the "extreme vagueness" of the President's instructions, as two conservative newspaper columnists have since done, is feeble apologetics.

What these three gentlemen did was to confer with Knudsen's counsel, Frederick Eaton, and Stettinius's counsel, Blackwell Smith, both Wall Streeters, and emerge with a draft that would have made Knudsen the "director general" of the new Office for Production Management and left Hillman a mere "adviser." Characteristic of the way the dollar-a-year men tend to operate was their failure to consult with Sidney Hillman, who was laid up with the grippe, or with Hillman's devoted counsel, Maxwell Brandwen. Neither side in this fight will do much talking, but so far as I can determine, Brandwen first learned of this order from a story about it in the Wall Street Journal. Stimson and Knox, the story said, were to retain their administrative functions under Knudsen, and these three would comprise the administrative board of the OPM; Hillman would be "relegated to a position of 'adviser' to Knudsen with no administrative authority." Brandwen read this and went to battle.

Harry Hopkins and Attorney General Jackson helped to defeat the dollar-a-year men. I hope revelation of the part he played will not cause trouble for the Attorney General. The day before I learned of the help he had given, I was informed by two persons, both in the government, that the FBI in checking on the household help and landladies of government employees, was asking whether these employees had entertained or consorted with any persons of "communistic" or "pro-labor" views. My informants, neither of whom had any sympathy with the Communist Party, insisted that the phrase "pro-labor" had been used by FBI agents.

The bitter attacks made on Hillman in Congress last week were not accidental. "Let Congress act," the New York Herald Tribune demanded on January 9. "It has the power to direct the organization of the defense program upon a sound and efficient basis—with a single head in supreme control." The dollar-a-year men will seek to do through Congress what they have failed to do in the White House. Their defeat is essential if the United States is to be adequately prepared and to give increased aid to Britain. Knudsen, a man of winning sincerity and simplicity, did not lack authority before and does not lack it now. Legally, the shift from NDAC to OPM has given him more power. Actually he lacked not power but imagination, daring, and will. Spiritually he is still a General Motors employee and cannot be expected effectively to boss men who were his employers before and may be so again. He is neither ■ Baruch nor ■ Beaverbrook, and if he is given supreme power it will be exercised not by him but by shrewder and less honorable men in less conspicuous posts. The effect of giving Knudsen supreme power would be not to speed production but to push labor out of the picture.

The events of the past few weeks have vividly demonstrated the need for labor representation at the top of the defense picture, and not merely as an aid in winning justice for the worker and preserving his morale. Labor through the Reuther plan first brought home the existence of unused man-power and machines in the automotive industry. Labor through the S. W. O. C. was the first to reveal the existence of unused capacity in steel. Experience in the last war showed that there is a tendency on the part of the big companies to monopolize war orders at the expense of productive efficiency. Only labor has an interest in maximum employment and maximum productivity. In the last war it did not matter that many American concerns failed miserably to provide planes and ordnance in sizable quantities, for the factories of the Allies could supply our troops. This time the situation is different, and it is only on labor that we can rely for the discovery of the productive short cuts that may eat into profits but can speed output. Philip Murray is now preparing "Reuther plans" for other industries. Hillman in the past has had a kind of stepchild role. He was not consulted on production. He wasn't shown production contracts and could not see whether army and navy were keeping their pledges to labor, which they are not. Now, if he has the courage and energy, he can have a voice in the productive process. The public is waking up to the fact that labor can provide production leadership.

Paris in the Reich

[For obvious reasons the author of this letter must not be named, but his identity is known to us. He is an American who has lived in Paris for more than twenty years. — EDITORS THE NATION.]

Paris, December 22

SIX months of living under German occupation should allow an observer to give an exact impression of the state of mind of the people of Paris. The feeling of moral annihilation which followed the lightning collapse of France has been succeeded by a new spirit of confidence, which is not unrelated to the strength of British resistance and to the Italian reverses in Greece and Egypt. It should not be assumed that this means that the Parisian carries his sincere dislike of the Germans to the point of heroic opposition to the regime of occupation. But it is evident, at least, that the people know perfectly well what is going on. Even though in the Paris press one sees no other news than that authorized by the Nazi high command, each Greek victory and each success of the British navy is known almost instantaneously here. People do not read the French papers. Long ago they rejected them as boche journals, and it is useless for M. Déat to exercise his mediocre talents in trying to convince his countrymen through the columns of l'Œuvre that the best interest of France is to cooperate in the establishment of a new European order under Hitler. On the other hand, everyone who owns ■ radio uses all his imagination and initiative to subdue the conflicting noises in his machine in order that he may listen quietly to London or Boston. The Boston short-wave station, which broadcasts in French, is immensely popular. Anyone who has lived in India knows from experience how news or rumor travels by word of mouth hundreds of miles with incredible speed. In the same way news of the Italian defeats circulates here, and hatred and contempt for the enemy, which dishonored itself forever with the "stab in the back," contribute to make the Italian disasters in Albania and Libya fully enjoyed as the only sparks of light that illuminate this dark Christmas Eve.

If in the beginning anti-British propaganda, carried out by Goebbels's agents and by the versatile Marcel Déat, showed itself efficient, now the majority of Parisians begin to look upon British resistance as their own battle. With that spirit of grace which never deserts this people even in its blackest hours, a French friend told me, commenting on the attitude of his countrymen toward England: "To be exact, the population can be classified as follows: 38 per cent Anglophile, 42 per cent Anglophobe, and the rest without opinion. The Anglophile says, 'Pray God the English will win!' The Anglophobe says, 'The question is, will those damn English have enough guts to lick Hitler?'"

Since November 11 the Nazi authorities have realized that the occupation of Paris by the armies of the Führer is purely material and that the soul of the French capital will forever escape them. Foreseeing that the commemoration of the Armistice would provide an opportunity to the French people to show their true feelings, Vichy ordered that Armistice Day should be a day like any other. Everybody should go to work. But that evening the people of Paris, instead of going back to their sad homes, started to march, as if following an inner command, to the tomb of the Unknown Soldier. In less than an hour the Champs Elysées was as crowded as on the most exciting July 14. It was a compact and grave crowd, impressive through the dignity of its silence and its sorrow. Nothing could be heard except the tramping feet or the impatient horn of some car carrying Nazi officers. Suddenly in the tight ranks of men and women a daring group of young people, mostly students, pushed through. Each one carried in his hand a long stick such as is used in this country to knock nuts from the trees, a gaulle (gaulle les noix). They thrust the sticks above the heads of the crowd, shouting "Vive De —! Vive De —!" Everyone realized at once that they were crying "Vive De Gaulle!" The police tried to reach them. It was impossible. The people crowded together tighter and tighter. The students were already at the base of the Unknown Soldier's tomb. And now a great chorus cried "Vive De —!" and raised the gaullies in time with their shout. The Gestapo came up in their cars. They shot into the air. It was too late. Paris had already celebrated the Armistice by acclaiming the leader of "Free France" and demonstrating against Hitler.

Minor manifestations of this feeling have taken place in the movie houses. People no longer like to go because they are afraid of the consequences. For instance, one day the Nazi propaganda bureau was showing a film of so-called "British atrocities"—British bombers over German cities. Exclamations of "Bravo!" swept through the crowd. The show was halted, and the people were warned that if such a thing happened again two persons selected at random from every row would be arrested. The lights went out and the show continued—now in a most impressive silence. The silence was absolute—because as soon as the theater became dark the entire crowd had moved out.

This spirit makes more and more difficult the task of the internal traitors. Laval, for instance, is finished. Since he came from Vichy, his car escorted by the personal guard of Abetz—today Hitler's ambassador, previously his leading fifth columnist in France—Laval has been for Paris l'homme des Allemands. By trying to force the situation, to impose Laval on Pétain, Hitler showed how the Italian defeats had shaken his nerve. When Hitler realized that the game was lost in the eastern Mediterranean as a consequence of the Italian defeats, he tried to offset the deterioration of the situation of the Axis powers by planning a new coup against Britain in the western Mediterranean. For that he needed the cooperation of France. Through Laval, Hitler tried to induce Vichy to consent to change the present transitory status of an armistice into a peace treaty. France, he suggested, could immediately obtain a peace much better than that which would await it if Hitler should succeed in breaking the British resistance. The price of that peace would be that France should place the rest of its navy at the service of Germany and co-operate from Africa in a general offensive in the western Mediterranean—an offensive which would include the much-announced assault upon Gibraltar through Spain.

It was at this moment that the intervention of Weygand showed itself decisive. All the rumors that circulated about Weygand's turning against Pétain were fantastic wishful thinking. It is far more likely that Weygand cherishes the hope of superseding the old marshal when age finally proves stronger than senile tenacity. Weygand will never rebel against Pétain, and though one cannot foresee the future, he will only à contre-cœur identify himself with De Gaulle, whom he sees as a high military officer who has defied the discipline of the army. Weygand is the man of the armistice. It was he and not Pétain who imposed the armistice. Considering himself responsible for its terms, he does not want a transitory situation to be transformed through a peace treaty into a definitive one. He wants this much less since British resistance and Mussolini's defeats have offered France an outlook which was not before it at the moment it gave up the fight. Weygand does not like the British, but he does not go as far—in his animosity—as the simple-minded and rough Admiral Darlan.

THE PEACE-SEEKER'S PROGRESS

Instead of allowing Laval, who for a time enjoyed the absolute confidence of Pétain, to play the game of the Germans under the cover of Pétain's name, Hitler tossed Laval on the table in one theatrical play—and lost it. Laval's failure has been a warning to the French collaborationists—at-any-price. Gaston Bergery shows himself every day more cautious. Only people like Doriot, who have nothing to lose, remain to be used by Hitler.

In the world of business the Germans are having greater success. If the average Nazi, after admiring the enchanting city from the Eiffel Tower and drinking champagne mixed with beer, is satisfied to buy silk underwear and perfumes for his Gretchen at home, the Nazi bosses have much wider aims. With frantic unanimity they have proceeded to grab the most remunerative Paris businesses. All those stories told by Knickerbocker and others at the beginning of the war about the greed of the Nazis and their foresight in placing their money abroad against the day of shipwreck in Germany have been fully confirmed here. Personal agents of Goebbels, Göring, Ribbentrop, and Ley have assumed the task of exploring the Paris market, acquiring for their bosses the most attractive enterprises. In accomplishing this no violence is used, there is no talk of forcible expropriations. They operate very gently, with white gloves and extraordinary caution, on a strictly commercial basis.

If the shares of a business enterprise are found to be for sale in the Bourse they take full advantage of the rate of exchange fixed by the Nazis, under which they get twenty francs for every Reichsmark. As soon as they have acquired a majority of the shares the business automatically goes to them. In other cases they investigate the financial situation of an enterprise in which they are interested. Since the start of the war the majority of businesses in Paris have suffered from a lack of capital. Well informed about each particular case, Nazi agents present themselves, generously offering money to tide over the period of crisis. In most cases this suggestion is enthusiastically welcomed. The new partner wastes no time. Rapidly he becomes the master. At other times the Nazi agent, carrying in his hand a list of the creditors of an enterprise which is in debt, goes around buying up the notes they hold until he is in a position to appear in the manager's office as the sole creditor with power to foreclose.

French business men who, like some of their fellows in the United States, believed in collaborating with Nazi business men have experienced a bitter disappointment. Amusing in this respect is the case of l'Illustration. Shortly after the armistice was signed, the owners of that well-known publication came back to Paris warmly disposed to work for French-German cooperation and eager at the same time to make good the losses incurred during a year of war. One morning there appeared in the publisher's office, amiable and smiling, a Nazi carrying an impressive dispatch case. "Good morning. I am delighted to work with you. I am the new administrator." Surprise on the part of the publisher; protestations that the main purpose of the review was to imbue its readers with an understanding of the new role which events had thrust upon the Germans in Europe; "Heil Hitler"—and all the rest. More smiles from the visitor, several heel-clickings and bows, and an insistence that he must have an office where he could begin work immediately. His interest in the affairs of the review was touching. A fortnight later he knew the situation and the internal workings of l'Illustration better than "the four Baschet" who had always monopolized the masthead of the paper and were also the owners. On the sixteenth day he called the owners to his office and addressed them thus: "Gentlemen, I don't know how to express my gratitude for your cooperation. L'Illustration is a publication which honors you. You may feel sure that in new hands its artistic standards and its traditions will be preserved. I do not consider myself entitled to abuse your kindness any further. After today your presence here will be unnecessary. From now on I take upon myself the responsibility for conducting the review."

Six months of Nazi occupation have been sufficient to cool the ardor of the partisans of collaboration. Even those ladies in high society who saw in the Germans the men who would save France from the vulgarity of again being seduced by such democratic experiments as the Popular Front now cry out to heaven because their children's British nurses have been put in concentration camps.

For the rest life goes on: there is the unpleasantness of seeing agents of the Gestapo nearly every morning in the halls of the hotel, but there is no serious trouble for those foreigners who can afford to pay six times more for many things than they did in peace time. With money practically anything can be bought in Paris—especially from the Germans themselves. If you are ready to pay forty francs for a piece of soap, which with coffee and sugar has become very rare, you can still get a good specimen from Coty. In the high-priced restaurants, provided certain restrictions in force since the beginning of the war are observed, important officials, war profiteers, and some privileged foreigners—who risk the black bourse and obtain 80 or even 100 francs for the dollar—may still indulge in a meal which recalls the good days of Drouant and La Tour d'Argent. Naturally it is the middle class, the small functionaries, and the workers who suffer the most. In general the Nazis have taken good care that the price of food does not rise too high. Nobody can forecast the situation in the next two months. But today one cannot talk of famine in Paris—any more, at least, than one could talk of famine in Germany in the years of inflation.

General de Gaulle

For several reasons unemployment is practically nonexistent in the occupied zone: first, the large number of French prisoners still held by the Germans; second, the fact that people from rural areas, who in past years were drawn to the big towns, are now going back to work the land. Besides, the Nazi administration forbids a woman to work if her husband has a job. Many jobs which during the war were filled by women have been taken over by men. In addition, one sees daily in the newspapers advertisements inviting professionals, technicians, and other qualified workers to go to work in Germany. The temptation is great for the French. They are paid the same as the German workers, and if this is not much in Germany, their wages translated into francs amount to quite a good sum. The Nazis do not want to risk sabotage in French factories working for the German army. They allow the French to produce in France only separate parts—motors, airplane wings, and the like—and prefer to have everything assembled in Germany under the direct control of the factory police.

I imagine that many fantastic tales have been spread abroad about those Nazi conquests which cannot be ascribed to military genius alone. Evidently, in accordance with the old French tradition of political salons, there are certain ladies who entertain high Nazi officers in their homes. Long before the war the handsome Abetz was a favorite in certain circles. But generally speaking, a woman who is seen with a German is marked. She will soon notice, through the glacial reception accorded her by her friends, how severely she is judged.

The Germans, on the other hand, can count upon the generous collaboration, sometimes more forced than voluntary, of the demi-monde and of the whole underworld of Paris—Lesbians, pederasts, traffickers in morphine and cocaine, whose names have figured in the police records and are today in the famous card-index of the Gestapo. The apostles of the pure race and of the regeneration of youth move as if in their own waters in that Paris which has so strongly attracted foreigners avid of sensation ever since the days when Charles Louis Philippe wrote, with his bitter grace, "Bubu de Montparnasse." And it is not unusual to find on the garter of some of these ladies the emblem of the swastika.

The Choice for the Americas

BY LEWIS COREY

II. An All-American Economy

NO HALFWAY measures piling up costs and arousing discouragement by their futility can bring about the economic cooperation of the Americas. What is needed is a long-range program that is far-reaching enough to transform old trade relations and set in motion new forces for all-American economic unity. But speed is also necessary, quick action to ease the economic crisis of Latin America.

The opinion of Latin Americans in Washington, confirmed by reports of United States correspondents beyond the Caribbean, is that unless this country finds a way to dispose of the most serious Latin American surpluses an economic collapse may be imminent. A collapse may mean fascist uprisings. If these occur they will be a result of the collapse and due only incidentally to "fifth column" activity. The cartel plan of absorbing the surpluses was rightly scrapped; another plan is needed whose costs, not necessarily heavy, must be borne by the United States. Action on the surpluses would be a most effective answer to Nazi machinations.

Latin Americans suggest that many products now stored in their warehouses could be released by barter trade with the United States without hurting regular commerce. No action was taken, however, on the Brazilian government's proposal to the United States Maritime Commission that it provide ships to carry manganese to this country in exchange for coal, of which we have a surplus. An agreement drawn up by a subcommittee of the Inter-American Financial and Advisory Commission and accepted by the United States and fourteen coffee-growing nations has set up quotas in the American and world markets to prevent coffee price wars and to withstand totalitarian pressures. A combination of barter and quotas could be used to increase United States purchases of other Latin American products. According to the National Foreign Trade Council we could import more Argentine meat on a quota basis without harming the home industry, and more flaxseed by reducing one-half the "ridiculously high" tariff; these measures would increase Argentina's exports to this country by $50,000,000 a year. We can and should increase our Latin American imports as much as possible; yet when Nelson Rockefeller, coordinator of commercial and cultural relations with Latin America, proposed to the National Defense Commission that Brazilian diamonds be bought for industrial uses (we now buy from the De Beers African monopoly) and Argentine leather for military shoes, his suggestion, it is reported, was flatly rejected.

ON THE LATIN AMERICAN FRONT

Since surpluses are a many-sided problem they call for action on more than one front. Independently of the United States, the Latin American nations are making a threefold attack that promises substantial results. They are promoting:

1. The exchange of their products among themselves. Only 10 per cent of their foreign trade is now with one another. The chief difficulties, their competitive production and their lack of purchasing power, will take time to overcome, but meanwhile the Latin American nations are making regional agreements to consume more of each other's surpluses of all kinds: to exchange Bolivian oil for the products of Argentina, Paraguay, and Brazil; Peruvian sugar for Chilean nitrates; Brazilian coffee for Argentine wheat and flour; Mexican oil and cement for Chilean nitrates and wines. The agreements mean lower customs barriers, planned regional exchange of goods, regional economic integration. Most interesting is the arrangement between Brazil and Argentina, considered a model for Latin America, by which each agrees to buy $20,000,000 worth of the other's surplus products. Barter agreements make the planned exchange easier. Some of our business men attack the pact as a "conspiracy" because under it Argentina and Brazil will buy from one another goods they now buy in the United States. But such regional trade should be encouraged as part of the larger cooperation of the Americas.

2. Transformation of surplus products into plastics, synthetics, and other industrial goods. The Argentine government now buys surplus corn to store or to burn as fuel, yet corn can be converted into many kinds of industrial goods. Brazil is already turning its surplus coffee into an asset. Research by the H. S. Polin Laboratories of New York reveals that coffee has almost an amazing range of industrial uses as the soy bean and yields a variety of new products not obtainable from other vegetable sources. With machinery built in the United States but through its own initiative and resources Brazil will shortly begin to convert 5,000,000 bags of coffee—1,000,000 bags more than the normal yearly surplus—into a plastic and other industrial materials. The plastic, called caffelite, has either a hard, opaque or a rubbery, translucent form and a variety of colors; it can be used as wallboard, flooring, and insulating material, and for molded objects such as buttons, inkstands, furniture, radio cabinets, and costume jewelry. Caffelite is cheaper than any other plastic in the world and as good as any. In addition to caffelite the coffee bean yields cellulose, furfural, caffeine, and oils. The chemistry of coffee oil is different from that of other vegetable oils, but its uses are similar—for soaps, paints, foods, lacquers, medicines, insecticides, and as a source of vitamin D. The Brazilian output of caffeine can be used to end the shortage and the artificial high price of that substance, since the new caffeine is a cheap by-product of the plastic. In the past nine years Brazil has spent $17,500,000 on the destruction of surplus coffee; destruction of wealth is now replaced by creation of new wealth, while competitive pressure is lifted from the exports of smaller coffee-growing nations. Many other Latin American products besides coffee and corn can be industrially utilized. Mandioca, for example, now grown only for food, yields materials which are used in adhesives, textiles, and paper.

3. Agricultural diversification to reduce surpluses and end the unbalanced production of one or two crops for export. Latin Americans are preparing to grow more of the foodstuffs they now import. They can and should produce the lard, dairy products, flour, potatoes, barley, and hops that they import from the United States. Regional agreements among Latin American nations encourage agricultural diversification by providing definite markets and facilitating the exchange of tropical products for those of the temperate zone. Diversification will not only bring about economic balance but will promote public health by improving the limited diet of the people—it is pitiful to see Latin American peasants produce great crops for export while they eat so little. Diversification will have political effects also, for it will help to create a class of small independent farmers. And by raising rural purchasing power it will speed up industrialization.

WHAT WE CAN DO

Much of the success of Latin American self-help will depend upon United States cooperation. One of the readjustments we must make is to open our markets more fully to Latin American exports. We must buy more to sell more, for the shortage of dollar exchange is increasing. During the first year of the second World War United States exports to Latin America went up 50 per cent, imports from Latin-America only 31 per cent. The disparity is even greater when Argentina is considered by itself. Loans to ease the unfavorable trade balance are no final answer, for they are essentially unproductive. A good beginning would be made if plans now being developed in Washington were carried out and certain Latin American products of which this country has an insufficient supply or which it does not produce at all were admitted duty free. But that is not enough. There should be repeal of such irritating subterfuges as the "sanitary convention" to keep out Argentine meats. Nor should marginal high-cost producers—for example, of sugar or copper—get tariff protection; the capital and sweated labor can be put to better use. True economic cooperation of the Americas is impossible without a tariff system that encourages complementary production and trade.

Another necessary readjustment, supplementary to tariff changes, is for the United States to cease competing with Latin America (and Canada) in the export of agricultural products, especially cotton, wheat, and corn. This would not only strengthen hemisphere cooperation, but respond to our own economic needs and the trend of the times. For years increasing world production has been driving United States agricultural products out of world markets. The costly rout should become an orderly retreat. The agricultural crisis will never be solved by trying to sell surpluses in markets in which they can be sold only at a loss. These surpluses are evidence of economic unbalance, the worst manifestation of which is the disastrous one-crop system in the cotton states. In the United States as in Latin America we need more agricultural diversification, greater consumption of foodstuffs, plants to convert agricultural products into synthetics and plastics—an industrialization of backward agrarian regions that would create greater economic balance and raise standards of living.

Meanwhile, results may be more quickly obtained by the transfer to Latin America of purchases now made in Asia or Africa. These amount to around $500,000,000 yearly, $100,000,000 of which, I am told, could be switched at once. Virtually every agricultural, mineral, and forest product that this country needs but does not produce can be secured from Latin America. Among the agricultural products are flax and wool; nut and vegetable oils; substitute fibers, including carao, which has three times the tensile strength of jute, and kapok, some of which we already import; tapioca, which can be made from a slightly improved quality of mandioca; carnauba wax, for which there are many industrial uses; digitalis, quinine, and other drugs. Among the metals are tungsten, antimony, manganese, platinum, chromite, copper, lead, zinc, vanadium, molybdenum, asbestos, mercury, tin. There is some fear that the Bolivian supply of tin may run out but it is nothing to worry about since our tin requirements are being heavily reduced by the increasing use of plastics and other substitutes, and there are possible new sources of tin in Argentina and also perhaps in Mexico.

The development of these new sources of supply will bring many advantages. It will diversify and balance Latin American production, tighten the economic cooperation and unity of the Americas, and make this hemisphere militarily self-sufficient. It will also offer us the means to break monopoly controls. All the metals and some of the other products are controlled by a handful of corporations operating as international cartels, many of them in Latin America; it will not be easy to break their grip but it can be done. Latin American quinine, which is now being produced in Guatemala, can be used to break the Dutch monopoly, whose prices are eight times higher than necessary for a reasonable profit. Mexican mercury, added as a source of supply to the high-cost California output, can be used to break the Italian-Spanish monopoly. Brazilian industrial diamonds can be substituted for those from British Africa. The United States agreement to buy and smelt Bolivian tin strikes a blow at the Patiño monopoly interests and the international tin cartel.

Government action is needed to develop these new Latin American supplies. The job and the stakes are too big to be left to shortsighted, conflicting corporate interests. The government can assure markets through agreements to buy definite amounts of a product for a definite period; such an agreement has been made by the Metal Reserve Company, a subsidiary of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, which has contracted to buy for five years Bolivian concentrates to yield 18,000 tons of tin yearly. It is important, however, not to develop a product for which there may later be no market, for instance, rubber. It takes seven years for rubber trees to produce, and meanwhile synthetic rubber will be making rapid progress. The National Defense Commission has called upon synthetic rubber factories to speed up production, and their output will soon meet all military needs. Synthetic rubber, moreover, is being produced to sell for 25 cents a pound, only 5 cents more than is paid for natural rubber, and the price will come down as mass production grows. The United States may continue to import rubber as an additional source of supply, but Latin America should grow rubber largely for its own use. The same situation may develop in other natural products.

Those who oppose shifting our raw-material purchases from Asia to Latin America argue that the United States should not give up its economic stake in Asia. But the stake is not large or crucial, and to emphasize its importance is wrong-headed and imperialistic. Of the eleven strategic materials now obtained in Asia nine can be got in Latin America—namely, tungsten, antimony, manganese, chromite, tin, quinine, vegetable oil, sugar, and fiber. The other two, rubber and silk, are being replaced by synthetics; nylon, rayon, and other synthetic substitutes are already used to make parachute cloth.

But if it is desirable to buy our raw materials in Latin America rather than in Asia, overemphasis of this branch of trade must be avoided, for an increase in the production of raw materials without a still greater increase in manufactures would confirm Latin America's status as a backward low-wage region from which high-wage countries get cheap raw materials. Latin Americans themselves understand the need for industrialization, and considerable progress in manufactures has been made in Argentina, Brazil, Chile, and Mexico. The advent of five-and-ten-cent stores in Brazil led to the production of a diversified line of small articles. Much more can be done in the manufacture of lumber products, pharmaceuticals, cotton textiles, leather goods, synthetics, paper, and toys. New plants are opening steadily if slowly. One neglected field—an imperialist neglect—that offers great promise is the smelting of metals which are now exported as ores or concentrates. Why should Latin Americans use metals smelted in the United States or England? They could get copper from Chile, steel from Brazil, which has immense reserves of high-grade iron ore in Minas Geraes, and other metals from other countries.

INDUSTRIAL LOANS WITHOUT STRINGS

The whole program of democratic cooperation centers in industrialization. A Mexican diplomat called my attention to what a representative of his government said at the Havana conference: "The economic development of the Latin American republics can be accelerated by an ample liberal policy of prudently made investments—which of course must not imply the threat of imperialist absorption—that will increase industrial production and buying power." Industrialization loans by the United States are part of the Havana policy. Several such loans have already been made, the most important being the Export-Import Bank loan of $20,000,000 to Brazil—which invested $25,000,000—to build a plant for the production of basic steel products. The Inter-American Development Commission has many industrial projects under consideration. One of these, now moving toward completion, is for a prototype plant in Brazil in which mandioca will be processed to supply material to local adhesive, textile, and paper industries. President Pierson of the Export-Import Bank may have arranged industrialization loans while in South America. Such loans are slated for Argentina, Bolivia, Cuba, Mexico, Peru, and Venezuela. But larger and speedier action is needed.

The United States should lend to Latin American nations, at low interest and for approved industrial projects, around $500,000,000 a year—say, roughly, $3,000,000,000 in five years. Such a capital investment would create an effective foundation for industrialization, stimulate the local production of capital, and move toward greater, more balanced economic development. Plans have been made and approved by eight Latin American nations, including Mexico and Brazil, for an Inter-American Bank with $100,000,000 capital to make industrial and other loans, but prejudices and interests may limit action. There are those who insist that industrial loans should be made only for the production of goods that do not compete with United States exports to Latin America. This is wrong. Our Latin neighbors must be encouraged to produce all the manufactures that they can, regardless of whether these compete with United States goods in their markets. President Pierson of the Export-Import Bank is reported to have refused industrial loans to the Argentine government for oil pipe lines and hydroelectric power because the projects "competed" with United States corporate interests there, but the opposition of utility interests should not stop loans for government power projects in Latin America any more than similar opposition stopped TVA. You read in the newspapers: "Loans to Bolivia and Mexico will be encouraged by a solution of the oil disputes." If Mexico, or Bolivia, or any Latin American nation wants to nationalize the oil industry, or any industry, it should be allowed to do it; nationalization is a necessary part of the program to get industrialization. Interference may disrupt the whole program of economic cooperation and therefore be as much against our interests as against Latin American interests. There must be no strings attached to industrial loans.

An industrial-loan program cannot be carried on by private investment. There is much talk of "a new flow of venture capital from this country southward," but it is the product of a mixture of outworn textbook economics and imperialist appetites. While the Latin Americans want loans they want ownership of the new industrial projects to remain in their hands. They do not want to strengthen foreign imperialist controls but to break them. Moreover, Latin America is unable and unwilling to pay the high profits that alone tempt "venture capital." Nor does it want capital with reactionary objectives, like those of the United States Steel Corporation, which made investment in a Brazilian steel industry conditional on changes in the mining and labor laws. There is room for private investment of capital on a small scale, especially by business men who will live and work in Latin America, but it must be within the framework of government action to supply the great capital needs.

Industrial loans must be made by the United States government to Latin American governments. The totalitarian potential in government enterprise can be overcome by democratic safeguards. In Mexico's experiments with the distribution of power the safeguards are found in the balance of management, labor unions, and the state. Moreover, industrialization will strengthen Latin American democracy by increasing the new middle class of technical, managerial, and administrative employees and calling into being the labor unions whose interests are served by democracy and freedom.

The United States, too, will make gains. Industrial loans to Latin America will not be a burden on the Treasury, since they will be loans made at interest for income-producing projects. The loans will be used to buy industrial equipment in this country and will therefore absorb idle capital and provide new employment. If the very low incomes of 30,000,000 Latin American families are raised on the average $100 a year, their purchasing power will be increased by $3,000,000,000, and much of this will be spent on imports from the United States. Thus, while the nature of our exports will change as Latin Americans manufacture more of their own goods, total exports will mount. As intensive all-American cooperation gets under way, we shall approach a full utilization of productive resources that should mean a national income of $120,000,000,000 within five years (the labor of 9,000,000 unemployed is still being wasted, and only part of it will be absorbed by the defense program).

Hemisphere defense and cooperation are stern necessities that can be shaped into a larger pattern of gain. They mean action to solve our own problems of unused productive capacity and insufficient purchasing power and consumption. They mean struggle against imperialism and fascism, for democracy. A dynamic all-American program to shape a new democratic world is the answer to totalitarianism.

[The first part of this article appeared on January 4.]

Youth Reorganizes

BY ROBERT G. SPIVACK

THE Young Communist League has lost the initiative in the American youth movement for the first time in six years. That is the important result of the four conferences which were held during the Christmas holidays. College students, however, are not turning reactionary. At the conference of the International Student Service on the campus of the New Jersey College for Women some twenty youthful left-wingers, conscious of the importance of combating fascism at home and abroad, banded together to form the Student League for Progressive Action. This outcome of the confusion prevailing among young progressives since the signing of the Nazi-Soviet pact is a tribute to the emotional stability and intelligence of the group. For a mood of frustration and gloom settled on the campuses after the outbreak of war. Many a sensitive adolescent intellectual was heard to remark, "Here we are, not even in the war, and already a lost generation." It looked as if F. Scott Fitzgerald were staging a comeback.

Hopefulness and not defeatism characterizes the students who formed the new organization. Much of their inspiration came from Joseph P. Lash, former secretary of the American Student Union and present general secretary of the International Student Service. But the students from Swarthmore, Harvard, Mount Holyoke, and Smith will work out their own program. Not unlike their elders, most of them want to send full aid to Britain but do not want to fight abroad. They favor completion of the New Deal revolution at home as a means of defending our democracy and as a substitute for Hitler's New Order. They are not doctrinaire, but increased social ownership of vital industries does not scare them.

The formation of the Student League for Progressive Action marks the opening of the "fourth period" in the development of an indigenous youth movement. It all started back in 1905 when Jack London helped to form the Intercollegiate Socialist Society to offset the ineffectiveness of college education, which he once described as the "passionless pursuit of passionless intelligence." American entry into the World War saw the end of that organization. After the Armistice George Pratt and others published the New Student, seeking, from a non-Marxian standpoint, to discover a basis for the better life which would be more enduring than Wilsonian idealism. Flappers, good times, jazz, and gin, plus Harding and Coolidge, put an end to that quest. Intellectual meanderings were translated into "action" eight years ago, when eighty social-science students journeyed to the bloody mine fields of Harlan County, Kentucky. What they saw there aroused their burning indignation. Out of it grew the "revolt on the campus," which was sponsored jointly by the Student League for Industrial Democracy (Socialist) and the National Student League (Communist). In 1935, in the period of left-wing good-feeling, the two merged into the American Student Union. The Communists in that period were the more vigorous, and it was not long before they began to play the leading and often dominant role. The American Youth Congress, formed simultaneously among non-student youth by Viola Ilma, was also captured by aggressive young radicals.

The Student Union and the Youth Congress were able to exert considerable influence and to obtain some needed youth legislation despite their small numbers. At its peak the A. S. U. could claim 15,000 members. Included in the A. Y. C. were sixty-two organizations which cooperated on specific measures; the Boy Scouts and Catholic youth groups remained outside. By 1938 Mrs. Roosevelt and many other prominent New Dealers saw in the World Youth Congress meeting at Vassar College an important movement to be encouraged. By 1938 Gene Tunney recognized it as a "menace" and sponsored a curious conglomeration of Coughlinites and Jewish Young Republicans who made an attempt to break it up.

Then came the Soviet-German pact. The reaction of American youth revealed that the leaders of the Young Communist League had taught others a great deal more about the menace of fascism and the qualities of democracy than they had learned themselves. Not only did young friends part company in shock and bewilderment but the organizations rapidly began to disintegrate. The A. S. U. membership dropped to less than 2,000. The Youth Congress lost the respect of two-thirds of its collaborators; the recent withdrawal of the middle-of-the-road National Student Federation was the latest blow.

Despite the important gains for youth embodied in the CCC and NYA, only one national youth group supported the President actively during the campaign. This was Joseph P. Lash's youth division of the National Committee of Independent Voters. It was organized so late, however, that many youthful New Dealers found no vehicle for expressing themselves. The possibility of a Willkie victory worried them and spurred their desire for organization. Without any national leadership local movements sprang up in Kansas, Illinois, and Massachusetts. New Yorkers joined belatedly.

Although the picture is still incomplete, the position of youth is becoming clear. The trend is decidedly away from nationalism. There is a growing realization that wherever democrats are fighting against fascism they must be supported. With greater maturity than some of their elders large numbers of young people are veering away from the perfectionist school of social philosophy. In democracy they see the opportunity, as Archibald MacLeish put it last fall, to keep the future open.

In the developing movement there are many shades of opinion, but all have a progressive emphasis. At Kansas State College two students have formed "Democracy's Volunteers." Thoroughly unsophisticated, they display a native militancy by calling their chapters, of which there are now six, "battalions." They advocate government-supported work camps. At Harvard, where the Student Union found itself practically immobilized by divisions on foreign policy, certain members have formed their own Liberal Union. The Swarthmore Student Union has decided to withdraw from the national body and be independent. The Harvard and Swarthmore groups form the nucleus of the new Student League for Progressive Action.

Concentrating exclusively on foreign policy, twenty college chapters of the Committee to Defend America by Aiding the Allies are functioning under leadership considerably to the left of William Allen White. Working closely with them is another Cambridge group known as the Harvard Student Defense League. Their four-page journal, Defense, recently set forth the credo of the new movement in an editorial called A Cure for Cynics. It read in part:

In colleges all over America cynics come a dime a carload. . . . They have put a price tag on every ideal, they have refused to believe that men could see beyond their own stomachs; they have doubted everybody's sincerity including their own. . . .

The fascists want us to believe that this war is not our war. They want us to believe that democracy is a myth. . . . The cynics are doing these jobs for them, doing it as surely as if they were paid propagandists of Berlin. Many of these cynics were once liberals. They must find it a little strange when their sentiments are echoed in both the Daily Worker and the Saturday Evening Post. . . .

Four student groups met during the holidays to work out plans for the coming year. The American Student Union met in New York, partly because its membership is concentrated there, and partly because it is unwelcome on most campuses. The Youth Committee Against War held its sessions at Madison, Wisconsin. The International Student Service met in the second of a series of conferences on "How Students Can Serve Democracy" at the New Jersey College for Women. The National Student Federation convened on the same campus to discuss student self-government.

The A. S. U. convention was able to attract 350 delegates largely because reactionary college authorities, plus the Dies committee and the Rapp-Coudert committee, insist on persecuting young people who stand by their convictions. Roosevelt, of course, was assailed as a greater menace to America than Hitler, and a good case of anti-war hysterics was enjoyed by all. The "tory" New Deal government was urged to form an alliance with the Soviet Union and China! The discussion of civil liberties illustrates clearly why the A. S. U. has lost so much influence. The whole question was considered only in terms of the rights of members; no mention was made of the attempts of the New York University chapter to prevent recognition on that campus of the Committee to Defend America by Aiding the Allies.

The Youth Committee Against War is largely made up of pacifists and Socialists. Communists, Nazis, fascists, and Trotskyists are barred from attending its conferences. Through the years the interplay of pacifist sentiment and socialist theory has led to an almost undiluted pacifist approach. Its program does not mention socialism. Agitation for repeal of the conscription act and defense of conscientious objectors are major activities. Its analysis of the present war strongly resembles that of the A. S. U. except in one important respect—the Y. C. A. W. considers the Soviet Union an imperialist power. To garner isolationist sentiment on the campus it is forming a Progressive Student League.

Among important current developments in the youth movement is the decision of the executive board of the International Student Service to extend its action. The board consists of young people and adults—students from Eastern schools and such prominent liberals as

Mrs. Henry Goddard Leach, Mrs. Eliot Pratt, Dr. Alfred E. Cohn, and Professor Walter Kotschnig. It is headed by Dr. Alvin Johnson. In the last two years the I. S. S. has helped nearly 300 student refugees. It expects to organize six work camps next summer and is planning to publish a magazine along the lines of Randolph Bourne's Seven Arts. Its main purpose is to "train student leaders for democracy."

The I. S. S. has already incurred the intense hostility of the Young Communist League, which has launched bitter personal assaults upon Joseph Lash, Mrs. Roosevelt, and others of its leaders, and charged it with sponsoring "Hitler-like forced labor camps." The Communists attempted to pack the recent conference with 175 delegates, but the move was thwarted. The conference agreed upon trade unionism, opposition to the award of government contracts to labor-law violators, defense of the civil rights of Negroes, and the necessity for democratizing the army.

The National Student Federation is the most conservative of the various student groups, although its leadership for several years has been liberal. Because a majority of the convention opposed the Youth Congress attacks on the Administration it decided by a vote of three to one to withdraw from that organization. The delegates did not have time to digest the proposal of their leaders for affiliation with the I. S. S. and defeated it by a small majority. It is expected, however, that there will be close collaboration between the two groups.

The next few months will see important developments outside the student field. The Youth Congress is holding its annual meeting in Washington in February. A group of young professionals, generally New Deal in sympathy, have formed an educational group known as the Committee of Thirty Million, which may assume functions the A. Y. C. once tried to perform. A recent issue of Clarity, organ of the Young Communist League, carried the suggestion that a working-class youth organization, apparently broader than the league, be formed as the backbone of the Youth Congress. When sounded on this question several young labor leaders (C. I. O.) said they would have nothing to do with it.

Trends of thought and action among progressive young people are in many respects analogous to recent developments in the labor movement. Even though Communist influence is waning, many are coming to realize that the defeat of fascism cannot be accomplished by defense of the status quo. More than 60 per cent of America's first voters supported Mr. Roosevelt because they felt that the war to achieve democracy had only begun. But they eye suspiciously efforts to placate big business and the award of defense contracts to Ford. To the generation now coming of age defense of democracy is a serious business. "Appeasement" is not in their vocabulary.

Everybody's Business

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

The Case Against Tax-Exempts

IN A session which must inevitably be largely devoted to the unpleasant business of raising the wind for defense, few thornier issues are likely to be presented to Congress than the Treasury proposal to abolish tax-exempt bonds. This is a question cutting clean across political lines and reviving the perennial controversy over states' rights in its most acute form—the control of the public purse. The suppression of the privilege of tax exemption on government bonds, whether federal, state, or municipal, has been advocated not only by President Roosevelt but by his three Republican predecessors. It is supported by Old Dealers and New Dealers, by liberal economists and Wall Street bankers. It is opposed by innumerable state and city officials of all political shades, including two such dissimilar figures as Mayor LaGuardia of New York and Governor Bricker of Ohio.

Recently a new drive on the problem of tax-exempts has been started by the Treasury with some of the steam generated by the defense program. This, perhaps, is partly a matter of tactics, for in the near future the ending of tax exemption might produce less in revenue than it would cost in the shape of higher interest rates. Nevertheless, the huge prospective addition to the national debt does make more imperative the closing of this tempting gap in the fiscal system.

It is hardly necessary to argue that the tax-exempt bond is an anomaly in a country which has adopted the principle of progressive taxation. When income tax is levied on the basis of ability to pay, with rates increasing as income rises, it is absurd to provide the wealthy with an avenue of escape from their fair share of the national burden. Yet by investing all their capital in government securities millionaires can shut their doors on the tax collector; or, by a carefully calculated distribution of principal between tax-free and taxable securities, they can reduce their contributions to the revenue far below the amount payable were their full incomes subject to tax. Witness an example quoted in the New York World-Telegram of December 30, 1940:

Taxpayer A is a resident of New York State, and his income from his business last year was $224,441. Also he received $880,408 in interest from wholly tax-exempt bonds. This would give him a net income of $1,104,849. On the $224,441 he would pay, according to 1940 rates, a New York State income tax of $17,441. Then he would pay a federal income tax of $116,586. However, if that $880,408 in interest from government bonds had not been tax free, this same taxpayer A would have had to pay federal and state income taxes totaling $818,386—$87,874 to New York State, $730,712 to the federal Treasury.

Tax-exempt bonds not only offer an unfair advantage to the man in the upper brackets, but they are positively disadvantageous to the man whose income is too small to be subject to income tax. If the latter has a few hundred dollars saved he probably wants to invest in government bonds, since these provide him with the maximum of security. To him the tax-exempt feature is useless, but its existence means he must compete in buying his bonds with men to whom tax exemption is worth a large premium. In other words, the small man obtains a lower return from his investment than he would if there were no tax exemption.

Another bad feature of tax exemption, when combined with a progressive income tax, is that it encourages the wealthy to become government rentiers, and either restrains them from investing in industry altogether or forces them to insist on an unusually high rate of profit. John W. Hanes, a Wall Street man and former Under Secretary of the Treasury, has pointed out that a person with a private income of $1,000,000 would need to obtain a yield of 12.5 per cent from private investments in order to make as much money, after paying taxes, as he would gain by buying 3 per cent tax-exempt securities. The wealthier a man is the more a tax-exempt bond is worth to him, and the greater is the inducement to him to divest himself of his full share of the national burden. To an individual with a surtax net income of $4,000 to $6,000 a tax-free 3 per cent bond is equivalent to a taxable bond yielding 3.26. When the income is between $18,000 and $20,000 the equivalent income is 4 per cent, and for an income between $300,000 and $400,000 it is no less than 10 per cent.

That, very briefly, is the case for the abolition of tax-exempts, but it must be recognized that there is also a case against it arising from the fact that such securities are issued not only by the federal government but by states, cities, and other public authorities. The right to issue tax-free bonds means that these authorities are able to borrow for public purposes at lower rates than would otherwise be possible. If this privilege is taken away from them they will have to provide more money in their budgets for interest, and real-estate and other local taxes may have to be increased. The federal government would also have to pay higher interest rates, but as existing issues of tax-exempts were refunded, it would be compensated by taxation of the income not only of its own securities but of those of the cities and states. New York and other states levying income taxes would receive likewise an offset inasmuch as they could collect on income derived from federal securities. But there are fourteen states without income tax, and this means of raising revenue is not open at all to cities and smaller subdivisions of government.

The Treasury, it is believed, will shortly ask Congress to place a ban on all new issues of tax-exempts, but in view of the intense opposition it is doubtful if the necessary legislation can be passed. In this event, the Treasury is likely to seek authority to make all its own obligations subject to all federal taxes and to bargain with the states for authority to tax interest on their securities on a reciprocal basis. It would seem, however, that in order to persuade the cities to come to terms some additional quid pro quo would have to be offered. One solution might be to give municipal authorities the power to levy real-estate taxes on federal property. Growing national intervention in economic affairs, in itself a necessary and inevitable development, involves an expansion in federal real-estate holdings. In the use of such property the government benefits from the various local amenities, but it does not contribute to their cost through taxation, and consequently when property passes from private to public hands the burden on the remaining local taxpayers increases. In communities where government holdings form a substantial share of the whole, this may mean real hardship. Hence there seems to be a case for a deal by which the federal government surrenders its privileges as an untaxed landowner in return for the abandonment by the municipalities of their right to issue tax-exempt bonds.

In the Wind

RECENT WHITE HOUSE visitors say that the President's decision to send Harry Hopkins to London was an implicit reply to the Halifax appointment. The President couldn't do anything about London's choice but wanted to make it clear that he was in no appeasement mood; so he chose a pure New Dealer.

FBI METHODS are arousing growing resentment among isolationists without the faintest fifth-column sympathies. Dr. W. Marion Jeschke, pastor of St. Luke's Evangelical and Reformed Church in Buffalo and chairman of the local branch of the American Peace Mobilization, has protested that an FBI agent visited him to tell him he was tied in with a "Communist front."

ALTHOUGH THE Ford Motor Company is trying not to air the fact, Ford sales, as indicated by registration figures, are continuing to drop. While the drop isn't precipitous, the curve is steadily downward. C. I. O. leaders think that this may help them to win the organizing drive.

BIGWIGS of the "March of Time" are jittery over the new release on Labor and Defense. While it professes impartiality, it ends with a speech by Gene Cox denouncing strikes in defense industries, and labor groups are reported to be getting ready to blast it.

AS A RESULT of repeated exposure of his right-wing ties, Merwin K. Hart is facing a minor revolt among members of his neatly named New York State Economic Council. Although all of them go along with his "economy" drive, a strong group is getting restless about his views on foreign affairs.

LARGO CABALLERO is still being held in prison in France although a Mexican visa has been obtained for him. The State Department is said to have received a flat promise from Vichy that he will not be shipped back to Spain.

WHEN AUSTRALIAN troops were reported to be entering Bardia singing "We're going to see the Wizard of Oz," one cable editor queried: Is it an ASCAP tune?

JOSEPH KENNEDY will start his isolationist crusade with a speech at Harvard. Incidentally, pro-Communist theorists are now saying the reason Kennedy soured on England was that he saw it was "going Nazi."

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

A Native at Large

BY JONATHAN DANIELS

VERY properly the President, in his message to Congress, describing that future which, he said, America arms to make secure, put the emphasis on the essential human freedoms. Few honest persons anywhere will doubt the sincerity of his purpose, his intent in a world of tyranny to use the power of America for the preservation of liberty. But two days before he spoke the leading American news service had sent out this story on its wires:

Hattiesburg, Miss., January 5—(AP). Officers at Camp Shelby, nearby military training base, said today the body of Private Alton Beans, Battery C, 135th Field Artillery, Twenty-seventh (Ohio) Division, was found yesterday in an unoccupied tent. It was sent by train today to Ravenna, Ohio. Camp Shelby sources refused further information.

As important, I think, to freedom in America now as anything in that future which the President described is the statement which the Associated Press put at the end of its brief item about the death of a man who to most of us was an unknown soldier: "Camp Shelby sources refused further information."

Here is a dead man, even if a soldier. As related, his death sounds mysterious. Reporting it, the Associated Press, the chief source of news in this free land, felt compelled to indicate that it did not feel that it was adequately covering the news and to explain that free news about a death in one of the nation's camps was denied to it.

It has always been regarded as essential to public safety that any death under circumstances which are the least strange be investigated by public officials and the facts made available to the public by the agencies equipped to do it. In America that agency is the news-gathering service. This service provides the only information about what is happening to their boys which the people possess. Certainly if thousands—maybe millions—of young Americans are to be placed in remote camps under the control and discipline of officers, the report of the mysterious death of one of them should not be accompanied by a phrase which might be expected in an announcement from a concentration camp: "Camp Shelby sources refused further information."

Unless the Associated Press felt that it was denied information it had a right to ask for, the phrase would seem an almost gratuitous aid in the creation of fear about what goes on in the camps, in the development of a sense that there is a blackout of information about democracy's army. If the Associated Press was justified in adding that phrase, then some military men are using their power to suppress news in a manner which suggests that some of them have learned more from Germany than methods of mechanized warfare.

Wherever the Associated Press feels that such a phrase is necessary, the truth probably is that officers are not following a national policy but displaying individual incapacity. If this country is arming for the preservation of freedoms in the future, the right of the public to information about what happens to men found dead in army camps needs to be preserved right now. It is improbable that any mystery dangerous to other men in the service surrounded the death of Private Allen Beans. Mystery writers and mystery mongers, however, could make much of the strange phrase "found in an unoccupied tent." Ordinary people might wonder why the death of a private was given a place on news wires in an item which suggested strangeness without answering the questions the strangeness stirred. The military men cannot complain of the curiosity aroused when they themselves are the authors of the mystery. Certainly when the Associated Press wires the country, in effect, that the army is suppressing facts about a soldier's death, the public sense of security about its boys in those camps is not going to be improved.

I wrote something about another case of this sort a couple of weeks ago. There are enough such cases to indicate that a good many military and naval men—by no means all—regard the free press of a democracy as undesirable. There are certainly enough such cases to justify the demand for a statement of national policy. Neither the people nor the newspapers want the army or the navy to give out military secrets. But the public which is America is entitled to the news about its own army and its own navy and about its boys in both.

If a general or a colonel or a second lieutenant can suppress the facts about a death, what can they not suppress? What may not happen in suppression? If we are arming to make freedom secure in the future, a democracy cannot afford to permit officers in the army and navy, generally more out of ignorance than evil intent, to disregard it now.

The President needs to speak to the army and navy about freedom even more than he needed to speak to the Congress and the people about it.

BOOKS and the ARTS

HENRI BERGSON

BY IRWIN EDMAN

HENRI BERGSON died in Paris on January 4 at the age of eighty-one. The general public, and that relatively private clique known as the philosophical public, had long ago fallen into the habit of thinking of Bergson as dead. Only on the publication of the dramatic news of Bergson's decision to renounce all posts and honors rather than to accept exemption from the anti-Semitic laws of the Vichy government was the world reminded that he was still alive. There had been an interval of more than twenty-five years between the publication of his phenomenally successful "Creative Evolution" in 1907 and the book rather blindly called "The Two Sources of Morality and Religion." A few people knew vaguely that Bergson was still living, an invalid in retirement, in Paris. A few, and not only philosophers, remembered when his name was something to conjure with, and his philosophy was hailed, by William James among others, as an almost medicinal magic. "Oh, my Bergson," James wrote to the author of "Creative Evolution" when that book first appeared, "you are a magician and your book is a marvel, a real wonder. . . . But, unlike the works of genius of the Transcendentalist movement (which are so obscurely and abominably and inaccessibly written), a pure classic in point of form . . . such a flavor of persistent euphony, as of a rich river that never foamed or ran thin, but steadily and firmly proceeded with its banks full to the brim. Then the aptness of your illustrations, that never scratch or stand out at right angles, but invariably simplify the thought and help to pour it along. Oh, indeed you are a magician! And if your next book proves to be as great an advance on this one as this is on its two predecessors, your name will surely go down as one of the great creative names in philosophy."

James's generous salute came at the very peak of Bergson's reputation. There was a whole epidemic of books about Bergson; his themes and his terms became clichés in philosophical discussion all over the world; and all over the world, too, "Creative Evolution," with its gleaming mellifluous stream of thought entranced many more than could understand it, and many readers, too, of many different worlds: the fashionable dowagers who found refuge from boredom in his élan vital, the religious liberals welcoming a philosopher who seemed to have found critical circumvention of mechanistic science and a new and poetic support for belief in God, in free will, and even, though in a somewhat Pickwickian sense, in immortality. Sorel could connect Bergson's theory of reality as an integral movement with a doctrine of revolution as contrasted with piecemeal parliamentary reform. Those wearied of the rationalism of the Transcendentalists and the fixities and the iron necessities of materialistic science, all found in him a hope, an inspiration, and a release. Here, moreover, was one romantic who seemed to have a clear head. Here, too, was a philosopher who, while a consummate literary artist, could beat precise analysts at their own game, and analyze nuances of feeling, action, and thought which seemed to escape through the nets of logic and to be crushed by the tight schemas of matter in motion.

All that seems long ago now. Bergson, secure, or so it seemed in the years before the Vichy government was thought of, in his post at the Collège de France, had his claim to immortality staked out. But his popularity with the general literate public vanished almost as quickly as it appeared. As for the professional philosophers whose admiration had always been tintured with critical reserve, these now found more to criticize and, what was perhaps more decisive, began to think in other terms about other problems. When, in 1935, the English edition of "Les Deux Sources de la Religion et de la Morale" appeared, having been completed through long and painful years of paralyzing illness, all the masteries and subtleties of analysis were still there, extended now to morals and religion, and to art as well. The book was respectfully greeted, and has had some academic influence, but Bergson's day as a central figure in philosophy and, certainly, in general culture seemed to be over. Like other intellectual figures who became briefly fashionable, he had become dated before he died. All that remained in the public memory were a few tags: "élan vital," "creative evolution," "the stream of consciousness," "the flow of reality." Now other men were using other terms for other issues. The intellectual scene and the world setting in which Bergson wrote had almost nightmarishly changed.

What did Bergson contribute? What remains? Looking back now one sees that, for all his "French" clarity (Bergson is one of the most lucid writers ever to have been a professor of philosophy), Bergson is in a romantic, almost a German romantic, tradition. In his early youth he was a disciple of Herbert Spencer, but soon felt, as so many less articulate people in the late nineteenth century felt, something sterile and inadequate, something artificial about the "reality" revealed by "scientific laws." In his youth Bergson had studied psychology and biology, and was caught by the fascination of two ideas, nay, for him, two realities: life and time. One of the most characteristically contagious passages of his works is in his little "Introduction to Metaphysics," where he makes one feel and realize, almost as a poet might, the tension and the fluency of time, the urgency and poignancy of duration. Bergson was rebelling against the fixities and rigidities which both logicians and materialists had ascribed to reality. Bergson found reality in movement and change themselves, an aperçu not uncongenial to the dynamic changing society in which he lived. If change was real, novelty was real; if novelty was real, freedom was real. The immediate was flux, and the changing was ultimate. When in "Creative Evolution" Bergson turned to biological considerations, he held that change means growth, growth means creation, creation means freedom. And if freedom was ultimately real, what a liberation that spelled for the soul of man, no longer bound by the fixities of space, of logic, and of habit! The real facts of evolution were to be found, not in a mechanical elimination of the unfit, but in the creative surge of life, in an élan vital. That propulsive life was best known in the living of it, "bathing in the full stream of experience." Knowledge was not in spatial formulas, post-mortems of the living flux. Knowledge lay in intuition, in the self-immolating and absorbed insights of the poet, the artist, the saint, of men at the acme of life, in the creative activity of genius, worship, or love.

It is not hard to see what the dreaming spirits of men, whose dreams had been clipped by physics and by society, found in this celebration of enraptured impulse and of creative movement. It is easy to see what people, wearied of fixed and conventional goals in what Bergson in "Morality and Religion" was to call a "closed society," found to cherish in his conception of spontaneous freedom in open societies. In the latter, Bergson suggested, the intuitions of seers and saints and poets opened new roads and suggested unattained but not impossible heights from which men might have angelic vistas. "The universe," he says at the close of "Morality and Religion," ". . . is a machine for the making of God."

Bergson's persuasiveness came not so much from the seductive vagueness of intuition and of the élan vital as from his shrewd and subtly destructive analyses of the pretensions of the intellect and of intellectualism to be revelations of reality. Intelligence—here he was at one with the pragmatists—was purely practical. It set up immobilities to guide us in the chartless flux. But for truth we must turn our backs on the "false secondary power by which we multiply distinctions," and feel intimately the pulsing movement of life itself. The pragmatists enjoyed and applauded Bergson's critique of intelligence and scientific method. The mystics and the romantics applauded and hugged to their hearts the passionate hugging of life which he counseled as the way of reality. The liberal theologians were delighted because they thought the élan vital might lead anywhere. Did not Bergson himself suggest that it might lead to immortality and to God? In an age given to statistics and formulas the artists welcomed intuition.

Everyone rebelling against convention in conduct, chafing against formalism in art, revolting against the fixed and stable in thought, found in him an enchanting voice. Only other philosophers found things to grumble at. They did not mind Bergson's celebrating life, but they did not approve the obscurantism of turning one's back on intelligent discrimination. They admired the subtlety of his analyses, but could not make out where the analysis led, or, for that matter, where the élan vital led. They questioned the casuistry by which Bergson proved there was a real future without a causal past. They distrusted, above all, the anti-intellectualism to which Bergson turned his own fine intellect. The élan vital means a renaissance to a poet; to a barbarian it means brute power. The reactionary forces now in control of France are also exhibitions of the élan vital. But it was the intelligence of integrity that caused Bergson, just a few weeks before his death, to refuse to be made an exception by the Vichy government to their racial laws. Bergson's philosophy was once hailed as a new thing in the world. Its elements are very old; its mysticism is as old as Plotinus, to whom Bergson acknowledged himself much indebted. His élan vital goes back a long way too; ultimately to the Dionysiac mysteries and, in the modern world, to Schopenhauer. Its romanticism goes back to Schelling, Fichte, and Rousseau. Its dress was sophisticated and new; its substance was old and primitive, in both vitality and opaqueness.

There are subterranean vital forces now come to the surface of the world. The world is a machine making devils as well as gods. The abdication of mind is celebrated by barbarians. Instinct and intuition demand education, not wanton trust. Analysis may be abstract or irrelevant, as Bergson pointed out; it may also be the servant of that life which otherwise wanders into dark by-paths and fanatic blind alleys. "Evolution" is creative when men intelligently cooperate; otherwise it is, as events have proved, brutal, fatal, and blind.

Soviet Agent

OUT OF THE NIGHT. By Jan Valtin. Alliance Book Corporation. $3.50.

THIS thick volume—756 large pages, some 320,000 words—is a historical document of the first rank, a biography, an adventure story, and in places, so it seems, a brisk novel. It is all these in one, and in addition the structure and writing are excellent. Before you start to read it you had better plan to take three days off. Its suspense is such that you will not be good for anything else until you have turned the last page. And then you will need time to think and to remember.

Jan Valtin is the pseudonym of a well-known former German Communist. He was born the son of a respectable Social Democrat attached to the nautical service of the North German Lloyd. Growing up in the ports of the seven seas, at fourteen he spoke a smattering of Swedish, English, and Italian, and knew fragments of Chinese and Malay. The end of the first World War finds him at school in Bremen. He takes part in the uprising of the sailors as a young Spartacist. Thus his political life begins in a fashion typical at the time for thousands of intelligent working-class youths.

After the revolution is crushed by the Noske guards—cadres of the storm troopers to come—the boy goes to sea. But soon he returns to join the Communist Party and to become an international agent for the Comintern. He works in the maritime section, is trained in Leningrad for special work, travels on missions all over the world, serves three years in St. Quentin for the attempted murder of an alleged traitor, returns to Germany, becomes a ringleader in the two-fronted fight of the Communists against the Nazis and the Socialists—the "Social-Fascists," according to the party line. After Hitler's seizure of power he goes underground to continue the fight and is finally caught by the Gestapo. He passes forty months of torture in the dungeons of the Third Reich, then consents to become one of Himmler's agents in order to get free and to be able to join his comrades and take part in the struggle again. But as it turns out, he is arrested by the GPU for being not quite the docile tool that he had been for more than twenty years. After his escape from a GPU hideout in Denmark he finally breaks with Moscow, to be forever denounced as a German agent by the Communists.

This general outline gives no more than a faint hint of what the reader may expect. But it would be futile to attempt to indicate in a short review the many significant situations, theoretical discussions, and full-drawn characters of the work; some of these characters are well-known figures of the Comintern and the German Communist Party. Nor have I space to give a just estimate of the author as a writer. He has a natural gift for observation, characterization, and dialogue not easily surpassed by the renowned professionals. One remembers each of his protagonists. His description of the Gestapo hell is the most exhaustive and most convincing which has yet appeared in print. The author's account of his relationship to his wife, who died in a Nazi prison, is an unforgettable and truly modern love story.

Yet for all these virtues the greatest value of the book derives from the profound political lesson that it teaches. It makes absolutely clear the causes of the disintegration of a movement which, starting out to save the world, ended in crimes against its own ideals. The genuine surge for a better and freer world which attracted the best spirits after the last four-year slaughter lost its character and force as soon as it was misused and channeled in the interests of a single state, in a dictatorial, authoritarian fashion. The productive forces of the movement were driven into the wilderness; the yes men, the orderlies, and the paid adventurers took charge. Morality was replaced by vice, courage by intrigues, thinking by obedience. Jan Valtin is one of the many who hoped against hope that in the end everything would come out right. The doctrine of the infallibility of the great pope in the Kremlin and the little popes in the Comintern became a dogma to which they clung in secret despair. They were ruthless against themselves as against others. And only today are they learning the lesson that you cannot fight for a free and just world by giving up freedom and integrity.

"Out of the Night" will be misused in many quarters. The red-baiters will eat it up, but that will matter little as long as it is read widely. The fighters of the future will learn from this work many of the fallacies which they will have to avoid. Jan Valtin, after grave errors, has at last made his contribution to the cause of the oppressed, and with more than good measure.

FRANZ HOELLERING

Washington as General

WASHINGTON AND THE REVOLUTION: A REAPPRAISAL. By Bernhard Knollenberg. The Macmillan Company. $3.

THE title of this book is somewhat misleading. Mr. Knollenberg does not cover all of George Washington's activities during the Revolution, but only a small part of them. The author is concerned chiefly with the so-called Conway Cabal of 1778, and his argument is that the Cabal was a figment of Washington's imagination. The reader may recall that General Gates won the Battle of Saratoga and so brought about the surrender of General Burgoyne's army to the American forces. This was in October, 1777. A resounding victory it was, undoubtedly, with reverberations from Massachusetts to Georgia. Many American patriots, in Congress and out of it, looked upon Gates as the coming man, as a general who knew how to win. This wave of adulation led Congress, then driven out of Philadelphia and sitting forlornly in a little Pennsylvania town, to create a Board of War and put Gates at the head of it. The powers of the board were somewhat vague, but in a certain sense they were superior to those of the commander-in-chief.

Now upon the scene comes Thomas Conway, an Irishman by birth who had served as an officer in the French army and gained some distinction. From France he came to America as a volunteer general, and was given by Congress a rather high place in the American service, to the great disgust of many American officers. Washington wrote to Richard Henry Lee: "General Conway's merit, . . . and his importance to this army, exists more in his own imagination than in reality, for it is a maxim with him to leave no service of his own untold, nor to want anything which is to be obtained by importunity." According to the accepted version of the Conway Cabal—supported by most historians—this Irish-French footloose officer conspired with Gates, and possibly others, to deprive Washington of his command and put Gates in his place. Washington suspected this plot, and his suspicions were strengthened by certain letters from Conway to Gates, the contents of which were repeated to him.

Mr. Knollenberg declares that the Conway Cabal is "probably a myth"—a conclusion with which this reviewer cannot agree. The Cabal may not have had any tangible form; it is quite possible that it never went to the extent of written agreements, but I am firmly convinced that it was in the air, so to speak, when Washington discovered it.

The value of Mr. Knollenberg's book, as a convincing document, is greatly diminished by his obvious bias against Washington. He asserts that Washington was ill-tempered and lacking in candor, and gives a general impression—without saying so definitely—that he was a second-rate person. But he does not analyze the character, or the motives, of Gates and Conway. Conway was in fact an adventurer without any foothold in this country, a man without fortune or family and a "go-getter" by force of circumstances. Gates was not an American. He was English by birth and had been an officer in the British army. He was conceited, vain almost beyond belief. No great military talent was needed to achieve Burgoyne's surrender, for that former fashionable figure in London's night life had got himself and his army so thoroughly entangled in our forests that he had lost most of his artillery, his ammunition, and his supplies. Any mob of militia—if sufficiently numerous—would have forced his capitulation. Mr. Knollenberg does not say much about that.

George Washington was not a great general, as we all know, but he was a great man. He possessed the genius of understanding men and their motives, the genius of will and determination, the genius of what we may call—for want of a better term—a godlike loftiness. He could withstand disaster in torrents. I am confident that without Washington the Revolution would have disintegrated finally into local mobs, and would have eventually died. That is what the British expected it to do.

Before Mr. Knollenberg became the librarian of Yale University he was a lawyer, and his book has all the earmarks of a corporation lawyer's argument in court. A brilliant lawyer, as you know, can take half a dozen minor facts and a few plausible assertions, and produce from them a document, with references and cross-references, that will completely confuse both judge and jury.

The Conway Cabal was a dramatic episode in the War for American Independence. As Mr. Knollenberg deals with it, the Conway Cabal is far from dramatic. Like most scholarly historians he appears to be suspicious of drama, vividness, and color.

W. E. WOODWARD

The Conquest of Holland

JUGGERNAUT OVER HOLLAND. By E. N. van Kleffens. Columbia University Press. $2.

THIS is the first authentic and comprehensive account of the Nazi invasion of Holland and of Dutch policy before, during, and after the invasion. It is authoritative because Mr. van Kleffens has been Dutch Foreign Minister since the summer of 1939 and was a high official of the Dutch Foreign Office for many years before that. But it does not read like an official account. Anybody who has met Mr. van Kleffens and experienced the extraordinary reserve of this Dutch statesman will be doubly surprised. He tells a vivid story.

The pattern is well known. But the clash between Nazidom and the "normal standards of civilized communities" carries a lesson which cannot be explained too often; it should be repeated until the Nazi philosophy and its exponents have been relegated to the outer darkness where they belong.

In Holland as elsewhere the Nazis attacked first and furnished their excuses afterward. Bombing from the air started at about four in the morning on May 10. It was obvious at once, writes Mr. van Kleffens, that the royal palace at The Hague was one of the principal targets. The Nazis may therefore say that the Queen at least was advised immediately. But the Dutch Minister at Berlin was called out of bed only at 5:30 a.m. and received by Herr von Ribbentrop at 6:15 a.m., and the Dutch Foreign Minister himself had to wait till proper office hours in the forenoon before the Nazi Minister at The Hague called on him to announce warlike acts that had been going on for hours. The Queen had long since had to seek the bomb-proof shelter at the palace. The Dutch Cabinet had met hours before and become a war Cabinet.

The Nazis did not take much trouble with the documents which were intended to justify their action. The memorandum submitted to the Dutch Minister in Berlin was different from that handed over at The Hague. It was not even intended for The Hague. There were no means of transmitting it, inasmuch as the Dutch legation in Berlin was immediately cut off from the outside world. Everybody attached to the legation was herded into a small building. They depended for food and bedding on the kindness of the United States chargé d'affaires and the Swedish Minister. Only after four days of anxious waiting were they permitted to leave for neutral Switzerland.

Ever since the European war started, the Netherlands government had of course been prepared for Nazi aggression.

Shall America take world leadership for democracy?

This question—which has become the subject of radio forums, of discussion by thinking people everywhere, of school and club debates—is raised and answered in a document of profound importance to all of us at this time.

SEVENTEEN INTELLECTUAL LEADERS SET FORTH THEIR COMMON PROGRAM FOR A NEW ERA OF WORLD FREEDOM

Now there is a plan for a new world—a goal toward which mankind can work. This inspiring declaration, with its four-point program for action, will stimulate and encourage every man and woman of good will. Its influence is already being widely felt. It embodies the joint beliefs of Herbert Agar, Frank Aydelotte, G. A. Borgese, Hermann Broch, Van Wyck

Brooks, Ada L. Comstock, William Yandell Elliott, Dorothy Canfield Fisher, Christian Gauss, Oscar Jaszi, Alvin Johnson, Hans Kohn, Thomas Mann, Lewis Mumford, William Allan Neilson, Reinhold Niebuhr, and Gaetano Salvemini. "An excellent and unusually comprehensive basis for discussion of the shape of things to come."—POORE, N. Y. Times. $1

THE CITY OF MAN

A DECLARATION ON WORLD DEMOCRACY

"A brilliant and heart-lifting document . . . a definite workable proposal for ways and means to attack the problems that confront us. . . . If democracy fails, it will not be because our wise men have forsaken us."—Harpers.

THE VIKING PRESS 18 EAST 48th STREET NEW YORK, N. Y.

But the evidence was conflicting. It had reason to assume a certain German interest in the continued independence of the Netherlands because it had been intrusted with the protection of Nazi interests, first in Poland and in South Africa, and then, as late as March 27, 1940, in the Cameroons. It knew of the importance attached by the Nazis to Dutch agricultural produce and to Holland as a country of transit in war time. Important Nazi officials repeatedly gave assurances which the Dutch were entitled to believe.

Nevertheless, the Dutch had mobilized and were actually on a war footing when aggression came. Mr. van Kleffens makes it clear beyond any doubt and in convincing detail that the Dutch fought valiantly. He also explains that the frontier defenses were weaker than expected because the reserves had already been engaged by the German parachute troops and by troops landed from "neutral" ships in Dutch harbors. Nevertheless, the reserves had done their job in overcoming this new weapon. The Dutch air arm brought down the record bag of one hundred enemy planes in one day. But it was all of no avail against the Juggernaut.

Mr. van Kleffens discusses with surprising freedom Dutch foreign policy in relation to the Allies. He gives the lie to the Nazi allegation that the Dutch had already surrendered their independence to the Allies. In the Dutch legations in London and Paris were sealed instructions for communication to the Allies in case of German aggression. That was all. On the other hand, he maintains that previous arrangements with the Allies would merely have provoked Nazi aggression, and events proved that the Allies were not yet ready to give such assistance as would have made it worth while to risk giving the Nazis an early excuse. He even argues with considerable bluntness that the Allied blockade included measures beyond the limits of "common sense." In the matter of reprisals involving neutral trade the Allies made it clear, he says, that neither France nor Great Britain was to be deflected from its purpose. "Once more belligerent interest had silenced the voice of law." Nothing could prove more convincingly the truly democratic nature of the Allied struggle against totalitarianism, for Mr. van Kleffens wrote these words after his government became allied with Britain and while he himself was enjoying the hospitality of Britain. On the Allied side free speech has certainly not perished from the earth.

Mr. van Kleffens also draws numerous parallels with the Norwegian struggle, and does not hesitate to suggest that Norway might have prepared better and have withstood the Nazi onslaught for a longer time. It is curious to observe how a man in his position could become so engrossed in events of immediate concern to him as to lose sight of the fact that Norway was still fighting at the time of the invasion of Holland and went on fighting for another month.

Today both countries are fully in the fight, both at home and abroad: at home because their peoples have finally got what an eminent Norwegian historian now in this country calls the "Nazi lice on their bodies" and know the alternative; abroad because their monarchs and governments have been able to establish themselves outside the sphere of Nazi domination and are contributing great merchant marines, naval and air-force units, money, and men to the joint struggle. The voice of a free people can still be heard, and Mr. van Kleffens proves it.

BJARNE BRAATØY

Lafayette phono-radio combination $124.50

An authentic copy of a famous Chippendale console houses this superb 11-tube, 5-band Lafayette radio and automatic record changer. Excellence has been the watchword in its making — excellence in high-fidelity performance on broadcasts or records, and excellence in its cabinet craftsmanship. See, and hear Model FE 147 at your Lafayette showroom. If you prefer, we will mail you further information.

Lafayette Radio

100 SIXTH AVENUE • NEW YORK, N. Y.

901 W. JACKSON BLVD., CHICAGO • 245 PEACHTREE ST., ATLANTA
110 FEDERAL ST., BOSTON • 34 CENTRAL AVE., NEWARK
300 E. FORDHAM RD., BRONX • 90-08 166th ST., JAMAICA, L. I.

THE DYNAMICS of WAR and REVOLUTION

By LAWRENCE DENNIS

It is the best antidote on the book market for wishful and muddled thinking if you are tough minded enough to take it.

$3.00 Published by

THE WEEKLY FOREIGN LETTER

205 East 42nd Street

New York, N. Y.

Man Against Bacteria

GERMS AND THE MAN. By Justina Hill. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $3.75.

THE pace set by DeKruif in the dramatization of scientific phenomena for the allurement of lay readers is difficult to maintain. The present author is an accomplished scientist in DeKruif's field, and she writes conscientiously, accurately, and systematically of pathogenic bacteria and our defenses against them. Her book makes interesting reading for anyone, and the bibliography is remarkably comprehensive. Its weakest aspect is the attempt to give it a dramatic accent by such chapter headings as Job's Curse, the Staphylococcus, and Some Less Polite Germs; Sword Swallowing, or Drugs Taken by Mouth; and the like.

There are some minor errors—the reference to ferrets as polecats, for example—and there is the usual fallacious acceptance of the principle of causality, to which bacteriologists almost universally subscribe. Nevertheless, this book is the best popular presentation of an important field of biological science that has appeared.

KARL MENNINGER

IN BRIEF

SONS OF THE OTHERS. By Philip Gibbs. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

This has as its chief virtue the distinction of being one of the first trickles in what will undoubtedly become a torrential flow of novels about the present war. Beginning with France's declaration of war and ending with the evacuation of Dunkirk, it inevitably gives the impression of a novelized newsreel rather than of a work of lasting art; but the battle scenes are vividly portrayed, and the events, which were headlines a few months ago, naturally carry a gruesome interest of their own.

TODAY AND FOREVER. By Pearl S. Buck. The John Day Company. $2.50.

A collection of warm-hearted stories about the China of yesterday and the China of today; about villagers who had never seen an airplane or a Japanese until the two appeared in deadly conjunction in the morning sky; about rich merchants in Peking and Shanghai; about American missionaries driven to distraction by the patient stolidity of a people whom they do not understand but cannot help loving. The tales, though lacking the full-bodied flavor of the author's novels, make good reading.

THE SILENT DRUM. By Neil H. Swanson. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.75.

Following up some of the characters he introduced in "The Judas Tree," Mr. Swanson tells another appealing, adventure-packed story of pre-Revolutionary days in the country around Fort Pitt and the Conococheague valley, when the traders and the settlers were feuding and the Black Watch was trying to keep order. One year in the life of his hero, a young Dutch bound boy, furnishes not only its quota of thrills but a colorful cross-section of frontier life with all its brutality, rough humor, and urgent need for quick decisions and bold action.

AN ESSAY ON NATURE. By Frederick J. E. Woodbridge. Columbia University Press. $3.

Professor Woodbridge here attempts by common-sense methods to resolve the dualism inherent in the scientific view of the universe. He defines Nature—which he always capitalizes—as the sum of everything which makes up the setting of human history. Whatever is, he would say, is natural—including a belief in the supernatural. Sir Thomas Browne, Santayana, Plato, Goethe, the Te Deum contribute to a point of view which may be justly described as the fruit of wisdom.

DRAMA

One Kind of Unemployment

FEW who saw Miss Pauline Lord in "Anna Christie" or "They Knew What They Wanted" are likely to have forgotten her, though the most recent of those two plays is already sixteen years old. Few, for that matter, who know her only from a performance in one or another of the trivial plays in which she has since appeared from time to time are likely to forget her, however impossible it may be to remember even the name of the play in which she acted. Something, as editorial writers say, is wrong with a system where the waste of such talents is possible over a period of years.

One may grant that she is no universal actress, that there are many roles to which her talents are not suited. But the tendency of casting directors seems to have been to limit her opportunities more and more, to make her more and more a mere specialist. Her great roles were those dominated by pathos, hopeless courage, and intolerable anxiety, and there is no reason why anyone should have asked her—as nobody ever did—to be a romantic ingenue. But that does not mean, on the other hand, that she should be given only opportunities to do less and less until finally she seemed to be remembered only when someone had to tear a handkerchief or give a blood-curdling scream. It is true that she does both these things very well. There is no one who can look more desperately unhappy than she can. But she can also act a rounded role, she can relate the terror and anxiety to a character, she can make the outburst mean something. She is, in other words, criminally wasted in such elementary and clumsy melodrama as "Eight o'Clock Tuesday" (Henry Miller's Theater). Another good actor, McKay Morris, as well as several other competent performers, is also wasted. But the others are almost completely subdued to the stuff they work in. Only Miss Lord rises at moments above it, and I rather fancy that she will be responsible for a tiny residue in the memory left by a play which might otherwise leave not a wrack behind.

As for the play, it is a very routine whodunit. So far as I remember—two days later—the villain is discovered, when the curtain rises, dead of a paper knife and with his wife kneeling beside him. As usual it turns out that nearly everyone in the cast had not only an excellent reason for wanting to kill him but ample opportunity to have done so. A most unorthodox detective takes charge, and scorning such trivia as fingerprints and blood stains, makes each person reenact his last meeting with the deceased until someone, who has to save someone else, finally confesses. The wonder is that anyone cares. The corpse had been such a thoroughly undesirable person that his taking off was a public service no matter who was responsible, and early in the evening I should have been perfectly willing just to pass a vote of thanks for the person or persons unknown and to let it go at that. In connection with plays of this sort it is usually said that it would not be fair to reveal the solution. This time let's be honest and just say that it wouldn't be worth the trouble.

Musical comedies commonly stick around a while even though less than rapturously received, but "Night of Love" folded up after two or three performances, and warning against it is not necessary. JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

"PAL JOEY" (Ethel Barrymore Theater), a musical comedy based on the book by John O'Hara, presents, with music by Rodgers and Hart, one of those characters with which the "hard-boiled" school has won its fame. The word "nihilist" is too big to apply to Pal Joey. His lack of any attitude whatever is so complete that he cannot even be called amoral. He falls among those submarginal characters so thoroughly set forth, in another environment, in "Tobacco Road," and he has somewhat the same fascination. In the first act Gene Kelley brings Pal Joey to life so unobtrusively and yet so convincingly that he dominates the melodious background provided by Rodgers and Hart, which really belongs to another world. At that point, however, the piece turns into musical comedy. It is good musical comedy; the girls are pretty, and June Havoc lives up to her name. But much as I like Rodgers and Hart—"Bewitched, Bothered, and Bewildered"—is in their best vein—I was a little disappointed because by that time I was so hypnotized by the nonentity of Pal Joey that I wanted to see more of it.

MARGARET MARSHALL

ART

Mané-Katz

THERE is an oddly haunting show of oils mainly of cabinet size at the Marie Sterner Gallery. Expressionistic images of the itinerant musicians of East European cities form the content of a number of the delicate paintings; and as a whole the exhibition curiously infects one with a pathos like that which street musicians often involuntarily impart—say, the violinists or guitarists who fiddle and strum enthusiastically on sidewalks, in subway trains, or in ferry houses. Within the frames one feels a sweetness of will and eagerness to cheer and charm similar to that of the players on the streets and ferries: one also feels a sadness similar to that which, despite their effort, rises over their jigs and marches. Blent eagerness and sadness emerge as poignantly from the larger pictures—with the expressionistic images recalling richly gowned personages of the Chassidim, the eighteenth-century mystical sect of Eastern Jews—as from the series of the little Polish itinerants. They overflow the frequently lovely color patterns and very refined harmonies.

The instrumentalists down on the street we are nevertheless likely to forget: not, however, these miniature works of art. Their pathos recurs to mind in after hours, drawing us back to them.

The artist, M. Mané-Katz, was the subject of an exhibition much remarked at the Wildenstein Gallery two years ago. Last year, while serving in the French army as an interpreter with major's rank, he was taken prisoner at Royan. There he encountered Picasso, who made him the much-needed present of a blanket. He asked the Spaniard, "What is to become of us, what can we do now?" Swiftly came the answer, "Why not arrange an exhibition?" Mané-Katz was put in a concentration camp, where he became sick. Fears of an epidemic rising from the heat and from the filth in which the captives were obliged to live impelled the Germans to send him and thousands of others into unoccupied France. Possibly through Picasso's faith, certainly in the desire to continue his life as an artist, he cabled friends asking them to procure him an American visa.

What causes his new show to stay by us would seem primarily to be his unfeigned vein of sensibility, exquisitely manifest in his projection of the state of unearthly meditation in the seated figure of the rabbi in Oriental robes. Even more prominently it would seem to be his frequent sense of pictorial style. Evidently it has been sharpened by Goya and especially by Rouault: one or two of his compositions, in connection with the fact that they are mildly visionary and macabre, make us feel Mané-Katz to be a kind of undemonic Rouault—without the heat of hellish mud. But he has a streak of rather delightful preciousness quite his own. Neglected in a few instances, in others his forms are well achieved. The sober "Trumpeter" is composed of a taut opposition of two rhythmic bell shapes, one black, the other gilt. The gay "Tuba Player" contains an exciting movement of expressive fiery golds. The serene "Drummer" has a satisfying breadth of line; and the spectral "Student"—probably the most deeply engaging work in the haunting little show—is elegantly composed of three simple shapes in dynamic interplay. PAUL ROSENFELD

RECORDS

STRAUSS'S "Don Quixote" is, for me, his finest work; but it is the tone-poem in which the correlation of programmatic meaning and music is most detailed and most subtly achieved, and one, therefore, in which some of the humorous points are only for the musically sophisticated listener with detailed knowledge of the score. Considered by itself the new Victor set (720, $5.50) made by Ormandy with the Philadelphia Orchestra and Feuermann is excellent. But I am better satisfied by Beecham's treatment of the work in the set he made for Victor with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony; and since he made it only five years ago the recorded sound is still very good by present-day standards. It is a little less rich and brilliant than the sound of the new recording; but it makes up for this with better balance and greater clarity at times: in the old set one hears not only Don Quixote jogging along in Variation 1, but Sancho with him, and one can manage to hear the windmills turning when Don Quixote first perceives them.

There is the Mahler emotion—the sickness-at-heart, the world-weariness, the bitterness; there is the Mahler process—the individual musical thought using an individual musical vocabulary in an individual way; there are the gigantic Mahler forms into which the process translates the emotion. And for a person who goes along with the ways of feeling, of thinking, of using the medium, Mahler's Ninth Symphony is a superbly contrived work of great emotional impact. Bruno Walter, who is such a person, makes his sympathy with the work effective in the concert performance with the Vienna Philharmonic that was recorded in Vienna in January, 1938, and is now offered by Victor (Set 726, $10.50). There is a little sharpness in the sound of the violins; but this is a more agreeable-sounding recording job than the one of Walter's Vienna performance of "Das Lied von der Erde."

Some other Victor releases: Most of Beethoven's variations on the theme "Ich bin der Schneider Kakadu" are as inconsequential as the theme itself—only the introduction and the ninth and tenth variations revealing a relation to the other music of this late period. The work is played with good musical taste, but with somewhat wiry violin tone, by Erling Bloch and Torben Svendsen, violinist and 'cellist of the Danish Quartet, and Lund Christiansen, pianist (Set 729, $2.50). Mozart's charming Sonata K. 448 for two pianos is played fluently but not very effectively by Luboschutz and Nemenoff (Set 724, $3.50). The lovely Boccherini Sonata No. 6 that Casals recorded on the 'cello under the title of Adagio and Allegro has now been recorded on the viola by William Primrose (17513, $1), who plays it with beautiful tone but in a way that sounds affected after Casals's wonderfully subtle phrasing. Respighi's Old Dances and Airs for the Lute, Suite No. 2, played by the New York Philharmonic-Symphony under Barbirolli (17558, $1), is moderately enjoyable; so is Frescobaldi's Toccata, which is heavily weighed down by the orchestral transcription and performance it gets from Hans Kindler and his National Symphony (17632, $1). And a new set of Falla's "Nights in the Gardens of Spain" for piano and orchestra (725, $3.50) offers an excellent performance by Lucette Descaves and the Paris Conservatory Orchestra under Bigot of a work that is little more than Spanish style used with sophistication and fastidiousness for three movements.

Szigeti played Mozart's Violin Concerto K. 218 with his usual vitality of phrasing and distinction of style at the first of his notable series of nine broadcasts over the Mutual network Sunday evenings at seven. He is to play a complete concerto each time; and if you missed the first two don't miss the rest.

B. H. HAGGIN

Letters to the Editors

Protest from Ukrainian Nationalists

Dear Sirs: I've read many misleading articles in the Communist press, but your ambitious attempt, in The Nation of November 16, to expose our Organization for the Rebirth of the Ukraine scores 100 per cent in inaccuracy, to wit:

1. Ukrainian nationalists don't want Hitler's aid to restore the Ukraine any more than they want your friend Stalin's aid.

2. The O. D. W. U. is an American organization, founded by Americans and composed of Americans, and it has no international headquarters in Berlin or anywhere else.

3. Vladimir Dushnyck was never detained in Belgium "for suspected espionage activities" and has statements from the United States consulate in Belgium and the Belgian Department of State to prove it.

4. The Ukrainian Press Service, of which I was director at the time, never carried any such caption on its releases as "Hitler sympathizes with the Slovaks, Poles, Magyars, and Ukrainians." As a matter of fact, it consistently disseminated anti-Nazi news.

5. Monsignor Ivan Buchko is not a member of the O. D. W. U. nor was he arrested in Brazil. He was stopped from delivering a sermon in Ukrainian by local police and left the country in protest. The President of Brazil officially apologized for the incident and invited him back to the country, an invitation which Bishop Buchko accepted.

6. The O. D. W. U. and the Hetman Organization are not affiliated in any way.

7. Four Ukrainian organizations did meet in New York, but the only group to urge that the O. D. W. U. and the Hetman Organization be thrown out was the Socialist group, the editor of whose youth publication was thrown out of our organization.

And as for anyone calling Professor Granovsky a "Hitler stooge," when you say that, you lie.

PM apologized for a scurrilous attack on a mighty fine and democratic organization, with which I have been associated for six years and will continue to associate. It is up to you to do likewise.

ROMAN LAPICA,

Editor, the O. D. W. U. Trident
New York, November 19

[Mr. Lapica's letter is one of a number of protests we have received concerning the column Within the Gates in our issue of November 16. Most of them were more temperate than Mr. Lapica's, but practically all of them made the point that the O. D. W. U., far from being "under the Nazi thumb," as our article stated, is working for a British victory. We are glad to learn that this is the case, and we regret that our author failed to make clear the organization's present position on this highly important subject. In fairness to the author of the article, however, it should be pointed out that formation of the Ukrainian-American Committee to Aid the Allies, the first overt sign of a change of heart, took place several days after the article appeared. As for the O. D. W. U.'s past, Mr. Lapica's protest comes with less grace. His charges of inaccuracy may be answered briefly:

1. The three successive organs of the O. D. W. U.—the Vistnyk, the Nationalist, and the Ukraine—are replete with praise for German National Socialism and hopes for a National Socialist Ukraine. There is space here for only a few excerpts:

The only proper method to construct the political system of the Ukrainian nation is upon the principles of authoritarianism and führership, which rest upon the principles of creativeness, character, will, and responsibility of the individual.—Resolution adopted by the Congress of Ukrainian Nationalists (of which the O. D. W. U. is a member-group), as reported in the Nationalist, September 14, 1938.

The League for the Rebirth of the Ukraine in America (O. D. W. U.) is closely related to German Nazi-ism and Italian fascism.—The Nationalist, August 17, 1938.

When Andrew Melnyk was made head of the Provid, the governing body of the Ukrainian Nationalist organizations, the Nationalist captioned his picture "The Führer of the Ukrainian Nationalists," and added, "Long Live the Hitler of the Ukraine, Colonel Melnyk."

2. It is true that the O. D. W. U. was founded by Americans, but at the first Congress of Ukrainian Nationalists a resolution was adopted asking that "the organizational bond of the Nationalist organizations on the American continent with the Provid of the O. U. N. (Organization of Ukrainian Nationalists) be intensified, and that this bond be effected through the governing bodies of the corresponding Nationalist organizations." Representatives of the Provid were always warmly received, and at one meeting held in the New York Hippodrome the Provid's secretary was greeted with the Nazi salute and appointed to the nominating committee of the O. D. W. U.

3. In an article entitled Current Immigration in Belgium, published in Svoboda, Vladimir Dushnyck himself wrote that he had been detained in Belgium for suspected espionage activities. It is true, however, that he has credentials which show that he was cleared and released, and this should have been stated in our article.

4. Testimony before the Dies committee produced a Ukrainian Press Service release which said, "Hitler sympathizes with the Slovaks, Poles, Magyars, and Ukrainians." The attorney for the O. D. W. U. insists that there must have been two Ukrainian press services at the time. We can't say.

5. Mr. Lapica's statements concerning Monsignor Buchko are superficially true. He was held only briefly by the Brazilian police, he has papers to prove that he is now in good standing in Brazil, and he is not officially a member of the O. D. W. U. But he is, none the less, one of the organization's chief spokesmen and defenders and has referred to its members as "the flower of the nation." The question of his actual membership seems to us the sheerest technicality.

6. The column to which Mr. Lapica takes exception did not say that the O. D. W. U. and the Hetman groups were affiliated; it said that they were "brought together." They had been at loggerheads for years, and informed Ukrainian-Americans are agreed that they now cooperate closely.

7. We cannot be sure that the delegates who wanted to expel the O. D. W. U. and the Hetman Organization were "Socialist" on the strength of Mr. Lapica's designation. After all, Mr. Lapica thinks we are Communists.—
EDITORS THE NATION.]

Del Vayo's Emigré Council

Dear Sirs: The article of Alvarez del Vayo on The Duty of the Emigré (see The Nation of December 14) was magnificent; I think there is hardly any other statesman so well oriented in our world as he. The proposal of a Central Council of the Emigration, however, seems to me debatable. A union among the émigrés from many lands would lead, somehow, to their separation from the unity of American thought and action. Somehow it would isolate them in these United States, of which they want to make a Uniting States.

A proposal like the one embodied in the recently published "City of Man" takes care, I think, of such difficulties, and its intention provides adequately for a community in thought and action made of Americans new and old, of born citizens and recent citizens, and of citizens to be. In such an intercourse the experience and inspiration of men like Alvarez del Vayo and those whom he has in mind for his council would prove immensely more fertile.

G. A. BORGESE

New York, January 9

Dear Sirs: Del Vayo's article was both interesting and important; the comments it aroused (printed in the issue of January 4) seem to me even more significant, for they illuminated not only the problem itself—the creation of a Central Council of the Emigrés—but also many faults committed by the anti-fascist front.

A grouping of the comments shows that some, like Sir Norman Angell, would like to see the council as a kind of general staff that would touch off the revolution and take over its leadership in the countries occupied by Hitler; while others, like Bjarne Braatoy and Paul Hagen, would grant such a council at best the functions of a research organization. Pierre Cot chooses a middle course; the principal task he has in mind for the council is to contribute to the enlightenment of American public opinion.

It is no accident that the severest criticism of Del Vayo's proposal came from the Germans—Paul Hagen, Franz Hoellering, and Konrad Heiden; while the most enthusiastic response was that of Max Ascoli, an Italian. This seems to be explained by the fact that in Italy the idea of democracy has a heroic, a revolutionary tradition. It is indissolubly linked with Italy's rise as a nation; Mazzini and Garibaldi still live in the hearts of the Italian people. For Italians—also for Spaniards and with certain reservations for Hungarians, Czechs, and Poles as well—the fight against fascism is identical with the fight for democracy. The Germans, however—and that fact emerged most clearly from Heiden's comment—are keenly aware of the absence of a positive goal, of a program in the "fight against Hitler." The only democracy they know is that of the Weimar regime, and no anti-Nazi wants to see that reestablished in its old form.

These phenomena alone would justify the formation of a council such as Del Vayo proposed. It would have a right to exist even if it were only a forum for the forces that see in the fight against fascism a fight for a truly social, living, youthful democracy—for the democracy of Lincoln, Garibaldi, Masaryk, of the Spanish Loyalists and of the workers of Vienna.

Although I am skeptical regarding the possibilities of directing and promoting the revolution in the occupied regions from without, I believe that the council should not confine itself to research and theoretical work alone. The word "propaganda" has been greatly abused. But properly understood—as the active, passionate daily appeal to world opinion—propaganda is an important weapon. To sharpen, perfect, and coordinate propaganda would be a great task for the council. Perhaps the council will not succeed in organizing the revolution against Hitler, but at least it may succeed in organizing the crusade for democracy. That would be, I believe, a sufficiently explicit program for the moment.

The program for the future, which is to be realized after the fall of the dictatorships, can be discussed by the council only theoretically. Its practical application must be carried out by the oppressed peoples. It will be all the more comprehensive, and all the more far-reaching, the more strongly the idea of democracy is entrenched in the hearts of the people of Europe. LEO LANIA

New York, January 10

Legal Aid for Objectors

Dear Sirs: May we ask your help in raising a modest sum to finance legal aid to conscientious objectors who refused to register under the Selective Service Act. In a few of these cases the defense raises the question of the constitutionality of the act. It is hoped in New York to carry at least one case through the Circuit Court of Appeals. Counsel are serving without fee, but the cost of records, stenography, and research is considerable.

It may be regarded by some as a waste of money to test the constitutionality of an act which most lawyers feel the Supreme Court will uphold. But questioning of the act on constitutional grounds has a valuable educational effect on the public. Serious issues are raised which the courts cannot ignore and on which it is important to have a decision.

There are more than thirty non-registrants in the country. Each man deserves legal aid.

We have constituted themselves a committee to raise the sum of $2,500 for this legal service and for the necessary accompanying publicity. All contributions will be expended on our order. Checks should be made payable to Evan W. Thomas, Treasurer, and mailed to 2929 Broadway, New York.

EVAN W. THOMAS, Treasurer, ROGER N. BALDWIN, CHARLES BOSS, JR., FAY BENNETT, ALLAN KNIGHT CHALMERS, RICHARD B. GREGG, JESSE H. HOLMES, JOHN HAYNES HOLMES, BROADUS MITCHELL, FRANK OLMSTEAD, A. J. MUSTE, NORMAN THOMAS

New York, January 10

CONTRIBUTORS

LEWIS COREY is the author of "The Decline of American Capitalism," "The House of Morgan," and "The Crisis of the Middle Class."

ROBERT G. SPIVACK, a free-lance writer, has been secretary of the International Student Service for the past three years.

IRWIN EDMAN, professor of philosophy at Columbia University, is the author of "Four Ways of Philosophy," "Arts and the Man," and other books.

FRANZ HOELLERING, for many years editor of the Berliner Zeitung, is the author of "The Defenders," a novel of post-war Vienna.

W. E. WOODWARD is the author of "George Washington," "A New American History," and other books.

BJARNE BRAATOY, Norwegian author and journalist, is a member of the Norwegian Shipping and Trade Commission in the United States.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 55 Fifth Ave., New York. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 152

NEW YORK · SATURDAY · JANUARY 25, 1941

NUMBER 4

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

EDITORIALS

- Let Congress Investigate 88
Eire Plays with Fire 88
The "Loyal Opposition" by Freda Kirchwey 89

ARTICLES

- A Time for Candor by I. F. Stone 91
Brains for the Army by Donald W. Mitchell 92
Can Britain Be Stormed? by Stefan Th. Possony 94
Plaguing Mr. Quisling by Theodor Broch 98
Puerto Rico's New Deal by Louise S. Blanco 100
In the Wind 101
A Native at Large by Jonathan Daniels 102

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

- Red Dragon of Wales by Louis B. Salomon 103
Economics in a Vacuum by Paul M. Sweezy 103
A Realistic Utopia by Rustem Vambery 104
English Compromise by Hilary Sumner-Boyd 105
Good Enough to Be True by Dorothy Van Doren 105
Personal History by Ralph Bates 106
Technology and Power by Charles E. Noyes 106
From Austria to Vermont by Ruth Norden 107
In Brief 108
Drama: Homicide as Fun by Joseph Wood Krutch 108
Dance: Repertory by Sherman Conrad 109
Records by B. H. Haggin 110

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

The Shape of Things

THE CONFERENCE BETWEEN HITLER AND Mussolini has, as usual, ended with an official announcement that the two dictators reached "complete agreement" on all issues. We would not be surprised if this time the statement were true for the unhappy Duce is hardly in a position to disagree with his partner any longer. Since their last meeting his armies have been soundly thrashed in Albania and Libya, his fleet has been chased out of Taranto with heavy losses, and his East African Empire has begun to crumble. Moreover there is good reason to believe that the morale on his home-front, never very good, has seriously deteriorated. He must, therefore, have gone to Hitler as a suppliant begging for more aid, and if this has been promised to him we may be sure he was required to pay a steep price. German troops are occupying strategic points in Italy, German officials are everywhere, and German planes must be relied on to protect Italy's coasts and communications. Just what other forms Nazi assistance will take remains to be seen. A direct effort to rescue the Italian armies from their predicament in Albania and Libya seems unlikely, because of the physical difficulties of sending armies to these battlefields and because of German fears that they would be improperly supported by their ally. There are reports, however, of attempts to bully Greece into making peace by threats of invasion via Bulgaria in the spring. There are also renewed rumors to which London gives some credence of an offensive against Gibraltar. Meanwhile the dictators have to consider the problem of thwarting American aid to Britain. Their present line of propaganda is that they need not worry since it will come too late to affect the outcome of the war. We hope this argument spurs Congress.

✱

THE GERMAN HIGH COMMAND WAS ENTIRELY logical when it inaugurated its program of first-aid to its stricken partner by a sharp attack on a British convoy. For British naval ascendancy in the Mediterranean has been a prime factor both in the defeat of Graziani and in the success of the Greeks. For months the Italians have proved impotent to prevent the transport through "mare nostrum" of supplies and reinforce-

Editor and Publisher

FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor
ROBERT BENDINER

Washington Editor
I. F. STONE

Literary Editor
MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors

KEITH HUTCHISON MAXWELL S. STEWART

Dramatic Critic

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager and Director of Circulation

HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager

MARY HOWARD ELLISON

ments for Egypt and Greece. Worse still, from their point of view, their own lines of communication with Libya have been rendered increasingly hazardous and Graziani has had to face the British onslaught while half-starved of essential material. The arrival of Nazi dive-bombers in Sicily ends for the time being the immunity enjoyed by the British navy in the narrow waters between that island and Africa. Its losses in last week's battle were not crippling but were sufficiently serious to warrant special efforts to forestall a repetition. The Southampton, a modern first-class cruiser, was so seriously damaged that it had to be abandoned and sunk while the aircraft-carrier Illustrious was hit several times and is now believed to be at Malta where it is exposed to renewed attacks. However, the important convoy escorted by these and other vessels arrived safely at its destination. At the same time these attacks have cost the Germans a good many Stukas and they have also suffered from heavy raids on their base at Catania. It remains to be seen whether this new menace will force the British to use the much longer Cape route for their convoys and restore to Italy its communications with Libya. It must be remembered that the range of the Stuka is limited and it should be possible for ships to transverse the danger zone under cover of night.

✱

THE INAUGURATION OF FRANKLIN DELANO

Roosevelt was a solemn rather than a gala occasion. Crowds stood in the clear icy air for hours to get a glimpse of the President who enters his third term in office at one of the most critical moments in our national history. Demonstrations of enthusiasm were frequent but the atmosphere of the ceremony itself was serious, even portentous. And the President's address conveyed the same tone, though both his voice and his words expressed vigorous confidence in the country's future. One of the first official acts to be made known after the inauguration was the appointment of John G. Winant as Ambassador to London. Mr. Winant has many qualifications for the most important diplomatic post. He is sincerely liberal; his interest for years past, particularly as head of the International Labor Organization, has centered in bettering living and working conditions for the masses in all countries. He is also wholly free from any taint of appeasement; his opposition to fascism in all forms is unqualified. He is an attractive person—simple, direct, democratic in manner and feeling. These are fine qualities for the American envoy, especially at a time when Labor is assuming more and more power in the direction of British affairs. But it is also unfortunately true that Mr. Winant is temperamentally both slow to make up his mind and slow to act. It is fortunate that he will be accompanied by a minister experienced in business who will handle negotiations dealing with shipments of war supplies from the United States.

THE RECONCILIATION BETWEEN PETAIN AND Laval is a sign that the "noose" around the French neck has been given another twist. Ever since Laval was ousted on December 13, negotiations between Vichy and Berlin have been virtually suspended. Hitler has ignored the personal letter sent him by Pétain; no progress has been made toward the release of the two million prisoners. The amazing official explanation of Laval's comeback makes no mention of these matters. It insists that the former vice-Premier's dismissal was for imperious reasons of domestic policy which could not be explained to the public: "as a result there was a certain amount of confusion in many minds, which the Paris newspapers did not hesitate to exploit and increase." Since the press in occupied France is entirely pro-Nazi and hand-in-glove with Laval, this is tantamount to an accusation of disloyalty against the latter. Yet, the official statement goes on to explain Pétain has reestablished relations with him in the interests of national unity. At the same time, Vichy reiterates its determination not to use the French fleet against the British and to guard the integrity of the French empire. We wonder how long these brave words will remain uneaten. If Laval again takes charge of negotiations with the Nazis, as seems probable, we can be sure he will do his best to afford Hitler that form of collaboration which he most needs—effective aid against the British Navy.

✱

AN EDITORIAL IN THE NATION LAST WEEK

told how the majority of three members of the Smith committee not only filed a report without consulting its two dissenting members, but filed it too late for the minority to prepare a dissent before the last session of the old Congress. We are glad to report that as one result of that editorial Chairman Howard W. Smith, chairman of the committee, promised on the floor of the House to ask unanimous consent for a suspension of the rules in order to permit the filing of a minority report. Another result was a bitter attack on The Nation by Chairman Smith and Congressman E. E. Cox of Georgia. After reading their speeches and the able reply made by Congressman Arthur D. Healey we see no reason to alter our comment on the conduct of the Smith committee majority. We still feel, in the words of the minority statement issued by Congressman Healey and Senator Abe Murdock, that the "circumstances surrounding the issuance of the final report . . . do not . . . reflect an impartial fact-finding investigation." The report, as issued, contains no indication that it is not a unanimous one, a procedure which we still believe merits the formal rebuke of the House. The plane on which The Nation was attacked may be judged from Congressman Cox's statement that this journal "is as nasty a sheet as soils the newsstands of this country. It is fit for one thing, and it is hardly fit for that."

IT WOULDN'T BE A BAD IDEA IF NAVY DEPARTMENT officials took the trouble to read the Walsh-Healey Act before they tell Congressional committees and the public that it is interfering with defense. Rear Admiral Towers, who has shown an anti-labor attitude in the past, told the House Naval Affairs Committee last week that the Walsh-Healey Act was slowing up defense because subcontractors were unwilling to subject themselves to its terms. It is interesting to note that airplane manufacturers did not make this complaint. It is amusing to record that the day after the Rear Admiral's testimony the Department of Labor issued a statement pointing out that subcontractors are exempt from the wage-and-hour provisions of the act and always have been. Subcontractors are subject only to provisions requiring certain minimum precautions as to sanitation and safety. The Rear Admiral, intentionally or unintentionally, may have aided the lobbies fighting the Walsh-Healey Act but he was hardly contributing to smooth operation of the defense program by his statement. Incidentally, the House Naval Affairs Committee heard a long list of spokesmen for the aircraft industry explain why plane production cannot be speeded up appreciably by new methods, but has yet to hear Walter P. Reuther testify on his plan for making 500 planes a day.

✱

DESPITE SOOTHING STATEMENTS TO THE contrary by E. R. Stettinius, now priorities chief of the Office for Production Management, there seems to be an actual shortage of aluminum. It had earlier been thought that Stettinius was merely being disingenuous when he said there was no shortage, for it has been known that there is a dearth of finishing capacity. Now an exclusive story by C. P. Trussell, Washington correspondent of the Baltimore Sun, reveals that the Reynolds Metal Company is unable to get assurance of enough raw aluminum from the Aluminum Company of America to take care of orders from airplane companies. Trussell cited letters and a memorandum which indicate that Stettinius knew that Reynolds Metal was having trouble procuring aluminum at the time he issued his reassuring statements. Were they designed to allay growing criticism of the fact that the nation's needs in so vital a raw material are at the mercy of one great monopoly? The TNEC believes that the Mellon monopoly has been restricting production to maintain prices. The committee's chairman, Senator O'Mahoney, has been making a private survey of his own and it was this which elicited the Reynolds correspondence. Reynolds, which has a government loan to build an ingot plant, will become the Aluminum Company's only competitor in this field. Perhaps this has something to do with its inability to obtain aluminum ingots for its two fabricating plants.

FURTHER EVIDENCE OF JIM CROWISM AT THE expense of national defense is cited in a letter written by Senator Wagner to Defense Director William S. Knudsen. A few weeks ago The Nation published an article revealing that Negroes are denied the right of serving as pilots in the Air Corps or as officers in the regular army, and are seriously discriminated against in all branches of the service. It now appears that this discrimination has been carried into the defense industries at the expense of vital production. Senator Wagner asserts that certain airplane plants have turned down qualified Negro applicants "solely because of their race or color," even though skilled men are badly needed. Such discriminatory practices are forbidden, but there is no evidence that the Defense Commission has brought pressure against the offending companies. Speaking before a recent session of the Catholic Interracial Council, Charles H. Houston, former dean of the law school at Howard University, brought out additional evidence of discrimination in the armed services. He declared that except for a few Negroes who had enlisted as whites, the Marine Corps contained no Negroes and that the Navy accepted them only as messmen. Such practices, Mr. Houston rightly points out, are grist to the Nazi propaganda mills in Central and South America.

✱

THE UNITED STATES IMMIGRATION SERVICE seems anxious to "overrule" the United States Supreme Court. It has rearrested Joseph G. Strecker and ordered him held for deportation proceedings. Strecker was arrested once before for deportation on the ground that he was a member of the Communist Party. He asserted that he attended a Communist meeting in 1932, that he donated 60 cents and was given a party card, that he didn't know what the card was for and never attended another meeting or paid dues again. The case was fought for six years. The Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals in New Orleans held that membership in the Communist Party was not sufficient proof that an alien was deportable as one who wished to overthrow the government by "force and violence." The Supreme Court upheld the Circuit Court, but on somewhat narrower grounds. It said that the fact that Strecker had once been a member of the Communist Party was not grounds for deportation. The Smith Alien and Sedition law passed by Congress last year contained a provision designed to "correct" the Supreme Court's decision. The word is quoted from a statement made by Congressman Smith to our Washington editor last week. The new provision was intended to make past membership in the Communist Party grounds for deportation. The Supreme Court will now have to decide squarely whether membership in the Communist Party is sufficient evidence of intention to overthrow the government by force to warrant deportation.

Let Congress Investigate

THE National Labor Relations Board has issued proposed findings and a proposed decision in the case concerning the Ford motor company plant at Kansas City. This will be the tenth Labor Board decision against Ford, and this one like its predecessors involves the use by Ford of methods which can only be described as totalitarian in their brutality and lawlessness. The facts, as the Labor Board proposes to find, are that between January, 1937, and September, 1937, the United Automobile Workers Union succeeded in enrolling more than 90 per cent of the workers at the Kansas City plant. It had achieved an oral understanding with the management as to shop stewards, lay-off procedure, and working conditions. On September 17 the plant closed for a change of model. When it reopened two months later, no members of the U. A. W. were taken back. All those hired had to show the blue card of the Independent Union of Ford Workers. The board proposes to order the reinstatement of 1,021 U. A. W. members, their reimbursement for pay lost, and the disestablishment of the Independent Union as a company-dominated labor union.

On March 27, 1937, the Kansas City Star carried an interview with Henry Ford in which he was quoted as advising his employees to stay out of unions. "Those who join," Ford was quoted as saying, "will be like the turkey—they'll get it in the neck eventually." The Nation would like to know, in Ford's words, whether Ford or the worker is to "get it in the neck." It would like to know whether he is to continue as the beneficiary of favoritism by the Defense Commission and the Quartermaster Corps of the United States Army despite his continued violations of the Wagner Act.

To give Ford a contract for so desperately needed a defense item as plane engines may be excusable, though the terms of the contract are very profitable and we find it hard to believe that Ford would not obey the Wagner Act if he had to. But whatever the pros and cons of the engine contract, there is no reason for the favoritism still being shown Ford on the $1,400,000 contract for "midget cars," the details of which were first revealed by the Washington editor of The Nation in our issue of December 14. As our readers will recall, in this case the General Staff of the army was black-jacked by the Defense Commission into giving Ford a contract for a certain type of military car which a small manufacturer had developed and was fully able to supply. One contract went to this small manufacturer for 1,500 cars for extended field tests. The General Staff did not wish to place more orders until after these tests were completed. Ford had not shown that he could meet specifications on the car, the most important of which was a maximum weight of 2,000 pounds. Army experts feel that a heavier car would lose its usefulness and had originally tried to obtain a 1,000-pound car. Since the appearance of The Nation's article, Ford has succeeded in getting the specifications raised to 2,160 pounds—the weight he can match. He has also obtained priority over the small manufacturer on the axles, the "bottleneck" in production of this midget car. The Nation's Washington dispatch had predicted that these would be Ford's next steps.

Both the President and Secretary of War Stimson were misinformed as to the true facts about this Ford contract; it was represented to them as a contract for an essential article that could not be obtained in sufficient quantity without Ford. We believe that if the President, as Commander-in-Chief, calls in his Chief of Staff General Marshall, he will find that the facts as The Nation has reported them are correct and that the award of this contract to Ford was scandalous favoritism and a gratuitous slap in the face of labor. The Nation believes this contract cries out for a Congressional investigation, that an inquiry will show that military efficiency is being impaired by this kind of favoritism to Ford and that he seems to have altogether too much influence in both the Defense Commission and the Quartermaster Corps.

The contract is far from being a fait accompli. So far as The Nation can learn it has yet to be actually drafted and signed. If the original specifications are restored, as army experts would like them to be, Ford will be unable to meet specifications and the award can be voided. If the contract contains a clause requiring Ford to obey the labor laws, he will probably—as Washington representatives have boasted—refuse to sign the contract. Here lies the War Department's way out.

Eire Plays with Fire

A NUMBER of recent events suggest that Ireland's day of reckoning is not far off. Rumors of German invasion are becoming more insistent. Domestic difficulties, including a serious shortage of food, have brought the war to Eire despite its attempt to remain neutral. And within the past week the British press has started a campaign urging the government to reclaim its former naval bases with or without Ireland's consent.

A majority of the Irish people undoubtedly support Prime Minister de Valera in his determination to keep Eire out of the war; the question is how long he can continue to walk a tight rope on the edge of the Battle of Britain. The very strength of British resistance is an invitation to the Nazis to attempt to close Britain's back door by seizing Ireland. Although the occupation of Ireland would bring the Germans no closer to Britain than they are now, the establishment of Nazi air and naval bases on the island might make an invasion of England unnecessary.

Eire's defenses against a German attack are negligible. Periodic attempts have been made to build up its forces, but at most it has no more than 250,000 poorly equipped soldiers and no navy or air force worthy of the name. The British navy and the R. A. F., paradoxically enough, are the bulwark of Irish neutrality. Britain is also reputed to have an army of 250,000 first-class troops in Northern Ireland ready to resist a Nazi invasion. With the aid of the Irish, whose fighting abilities are well known, the British can make an invasion of Ireland difficult and costly, but without air and naval bases in Eire it is doubtful that they could prevent Hitler from seizing the island if he threw his full strength into the attempt. Although the Germans describe the series of bombings in the vicinity of Dublin during the first week of January as a "regrettable mistake," they were in all probability reconnaissance flights preparatory to more decisive measures later on.

Nazi charges that the British government intends to reoccupy the naval bases may for once have some foundation. There can be no question that the bases are of the utmost importance in protecting British sea lanes to the Western Hemisphere from attack by Nazi planes and submarines. As a matter of fact, the protection of these sea lanes is almost as vital to Ireland as it is to Britain, since Ireland, too, is suffering acutely from the German blockade. But although dependent on British sea power for the food and raw materials necessary to keep its people alive, Ireland has stubbornly refused to consider restoring the needed bases even temporarily. Churchill has done everything within his power to impress on De Valera the danger of his course. The possibility of unity between North Ireland and Eire has been brought forward as an inducement. But like the Dutch and Belgians a year ago, the Irish have clung to the illusion that no one would attack them if they maintained a scrupulous neutrality—and they have regarded a leasing of the bases as a departure from strict impartiality. Having exhausted all possibility of persuasion, the British government may be forced in self-defense to seize the bases without consent of the Irish government.

It is to be devoutly hoped that this extreme action can be avoided. For Britain can ill afford to resort to the tactics of the totalitarian aggressors even in self-defense. But it is clear that Eire cannot enjoy the advantages of British protection indefinitely without accepting some of the responsibility. This does not mean that Ireland necessarily need enter the war. The leasing of the bases to Britain will not precipitate a Nazi invasion unless Hitler has already decided to attack. And it might prevent it. For the existence of strongly fortified air and naval bases on the southern coast matching the powerful defenses in Ulster would make invasion extremely difficult.

The "Loyal Opposition"

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

THE PRESIDENT'S aid-to-Britain bill will go through. It will be modified, no doubt, as it should be, but in the end Mr. Roosevelt will get the powers necessary to meet an emergency that is great now and sure to grow worse in the months immediately ahead. The opposition to the bill is not to be gauged by its noise and truculence. It is a weak opposition representing, I am sure, minority opinion. Joseph P. Kennedy's speech was temperate in tone but essentially specious and contradictory. And in general the attack on the bill has been violent and self-defeating. Senator Wheeler's inexcusable taunt that according to the President's plan every fourth American boy would be "plowed under" disgusted even vigorous opponents of aid to England. The various interventions of Roy Howard are having a similar effect. Perhaps his recent heroic success in pushing William Allen White out on a rather shaky limb went to Mr. Howard's head, because he then tried to work the same trick on Wendell Willkie.

But Mr. Willkie is tough, apparently quite as tough as Mr. Howard himself. When Howard urged him to oppose the aid-to-Britain bill, he refused; when Howard urged him at least to come out for serious modifications, he refused again. Then, according to informed reports of the episode both published and unpublished, Howard threatened to "break" Willkie politically if he persisted in supporting the measure. Mr. Willkie persisted, and for his integrity and plain speech he deserves much credit. Perhaps, recalling November 5, he found consolation in reflecting that the enmity of Roy Howard may be less costly than his friendship. In any case that reflection will encourage supporters of the President's bill for by this time it has become almost an axiom that people and measures which are assailed by Howard and his general staff of columnists are not only apt to be good; they are also apt to be victorious. The same is true of the objects of the Chicago Tribune's venomous attacks. People discount them and begin to suspect that some motive of self-interest lies behind this unaccustomed passion for peace and pure democracy. And the more closely they look the better reasons they find for their suspicions.

The real root of the objection to sending all possible aid to Britain is beginning to emerge. It has been exposed by the innocent Mark Sullivan in the New York Herald Tribune. Mr. Sullivan professes to favor sending supplies to England but he asks plaintively every few days what in the name of Herbert Hoover are we planning to salvage over there. Will it be socialism? Some of the columnists—even including Mr. Sullivan's next-page neighbors—say it will be and so do the British Labor people; if they are right, Mr. Sullivan believes we'd better think twice before we decide to help defeat Hitler. Mr. Howard, according to reports, is no less worried by the specter of socialism in England and by the large part Labor leaders are playing in the Churchill government. And even the carefully chosen words of Mr. Kennedy betray the same set of fears. He warns us that a protracted war may leave Europe a prey to Russian ambition and conjures up a picture of our sons and grandsons patrolling the Continent to put down revolutions.

And so, once more, as in Britain under Chamberlain, the reactionaries begin to ask whether the defeat of fascism is really as important as the maintenance of the status quo (again forgetting, in their panic, the fate of capital and "free enterprise" in the countries under Nazi control); only this time they cast fearful glances toward a "socialist" England just as their British counterparts worried over "socialist" Spain and "socialist" France in 1936 and 1937 and 1938. And when one sees this same mood arising, these same tactics emerging in the fight against an American policy of resistance to the dictators, one is tempted to despair. But only for a moment. If Roy Howard and Herbert Hoover and William R. Castle and Charles A. Lindbergh would rather risk fascism than the chance of social change, their preference is shared by very few people.

It is true that new social arrangements will inevitably emerge from the vast destruction of the war; it is true that, if fascism is defeated, popular uprisings are almost certain to occur throughout Europe, and in Britain the balance of power will shift toward the workers and their allies in the middle classes. It is not to be expected that Mr. Howard and his fellow appeasers enjoy that prospect. Nor can it be denied that for all of us the future holds threat as well as promise. The most one can hope for at a time of great decision like the present is an honest appraisal of the alternatives. If Britain is actually defeated, its democracy wiped out, its navy sunk or captured, its Empire taken over—what in cold fact will be in store for us and for the world? Secretaries Hull and Stimson and Knox have answered this question; in addition they have said as clearly as they dared that such a catastrophe is not only possible but almost certain unless help to Britain from America is enormously increased—and quickly. They have answered, but apparently the appeasement clique distrusts their facts or their judgment. Otherwise it would give up its suicidal opposition; the men I have named may be shy of social vision, but they are not traitors.

The facts, however, are all too clear. The testimony of the department heads has been backed by the figures of experts in the government and by private research. The most impressive recent argument for increased shipments is to be found in a small book "Fivefold Aid to Britain" by Fritz Sternberg, who has contributed many articles on economic warfare to The Nation and other journals. Mr. Sternberg shows in graphic charts and compact sentences how far short of the necessities of the situation our efforts are falling. Even under the new defense budget our expenditures for military purposes will be less than Germany's at the start of the war and less than half the amount Germany is spending today after seven years of intensive rearmament. Experts believe that Germany's total airplane production in comparison with Britain's is $2\frac{1}{2}$ to 1; Mr. Sternberg offers figures to show that it would be necessary to ship as many as 1,500 planes a month to England to overcome the Nazi lead. A similarly great increase in steel shipments is required. Today, out of our vast capacity of 83,000,000 tons, Britain is getting 8,600,000. This added to the steel production of the Empire provides a total of 25,000,000 tons, while Germany's resources, including the production of the occupied territory, amount to 42,000,000 tons. The United States must increase its steel shipments to 30,000,000 tons if Britain is to be given a safe margin for defense. Mr. Sternberg sums up the situation succinctly in terms of hours of work. Today while both Britain and Germany give four working hours daily to armament production, the United States gives thirty minutes to the same task. Under the fifty-fifty plan announced by the President—though not actually in effect—American industry devote fifteen minutes a day to producing Britain's war needs. If this could be increased to one hour, Britain would be saved. "One hour of American labor corresponds to production valued at \$12,000,000,000 per year. Such a volume would soon enable Britain to equalize her armament production with that of Germany." So Mr. Sternberg.

As I said above I don't believe the fear of social change which, consciously or otherwise, dominates most of the leaders in the fight against increased aid to Britain is shared by the people in general. Nobody wants to see Europe collapse into a succession of civil wars and revolutions. But neither does anyone want or believe in a return to the do-nothing policies that wrecked the hope of collective security and gave Hitler his chance. The rise to power in England of Labor men and leaders of progressive thought may have frightened Mr. Sullivan, but it has given millions of Americans reason to hope that this war will not necessarily end in another period of reaction and nationalist conflict. The growing belief that capitalism in its old forms can never be revived will create enthusiasm rather than fear in the heart of the ordinary American. He is no socialist but he is a man who read Mr. Howard's newspapers and then went out and voted for Roosevelt. Today he will back the President's demand for emergency powers and help to England; and he will do it for much the same reasons.

A Time for Candor

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, January 19

THIS is written at the close of the first week of hearings on the lease-lend bill before the House Foreign Affairs Committee. By the time this letter appears the fireworks will have begun. Kennedy, Norman Thomas, and Hanford MacNider will have been heard in opposition to the bill. Lindbergh and Hugh Johnson will be before the committee. Perhaps the sharpest impression left by the hearings so far is their undramatic character. The occasion itself is, in a word worn shabby on lesser events, historic. We may be on the eve of the greatest armed struggle of all time. The Navy Department is certainly thinking in terms of protecting Singapore; the War Department may well be thinking of a landing at Dakar. The State Department, in its own devious way, is dicker with Franco and Stalin, Chiang and Weygand. In Belgrade and in Ankara, the newspapers postpone their press time three hours so that they can present the full text of the American President's message to Congress. We are reaching out for imperial responsibilities and have become the focus of world-wide hopes and fears.

If 1776 stands as the symbol of our emergence from colonial status to independence, H. R. 1776 is the symbol of our determination a century and a half later to decide the destiny of the world. It seems foolish for isolationists to believe, after the extraordinary events of the past few years, that we can afford to make the same mistake about the British that the British made about the Czechs and the Spanish Republic. But it also seems unwise for interventionists to shut their eyes to the logic of the steps they propose and the commitments entailed. The lend-lease bill circumvents the Johnson Act and the Neutrality Act, perhaps also the national debt limitation.

It unquestionably places war-time powers in the hands of the President. The urgent necessities of the moment justify so sweeping a grant of authority, but they do not justify pretense in a situation that requires as much cool thinking as we can muster. The issues raised are momentous and deserve momentous presentation, but none of the Administration spokesmen during the first week of hearings was equal to the occasion.

First came Hull, as evasive as he always is with Congressional committees. He seems to find it hard ever to give a straight answer to a straight question. Morgenthau, flanked by five experts, whom he consulted on almost every question, was disarmingly meek, with the humility of a man who recognizes his own limitations.

Stimson was franker and commanded more respect than either, but like Hull seemed appallingly the elderly gentleman caught up in a world of lightning war. Knox showed a vigor that they conspicuously lack and Knudsen seemed consciously the bashful Great Dane exploiting his natural charm. All five put together added very little to our knowledge of the lease-lend bill, and the aggregate impression left by their testimony was not one of candor.

The House Foreign Relations Committee is no repository of genius, but after watching it for a few days one gets to like its members.

They are as American as apple pie. The absence of brilliance makes them seem all the more representative of the decent democratic average, and with few exceptions they seem sincerely trying to do their best. The questions they ask tend to fumble, but so do the questions that most people ask about the bill, and in most cases they deserved plainer answers than they got. The committee has its oddities, chief among them its chairman. Sol Bloom perches his black ribboned pince nez on his nose at the angle of George Arliss playing Disraeli, but there the resemblance ends. Johnson of Texas, the ranking majority member, seems to be the brains on the Democratic side. To the majority members the hearings so far have seemed a formality. They already have the votes needed for passage in both Senate and House.

Secretary of War Stimson

The House Foreign Affairs Committee is split along straight party lines on this bill; the handsome gray-haired Eaton of New Jersey seems to be the only Republican for it. The Republican members on the whole give an impression of genuine concern and sincerity, and I think no greater mistake could be made than to call their honesty and patriotism into question. Mrs. Rogers and Vorys of Ohio, stand out in this respect. I must confess that I took a dislike to Mundt of South Dakota, and some of his pettifogging questions. Fish, the ranking minority member, could not suppress a smirk of satisfaction as the camera flashlights boomed at the opening of the hearings and Tinkham gave the appearance of a ham actor playing prosecutor. Some of his questions deserved a better source and he made what was perhaps the most incisive remark of the first week of hearings. He asked Morgenthau whether the President could give away the Navy under the lend-lease bill and the Secretary replied that he thought that a violent assumption. "We are living in days," Tinkham retorted, "when the most violent assumption is apt to be the most correct assumption." No one recalled to him that he and his fellows regard it as a "violent assumption" that the United States will be in danger from the Third Reich if Great Britain is defeated.

A certain air of unreality has hung over the hearings so far, as of persons going through the motions before reaching a foregone conclusion. The Administration spokesmen said what was expected of them, and evaded most of the crucial questions. The Republicans for the most part fell back into the old rut of suspecting Roosevelt of intending to make himself a dictator; they have cried "wolf" so often that they can hardly take themselves too seriously. Much of the time the Republican members, as their party colleague Eaton complained, were chasing up "rabbit tracks" rather than keeping to the main issues. The feeblest theorizing of the hearings was Hull's excuse that we were substituting the "law of self-preservation" for international law; the one novel idea put forward was Knox's proposal for a customs union of all the nations in the Western hemisphere. Both Stimson and Knox will no doubt blush in the near future over their assurances to the committee that there is no intention under the bill to convoy merchant ships to Great Britain. It is hard to see what else we can do to lend additional aid to Britain within the next few months. For behind the question of lending or leasing materials to Britain is the more basic question of manufacturing these materials in sufficient time and quantity to be of help.

To the solution of this question the bill makes no contribution. The hearings themselves do, but in an unintended form. One came away from them impressed by the need for younger and abler leadership if the giant bureaucracies of army, navy, and business are to be shaken out of their customary ways of doing things. Until they are, the inadequacy of our present production effort and its business-as-usual pace will continue to endanger not only our British outpost but our own security.

Brains for the Army

BY DONALD W. MITCHELL

YESTERDAY'S American army is vanishing with the delivery of each new order for modern equipment and the induction into service of each new group of conscripts. Small in numbers and unable either to inflict or withstand a Blitzkrieg, it simply failed to measure up to the demands of total war. There can be only one real reason for regret at its disappearance, and that is the fact that too little close analysis of its deficiencies was made as the basis for planning the army of tomorrow. Between May and August, 1940, the War Department changed its mind half a dozen times regarding the size and make-up of the force which should constitute America's future army. Expert recruited armies of first 280,000, later 400,000, were discussed and then rejected as it became apparent that the Congressional demand for defense would support a mass force based on conscription.

Some of the weaknesses of the old American army stood out plainly. Anyone acquainted with military affairs knew that it was deficient in artillery and tanks, that most of its planes were too old, that the supply of ammunition was inadequate and in poor condition. Even worse was the condition of our coast defenses, particularly along the Atlantic seaboard. Guns were of short range and were not camouflaged; the mine-planting service had been dismantled; garrisons at the forts amounted to little more than caretakers. Now in many respects the army can be said to be modernized: it has unlimited funds at its disposal, it can draw on the industrial capacity of the country, and it has obtained, through conscription, a sufficient supply of men. But more needs to be done if we are to have a strong military force. We need to be assured that 1941 weapons are not to be directed by 1918 brains.

The abundant current literature dealing with the fall of France has had one bad effect. Written chiefly by civilians, it has tended to underemphasize the purely military aspects of the French defeat. There can be no doubt that even if no fifth column had operated, France would still have been vanquished, though possibly the collapse would have been slower and less complete. When the Germans opened their attack they were estimated to have eighty divisions as against sixty-five Allied divisions—a difference in numbers too small to be decisive in any battle fought according to World War patterns. Germany won this battle not by weight of numbers but because its attack embodied a complete revolution in military science.

There is not space to review all the reasons for the German military success. To some extent they are already rather widely known. Bombing by planes took the place of artillery fire in preparing the way for the successive attacks of break-through tanks, assault tanks, motorized infantry, and, lastly, regular infantry. This method of attack, together with the use of parachute troops and plane bombing to disrupt enemy communications, constituted Hitler's revolution in the science of war. Lieutenant General Drum, one of our more alert soldiers, has analyzed the reasons for German success as follows: (1) air superiority coupled with close coordination between air and ground forces; (2) attacks by heavy and light tanks, preceded by aerial bombardment and closely supported by mechanized infantry; (3) the use of large mechanized forces; (4) speed, intense fire power, and continuity of pressure; (5) highly trained officers and men prepared for the performance of their exact roles; (6) simplified supply. To these might well be added the fact that the High Command was much younger and, above all, better supplied with and more hospitable to new ideas than that of any other army in the world. This condition really made possible many of the other factors in German success. Against young men and new methods the old generals and World War army of France never had a chance.

Even more than modern equipment, then, a strong military force needs a progressive, forward-thinking High Command. In our own army there are plenty of officers who have both practical intelligence and vision. Dive-bombing was first practiced in the United States army. The use of armored divisions was anticipated here as early as 1930; in the succeeding years our army had numerous champions of the increased use of tanks. Our designs for tanks and planes, as well as the few machines built on these designs, lead the world. No army aviators elsewhere can rival those of the United States in accurate bombing, though this fact is mainly due to the navy's invention of the world's best bomb sights.

Why, then, with this background of innovation, is our army now frantically aping the Germans? The reason is that in the American army the men with the best brains do not hold the highest jobs. Our army professionals in the higher ranks remain extraordinarily impervious to progress. Thus while American officers were the first to foresee Panzer divisions, their ideas were not utilized by the United States army but remained on paper—for the more alert Germans to copy and improve upon. After inventing dive-bombing as an aid to infantry attack, the Army Air Corps stupidly abandoned it. With the best types of planes and by far the best bombing in the world our army made a tardy attempt to coordinate aviation with infantry only in its latest maneuvers, and then with very indifferent success, according to observers.

For some of this backwardness Congressional niggardliness can be blamed. When the matter of appropriations came up, few persons in Congress insisted that the army, however small, should be thoroughly well equipped and up to date. But too much of the responsibility rests with the army itself. General Marshall, Chief of Staff, has been quoted as admitting that our army costs more than twenty times as much, in proportion to its size, as certain good foreign forces. A large part of this greater expense can be laid to higher pay and costlier equipment, but much of it is due to poor management and inefficiency. The United States has long maintained more than 170 army posts, scattered all over the country. The scheme affords many men an opportunity to command and provides political plums for certain districts, but it gives no good opportunity for maneuvers with modern weapons or large bodies of troops. These posts, moreover, most of them dating from the Indian wars, serve no conceivable defense purpose. And while this inefficient and expensive system has been eating up the funds, the army has on several occasions failed to spend the money appropriated for such a highly necessary but unpopular branch of the service as Chemical Warfare.

In the last maneuvers men went into action without specific instructions or more than a very general idea of the objective of their own operations. In some cases transportation of food broke down completely, and men were without food for more than a day. In the state of Washington officers and men were ordered to wear woolen uniforms in 100 degrees of heat and to employ candles and lamps instead of easily available electricity. The use of substitute weapons, the lack of essential supplies, and the greenness of the new men took away from the impressiveness of these mock battles.

Much of the mental heaviness in higher ranks is attributable to our method of promotion of officers. Few people connected with the navy regard its promotion practices as satisfactory, but the navy discarded forty years ago the method that is still used in the army—that of straight seniority. If he passes the routine examinations and has a record of reasonably good conduct, the army officer is assured of steady, if slow, advancement. There is no reward for new ideas or brilliant work. At times these may even be penalized, for new ideas sometimes create discomfort for a superior officer. Thus our scheme for advancement exalts mediocrity. While our officers are not, as a whole, as old as those of France, retirement at sixty-four being enforced, they are considerably older than men of the same rank in the modern Germany army, whose leaders from Hitler down have not permitted themselves to become enmeshed in the practices of the past.

With conscription the army is now getting a better class of privates. The recruiting campaigns of former years succeeded in attracting mainly the able-bodied misfits of civil life. In the old army the opportunity for advancement was strictly limited. Pay, while nominally equal to that in the navy, was in reality only a little over half as large, since the army had fewer high ratings, and promotion to them was much more difficult. With the increased mechanization of the modern army opportunity both for education and promotion should be broadened.

From some standpoints Germany's successes have been the best thing that ever happened to the United States army. They have jarred a sizeable number of the higher officers out of their complacency and forced them to consider new problems. In the making of the new American army three points of view are represented. A small number of our younger officers, the most intelligent and progressive of their calling, wish to carry the German revolution in army organization to its logical conclusion and mechanize a very large proportion of our army. They argue, with a great deal of truth, that an armored division is cheaper, in proportion to its greatly enhanced power, than any other type of organization. A less progressive but much more numerous group favors a very close copying of the German technique of war. They have been impressed by the tactics and success but have not fully grasped the innovating spirit of the German war machine. Officers of this type defend the use of horses and mules for transport and wish to have both Panzer divisions and huge forces of the older non-mechanized infantry, since the Germans also had both. They tend to overlook the main point of German tactics—that armored and mechanized units were employed to the greatest extent that equipment permitted, and that large forces of ordinary infantry were used, not because of any greater effectiveness, but because the introduction of machinery into war was less than complete. A third group, possibly the largest of the three, is still professionally asleep. It wishes to continue with the same organization and tactics as it used in the World War, or at best make only slight changes in procedure. The views of this group are represented in the practice of giving the new armored divisions only half the anti-aircraft equipment of the German Panzer units. Another example of this attitude is found in the report of a general who criticized the excessive movement of troops by truck rather than afoot in the last maneuvers.

In no branch of human endeavor is the lack of technical progress punished more severely than in the art of making war. Yet, paradoxically, no group seems in general more averse to progress than the oligarchy near the top of modern armies. Though the obsolescence of the entire military system of the past has been demonstrated by Hitler, our own army has been late in making a new start, late even in ordering what it needs. Much of its recent progress has been haphazard rather than the result of effort to reach a definite and well-considered goal. Mr. Knudsen does not believe we shall have the equipment for a force of two million men before July, 1944. Will new tactics, more effective organization, a more intelligent High Command, and an entirely new spirit of open-mindedness and progress be present even by July, 1944? The effectiveness of American defense depends upon the answer to this question.

Can Britain Be Stormed?

BY STEFAN TH. POSSONY

EVERYBODY expected Hitler to attempt the invasion of Great Britain last summer. The conditions seemed favorable. At the end of July England had almost no organized army; British fighting forces rescued from Dunkirk had left most of their equipment on the French shore; the R. A. F. was not in good form; the Home Guards, though already drafted, had not yet been organized; and the morale of the British people, who for the first time in centuries faced a serious threat to their own homes, was not of the best. Yet Hitler refrained from attacking. For this he must have had very strong reasons. What were they?

Since it is most unlikely that Hitler held back in the expectation of an early—and advantageous—negotiated peace, we may assume that the reasons were military. Evidently he lacked the military means necessary for the invasion of Great Britain—troops drilled for the specific purpose and material specially adapted to conditions of war across the Channel. German soldiers had been trained for war in Holland, Belgium, and France. They had been trained on replicas of French and Belgian fortifications constructed in Poland and had learned to attack these efficiently and to conquer them by subtle ruses. They knew how to achieve and how to exploit a break-through and could execute a war of movement. Not only was the German infantry prepared in this specialized manner, but the Luftwaffe, the Panzer divisions, the parachutists, and the motorized artillery could be employed efficiently only in western Continental Europe. It is to this special training that Germany's lightning victories may be attributed rather than to a qualitative or quantitative superiority of material. In addition the German General Staff had thought out countless stratagems and ruses to make even the strongest positions of the Allies worthless. Neither such training nor such artfulness can be improvised in a few weeks.

With the fall of France, Germany faced, across the Channel, an enemy of whose defense system it had no special knowledge. This system had to be thoroughly explored; then the tricks had to be thought out; and only after this preparatory work was done could drill be started. It takes many months for soldiers to learn entirely new tactics.

The first invasion plan was to use barges which could be piloted so near to the coast that the soldiers could jump ashore and make a traditional infantry assault. Apparently the Nazis have now abandoned this idea. It was unlikely that the British navy would let a large number of barges go through, and even more unlikely that disembarked infantry could crush the British defenses without the support of heavy arms. Hitler therefore felt constrained to postpone his invasion until he could improve his armaments and his soldiers' training. Otherwise he would have risked a new Gallipoli under dangerous conditions.

So far as weapons were concerned, most of those successfully used on the Continent would not be practicable to cover a landing. The most important weapons required for such a venture are amphibian tanks capable of crossing the Channel under their own power; swift armored barges provided with special runways and cranes for landing heavy material quickly under enemy fire—land tanks, guns, and airport supplies; an important number of speed boats (E-Boote) to prevent interference by the British navy; monitors to bring artillery to bear on landing operations; and, of course, airplanes, destroyers, and submarines to cover the flank of the invasion force. Of all these weapons Germany, in July, 1940, had only the Luftwaffe in sufficient strength. The production of everything else began only then.

Not much imagination is needed to foretell invasion strategy, once the necessary weapons are ready. The Nazis will attempt to paralyze and disorganize the British defense line by dive-bombing. They will make a feigned or even a real attack of secondary importance, against Ireland or Scotland, in order to start all British forces moving in the wrong direction. Using their entire naval force, including a new 35,000-ton battleship and possibly another ship of the same size, they will risk a sea battle, certainly not with the hope of destroying the British navy, but with the intention of crippling Britain's naval striking power, even if the price is the total sacrifice of the Nazi fleet. By mass use of speed boats they will attempt to neutralize superior British sea power. Such a hope is not quite so silly as it sounds, since rapidly zig-zagging speed boats can be hit by naval artillery only by chance, and can almost never be hit by air bombs; they can therefore easily get close enough to their targets to discharge their two or four torpedoes. Of all surface warships speed boats probably offer the greatest danger to the British navy. Moreover, it is possible that Hitler has adopted the famous Japanese man-steered torpedo.

If Hitler succeeds in neutralizing the British navy and the R. A. F., then Great Britain must fall back on its coastal defense. This the Germans are confident they can crush with amphibian tanks, monitor gunnery, and dive-bombers. They rely especially on the insufficient caliber of British anti-tank artillery and on the speed and fire concentration of the monitors. Once a bridgehead is established—and it goes without saying that parachutists will play an important role in accomplishing this—once the British fleet is crippled and supply lines are organized, the Blitzkrieg can begin, and it will not be against a strong Maginot Line but against light field works. Having gained a foothold on the British Isles, the Nazis will then have the long-awaited chance to use the overwhelming quantity of material that gave them victory on the Continent.

The situation might be considered very grave if Britain had neither improved nor increased its armaments since July, and if Germany had succeeded in producing all the material it lacked at that time. But these conditions fortunately do not exist. Instead of years of peace devoted exclusively to production of armaments, Germany has had only a brief time for the preparation of specialized material, and its efforts have been hampered by actual warfare. Even if, as is possible, the British blockade and air raids have not reduced the German war production very much, they certainly have not facilitated it. A decrease of the German armament output can therefore be assumed. Moreover, the new implements of war that Germany must now produce are much more complicated than those manufactured in the past. For instance, motors for speed boats, monitors, and amphibian tanks are of completely new design and must be higher-powered by far than even the best airplane motors. The present American experience is proof enough of the kind of bottleneck that may slow up the fabrication of even less complex motors. It is clear that Hitler's industrial situation has deteriorated at a time when his most difficult undertaking still lies ahead.

Disregarding the new planes which both sides may

Drawing by Kelen
A. V. Alexander, Laborite First
Lord of the Admiralty

spring as a surprise in the decisive hour, German numerical superiority in the air has declined. Moreover, the Luftwaffe can help invading troops only in daylight operations, and its daylight attacks have been generally turned into smashing and costly defeat by the R. A. F.; the famous Stukas cannot be expected to repeat their earlier exploits. Over British soil they will not only be met by important fighter forces—in France they seldom saw enemy fighters—but by superior planes. Moreover, the British are now accustomed to the noise of dive-bombing. This is very important; French soldiers were not demoralized by the effect of the bombs but by their sirens. The English are too accustomed to them to be stampeded. That means that the Germans probably cannot conquer British positions by the Luftwaffe alone, but will be obliged to rely heavily on artillery. This necessity greatly increases the difficulties of invasion, since with only a bridgehead achieved, it will not be easy to bring artillery across the Channel or to organize the transport of bulky artillery supplies.

While no figures are available on the exact quantity of British material on hand, it is known that more than the minimum required for defense is available, and that a large increase is to be expected as soon as American supplies start flowing in. Theoretically, Britain already has sufficient to prevent the Germans from gaining a bridgehead, and certainly sufficient to block a Blitzkrieg on land. To this favorable quantitative ratio one must add the fact that most of the British armaments are now much superior in quality to the German. There is danger, however, that Britain lacks the specialized weapons it needs to fight speed boats, armored transports, and amphibian tanks in the Channel. For such targets England needs speed boats similar to those the aggressor will use, though with different equipment. Instead of torpedoes, British boats should carry anti-tank guns of large caliber, heavy machine-guns, and perhaps flame-projectors, and they must be well armored. Such boats would be the only efficient weapon against German invasion tactics.

Against the German navy when it seeks battle, equivalent British units must be used, equipped with mines, depth bombs, and torpedoes. If some of these weapons are lacking, England has developed other useful devices against invasion, such as burning oil released from underwater containers placed along the shore. Should an insufficient number of speed boats compel it to rely on the regular fleet, it will obviously suffer great losses, though there can be no doubt of the navy's ability to deal efficiently with large sea-borne invasion weapons of any kind. Therefore, even if we admit the feasibility of a few German bridgeheads on British soil, these will be established only at very great cost. To achieve them Hitler will not hesitate to sacrifice millions of human lives, including possibly the élite of his army, but such losses will lessen the striking power of the troops expected to carry on the attack against the defenses of Britain.

Let us examine the situation that will develop if Hitler by one device or another, and against all expectations, succeeds in launching a powerful attack from his bridgeheads. Britain will then be confronted with the danger that its military leadership and tactics will not be a match for German military leadership and tactics. If Britain is strongly armed, this will not matter very much. Successful defense with inferior armaments is, however, not practicable unless intelligence can be substituted for material. Given Britain's lack of medium and heavy tanks, the outlook would be bad if the British General Staff were still clinging to outdated French tactics. But if the British have really learned something, if they can make up for their material inferiority by mental and moral superiority, if they will use the weapons they have more intelligently than they used them in France, the outlook for England is excellent. Fortunately, the British General Staff did learn something in France. To be sure, there is still room for improvement in the British war administration, but Britain's best military brains are now employed at responsible posts, and the Libyan and Albanian campaigns, like the reorganization of the defense of the British Isles, show that British military leaders have finally adapted their ideas and methods to modern conditions.

Resistance to Panzer divisions does not necessarily require an equal number of tanks on the defender's side. If the defender has equality, of course no attack will be practicable. If the defender's tank inferiority is very great, he must rely on modern guerrilla tactics. To these the swift but almost blind armored cars are extremely vulnerable, especially when they are going through towns or along highways. Guerrilla tactics make use of natural obstacles, camouflage, explosives, hand grenades, fire, artificial fog. The tanks are attacked from close quarters, not from a distance as in France. Such tactics proved effective in Spain, where the Loyalists were completely without anti-tank artillery. For guerrilla tactics troops must be very well trained and in good condition. The defense must be organized in deep échelons, and the troops must be dispersed all over the country, but always in contact with strong points d'appui. If the Panzer divisions are continuously attacked by invisible fighters and impeded by numerous traps they will be decimated. The deeper they invade the country the less striking power they retain. Moreover, communications between the Panzers and the slower-moving infantry can be cut. Since without the support of tanks, infantry cannot break through well-defended lines, and since tanks without infantry cannot occupy terrain, any cutting off of the Panzer divisions is tantamount to stopping the offensive. If the French General Staff had reacted more vigorously when the poche of Amiens was quite empty of German infantry, the Battle of France would have had a different end.

We may be sure that the worst tactical blunders of the French army will not be repeated by the British. The French, it will be remembered, blew up their bridges—often incompletely—but failed to defend the fords or to use the rivers in attempts to split the German forces. Another French mistake was to attack the superior German tanks with inferior French tanks. If the French had used their tanks in masses instead of in dribbles, and not against German tanks but against communications and infantry, they might have obtained results. The French were also handicapped by the immobility of their artillery, a hazard absent in Great Britain, for the British now have very effective mobile and armored guns.

There is a further reason why the military situation in Britain today can be considered much better than it was in France last June. Nearly everywhere French territory was abandoned without the slightest attempt to defend it. French troops retreated to avoid isolation by encirclement, and the French population was neither trained nor armed to defend the ground. By now the British troops have been prepared to continue to fight even in isolation, and the task of the Home Guard is to defend each single village to the last. Hence the Germans will have to storm each town, each village, each bridge, each crossing, and such continuous and stubborn defense will rapidly weaken the Nazi onslaught. Nor should the effectiveness of the British aviation as a supporting force be left out of the calculation. Thus if the British carry out their defense in the expected manner, the German superiority in material will be overcome.

All this explains why the Nazis are at present in a quandary. On the one hand, their invasion supplies are not ready; on the other, England's power is growing steadily. Thus the longer Hitler waits, the worse his chances grow. If he does not risk invasion in the near future—even with incomplete armaments—he can never win the war. If he does risk invasion and fails, the bulk of his army will be destroyed, and his prestige severely damaged. Only two possibilities are open to him: he can maneuver to avoid the decisive battle—as Frederick the Great did throughout the last years of the Seven Years War—in the hope that a protracted war of attrition will finally lead to a negotiated peace. Or he can cross his Rubicon. He may be expected to choose the latter course, since it is the logical outcome of his temper and psychology. Hitler has customarily escaped from embarrassments by fleeing forward. And his opponents have generally been so surprised by his audacity that they could not react quickly enough to stop him. That is why Hitler firmly believes that what seems least possible is the easiest to achieve. This time, however, the opposition is of a different quality from anything he has met before.

PREPARATIONS FOR THE INVASION

Plaguing Mr. Quisling

BY THEODOR BROCH

SABOTAGE—the word had a sinister meaning in Norway. To us of the coast towns it signified vandalism under protection of the night. That was before April 9. Since then it has had a different definition.

From the moment the German General von Dietl, on that foggy spring morning in Narvik, gave his instructions to the civilian population of the city, it was as if an insulting banner, flaunted before our eyes, incited us to do our duty through sabotage. In the beginning it was comparatively harmless and innocent. The German soldiers of occupation rushed to our stores to buy food, clothing, and souvenirs. We carried most of the stock out the back doors. The German general ordered the Norwegian authorities to surrender all the skis in town. The next day a small pile of little children's skis was heaped behind the courthouse. Promptly the order was repeated. This time out came heavy, loaded mountain skis, the kind famous ski jumpers have flunkies carry for them up the scaffolding to the long ski slides. Once more complaints were issued. The German soldiers were unable to move from the spot; there must be something wrong with the skis. We asked if they had greased them thoroughly; greasing was an important part of proper ski technique. New orders: we were to grease the skis instantly. We requested a short delay so we could consult our experts. The experts chose the greasing least suitable to the damp spring travel. We heard no more.

I recollect a still more innocent case of sabotage, not particularly useful or heroic, but a small assertion of our self-respect. The first German commandant in Narvik was a hard-boiled Prussian Nazi, domineering and stupid. The younger German officers admitted openly that Herr Major Hausel was a bit of a bonehead. On a Sunday a week after the Germans had taken the city a patrol appeared at the courthouse: the Herr Major wished a pair of slippers. We recommended an excellent store which on Monday would be glad to sell him a beautiful pair. The major, however, must have them that day, and I as mayor was requested to send them to him at once. It took us some time, but finally we found some colossal slippers with extremely colorful embroidery. These were sent to the commandant's quarters by a little blond girl who almost dragged them behind her. A moment later the patrol arrived again. The slippers did not fit the major; they were too large. It occurred to me that there was an unmilitary gleam in the adjutant's eyes. We expressed our sincere regrets and informed him that in this or that street quite a fine supply of shoes and slippers could be found. Perhaps the adjutant himself would try.

I was once condemned to die for sabotage—it concerned some manipulation at the telegraph station—but I was pardoned. For a racial cousin excuses are found. When I was arrested a second time—for both sabotage and espionage—I did not give myself time to investigate the case thoroughly. I disappeared in haste. The Germans did not then have such substantial prisons as they arranged later.

At the first chance to catch my breath after climbing the mountains leading to the Swedish border I reviewed what we had done in Narvik and all over Norway since the invasion. It is possible that such attempts at sabotage have no definite results, but they are useful, nevertheless. Everything we owned they have taken from us—our homes, our country, and our liberty. Only our self-respect remains. We save a little of it that way.

When the German army of occupation, after two months of bitter fighting, had pacified the whole of Norway it introduced a new order of conduct, as it was called. New agents of the Gestapo were brought in—the first contingent had gone down with the Blücher outside the Oscarsborg fort in Oslo fjord. From now on the country's entire producing power must serve the German war machine under the formal direction of the dummies War Commissioner Terboven has succeeded in digging up, eagerly assisted by that irresponsible paranoiac, Vidkun Quisling. The people's will to resist can be expressed now only through sabotage, which I am sure is being carried on not only in Norway but in all the occupied countries. Napoleon himself recognized its force when he said, "Bayonets are effective weapons, but they are not so good to sit on."

The news that filters out from Norway gives evidence that there still is power of resistance in the people. And a good deal of news comes out, for with a coastline of 12,500 miles, the country cannot easily be muzzled. Every week Norwegian men are sent to the newly built concentration camps—students, intellectuals, and labor leaders in the cities, farm youths and workmen in the outlying districts. The university has been closed; demonstrative school children are denied schooling. Occasionally collective punishment is tried: the entire male population in some cities has been subjected to house arrest for demonstrations against the new regime.

There is sabotage in industry. The Germans bought our stock of canned goods with money they had printed in Norway. Not a few of the shipments proved to be spoiled on arrival in Germany because of tiny, almost invisible holes in the cans. Military stores show an increasing tendency to spontaneous combustion, and the cables to telegraph stations and coast fortifications, strangely enough, are continually grounded by storms.

Railroads and bridges suffer from landslides. The railroad to Bergen and other lines used for military transportation to German war harbors and air fields have been most often damaged. Even under normal conditions it is often difficult to keep the Bergen line open during the winter, and whimsical and violent nature seems this year to be especially unfriendly. The Germans have posted permanent military patrols along the railway and have arrested a number of ski runners in the mountains. It will not help. The railway is long; the mountains are high and pathless.

Unpopular teachers have always found Norwegian school children difficult to deal with, and definitely the children do not like the new school books or the new prophets of the Third Reich. The situation is not improved by the fact that Quisling is obliged to employ poorly equipped prophets. The Viennese children who were given shelter in Norway in the twenties remember a good deal from their sojourn, but they are not yet capable of being teachers in Norwegian schools.

If Vidkun Quisling is still alive it is because he carefully keeps himself at more than arm's length from every honest Norwegian fist. Also, the Germans take good care of him, and it is not so simple to lay hands on a dictator as a person on the other side of the world might imagine.

At the moment it is believed that between 300,000 and 350,000 German soldiers are in Norway. Our population is approximately 2,900,000. It should not be necessary to have an army of such strength just to keep the people in subjection. Surely, there are other reasons. Uncertainty about Russia and the need to keep Sweden coerced into passiveness are probably among them, but unquestionably the chief reason is the war against Great Britain. Our country has very useful bases for an invasion, and even if the plan for invasion be abandoned, our long coast will still play an important part in the aerial and submarine blockade. In southern Norway are valuable air fields, and Trondheim and Narvik are equipped to serve as submarine bases.

Because the population is so widely scattered and so easily kept under observation, more systematic sabotage is fraught with the greatest difficulties. In Norway as elsewhere the Germans seek to employ the ancient device—divide and rule. The population is already divided by physical barriers. It is difficult to get from one place to another. All means of communication are under German control; private individuals cannot buy benzine, farmers are not permitted to travel to cities without special permission. But also the German are trying to divide the people psychologically and set them against one another. Norwegian deserters are pushed into the foreground. The Norwegian Nazi organization is the only lawful party. The workers' technical organizations have been the object of considerable flirtation, but have been offered, of course, a conqueror's own brand of love—if you do not yield

I take you by force.

They are still permitted to exist, but all initiative in the labor movement is forbidden to them. The anti-capitalist and pacifist spirit in the labor movement is utilized to the utmost, and the material lowering of the standard of living consequent on the occupation is presented as a result of the struggle between capital and labor. The

Vidkun Quisling

Germans pretend to play the part of neutral justice and penalize certain firms which reduce wages or cut down their working staff. If they find a firm of this kind with a Jewish proprietor they think themselves fortunate. Aryans are set up against Jews, but this action will have little effect in Norway if for no other reason than that the Jewish minority constitutes only .06 per cent of the population.

An attempt has been made to set the Norwegian people against the king and the lawful Norwegian government in London. Through their Norwegian loud speakers the Germans shout that the government destroyed the country by refusing the protection of racial allies, that Norway was not properly defended, that the government stole the gold supply and the mercantile marine and then fled. In the face of a biased and hostile press an exiled government will not find it easy to hold its own. All reports from Norway, however, say that the loyalty of the common people toward the government is not crushed and that the king is more popular than ever before. The Gestapo, for instance, notified the Norwegian police that persons wearing coins fastened to their clothing with a pin or suspended from a cord around the neck must be arrested, since this form of propaganda cannot be tolerated. The coins referred to bear a picture of the king with his motto, "All for Norway." During blackouts placards urging unity and perseverance are pasted on walls. Handbills are passed around, seditious and revolutionary poems and songs go from hand to hand, new arrests are constantly being made.

Sabotage in the occupied countries cannot win the war, but in the long run it can become dangerous. Even if mechanized weapons decide the first phase of the struggle, psychological conditions may turn the scales in the next. The Norwegian people, by daring to defy its conquerors, has shown and will continue to show that it still has the will to fight.

Puerto Rico's New Deal

BY LOUISE S. BLANCO

Santurce, Puerto Rico, January 10
WHEN the leaders of the Puerto Rican Liberal Party forced Luis Muñoz Marín out of the party in May, 1937, they did not foresee that in 1940 he and his followers would win the elections and the control of the island for the next four years. Nor was this outcome foreseen by Washington officials, who for at least a year before the elections were encouraging the formation of a new party to contest the power of the graft-ridden, strictly party-minded Coalition—made up of so-called Socialists and Republicans—which had been running Puerto Rico. The party fostered by Washington, an alliance of the Liberals with dissident Republicans and Socialists known as the Unification Party, was destined at election time to come in a very bad third.

In 1937 it seemed that Luis Muñoz Marín, whose father, Luis Muñoz Rivera, was the island's most famous politician, had been eliminated from island politics. During the early years of the New Deal he had played a brief but spectacular role in the opposition, with considerable backing from Washington. That backing had, for mysterious reasons, been withdrawn. After this, his fellow-leaders in the Liberal Party, disagreeing with him on matters of policy and jealous of his ascendancy in the party, engineered his withdrawal. In 1937 he was without a party, party machinery, or money.

The swift rise to power of the Popular Democratic Party which he founded at that time would have been extraordinary anywhere; it was the more so in Puerto Rico, where the growth of parties has been slow and has followed a conventional pattern. The first problem which he and a small group of able associates faced was that of achieving official status for the new party. If a party wishes to present candidates on the Puerto Rican ballot it must obtain in each of the island's municipalities signatures equal in number to 10 per cent of the voters in that municipality in the preceding elections. The Popular Democrats did not approach the task through the village bosses and with promises of jobs, but instead appealed directly to the masses and sought to convince them that their vote was not a trifling privilege to be sold to the highest bidder but their only weapon against the exploitation from which they suffered. "Bread, land, and liberty" was the motto of the new party; its working slogan was "Don't sell your vote."

Years ago Santiago Iglesias had founded the Socialist Party in Puerto Rico as a workingman's party, although it was never genuinely socialist in ideology, and had built it up through unions affiliated with the A. F. of L. Even in its heyday the Socialist Party depended for its strength upon the city workers and party machinery. It had long since become thoroughly bureaucratic and thoroughly conservative. The Popular Democrats sought the support of the "forgotten man" of Puerto Rico, the jibaro, or agricultural laborer (once a small landowner, now for the most part landless), isolated by poor roads and the direst kind of poverty in the island's mountainous interior.

An important factor in their campaign was their paper, Batey, which they published and distributed free in the most remote districts. They were able to finance it by its advertising, which corresponded to its large circulation; 800,000 copies of the last edition before the elections were distributed. In a country in which the leading newspaper has a circulation of less than 40,000, it is clear that many people, when they received this paper from a party worker, had a newspaper in their hands for the first time. Party workers drove through the country, rode horseback for miles where cars could not go, and finally continued the task of distribution on foot. In their speaking campaign Muñoz Marín and his associates showed the same thoroughness. They spoke not only in cities and towns but in the mountains, where they addressed small groups of jibaros summoned from their hundreds of scattered huts.

Reports reaching the capital from the various districts of the island indicated the effectiveness of the Popular Party's campaign, and in the last months before the November elections the Coalition, in spite of confident declarations, showed signs of nervousness. Nevertheless, the consensus of opinion in San Juan was that in the end the jibaro would sell his vote to the candidate who had money to pay for it; it was believed that the temptation of a few dollars, or of some articles of clothing, would be too great for people of such utter poverty. Only Muñoz Marín and his Popular Democrats were firm in the conviction that the Puerto Rican masses this time would not sell their votes. They did not. Many picturesque stories went around, some of them undoubtedly true, about the way in which large sums of Unification and Coalition money went begging.

The last weeks of the campaign were marked by the usual colorful effervescence of a Puerto Rican election period, but the elections were perfectly orderly. They gave the Popular Democrats control of the Senate by a scant majority—ten "Populares" out of nineteen seats—and, accordingly, the presidency of the Senate. The Coalition, however, still has numerical superiority in the House, having won nineteen seats as against seventeen for the Popular Democrats. Here the three Unification members hold the balance of power, and while they may eventually go over to the Populares because of their longstanding hostility to the Coalition, present indications are that two of them will vote with the Coalition for the time being, thus giving it control of the House. The Resident Commissionership in Washington remains firmly in the hands of the Coalition, having been won by its present incumbent, Bolívar Pagán.

The program of the new party stresses social justice and includes many economic and social reforms. The issue of the island's status was subordinated to the necessity for Western Hemisphere defense. The platform expressed a preference, however, for independence. Among its planks are enforcement of the five-hundred-acre law, establishment of agricultural cooperatives, a readjustment of taxes in favor of small property owners, legislation against absenteeism and the coastwise shipping laws, and thorough educational reform.

The Popular Democrats face many difficulties: they lack absolute control; the popular composition of the party causes a scarcity of persons prepared to hold office; their projected reforms are certain to encounter intense opposition from entrenched interests. Somewhat dangerous, also, is the large number of new adherents which their unexpected victory created over night, adherents who do not really sympathize with their purposes. A great obligation is owed to the long-suffering Puerto Rican masses, who responded so admirably to the first respectful and intelligent appeal made to them. Only an exemplary administration can repay the faith and sacrifices of the jibaros. A poor record in office would turn the party's chief weapon, the newly awakened sense of civic duty, against itself.

In order to carry out their program, Marín and his associates will need whole-hearted support from Washington, an indispensable factor in the success of any Puerto Rican party. Since their social and political aims are similar to those of the New Deal, it is not too unlikely that they will get it.

In the Wind

A STUDENT recently visited the New York office of Verne Marshall's "No Foreign War" Committee and asked a member of the office staff "what form of democracy" the committee wanted to preserve. The reply was that he might read Lawrence Dennis to get the answer. The same person said the committee didn't consider England a democracy because Ernest Bevin, a Laborite, was "running" the country.

A FEW WEEKS ago the New York Times published a list of campaign contributions to the Democratic and Republican parties. A gift of $2,000 to the Republicans from "Thomas J. Watson, New York City," was listed. A $2,500 gift to the Democrats from "Thomas J. Watson, New York City," was also listed.

MOST PRO-BRITISH MANIFESTOS now current are signed by Ellery Sedgwick, retired editor of the Atlantic Monthly. Mr. Sedgwick still has not indicated whether he has changed his mind about General Franco, for whom he did such valuable tub-thumping during the Spanish war.

DAN GILLMOR, publisher of the magazine Friday, is branching out. He has just bought Popular Psychology Guide and Silver Streak Comics, two pulps with an aggregate circulation of about 200,000.

SOCIAL JUSTICE, bidding for labor support, now plays up Philip Murray as a "Catholic gentleman" and presses the theme that Sidney Hillman is a "pro-Soviet Russian Jew." Thus Hillman is now the pet target of both the Daily Worker and the Coughlinites. Incidentally, Brooklyn Christian Fronters are planning a big celebration over the dropping of the conspiracy charges against several of their members.

WHEN A PRESSMAN upset eight cases of type, the Japanese Weekly Times, published in California, suspended publication for a week. The publisher decided it would take that much time to "unpie" a couple of hundred thousand ideographs.

BULLETINS ON Chaplin's "The Dictator": Mexico has let it be shown, Argentina has firmly banned it, Chile will permit a censored version. For Argentines special excursions are being run across the River Plate to Colonia, Uruguay, where the film is playing—despite Italian protests.

A WASHINGTON STORY in the New York Times on efforts to get aid for Spanish anti-fascists has aroused some vigorous protests. The story was headlined, "Ask Aid for Spanish Reds," although the personnel of the committee seeking the aid is not even faintly red.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

A Native at Large

BY JONATHAN DANIELS

Rookie Unionists

"IT'S a racket," the boy said on the train. He had been home for a day from the rush of work in constructing the army camp. "You have to pay a couple of dollars a day till you get your dues paid. Some fellows don't mind paying it because even after they pay it they're making more than they ever did before. But they don't care anything about belonging to the union. Most of them are going back to the farm after this thing is over. We don't want to be in any union. We could use those bucks. But we got to pay 'em if we want to keep our jobs."

As far as he knew, there wasn't any real racket. Some folks said that fellows were kicked out after they got their dues paid so others could be taken in. He didn't know what happened to the money. But he thought there must be a lot of it.

"We just pay," he said; "we don't give a damn about she union."

Naturally where so huge a volume of men is crowding into little towns beside which big camps, or big plants, are growing, there is a lot of loose talk about union rackets. The whole business moves so fast that not even old union men can always be sure what is happening. Old conservatives who never did like the unions speak about increasing crookedness with new confidence, but few of them present evidence. Unions in the building trades in some boom towns have grown as rapidly as the defense projects. In one town the normal membership of the carpenters' union was 50; it passed 1,000 within three months. Others may have grown more rapidly still. In unions experiencing such a growth, under all sorts of local leaders, in all parts of the country, almost anything can happen. A man traveling gets the impression that almost everything has happened.

Beyond question in some of the quickly grown defense centers union leaders have gone to great pains and distances to secure for the project skilled men of the types needed. Certainly, also some local unions, in enrolling men, have seemed to take a good deal more interest in their dues than in their skills. There has been more confusion, as would be expected, in little towns where the whole system of collective bargaining was weak and insignificant before the boom hit them than in cities where long-existing organization had created experienced leaders able to handle the terrific expansion that has occurred in the unions in defense industries as well as in the plants and yards.

The situation undoubtedly creates a widespread possibility of rackets in unions. That such rackets do exist no sensible friend of labor would deny. The charge has even come from old labor men in some cases. But more ominous to me than the questionable practices of the unions is the threat to unionism in the future involved in their present swift expansion, particularly in the areas around the government's own rising camps. There under the government's protection the workers from the country feel little need for organization's aid and figure the cost of union dues in terms of the additional pigs they might have been able to buy with the money when they went back home.

And not all of them are going to stay back on the farm. However skilled or unskilled they were when they went to the camps, they will be skilled craftsmen, so certified, when they finish the jobs there. Necessarily apprentice standards have had to crack under the demand for workers. Later the farms will be full of craftsmen ready, when crops are poor, to move on the jobs in the towns and cities. They will have been union certified, but many of them will not be willing to continue to pay union dues.

In this new body of trade unionists the men are not unionists by conviction or training. The unions into which they go are too big and unwieldy to spend much time on their union education. Many of the men also go so far by automobile from their jobs to the places where they sleep that they have neither time nor inclination to hear union talk or to participate in union affairs. In a real sense many of the new members of the building-trades unions are people who have little knowledge and no interest in the organizations with which they have quickly become connected.

It is hard to see what the unions can do to prevent such swift growth as expands their membership rolls but progressively destroys the cohesion of conviction within them. The growth can be less toward strength than toward meaninglessness. There will undoubtedly be demands for investigations. Even more greatly needed by the country and the unions is prompt and sufficient action to direct organization so that there shall be a growth in intelligence and not merely in bulk.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Red Dragon of Wales

OWEN GLENDOWER. By John Cowper Powys. Simon and Schuster. Two Volumes. $5.

IF THE neatly boxed two volumes of "Owen Glendower" do not quite live up to their promise, it is certainly not because of any lack of romantic glamour in the subject: that fifteenth-century rebel-hero who hoisted the banner of the red dragon for Welsh independence and, allying himself with the mighty Percys of Northumberland, shook the English throne under its usurping occupant, Henry Bolingbroke.

Largely through the eyes of young Rhisiart (in English, Richard), Glendower's cousin and for a time his secretary, we perceive the great-souled Welsh chieftain, moved by a prophecy of Iolo Goch the Bard, gathering his forces and defying the King; marrying his daughter to Sir Edmund Mortimer, whom he had taken prisoner in the Battle of Bryn Glas; striving to weld the nation together in the face of a dismal curse which long before had foretold that as long as he waged war and destruction against his enemies he would succeed, but that as soon as he tried to build a permanent, peaceful edifice out of his conquests disaster would engulf him. Instead of the pompous old charlatan who in Shakespeare's "King Henry IV" boasts that he can "call spirits from the vasty deep" and that at his birth "the frame and huge foundation of the earth shook like a coward," he is here presented as a magnetic personality with a fatal strain of mysticism in his make-up, a dabbler in magic arts, to be sure, but one whose real sorcery consists not so much in necromancy as in his ability to "exteriorize" his soul while his body remains in a state of cataleptic trance (readers of Mr. Powys's "Wolf Solent" will recall that young man's "mythology"). One feels from the very first that Glendower is a man fated to perform mighty deeds with a tragic end, like the ancient Celts of whom it was said, "They went forth to battle, and they always fell."

Considering, however, that I had anticipated a genuine literary thrill in the treatment of this dazzling figure by so distinguished a stylist, psychologist, and antiquary as Mr. Powys, the book disappointed me. Despite a plethora of murders, feuds, burning loves, alarms and excursions, it seemed to me unconscionably long-winded; and on top of a style which is unaccountably labored, especially in the first volume (where the central romantic figure is constantly referred to as "our hero" or "our young friend"!), it is overlaid with a dank miasma of Celtic mysticism which seems to emanate more from the mind of the author than from the circumstances of the story, even though the drama is played out by Welshmen against a backdrop of the very hills and forests of Arthurian legend, of Bran and Myfanwy and the chimerical heroes and heroines of the "Mabinogion." Part of this crepuscular haze arises from the fact that Mr. Powys, himself steeped in Welsh history and folklore, strews his narrative prodigally with dark allusions to bygone Cambrian celebrities without a vowel to their names, the symbolical significance of which cannot but mystify the overwhelming majority of modern readers.

On the credit side, he has effected an astounding reconstruction of the spirit and trappings of a turbulent epoch. The Peasants' Revolt was only a few years buried in the scrap heap of time; Richard II had recently been deposed and, probably, murdered; the buds were already ripening which were to bloom as the blood-spattered roses of Lancaster and York; two popes, one at Rome and one at Avignon, angled for the allegiance of the Catholic world, while Wycliffe's Lollards proclaimed, even in the midst of flames, the hypocrisy of the clergy, and the strident voice of the Renaissance drowned out the death-rattle of the Middle Ages—already that lethal middle-class weapon, the long bow, was leveling the ancient proud chivalry of the sword. Where Shakespeare, in his two "Henry IV" plays, merely stages a spectacle of martial pageantry as a background for the clowning of Jack Falstaff (who appears in "Owen Glendower" under his true name of Sir John Oldcastle), Mr. Powys has woven the myriad and many-colored threads of history into a shimmering tapestry which, for all its faults, has a tragic beauty and grandeur that few historical novels of today can match.

LOUIS B. SALOMON

Economics in a Vacuum

MONETARY PROPOSALS FOR SOCIAL REFORM. By Margaret G. Myers. Columbia University Press. $2.25.

SOMEONE has said that bourgeois economists are at their best when they are criticizing each other. This is not quite accurate; they are at their best when they are criticizing petty-bourgeois economists. In "Monetary Proposals for Social Reform" Miss Myers has provided a neat illustration of the truth of this proposition.

The attitude of the petty bourgeois toward capitalism is fundamentally ambivalent. In private property and "individual initiative" capitalism has a good side; in poverty and economic insecurity it has a bad side. The problem always is how to retain the good and eliminate the bad. Since it never occurs to him that the two go together, like the two sides of a coin, he sets out to find out what feature of capitalism is responsible for the bad aspects. And the chances are ten to one that he ends up as a land reformer or a monetary reformer or some combination of the two.

At this point the orthodox economist appears on the scene. The orthodox economist is sure that there would be nothing wrong with capitalism if people only wouldn't abuse it all the time. Capitalism is like an individual who gets sick only when he flies in the face of sound rules of health. Hence the orthodox economist proceeds, with great gusto and devastating logic, to expose all the inconsistencies in the petty-bourgeois position and to conclude triumphantly that the proposed remedy would only serve to make matters worse than they already are.

This is the role which Miss Myers has assumed in the present work. She selects for examination three of the best known among twentieth-century monetary reformers: Silvio Gesell, Frederick Soddy, and Major Douglas. (Gesell was also a land reformer, but Miss Myers neglects this aspect of his teachings.) She then proceeds in a cold-blooded and workmanlike fashion to dissect the three gentlemen, to demonstrate that each looked only at what he wanted to see and, in addition, was full of contradictions and inconsistencies. The job is done with deftness and dispatch; at the end none of the three reformers has an intellectual leg to stand on.

But if Miss Myers shows the strong side of orthodox economics in her polemic against the monetary reformers, she just as definitely reveals the weak side in her own closing chapter. Here we are treated to a lecture on sound commercial banking, the necessity of interest based on the phenomenon of time preference, the evil consequences of deficit financing and government paper money, and so on. In her theorizing, full employment is blandly assumed—otherwise we should have to ask Miss Myers whether a time preference exists for present goods that aren't produced over future goods that aren't produced! And finally the conclusion is reached that "no manipulation of money and banking can right all the wrongs created by wars and tariffs and exchange controls." This is always the last word of the orthodox economist. The trouble with economics is—politics!

As against this position the petty-bourgeois reformer at least has the merit of recognizing that there is something wrong with the economic system itself. So long as this is true he will continue to attract followers from among the masses of the people, who are more impressed with their own experience than with the logic of economic orthodoxy. It follows that the effective answer to the petty-bourgeois reformer must be sought in an entirely different direction.

PAUL M. SWEZEY

A Realistic Utopia

THE CITY OF MAN: A DECLARATION ON WORLD DEMOCRACY. By Herbert Agar, Frank Aydelotte, G. A. Borgese, Hermann Broch, Van Wyck Brooks, Ada L. Comstock, William Y. Elliott, Dorothy Canfield Fisher, Christian Gauss, Oscar Jaszi, Alvin Johnson, Hans Kohn, Thomas Mann, Lewis Mumford, William Allen Neilson, Reinhold Niebuhr, and Gaetano Salvemini. The Viking Press. $1.

READERS of Anatole France probably remember how Gretau, the tall Nordic, knocked down his short, dark-skinned fellow-creature to take his land, and how the monk Bulloch, replying to the repining prayer of Saint Maël, gently observed: "Be careful, Father, what you call murder and theft are essentially war and conquest, the sacred foundation of empires, the source of all virtue and human grandeur. No right but the conqueror's is to be respected, for it alone demands respect." France wrote satirically, but Hitler is in earnest when he proclaims his respect for the successful highwaymen of history.

In this declaration a galaxy of brilliant scholars and thinkers, Americans like Alvin Johnson and William Neilson, refugees like Salvemini and Borgese, all of them gallant fighters for freedom, accept the cave man's challenge. Some critics might say: Why waste mental chivalry on an enemy who takes intelligence to be a defection from man's divine mission? In striving to continue Plato's endeavors did it not occur to them that Oxenstierna's familiar remark about the little wisdom which rules the world has proved more realistic than the recurrent desire to have it ruled by philosopher-guardians?

I do not think any of the signatories hoped to convince the rowdies of Europe. This new gospel of democracy redefines its fundamental idea as "humanism in theocracy and rational theocracy in universal humanism." No one has put it more clearly than the President of the United States when he said, "Most of us, regardless of what church we belong to, believe in the spirit of the New Testament." Certainly democracy is a faith, and "this common prayer of democracy militant . . . was anticipated by sages and saints of all ages."

On an ascending line of scholarly thoughts clad in poetic expression the Declaration arrives at a new doctrine of democracy in which the Bill of Rights is supplemented by a Bill of Duties and "morals will have the primacy over economics." Its idealism is far from being utopian. Without idealism democracy could not have been born in the Greek cities, or reborn in Cromwell's camp. Rousseau and not the Revolution ushered in French democracy, and the Gettysburg Address could not have been delivered without idealism. However, idealism like patriotism is not enough. If all who nowadays write or talk of democratic ideology had converted their energy into action for the defense or the establishment of democracy, literary and rhetorical accomplishments would be dispensable.

This is why the indorsers of the Declaration suggest the study of four issues as a preliminary to successful action. The first is that of freedom "under a constitutional order so that the citizen may be protected not only against the threat of the external tyrant but against the treason of his fellow-citizen as well." The aim of education is another. In economics, where ethics is also the leading principle, the "calamitous circle of capital-communism as enemy brothers or as mutual accomplices must be broken—economic freedom and economic justice must be reconciled." The last issue calls for a supra-national order the laws of which "cannot be enforced with judges but no sheriffs."

A reviewer less sympathetic with these conclusions might ask: Where are the masons in the various countries strong enough to build the cities of men from which the City of Man is going to emerge? But I am convinced of the truth of President Garfield's words, "Ideas are the great warriors of the world"; and a great warrior is likely to find the armies he needs. If ideas are right, events are bound to follow them. In spite of the occasionally enraptured overtones of its style the Declaration is not the wishful thought of a Dreamland. As a beacon of faith in the blackout of violence it illuminates the way of reason which leads beyond the rationale of materialism. Facts may dim the vision of men; they may prove temporarily incongruous with this City of the Future. But as a French wit said, "Tant pis pour les faits."

RUSTEM VAMBERY

English Compromise

TRADITION AND ROMANTICISM: STUDIES IN ENGLISH POETRY FROM CHAUCER TO YEATS.

By B. Ifor Evans. Longmans, Green and Company. $2.

"ROMANTICISM is disease; classicism is health." So Goethe; and too many after him. T. S. Eliot's definition is not much better: "The difference between classicism and romanticism is the difference between the complete and the fragmentary, the adult and the immature, the orderly and the chaotic." With Eliot and the neo-humanists, indeed, the antithesis becomes a convenient method of rejecting large sections of literature. Eliot ostensibly investigates the English "tradition"; actually he equates classicism with tradition and rejects as romantic what does not conform. From the opposite point of view the romantic critics do exactly the same thing: Poe throws out most poetry written before the nineteenth century, while Rimbaud, who in criticism as in poetry carried his theories to their logical conclusion, succeeds in rejecting the whole of French literature. This will not do. A tradition, if it is anything at all, is the whole of a literature, better, in this case, the whole of European literature; you cannot select a number of works to suit your personal tastes and label it "the tradition."

If the terms classical and romantic are to be retained in literary criticism—and they do seem to express an important and recognizable distinction—they must be clearly defined, and in such a way that both can be included in the tradition. In this connection the present book of Professor Evans performs two essential services: investigating afresh the English tradition as a whole, it shows that the two attitudes are inextricably mixed in the work of most poets—in this respect English poetry is much less "pure" than French and has succeeded in effecting a kind of "compromise"; and it provides a basis from which it would seem possible to formulate a workable definition.

Coleridge, as so often, seems to have put his finger on the root of the distinction, without using the terms, when he spoke of the "objective poetry of the ancients and the subjective mood of the moderns." Classical poetry is objective in that it tends to deal with "typical human action," "normal experience"; it is "complete" and "orderly"—in Eliot's phrase—and ruled by "reason" and "judgment" in the eighteenth-century sense because its implicit reference is to a definite system of social relationships; it is "public" and intelligible without reference to its creator. Romantic poetry on the other hand is subjective in that it tends to deal with the individual, idiosyncratic, "abnormal" experience of the poet himself or with a character or action with which he can identify himself; it is sometimes "fragmentary" and "chaotic" because it lacks the support and check of a definite system of social relationships; frequently it is "private" and unintelligible without reference to its creator.

This definition, which seems to emerge from Professor Evans's discussion, avoids reference both to the beliefs of the poet and to any religious, moral, or social system. This is as it should be, for the beliefs of a poet are irrelevant to a judgment of his poetry: much modern criticism condemns the Romantics because of the inadequacy or childishness of their theories. But their poetry is not the equivalent of their theories: poetry is not something else—religion or morals or science, though many critics who assert this in words seem to deny it in practice.

Perhaps the chief advantage of this definition, however, is that it does not make the two attitudes mutually exclusive—as any definition in terms of belief necessarily does. The compromise, the almost inextricable mingling of classical and romantic elements in the English tradition from Chaucer through Shakespeare, Milton, Dryden to Wordsworth and Keats, Eliot, and Yeats, is the theme of Professor Evans's book, and he shows how the practice of the poets has frequently contradicted their theory, how the attempt of literary historians to erect rigid schools and movements breaks down the moment it is pressed, and, most interestingly, how the poets of the early nineteenth century who carried the romantic attitude farther than any other poets in English were constantly engaged in an effort to restore their balance.

Professor Evans, who of course does not possess the brilliance or fruitfulness of major critics like Eliot, provides an excellent corrective for their aberrations, and he has done a real service in elucidating aspects of the English tradition which are so frequently overlooked or misinterpreted, and in supplying a less tendentious definition of two easily abused but useful terms.

HILARY SUMNER-BOYD

Good Enough to Be True

HE LOOKED FOR A CITY. By A. S. M. Hutchinson. Duell, Sloan, and Pearce. $2.50.

IN THE period that is best known to us—the period between two great wars—goodness in literature has rather gone out of fashion. Our historians and biographers have debunked: This fellow, you know, was really pretty much of a stuffed shirt. Our novelists have Told All: If human beings break all of the Ten Commandments, and we can be sure they do, let us say so; man is a nasty, crawling, stealing, lying, intemperate, fornicating little beast, and it is the duty of a novelist to admit it, even to insist on it.

Mr. Hutchinson has started with a different premise. His story of a simple—almost simple-minded—undistinguished English vicar during the first thirty years or so of the twentieth century is a chronicle of a good man. He believes, first of all, in the teachings of Jesus Christ: God is Love and Men are Brothers. After some years of hard work in a slum parish, he attains his heart's desire, an upper-middle-class flock in the genteel country, a commodious house with a garden, grass for his four young ones to play about on, work, to be sure, but work among people he knows and likes. It is the vicar's first and inevitable impulse to thank God for his new situation. Such a man, one might think, should have his rewards. But Mr. Hutchinson has tried him sorely. The new parishioners are worldly, snobbish, suspicious, perfectly willing for their vicar to labor in their vineyard as hard and as long as he likes provided he doesn't bother them too much or complain about his pay. The four children are by no means always a solace to their father. Out of principle the older son becomes a conscientious objector to war and dies in prison for it; out of want of principle the younger daughter is killed in an automobile accident. A waif whom the vicar and his wife have taken into their family and who grows to be friend and sister to them experiences all the horrors of war-time prejudice—she is a German. And the vicar's sufferings at this intolerance are only a little less than her own. A hard life, in short, in which the bad days outnumber the good. But oddly enough, for the vicar, virtue does provide its compensation. His children hurt him but do not fail to return his love for them. His parishioners are irritated at his refusal to be up to date—and cannot fail to pay him an affectionate if grudging respect, and even admiration. Since he is not clever, he merely does his duty, and the fact that he has done it is reward enough.

As a novelist Mr. Hutchinson has many faults. His style is stiff and formal. He is sentimental. He overdraws his characters. One of the vicar's daughters is addleheaded and lightminded beyond credence; the other is an equally incredible dominating prig and bore. But they are individuals, even though their individuality is overdone. And the vicar's patience, his forbearance, his charity, even his likable stupidity are not overdone. It is the power of goodness for its own sake that makes an often unskilful novel alive and interesting.

DOROTHY VAN DOREN

Personal History

I MUST HAVE LIBERTY. By Isabel de Palencia. Longmans, Green and Company. $3.

ONE day, during the dictatorship of Primo de Rivera, the chulos of Madrid were given a perfectly stupendous opportunity for the exercise of their indelicate wit. A procession of pregnant women, mostly of the classes that later supported fascism, solemnly paraded before the royal palace, as a pledge to the Bourbon in the name of the unborn. More than any other story in Isabel de Palencia's absorbing book, that incident defines the temper of conservative Spain toward what was called the feminine question. True, the old tradition was already crumbling when such women as Isabel Oyarzabal, later Señora Palencia, and Constanca de la Mora made their protests. Yet something of what an intelligent woman had to face if she desired to live freely is described in "I Must Have Liberty."

Half ■ Scot, Isabel Oyarzabal was born into a semi-aristocratic family of Málaga. The usual convent education was given her, and this she describes without irony or scorn. She refused to enter a religious order when urged to do so and determined to earn her own living. In Madrid she founded a woman's magazine, entered upon a short-lived theatrical career, and eventually became internationally known as a lecturer on Spanish culture.

Throughout this middle period the circumstances of her life gave the author increasingly close acquaintance with the mocking injustices suffered by the poorer classes. Nevertheless, as she says, she still looked upon the social problem from the old standpoint of charity. It was not theoretical speculation that changed her outlook, or study, but contact with the true center of progress, the Casa del Pueblo, the very heart of the real Madrid. There, in the trade-union and Socialist headquarters, she met men and women whose knowledge of home and foreign affairs far exceeded hers. It was natural that under the republic she should be sent to Geneva as a delegate to the International Labor Office. Finally, when the Spanish Republic was fighting for its life, she was appointed ambassador to Sweden and soon after chargé d'affaires in Finland. Perhaps the most moving part of the book is its conclusion, in which Isabel de Palencia expresses her profound gratitude for safe harbor in Mexico.

"I Must Have Liberty" often throws new light upon Spanish and international problems by means of sound appreciations of people and concentrated versions of things one had thought one understood. More striking and perhaps more important is the way in which the author admirably recreates the prevailing atmosphere of the Spanish political scene, especially in the chapters covering the dictatorship of Primo. It is a book of deep passion and characteristic dignity, quite unmarred by grandiloquence.

RALPH BATES

Technology and Power

THE ECONOMICS OF FORCE. By Frank Munk. George W. Stewart. $2.

TO CALL the present struggle a phase of world revolution without carefully defining revolution is to play into the hands of the dictators, who would like nothing better than to convince the democracies that totalitarianism is the inevitable pattern of the future. If the people of the democracies can be persuaded that this is true, and start quarreling among themselves about the relative merits of fascism, Nazism, and communism, the dictators will conquer the democracies and argue later about division of the spoils.

There is undoubtedly throughout the world a movement of revolutionary social and economic change which has been brought about chiefly by the rapid development of technology. Mr. Munk points out with disturbing clarity the ways in which this general revolutionary situation has facilitated the seizure of power by clever, ruthless men with ability to exploit popular dissatisfaction. And he piles up an overwhelming body of evidence to prove that once a group of unscrupulous men has obtained power, modern technology gives them opportunities unprecedented in history for extending it, until they can be dislodged only by a superior external force. Moreover, the logic of the dictators' position compels them to go on extending their power, in the domestic economy of their own countries and in foreign conquest, until they are completely victorious or completely defeated. As the author puts it, "Totalitarianism is more than a system of government: it is a permanent, world-wide, organized conspiracy. As long as it continues, other countries are sleeping on dynamite."

The nature of this conspiracy has been clearly outlined by Hitler as a series of steps which first destroy the victim's will to resist and then overwhelm him by force. The danger of the democracies is exemplified in a phrase which has been heard often during the last year: "Before we decide to fight, we must know what we are fighting for." Certainly, before the United States decides to fight, or even to give substantial aid to one side against the other, we must be convinced that our own liberty is involved in the struggle. But if each individual citizen is to base his decision on his attitude toward the domestic policies of the party in power, if we are to join in defense only on our own private terms, then the division which is part of the technique of the dictators has already been accomplished.

Munk covers too much ground in his short book to prove every point in detail, but he is restrained in statements of fact, and the documentation is convincing without being oppressive. His own personal experience as a Czech who did not escape from his country until after the German occupation of Prague adds conviction to his terrifying picture of German methods of preparing an invasion and then completely exploiting a conquered nation. Totalitarianism, as he presents it, is not a system which brings a new economic order, but the Nazis are thoroughly efficient in using the chaos they create for their own advantage.

The style is clear and straightforward; the author needs no literary apology either for writing in a foreign language or for being an economist. Some of the material will be familiar to most readers, but the cumulative effect is unique. The fundamental point, convincingly demonstrated, is that we no longer live in a world where nations struggle for economic power. Instead, economic power has become a weapon in the struggle for naked power within nations and throughout the world.

CHARLES E. NOYES

From Austria to Vermont

SECOND WIND. By Carl Zuckmayer. Introduction by Dorothy Thompson. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

CARL ZUCKMAYER has one marked advantage over the many German intellectuals and writers now in foreign lands who seem like mechanics without their tools. Apart from being a playwright with an impressive record of success, he has his deepest roots in the soil, whether it be Austria or the rolling country of his newly found home in Vermont.

Zuckmayer comes from the Rhine, and the play that made him famous overnight, starting an epidemic of laughter all over Germany, "The Jolly Vineyard," expresses to perfection the peculiar and inimitable brand of Rhineland humor, lusty and hilarious, far removed from slapstick. But he has usurped, so to speak, the Nazis' sacred "blood and soil" motif; his was a sense of humor that they so utterly lacked—and that made them virtually froth at the mouth whenever his name was mentioned.

Despite the Nordic-Germanic, Celtic, and Latin strains within him, Zuckmayer has always regarded himself in character, language, manner, education, and inclination as a German, despite contemporary racial concepts. That he, a Catholic, had a drop of Jewish blood in his veins played no part in his consciousness. But he was only too forcefully reminded of it by ensuing developments.

"Second Wind" does not proceed in chronological sequence. It flashes back and forth, from the author's arrival in this country to his grueling World-War experiences; from his beloved Henndorf in Austria and the rise of the new barbarian order to the hectic days of the inflation and post-inflation period of the twenties, which stand out in high relief as the best part of the book. He experienced privation at close range, at times selling cocaine on street corners and acting as a tout for night clubs to keep alive. But these were nevertheless the most exciting and creative years of his life. He participated in experimental theater projects and magazines in Kiel and Munich, helped discover new talent and developed his own. It was inevitable that he should be drawn to Berlin, then a cultural and theatrical center of highest standards, with Max Reinhardt and Leopold Jessner at the peak of their careers.

Zuckmayer has remained essentially a playwright, though he has many books and poems to his credit. According to his own testimony, he did not fully recognize the powers at work, as indeed most people failed to grasp their momentum. His is primarily an analytical, not a revolutionary mind. It was only at the grave of Oedoen von Horváth, the promising young writer who was killed by a freak accident on the Champs Elysées, that Zuckmayer began to sense the need for a new creative force. Of the funeral procession he writes:

All the writers and artists in exile in Paris went along. There were many fine, significant, outstanding heads and minds. . . . Yet there was behind them no power, no really unifying idea, no tangible concrete will, nay, not even a common faith. What bound us together was only our common fate, our common knowledge of threatened and even lost values.

It was here that Zuckmayer resolved that bemoaning a lost fate is not enough if something new is to be created, that those who wish to transform the world have to transform themselves first. It is this realization and the affirmation of life and its positive reserves that give the book its value.

RUTH NORDEN

Coming Soon in The Nation

A NOTE ON ORDER

By W. H. Auden

THE AMERICAN MINERS' ASSOCIATION

by Edward A. Wieck

A documented history, involving much original research, of the first national miners' union—in the Civil War period—in the United States, marking the beginning of the modern phase of the American labor movement.

330 Pages. Price $2.00

RUSSELL SAGE FOUNDATION

130 EAST 22d STREET • NEW YORK

THE DYNAMICS of WAR and REVOLUTION

By LAWRENCE DENNIS

It is the best antidote on the book market for wishful and muddled thinking if you are tough minded enough to take it.

$3.00 Published by

THE WEEKLY FOREIGN LETTER

205 East 42nd Street

New York, N. Y.

IN BRIEF

THE DONKEY INSIDE. By Ludwig Bemelmans. Illustrated by the author. The Viking Press. $3.

The incomparable (literally) Bemelmans fuses the notebooks of trips to several South American countries into a composite picture and labels it Ecuador, the epitome of the Latin American continent. Or at any rate of such features of that continent as are calculated to amuse and edify the readers of the New Yorker, Town & Country, and other not too profound contemporaries. Indeed, it will amuse anyone with a philosophical view of human nature. Like the illustrations, the text does not belong to the school of photographic realism, but of logical, superbly humorous, and enchantingly colored impressionism, which is somehow right as far as it goes—not quite as far as to be a contribution to the Good Neighbor policy.

COUSIN HONORE. By Storm Jameson. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

Honoré Burckheim, sturdy peasant-blooded owner of a large Alsatian ironworks, is the central figure of this novel, which pursues a thread of family intrigue through the web of Franco-German relations between 1871 and 1939. Somewhat sketchily, because of the jumping of broad time-gaps in the story, the author draws a composite picture of the qualities that led to France's recent downfall and of those that give promise of an eventual reawakening.

ZERO HOUR: A SUMMONS TO THE FREE. By Stephen Vincent Benét, Erika Mann, McGeorge Bundy, William L. White, Garrett Underhill, Walter Millis. Farrar and Rinehart. $1.

This book, replete with the urgency of the crisis which confronts us, is all the more impressive for the divergent backgrounds of its six authors. All the contributions are essential reading, and all the writers—with the exception of Miss Mann, who is a shade over-elaborate—make their points swiftly and economically. Ironically enough, none of them appears to know that a book of exactly the same title, "Zero Hour," was written by the Anglo-Austrian journalist Richard Freund in 1937 and published in both England and this country. Its warning of the imminent outbreak of war was received with polite academic interest.

MY BOYHOOD IN SIAM. By Kumut Chandruang. The John Day Company. $2.

This is apparently the first book about Siam (Thailand) to be written in English by a Siamese without the aid of a professional ghost. It is a naive story, clumsy in the use of our alien language, but none the less it portrays, at times divertingly, the pleasure and pathos of life in an upper-class Siamese home. Priests and princes flick across its pages, delightful criminals, wise and contented peasants, but the characters most memorable are those of the author's immediate family, his father's two wives and his two Old Gran's single husband, the redoubtable Pin. The fairs, weddings, funerals, sports of Siam are superficially described, and young Chandruang's impressions of America seem chosen more because they are quaint than acutely perceptive. Disappointingly, his book says little to illumine the Thailand of today's bad news.

TRAIL OF AN ARTIST NATURALIST. The Autobiography of Ernest Thompson Seton. Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.75.

It is perhaps his training as a naturalist which causes the famous author, artist, and lecturer to go into such minute detail about himself, everybody he knew well or was related to, everything which happened to them (especially him), and the scenes amid which it happened. A great deal of it is quite enthralling, especially the description of the Canadian wilds in which Seton grew up. The photographs and illustrations of and by the author, are lavish. The book is a mine of interest; and yet, although one expects an autobiography to deal with its subject, one is left with the feeling that this one talks too much about Ernest Thompson Seton.

GREENLAND LIES NORTH. By William S. Carlson. The Macmillan Company. $3.

This book parallels in several ways Peter Freuchen's generally superior "Arctic Adventure." William Carlson with one companion went to Upernivik, Greenland, to establish a new station for the study of winter air currents. Their adventures acquire interest because of their importance to the author during the Arctic night, when the death of a dog, the lust of a native woman, or a birthday gift from his companion became significant beyond their normal proportions in the civilized world. Monotony was their greatest peril, the attrition of morale due to such isolation as can be known only in a land which is 90 per cent under ice and sunless for half the year. Despite the exclamation points, the style of it is as labored as if written with mittens—the drawings look as if they had been also—but it bears considerable informative matter for those of an encyclopedic mind.

DRAMA

Homicide as Fun

FUTURE students of the Spirit of the Age during the first half of the twentieth century will probably find no literary phenomenon more puzzling than the farce-melodrama. I can foresee them earnestly pointing out that while the comic relief of Elizabethan tragedy comes immediately to mind as a possible parallel, it is not really the same thing. Thus though Shakespeare and his contemporaries shocked classical taste they at least did not usually confuse the comic and the tragic, since the comic characters and the tragic ones were kept separate and we were supposed to stop laughing when the porter went off and Macbeth came on. During the early twentieth century, on the other hand, and at least as early as "Officer 666" and some of George M. Cohan's later works, it appears that the audience was expected to laugh when the corpse fell out of the closet and to regard the more extreme forms of violence as comic per se. Whether this astonishing fact is to be explained in terms of moral degradation and as the result of cardiac callosities induced by the public violence with which everyone had become familiar during the course of the then current collapse of civilization, or whether it had best be understood as a purely literary phenomenon and the natural final result of a refusal to keep the literary genres distinct, is a question still under dispute.

In any event, our historian will continue, all previous assaults upon mixed emotions were surpassed by a gruesome extravaganza called "Arsenic and Old Lace" which was written by one Joseph Kesserling, produced early in 1941 at the Fulton Theater, and reviewed in terms which indicated unmistakably that the majority of contemporary critics regarded it as perhaps the supreme masterpiece of the generation. The text makes strange reading. It is concerned primarily with two apparently harmless old ladies living in Brooklyn—a notoriously bourgeois section of New York City—who, because of a hereditary taint of insanity, have fallen into the habit of poisoning homeless old men who come seeking a lodging. They are assisted in disposing of the bodies by a nephew who believes that he is Colonel Theodore Roosevelt, and the action of the play begins when an adopted nephew discovers what has been going on just at the moment when the household is further recruited by the appearance of a third nephew—a homicidal sadist escaped from an asylum in the company of a mad surgeon who carries a set of instruments with which he tortures victims for the entertainment of his companion.

The action can be imagined, or rather it probably cannot. In a moment of extraordinary insight one of the characters describes the events in progress as "what you would expect if Strindberg had written 'Hellzapoppin'"—the latter being a currently popular piece of clownage notorious for its irrational violence. But perhaps students of more familiar literary fields are more likely to find such scenes as that in which the mad doctor prepares to operate upon the helpless hero reminiscent of some of the outrageous scenes in the decadent tragedies of John Webster or of Cyril Tourneur; and, in fact, the final scene, which is reserved for a curtain call and which consists of a parade of the twelve corpses supposed to have been buried in the cellar before the play begins, is strikingly reminiscent of the dance of cadavers in "The Duchess of Malfi"—except of course that our later Webster expected his audience to be amused. Yet the critic of the staidest of the metropolitan newspapers, the New York Times, described the performance as "so funny none of us will ever forget it," while the Herald Tribune called it "the most riotously hilarious comedy of the season," and the Sun's critic protested, "you wouldn't believe homicidal mania could be so funny." To the Mirror it was "the season's No. 1 delight," while PM proclaimed roundly that "the theater, which is several thousand years old, has never produced anything quite like 'Arsenic and Old Lace.'" In fact, there seems to have been no dissent unless one wishes to count as such the remarks of the reviewer for The Nation, a somewhat old-fashioned weekly, who admitted that he had been considerably amused but suspected that the importance of the play had been overestimated. Since the tone of his paper was rather stuffily literary, and even well-worn allusions were considered to be ornaments, he added that whereas the possibility of considering murder as a fine art was as old as De Quincey, his own age was the first to regard it as frankly hilarious.

By a curious coincidence, continues the historian, the same week that first witnessed "Arsenic and Old Lace" also saw the first performance of "Mr. and Mrs. North" (Belasco Theater), another comic murder play, in this instance dramatized by Owen Davis, Jr., from a series of short stories written by Mr. and Mrs. Richard Lockridge, the former of the coauthors being one of the critics quoted above. Though "Mr. and Mrs. North" is a comedy during the course of which two persons have their heads bashed in with a heavy blunt instrument, it is actually far less difficult to adjust oneself to, since the interest is centered chiefly, not upon death itself, but upon the complications which arise when a pleasant and harmless young couple find that their apartment has been selected, during their absence, as the scene of the murder. In fact, though melodramatic excitement is by no means absent, the play is first of all a charming light comedy about an attractive couple, and its originality lies in the shrewd and kindly domestic humor. Incidentally, it is very delightfully acted, especially by Peggy Conklin as the agreeably scatter-brained wife. Doubtless "Mr. and Mrs. North" is not unlike anything ever seen in the theater before. But I am not at all sure I do not prefer it to "Arsenic and Old Lace." Maybe there never was anything like the latter before because there was really no reason why there should have been.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

DANCE

Repertory

AN EVENT of first importance to the dance was the inauguration this month of a season of dance repertory by the Humphrey-Weidman Company at their new studio-theater at 108 West Sixteenth Street, New York. On the stage of this theater, which is as large as the seating space and has full lighting and production facilities, they will present a program of new and old dances every Saturday and Sunday evening till June. On one Sunday evening each month straight theater dancing will be featured. This is the first such venture since that of the Dance Repertory Theater in 1930-31. The usual season for dancers contains little that contributes to their development—one or two performances at an uptown theater (a long, new work is always expected), a few recitals at the Y. M. C. A. or schools and colleges, six weeks, perhaps, on the road; the rest is studio, classes, rehearsals.

This repertory scheme was adopted after a ten-year trial of every possible channel for bringing dance to the public—not only by Charles Weidman and Doris Humphrey but also by most of the other leading modern dancers. Dances have been arranged for Broadway shows—"Lysistrata," "The School for Wives," Cornell's "Romeo and Juliet." Weidman and José Limon have danced and choreographed extensively in musical reviews like "Americana" and "As Thousands Cheer." This year Katherine Dunham's group is adapting its native Negro dancing to the score of "Cabin in the Sky." Until this winter Paul Draper has purveyed the beautiful stylizations of his J. S. (Yankee Doodle) Bach tap-dancing only through the medium of floor shows. The motion pictures, in their increasing use of dance, have absorbed a few performers, notably Agnes de Mille.

But none of these methods has proved really satisfactory. Not only are such opportunities quite uncertain, but also they finally demand too great dilution and compromise in the dancer's serious work. Though modern dance can work with plays and musicals, it cannot be made a mere entertaining adjunct to them. It has still to be generally understood that the best dancers—Graham, Humphrey, Weidman, Holm, Sokoloff, Tamiris—are not just a new, more gymnastic variety of dancing-master. Their technical preparation has been an arduous exploration; they have dredged riches from the deepest sources. Like a Picasso, a Stanislavsky, a Pound, or any other real artist, they need to be a part of a live creator-audience circuit. Only with an audience which takes them at their own definitions can they accomplish the testing, the remaking, the perfecting of their work-in-progress.

The dances offered by Humphrey and Weidman on their first programs suggest two particular advances that should be made through this repertory practice. Miss Humphrey is doing a new piece, "Song of the West." Like her most distinctive work, it follows that line of modern dance that is abstract, lyric, thematic, dance as a solo art, musical rather than dramatic. This phase has always been the most difficult for audiences. Poems, music, plays can be approached and studied in some secondary form. But a dance can be experienced only in performance. An opportunity to see many times over this new dance, as well as "Passacaglia," "New Dance," and others to be revived in the spring, should accomplish much to overcome the "difficulties" of communication of modern dancing. Anyone who has ever watched a dance over a long period knows it is a continual unfolding; the eyes see the patterns made in space, and from these a "meaning" communicates itself in its own kinesthetic terms. These dances are elaborately conceived and produced, and with each year of performance mature in every way. Seldom are they able to be done or seen as adequately as they merit.

The second benefit should emerge from dances like "The Shakers," and particularly from Weidman's "non-representational pantomimes" such as "On My Mother's Side." Here the indication of characterization and the use of spoken poetry represent the other chief direction of the modern dance: its movement toward a new theater form comparable to the experimentation of theater poets. Martha Graham's "Letter to the World," with a libretto made from Emily Dickinson's poems, is the most exciting effort made by a dancer so far; it was seen for the first time—probably the only time—in New York on January 20. With Yeats dead, with the Federal Theater throttled by the ire of Dies, with Eliot and Cocteau blacked out and Auden an émigré to radio drama, the "poetic theater" has lost its best torch-bearers. The dance now must carry the brunt of theater experimentation, which perhaps has certain advantages. From the frequent repertory production of such dances as those mentioned there may result that necessary accumulation of experience and fecundation of the imagination of poets, dancers, designers, and musicians from which in time the new theater synthesis will come.

At any rate, in one phase or another, the dance cannot but profit greatly by this venture. If it is successful, next season may bring similar setups for other companies, or possibly some merger. The Humphrey-Weidman Repertory, along with the Bennington Summer School of the Arts, now stands as one of the most hopeful efforts being made in this country to forward the real development of the dance and of the theater arts. SHERMAN CONRAD

RECORDS

IT IS a pleasure merely to watch the young New Friends of Music Orchestra, unlike the old New York Philharmonic-Symphony, play with interest in the occasion and willingness to contribute everything it has to give; and most of the time this year the orchestra has been a pleasure to hear. At the opening concert it glowed in Schönberg's marvelously scored Kammer-symphonie No. 2 and was finesse itself in Stiedry's enchanting performance of Schubert's "Rosamunde" music; but apparently when Stiedry conducts Haydn, for whom he obviously has affection and understanding, something happens inside him that causes him to drive the orchestra with nervous intensity that produces harsh, wiry sonorities.

Stiedry has been more successful in creating the orchestra and getting it to play well than in finding music for it to play. The eighteenth century offers any number of works by Haydn and Mozart, Bach and Handel, for an orchestra of that size; the difficulty has been with the nineteenth century, which wrote for a large orchestra, and with the twentieth, which has produced bad music for orchestras of all sizes. And this difficulty has given us Schönberg's technically expert but valueless Kammer-symphonie No. 2 and Schubert's immature Symphony No. 5 at the first concert; and a later program consisting of Ravel's "Ma mère l'Oye," Hindemith's Kammermusik for piano and orchestra, and Brahms's Serenade in A. But future programs look better, with Bach's Passion According to St. John and Art of Fugue and lots of Mozart.

Bach's Prelude and Fugue in E minor for organ (Peters Edition Vol. 3, No. 10), well played by Commette on a Columbia single disc (17243-D, $.75), I find to be an uninspired and unimpressive product of Bach's craftsmanship. But a Victor single (13498, $1) offers a good performance by Gustave Bret of the strange and moving Chorale Prelude "Das alte Jahr vergangen ist," together with the brief "Liebster Jesu, wir sind hier," and on the reverse side the beautiful vocal polyphony of the Benedictus from Lassus's Mass "Douce Mémoire," excellently sung by the Dijon Cathedral Choir under J. Samson. And Victor's Black Label volume of Madrigals, Motets, and Chansons (G-26, $2.50) offers further lovely examples of such polyphony in Weelkes's "We Shepherds Sing," "To Shorten Winter's Sadness," "Welcome Sweet Pleasure," Pilkington's "Diaphenia Like the Daff-down-dilly," Vautor's "Sweet Suffolk Owl," Byrd's Lullaby, Palestrina's "Pater Noster," Lassus's "Sweet Maiden," de Wert's "Un jour je me'en allai," and more deeply affecting examples in Morales's "O vos omnes," de Sermisy's "O joli bois," Gibbons's "Silver Swan," Weelkes's "O Care Thou Wilt Despatch Me" and "Hence Care Thou Art Too Cruel." These are well sung by the Lee Jones Madrigal Singers except for the occasional tremolo and other inadequacies of one of the two sopranos.

Other Victor records offer Bjorling's superb singing of "Di quella pira" and "Ah, si, ban mio coll' essere" from "Il Trovatore" (2136, $.75); Ulrica's aria "Re del abisso" from "Un Ballo in Maschera," sung in German by Margarethe Klose with beauty of voice and without the Teutonic style of Roswaenge's singing of the Barcarolle from the same opera (17560, $1); the Slumber Song from Rimsky-Korsakov's "May Night," well sung by Irene Jessner, and coupled with "It Is Near to Midnight" from Tschaikovsky's "Queen of Spades," in which there is more of the familiar Jessner tremolo and stridency (17559, $1). The Bayou Ballads of the Louisiana Plantations (Set 728, $2.75) may be more significant and exciting to others than they are to me. Most of the arrangements—the ones by Kurt Schindler—are in good taste; and they are well sung by Marguerite Castellanos Taggart. As for the symphony that Bizet wrote at seventeen (Set 721, $4.50), it is a neat job of symphonic construction with some manifestations of the charm and humor that I prefer to experience in the works of his artistic maturity.

The National Committee for Music Appreciation devotes two of its opera sets, twelve sides in all, to a number of what Tovey would call "bleeding chunks" of Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde," which give some of the best music in the opera. The orchestra plays well, but is blanketed by the singing, which is poor. The final set of the series offers as many of the arias and duets of Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" as can be jammed on the records two on a side by speeding up the music. In addition this finely wrought music suffers from the complete lack of finesse in the singing, the thrown-together performances and the hastily made recording. And there are errors in labeling and confusion in the correlation of recorded music with printed text.

B. H. HAGGIN

Letters to the Editors

Addenda to "Who Owns the Future?"

Dear Sirs: Anent the letters of Lawrence Dennis, Max Lerner, and myself published in your issue of January 11, I feel that Lerner did not quite get the point of my letter to Dennis and was somewhat less than fair to him. It's no use dismissing Dennis as a "fascist." He admits it. His argument must be met on its merits, not by a label. And it's no use saying that Spengler was "sick" and that our culture is "well" and "strong." Spengler was right. Our culture is desperately ill. It will either be cured of its illness or die. But I didn't say that "socialism" and "fascism" are the same remedies. I said that "Caesarism" is the state form of the future.

By "Caesarism" I mean a world order in a world imperium in which government will cease to govern nation-states and local land plots and begin to govern the world as an economic and social unity. By "Caesarism" I also mean, not despotism, which is but one of its guises and one hateful to us both, but the supremacy of politics over business, leadership that leads, government that governs, mass values that people believe in, and militant social-mindedness—"totalitarian" in scope and efficacy if not in purpose. All these forms of power and tools of action are common to fascism and to any effective socialism. They are common to the modern tyrannies and to the "strong democratic state" we both would like to see. These are the prerequisites of survival in the twentieth century. They can be used, and are being used successfully, by the fascist tyrants to serve the ends of despotism and barbarism. If the ends of democracy are to be served, democrats must learn at once to do what must be done. Dennis is right when he says that most democrats are still unwilling to face the issue. They have therefore lost almost every battle for the last ten years.

There is no quarrel between Max Lerner and myself. But if there were, it would be precisely on the point of ends and means. He implores me to look to my means. I implore him to look to his. Dennis has already looked to his. No organization of political and military power in our world will prove viable and effective unless it rests upon a new economy ruled by a self-conscious, respected, and purposeful political élite wielding authority in areas far wider than the nations or even the "great powers" of today. This is so because our world has been made by a past which none of us can change. We can only change the future. I want to change the future and am therefore not an "intellectual defeatist" ■ The Nation's editors would have it.

"Socialism" and "internationalism" (or call them "totalitarianism" and "imperialism," "collectivism," and "federalism," or whatever you like) are the only workable weapons for changing the future. If the defenders of democracy know this and act upon it, they can still prevail. But not otherwise, and not by anything short of this. Popular heroism and sacrifice are not enough. Denouncing traitors and appeasers is not enough. "Capitalism," meaning the control of government by private business, and "nationalism," meaning the division of the world into rival sovereignties, must give way to a broader and better organization of men and women to serve democratic ends if democracy is to survive.

FREDERICK L. SCHUMAN

Williamstown, Mass., January 13

Dear Sirs: Professor Lerner chides his colleague Schuman for exchanging with me views on the current disintegration instead of getting out on the propaganda firing line. In so doing, Professor Lerner, unlike Professor Schuman, ignores my case. Briefly, it is that there is no use fighting for something that won't work. We fought for democracy twenty years ago. Since then we have failed to make it work satisfactorily, even to Professor Lerner. Now he attacks not this failure, nor even its causes, but only its consequences, such as the new 'isms, particularly Nazism.

He misjudges me when he infers that I aspire only to the role of an ivory-tower Cassandra. I desist from appeal to the masses merely because I realize the impossibility of competing in propaganda with those who advocate going to war. The next war is always easy to sell. Steps to avert it are not. The Lerner and the Roosevelts are preaching a holy war. It is a crusade against sin and for righteousness, "everywhere." The sinners are the nations—Germany, Russia, Italy, and Japan—engaged in creative social experiments and expansionist enterprises. The righteous are the British and ourselves, who, since our last victory for our system, have failed to make it work. Obviously, one cannot make good propaganda against "righteousness" or for peace with "sin." One must wait until experience has changed the mass mind as to what is good and what is evil.

Professor Lerner disregards my forecast that the Roosevelt holy war will be a failure. My reasons are that the poor and the wicked we shall have with us always and that Utopia is a place which does not exist. My case is based on experience; that of Professor Lerner on faith, hope, and wishful thinking. When the failure of the Lerner-Roosevelt holy war has taught its lesson, I shall be able to make propaganda—not against that war, which will then be past history, but against its instigators in our midst.

It is interesting to know that Professor Lerner agrees with me that the barbarians are bound to win. He writes, "Let us leave him [Dennis] with his dreams, sitting for the moment in his ivory tower writing for his limited public, until the barbarians do with him what in Europe they have done with the Strassers and Rauschnings and other men of brains and good impulses who have cleared the way for them." It is good to have Professor Lerner thus admit that his is a lost cause. I am not now concerned about what the barbarians will do to either of us. I only want to be sure that they will win. Lerner comforts himself with the hope that the barbarians will liquidate me because I am an intellectual and a rationalist. It seems to me that rationality is with the survivors, and especially with what survives. Stalin's policy seems calculated to aggrandize Russia and to spread communism; hence, for Stalin's purposes it is rational. With these purposes I have no sympathy.

The purposes of Roosevelt and Lerner cannot be served by a war which cannot enrich America or preserve the system to which they are attached. Hence, I find such a war irrational. Germany and Japan have a chance of creating by the sword vast empires in their respective areas. I do not say they will. I have no sympathy with their attempt to do so. I only say that such empires have been so created and maintained over long periods in the past. I assume this will happen again in the future. I also say, very emphatically, that the Lerner-Roosevelt empire "everywhere" of "righteousness"—freedom of religion, freedom of speech, and freedom from want—has never been created either by the sword or the gospel, or by the two operating hand in hand. I assume that this cannot happen in the future.

Lerner's idealization of democracy in the past is as unreal as his ideal of democracy for the future. He admits, with me, that American democracy has been capitalism, yet he finds capitalism not worth fighting for. The democracy he cherishes was but one phase. That phase is now gone forever. The new phase of democracy is totalitarianism. We are entering this world-wise phase by declaring war on totalitarianism and going totalitarian in order to wage the war. I am doing nothing to bring on the new phase. Rather I would retard it by keeping America out of war. Professor Lerner is denouncing the new phase. At the same time he is hastening it by crusading for American intervention in the war.

LAWRENCE DENNIS

Short of War— What Does It Mean?

Dear Sirs: Your editorial on financing Britain, in the issue of December 14, begins an analysis of American policy without carrying it through. "Either the interests of this country are vitally affected by the outcome of Britain's struggle or they are not." The implications of this sentence are larger than the editorial indicates, or than many of us have realized. The realization would upset our slogan of all aid to Britain short of war, a comfortable phrase which has won almost universal agreement. I submit that this agreement is now profoundly dangerous, because the slogan will not bear analysis.

What do we mean by short of war? Do we mean that we are not going to get into war in any circumstances? Obviously not, since we are spending billions on armament. Do we mean that we shall not fight until this hemisphere is attacked? Assume that we do, and can answer the awkward question of where the hemisphere has its military frontiers. Then why aid to Britain, when such aid makes us an increasingly active participant in the war, and thereby increases our danger in the event of a German victory? To this there seems only one answer: that we have a subsidiary national interest in British survival, at least until our hemispheric defenses are prepared—an interest for which we are unwilling to fight but willing to increase our risk in the immediate future. Britain, in short, is our first line of defense, and worth defending only to the last Briton.

This is a tenable position. But many Americans do not consider that it is peace with honor; many feel that it jeopardizes, for the sake of the present, our national interests in the future, much as England and France did theirs from 1933 to 1939. Hence this interpretation of the slogan, whatever its merits or demerits, is not one on which we are agreed.

Another interpretation is possible: that our national interest in British survival is vital enough to be worth not only aid short of war, but war itself if necessary. Then what do we mean by "if necessary"? Presumably that we shall intervene if and when the alternative is British defeat, and not before. This is a logical position. But it is not a practical one, because such intervention is prohibitively difficult. In the first place, a military crisis is almost certain to develop too fast for effective action by us. In the second, no one can say whether we shall have clear-cut alternatives, or be able to recognize them if we have: do we fight to keep the shipping lanes open? or the Germans out of Turkey? or Gibraltar? or England? The only practical course is to obviate the chance of British defeat by the most effective means in our power, short of nothing. Those who grant that British survival is worth war, if necessary, are thereby forced to an unconditional slogan: all aid to Britain. This is a position which many Americans take, and many refuse to take; it is thus one on which we are far from agreed.

Our apparent unity of thought is in fact the evasion of thought. We have accepted a slogan as a substitute for reasoning. There was another slogan, years ago, about making the world safe for democracy; we accepted it, fought for it, and forgot it, all without knowing what it really meant. Our current slogan is less challenging, but again we do not know what it means. These are days when we are making decisions which will affect our destiny for generations; it is therefore the duty of a citizen to think out his position for himself. Our slogan is not a position, but only an excuse for not finding one. If thinking produces disagreement, it also produces in time an intelligible policy. The unthinking acceptance of a phrase produces nothing but danger.

W. B. WILLCOX

Williamstown, Mass., January 8

CONTRIBUTORS

DONALD W. MITCHELL, a close student of naval and military policy in the United States, has written articles on the subject for numerous periodicals.

STEFAN TH. POSSONY, an Austrian writer now living in this country, is the author of several books on economic and military problems of modern warfare.

THEODOR BROCH, who is now in this country, was mayor of Narvik at the time of the Nazi invasion.

LOUISE BLANCO, a native of the Middle West, has lived in Puerto Rico for several years.

LOUIS B. SALOMON, a member of the English Department of Brooklyn College, reviews fiction regularly for The Nation.

PAUL M. SWEEZY is instructor in economics at Harvard University.

RUSTEM VAMBERY, Hungarian criminologist and sociologist, has written extensively on European problems. He is a lecturer at the New School for Social Research.

HILARY SUMNER-BOYD, an American educated at Oxford, has contributed to the London New Statesman and Nation and to Time and Tide.

DOROTHY VAN DOREN, formerly associate editor of The Nation, is the author of "Those First Affections" and other novels.

'CHARLES E. NOYES is a staff writer for Editorial Research Reports, a Washington newspaper service.

RUTH NORDEN, together with Heinz Norden, has edited and translated many volumes from the German.

SHERMAN CONRAD is an Associate of the School of Letters at Iowa University.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 5 Fifth Ave., New York. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 152

NEW YORK · SATURDAY · FEBRUARY 1, 1941

NUMBER 5

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

EDITORIALS

- | | |
|---|-----|
| A Lindbergh Peace | 115 |
| Rumanian Frenzy | 116 |
| C. I. O. Solution for Defense Housing | 117 |
| Ambassador Dodd Speaks by Freda Kirchwey | 118 |

ARTICLES

- | | |
|--|-----|
| One-Sided Horse Trade by I. F. Stone | 120 |
| India and the War by Jawaharlal Nehru | 121 |
| Passports to Nowhere by Joachim Joesten | 124 |
| Our Gerrymandered States
by Richard L. Neuberger | 127 |
| Everybody's Business by Keith Hutchison | 128 |
| In the Wind | 129 |
| A Native at Large by Jonathan Daniels | 130 |

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

- | | |
|--|-----|
| A Note on Order by W. H. Auden | 131 |
| Elegy for James Joyce by Ivan Goll | 133 |
| The Way of the Vanguard by Philip Rahv | 133 |
| Literary Autobiography by Dorothy Van Doren | 134 |
| In Brief | 136 |
| Drama: Tragedy Is Not Easy
by Joseph Wood Krutch | 136 |
| Art: Greco for Greece by Christopher Lazare | 137 |
| Records by B. H. Haggin | 138 |

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

113

The Shape of Things

THE CONSCRIPTION OF LABOR IN BRITAIN, recently announced by Ernest Bevin, Minister of Labor, seems on the face of it a retreat from the relatively enlightened social policy followed by the British government in recent months. Yet there are compelling reasons why some such step should be taken. According to Churchill's statement Britain has today some 4,000,000 men under arms. Most of these men have been taken out of trade or industry. But Britain's need for supplies and war materials has never been greater. And maximum production cannot be obtained unless every man is not only employed but employed in the kind of work most needed by the country. The shift of manpower from the export and other non-essential industries to the war industries has not been proceeding as smoothly as it should. Some compulsion seems, therefore, defensible as an emergency measure. But if such an extreme step is to be taken, labor has the right to ask that capital make an equivalent sacrifice. The counterpart of conscription of labor is a capital levy. Although there has been some increase in taxation, British capital has so far gotten off fairly lightly. Only about a third of Britain's war expenditures are being defrayed out of taxes. In contrast, Germany is said to be meeting half of its expenditures by taxation. Thus under present conditions British labor is carrying not only the increased burden of production but, through the effect of inflation and declining living standards, is carrying a large part of the financial burden of the war as well.

★

THE SURVIVAL OF THE DAILY WORKER IN wartime Britain has been something of a miracle and it is not altogether surprising that the British government has now ordered the suppression of this paper as well as of The Week, a news-letter which followed the party line. We can understand the government's impatience with the "defeatism" which the British Communist organ has been dishing out since Moscow looped the loop at the beginning of the war, but we are sorry it has been goaded into such an assertion of its emergency powers. Several independent Labor members of Parliament have put down a motion expressing their "detestation" of the Daily Worker's propaganda while regretting that

Editor and Publisher

FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor
ROBERT BENDINER

Washington Editor
I. F. STONE

Literary Editor
MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors

KEITH HUTCHISON MAXWELL S. STEWART

Dramatic Critic

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager and Director of Circulation

HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager

MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Published weekly and copyright, 1941, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 55 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. Washington Bureau: 856 National Press Building, Washington, D. C. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879.

action against it was taken under the defense regulations instead of by court proceedings which would have afforded it a chance to state its case. This seems to us fair criticism. In defending his action Herbert Morrison, Home Secretary, said that their publishers had been warned last July. Nevertheless they had continuously "by every device of distortion and misrepresentation sought to make out that our people have nothing to gain from victory." We have no doubt that the allegation is well founded but we still wonder if these Communist sheets were sufficiently influential to justify their suppression. Most British workers have long ceased to be befuddled by Communist propaganda. In fact, the occasional usefulness of the Daily Worker as a gadfly to bureaucracy—in the matter of air-raid shelters for instance—has been largely destroyed by just suspicions of its ulterior motives. *

ONE OF BRITAIN'S COLONEL BLIMPS HAS flourished his old school tie once too often and neatly choked himself. Recently Lieutenant-Colonel Ralph Charles Bingham wrote to the London Times to the effect that the middle and working-classes had fallen down on the job of providing officer material. Boys from these classes, pontificated the Colonel, fail in the art of "management"—unlike "the old aristocratic feudal classes" they never had "their people" to consider. "Never was the old school tie and the best it stands for more justified than today." In blitzkrieged Britain, overemphasis on class distinctions is definitely déclassé and this voice from the past raised a storm in press and Parliament. Now the War Office has descended heavily on Colonel Bingham, reprimanding him for communicating with the press on military subjects in breach of army regulations and relieving him of his command of the training unit. This should prove a salutary lesson to other brass-hats still fighting Waterloo on the playing-fields of Eton. *

TO THE CATHOLICS IN THIS COUNTRY WHO think General Franco's regime heralds the rebirth of a Christian Europe, we recommend an article which appeared recently in Arriba, organ of the Spanish Phalanx and its chief, Serrano Suñer. According to a dispatch in the New York Times, this article asserted that Franco reserves the right to intercept at sea any ships which may leave France carrying Spanish refugees to Mexico and other American countries. The "Christian" Franco is outdoing the "pagan" Hitler in his hounding of political opponents. "The Spanish government," writes Arriba, "reserves full right to maintain watch on these embarkments at Marseilles and the justice of Spain will not permit assassins of three years of red storms to flee under the paternal care of France." What this "paternal care" amounts to is shown by the protest which the Mexican government has been forced to present to Vichy regarding the detention in unoccupied France of Francisco Largo Caballero and other former officials of the Republican government. This protest gives full confirmation of the arrest of Caballero which was solemnly denied in Vichy and elsewhere. *

DETAILS REGARDING THE CLASH IN CHINA between the new Fourth Route Army and regular Kuomintang troops indicate that a grave situation has arisen. According to a dispatch from Edgar Snow in the New York Herald Tribune, the rear guard of the Fourth Army, consisting of 8,000 men, was attacked early in January by twenty-seven divisions of Central government troops as it was preparing to cross the Yangtse to take up positions assigned by the Chungking War Office. A nine-day battle ensued in which the Fourth Route Army lost 4,000 men, including its commander, Yeh Ting, who was captured, and the second in command, Hang Yung, who was wounded, captured, and subsequently murdered. Other American observers who have just arrived in this country fully confirm Snow's analysis of the background of the conflict. As early as last summer the Fourth Route Army received orders from Ho Ying-chin, right-wing War Minister, to evacuate the rich Yangtse valley and move northward. The leaders of the Fourth Army agreed to make the move but asked that arrangements be made for the protection of the partisan troops left behind, for the care of the wounded, and peaceful transit through the territory occupied by Kuomintang troops. None of these arrangements was ever made. Instead, the Kuomintang troops fell upon the retreating Fourth Route Army and all but destroyed it. Similar though less severe clashes have occurred in the past between the Eighth Route Army and the troops of local warlords. In each case, the conflict has been patched up without seriously affecting Chinese unity. But the recent clash is admittedly more fundamental. Should it spread to include the Eighth Route Army, many observers fear that the centralized authority of Chiang Kai-shek would be jeopardized and that general civil war would result. Needless to say, such a conflict would nullify, if it did not bring to an end, the assistance now given China by the Soviet Union, Great Britain, and the United States. *

THE TRUCE BETWEEN THAILAND AND INDO-CHINA appears to be a victory of the first order for Japan. Early reports from Vichy assert that Japan has demanded the right to occupy certain ports in Cambodia as a price for mediation of the conflict. Ostensibly the Japanese fleet is to occupy the ports in order to enforce the terms of the settlement. But it is evident that the possession of naval bases in south Indo-China and Thailand would be of tremendous assistance to Japan in the event of an attack on Singapore, Burma, or the Dutch East Indies.

According to the latest information available, the Vichy government has not yet acceded to the Japanese demands. But there seems little chance that the French will be able to offer effective opposition unless support is forthcoming from Great Britain or the United States.

★

WE CAN FIND NO KIND THINGS TO SAY OF Justice McReynolds on the occasion of his retirement. More than any other member of the old court he typified that narrow philosophy which so long made the Constitution seem a part of a Magna Carta for Wall Street's barons. To Mr. Roosevelt, about to appoint a successor, McReynolds may well stand as a monument to the dangers involved in the use of the Supreme Court as a place to which officials otherwise unsatisfactory can be "kicked upstairs." For Wilson named McReynolds to the court when he wanted to get rid of him as attorney general. The President has said that he has already made his choice. Attorney General Robert H. Jackson and Senator James F. Byrnes are said to be leading contenders for the job. The President owes a debt to Byrnes for his services in the Senate and during the campaign. But in spite of support for many New Deal measures, he remains essentially a Southern conservative. Mr. Jackson's presence on the court would, on the other hand, strengthen the liberal majority; and fortunately a most admirable successor to the attorney general would be available in his own department—the present Solicitor General, Francis Biddle.

★

THE PRESIDENT MADE A MOVE IN THE RIGHT direction when he nominated Dean G. Acheson as Assistant Secretary of State. Mr. Acheson is a person of broad interests and liberal outlook. It is officially suggested that his particular function will be to act as a link between the department and both the British Embassy and the Treasury in the matter of British purchases. But it may be assumed that the President hopes Mr. Acheson's presence in the State Department will also serve as a general leaven. No one man, however, is likely to create enough ferment to affect so unyielding and solid a lump. If the department is ever to be brought in line with the aims and policies of the Administration as a whole, resignations as well as new appointments will be necessary. Mr. Acheson is needed in the State Department, but he will be lonely there.

★

THE COMMITTEE NAMED BY THE NATIONAL Association of Manufacturers to investigate textbooks will no doubt be prepared to walk a mile to evade any notice of the testimony taken last week by the Securities Exchange Commission in the Electric Bond and Share case. Testimony revealed that Herbert Dorau, professor of economics at New York University, and John T. Madden, dean of its school of commerce, had received approximately $150,000 between 1936 and 1938 from the Edison Electric Institute. The revelation came after Dorau had been put on the witness stand as an "expert" by Electric Bond and Share. Dorau, who is also chairman of the department of public utilities and transport in the university's school of commerce, gave a long list of articles and monographs he had written. He is author of the chapter on public utilities in a textbook on economics used at the university. His financial relations with the Edison Electric Institute came out under cross-examination. He had worked for Electric Bond and Share and for Associated Gas and Electric. He said that both he and Madden, who operated a joint banking account, were given jobs at $1,200 a month each by Simpson, Thacher, and Bartlett as utility experts for Edison Electric Institute. Dorau said his work for the Institute was "a matter of analysis and conviction." It is nice when one's analysis and convictions coincide with $1,200 a month.

A Lindbergh Peace

PASSED through its baptism of fire, the President's bill to aid the British has scarcely been singed. One would have expected that so doughty a quintet as Lindbergh, Kennedy, Castle, MacNider, and Hugh Johnson, given a national rostrum, would leap to the charge, fists flying. Instead, with one exception, they hedged about and moved cautiously. Although opposed to the lease-lend bill, Castle and Johnson favored a large measure of aid, under strict Congressional controls; MacNider told the committee, "It would be a very unhappy day for America if Great Britain were defeated"; and Kennedy's equivocal testimony at one point came so close to an endorsement of the bill that he was roundly applauded by Administration supporters in the audience. The leaders of those who a few short months ago scoffed at "aid short of war" as hypocritical or illusory now urged aid short of the lend-lease bill. Gone completely—or almost completely—was the insistence that aid once undertaken must move on inevitably to full aid and war. The isolationists are fighting a rear-guard action.

The glaring exception among the witnesses heard so far is Colonel Lindbergh, who hopes for an immediate "negotiated peace"; who argues that the United States is largely to blame for the war because it enticed France and Britain into battle by promises of help; who believes that Britain's position is becoming "more and more desperate" and that further aid from this country can only prolong the conflict; who finds between England and Germany "not as much difference in philosophy as we have been led to believe"; and who would "prefer to see neither side win."

Another flying colonel, Clarence Chamberlin, who likewise flew across the Atlantic and should therefore be privileged to testify, thinks that "either Lindbergh doesn't know what he is talking about or he's been bitten by the Nazi bug." There is probably a good deal of truth in both alternatives, but the analysis seems somewhat on the crude side. From his testimony we should say that Lindbergh is less the ignoramus, less the Nazi, than he is the forerunner of that American hemispheric imperialism which will blossom forth should England go down to defeat.

The pattern has long been forming. The Lindberghs of this country—and the Eagle is not as lone as we could wish—want to see an immediate "negotiated peace," which at this point in the war means a peace dictated by Hitler. (What other peace could there be between a Germany that rules a continent and an England growing "more and more desperate"?) The military effects which such a catastrophe would have on our own situation are dismissed by the Colonel with utter irresponsibility. Aviation, he tells us, has made our defense much easier; hence we need not worry about a German victory. On the other hand aviation has made our power to attack much harder; hence we must abandon all thought of carrying the fight to Europe. Ergo, there can be no real war between the United States and Europe, the British navy means nothing to us, and England can sink out of sight for all it matters to our safety.

It is a pity that the House Committee which listened to Lindbergh didn't take the trouble to analyze an argument which is as dangerous as it is specious. No one in his senses thinks primarily of the German threat in terms of bombs over St. Louis, or even over Sandy Hook. The danger is that a victorious Germany would be a power stretching from Russia to the Irish coast, a power whose industries, resources, naval strength, and vast supplies of slave labor could compel this country to go fascist without the firing of a shot. We would have to arm to the teeth in defense; we would go rampantly imperialist if for no other reason than to assure the Western Hemisphere for American autarchy; we would mercilessly beat down the American standard of living not only to pay for our arms but even to exist economically in a German-dominated world. And in the end we would have to fight, without the British Navy and without England as a vantage point from which to conduct an offensive.

This prospect is not of our fabricating. It is a prospect that is already germinating in the minds of the Lindberghs. Even now the Colonel talks glibly of setting up "aviation bases in Newfoundland, Canada, the West Indies, parts of South America, and Central America," and some months ago he stated flatly that we ought to step in and control Canada's foreign policy. Colonel Lindbergh and we see eye to eye on the consequences of a Hitler victory; but the Colonel thinks of the vision as American Empire and finds it good, while we find in it only fascism and the promise of wars to come.

Rumanian Frenzy

FOR the second time since the German army occupied Rumania that unhappy country has suffered an appalling spasm of violence. Only a confused account of the outbreak has yet percolated through the censorship, and its immediate causes, in particular, remain extremely obscure. But it would not be inaccurate to diagnose the revolt of the Iron Guard as a case of severe schizophrenia—the uncontrollable physical reaction of souls torn between admiration for Hitler and realization that he has betrayed them.

The Iron Guard did not originate as a foreign offshoot of national socialism. It was an indigenous, intensely nationalistic movement on parallel lines, which shared the Nazis' anti-Semitism and diseased mysticism. Like its counterpart in Germany it had an economic basis in the land hunger of the peasants and the job-hunger of the urban middle classes. As Hitler's star rose it looked upon him with increasing admiration and hope and gladly became his subsidized fifth column in Rumania. The first great shock of the Iron Guard was the settlement imposed by Germany last fall which gave most of Transylvania to Hungary—a bitter blow to nationalist pride already wounded by the surrender of Bessarabia and the Dobrudja. However the opportunity to drive King Carol out of the country, to indulge in pogroms against the Jews, and to wreak revenge on internal enemies offered a temporary safety valve. Moreover the Guard was declared the sole legal party in the country and its leaders were given high office.

Meanwhile the Germans had marched in ostensibly to instruct the Rumanian army in modern warfare. But more and more divisions arrived and with them came economic experts and purchasing agents whose requisitions increased the scarcity of goods and sharpened the economic crisis. If the Iron Guard looked to the Nazis for help in achieving the break-up of the great estates or for action against the industrial monopolists, they were disappointed. It was soon clear that German methods of exploitation precluded such reforms; for they needed to squeeze Rumania to the utmost and it is well known that the first result of giving land to half-starved peasants is to increase home consumption and decrease the marketable surplus. Nor did it suit the Nazi book to destroy the industrial magnates: they preferred to use them as they had used their own Thyssens and Krupps.

General Antonescu proved himself the obedient servant of Hitler and, with German soldiers available to back him, his need of the Iron Guard lessened. The report that he was negotiating with the Bratianus, the fabulously wealthy clan which controls a huge slice of Rumania's economy, probably showed the Iron Guard that its position was being undermined and drove it to revolt. The actual signal for the outbreak was the murder of a German officer—an indication that it was aimed not only at Antonescu but at his Nazi backers.

This Rumanian tragedy illustrates once again the mad folly of fascists outside Germany who offer their services to Hitler and expect in return the opportunity to fulfil their own social and national ambitions. He is always prepared to use them to disrupt the countries he hopes to conquer but, this achieved, he is equally ready to liquidate them should their demands conflict with his own plans. Even complete acceptance of the Nazi philosophy will not appease Hitler; he requires also unswerving obedience and acknowledgment of the paramountcy of German interests. There is a lesson in Rumania for appeasers at Vichy—and for some nearer home.

C. I. O. Solution for Defense Housing

THE DIVISION in the labor movement, otherwise deplorable, has at least one good by-product. The C. I. O., with no real foothold in the building trades, does not share the A. F. of L.'s vested interests in established methods of housing construction. The result is that the C. I. O., through its recently organized housing committee, has now issued a fairly detailed proposal for the use of prefabricated materials to solve the growing problem of defense housing. One small example given by a speaker at the tenth annual meeting of the National Public Housing Conference in New York will serve to illustrate the way in which a housing shortage may interfere with defense production. Peter Flynn, vice-president of the Industrial Union of Marine and Shipbuilding Workers, C. I. O., said that many key workers in New Jersey plants were forced to refuse overtime work because of the long distances they had to travel between their homes and places of work.

We hope the C. I. O.'s plea for the use of prefabricated housing will not meet the same indifference that greeted its previous proposal along the same lines last October 14. Since that proposal was made to the Defense Commission, the problem has grown more serious and the C. I. O. housing committee has gone further into the possibilities of prefabrication. The subject holds special attractions for the C. I. O. because of its strong position in the steel industry, which would be stimulated by prefabricated housing. The C. I. O. believes that use of prefabricated parts has four advantages. Such houses can be put up far faster than ordinary ones. There is no dislocation of industry and labor, since it is not necessary to move large numbers of construction workers to the sites where houses are needed. Instead the parts are manufactured in industrial centers and shipped to the point needed for assembly. Prefabricated housing is also cheaper and it has a high salvage value. Homes may be dismantled and moved when the emergency is over.

Lumber, brick, cement, and contracting interests, and no doubt the A. F. of L. building trades as well, will fight the plan. For emergency or war-time expansion of prefabricated housing might endanger their position in the future by bringing about a sharp reduction in the cost of housing and rendering older methods obsolete. The C. I. O.'s detailed analysis of the difficulties to be encountered in the use of conventional methods indicates the need for overriding these objections, and the possibility that this may open the way to wider use of prefabricated housing later should be an extra inducement, not an obstacle. Unfortunately vested interests in both capital and labor will find strong support from the new defense housing setup at the capital, where C. F. Palmer, real estate dealer from Atlanta, Georgia, has been made coordinator of defense housing.

The objections to Mr. Palmer rest not merely on his record, which shows him to be unfriendly to public housing and hostile to new and cheaper methods; they have to do also with the curious manner in which Mr. Palmer has been made independent of the Defense Commission and thereby subject to no check either from labor's representative, Sidney Hillman, or from the consumer representative, Harriet Elliott. Mr. Palmer, as housing adviser to the Defense Commission, had already demonstrated his unwillingness to cooperate with either. The same group to whom our Washington editor two weeks ago attributed the palace cabal which sought to strip Hillman of authority in the new Office of Production Management reappears in the story of Palmer's mysterious elevation. In this case, too, Harold Smith, Director of the Budget, and William H. McReynolds, one of the President's administrative assistants, seem to have played leading parts. An order was framed making Palmer coordinator over all other housing authorities and subordinate only to the President, and Mr. Roosevelt's signature was obtained before the Defense Commission knew what was happening. We cannot believe that the purpose of that order was fully explained to the President.

Since his mysterious elevation, Mr. Palmer, by appointing Harold E. Pomeroy, formerly executive secretary of the Associated Farmers of California, as one of his chief aids, has added to the bad impression he has already made. Mr. Pomeroy claims that he was misled into working for the Associated Farmers and left his job with them after a year's time. Mr. Pomeroy is not a vigilante or a thug or a fascist. But he has been associated during most of his career with reactionary business and political interests in California. The C. I. O.'s housing report had to be made to the new coordinator of defense housing. So novel and disturbing an idea is unlikely to get a warm welcome from either Palmer or Pomeroy.

Ambassador Dodd Speaks

BY FRED A KIRCHWEY

IF WILLIAM E. DODD were alive his contribution to the great debate in Washington would be more important than that of all the other witnesses together. For Mr. Dodd served as American Ambassador at Berlin during almost five of the eight years of Hitler's rule. He watched the consolidation of Nazi power and the expanding menace of Hitler's ambition. Beside his testimony the theories of Lindbergh and Kennedy would have shriveled into their natural proportions.

Some suggestion of the story Mr. Dodd would have told may be found in the paragraphs which follow. They are taken from his Berlin diary,* an amazing account, frank and bold and realistic, of Europe's descent into war. Naturally it does not offer direct testimony as to Hitler's ultimate intentions toward the United States and the world. Rather it documents the record of broken promises, of mounting fear in the smaller nations, of suicidal hesitations and concessions on the part of the great powers. It shows the direction if not the goal of Hitler's ambition. It records the countless warnings which were duly transmitted to—and filed in—Washington. The scattered fragments printed below are only a hint of what will be available when the "Diary" is published. I offer them as a poor but useful substitute for the testimony of a man who died too soon.

October 17, 1933, Tuesday. I went today at 12 o'clock to see Chancellor Hitler . . . The Chancellor was clearly excited. I asked him why he had withdrawn from the League. He ranted about the Treaty of Versailles, the failure of the powers to keep their promises about disarmament and the indignity of keeping Germany in a defenseless status. I replied: There is evident injustice in the French attitude; but defeat in war is always followed by injustice. . . .

After an exchange of niceties, I asked the Chancellor whether an incident on the Polish, Austrian, or French border which drew an enemy into the Reich would be allowed to be a casus belli. Of course he said, "No, no." I then said in case such a thing were to occur in the Ruhr valley would you hold off and call a conference of the European powers? He said: "That would be my purpose, but we might not be able to restrain the German people." . . . My final impression was of his belligerence and self-confidence.

June 18, 1934, Monday. As I was about to go [after a call on Von Bülow, Under-Secretary of State], I asked about the Venice conference. He said promptly: "We declined the Far East pact with Russia and Poland which Litvinov urged because we are not armed and could not participate on equal and safe terms. It involved Germans in a guarantee of the Baltic states' safety, and also Czechoslovakia's, against aggression of any kind." It was plain that Hitler is not willing to allow these states with German minorities to maintain their independence. . . .

November 1, Thursday. At 6 o'clock, I returned the formal call of the Soviet Ambassador, Suritz. He talked rather freely about Russian economic life and gave me an inkling of negotiations with Hitler in spite of the Nazi hatred of everything Russian. I believe Hitler is trying to negotiate a pact with the Soviets like that with the Poles, mainly to scare the French. . . .

November 17, Saturday. The Polish Ambassador, Lipski, called . . . and remained nearly an hour. He was frank in the discussion of Polish-German relations: "The pact of last winter is only a temporary affair. Germany intends to re-annex part of our country, the maps posted all over Germany show this clearly. . . . The Russians and the Germans are negotiating a commercial treaty which I think has a political and military pact attached, but it is secret, and these negotiations are going on largely to isolate France." . . .

Germany, he went on, intends to re-annex Alsace-Lorraine and large parts of Poland as well as Austria and Czechoslovakia. Then she will control the Balkan region zone and all the Baltic Sea. Europe will be a German realm if she succeeds.

December 10, Monday. . . . At 11 this morning the Dutch Minister told me the same thing that the Belgian told me last week. "Germany will annex Holland if she wins a European war." He was very positive in this, and also perturbed about the Japanese denunciation of the Treaty of Washington. "It means war if the United States and England do not unite in their Far Eastern policy. England will lose her Hongkong and other Chinese concessions, the United States will find the Philippines annexed to Japan, and we, the Dutch people, will lose our three-hundred-year-old Far Eastern holdings." . . .

April 4, 1935, Thursday. . . . I learned of a confidential interview with Benes, about the end of March, in which the Czech Premier said his country would fight . . . if [its] allies helped; otherwise, there was nothing to do but capitulate to Germany's terms . . . I wonder if Benes doubts the validity of French and English promises.

March 7, 1936, Saturday. . . . Already the news had come that Hitler was to address the Reichstag assembly today at 12 o'clock! When Mayer returned at 11 o'clock, he brought a summary of Hitler's propositions: he was sending some 30,000 troops into the demilitarized zone of the Rhineland; he proposed an agreement with France and Belgium to demilitarize both sides of the Rhine, also the Dutch border on the German side; he would denounce the Locarno pact between Germany, France, Italy, and England because France was signing a pact with Russia; he would return to the League of Nations and be ready to limit aircraft with Western powers, and would demand the restoration of German colonies. . . .

* Reproduced by special permission of Harcourt, Brace and Company from "Ambassador Dodd's Diary," edited by Martha Dodd and William E. Dodd, Jr., to be published February 20.

March 18, Wednesday. I went to see Von Neurath at 11:30 to get his reactions to events since March 7. He was suave and smiling as if everything he had discussed with me February 29 had worked out according to his advice. He even denied what he told me on the former occasion, namely, that he was urging a diplomatic solution of the Rhine demilitarization matter. I suppose it is impossible to trust even the more conservative members of the government. . . .

April 4, Saturday. . . . We learn today that some Austrian and Czechoslovak Germans are new members of the Reichstag. The fact that Hitler decreed them members is symbolic of his so-called peace policy. The claim of the right to annex parts or all of these countries is thus subtly announced. . . .

April 7, Tuesday. . . . I went to see the British Ambassador on the same street. Sir Eric Phipps . . . knows contemporary Europe as few others do. In January he was ready to help his government to the limit against German aggression and willing to support the French-Soviet pact, wrangled over in Europe for a year. He had said then that France and England were offering a solid front and Italy was expected to join them.

Today he was uncertain about what his country should do in any direction. All Europe is in a critical situation. Italy may seize all Ethiopia and even Egypt, which would mean immediate war in the Mediterranean. France might break across the German western frontier which England would not support. Germany is preparing to the limit for eastern aggression and England won't do anything. I said: That means a new Europe, with France declining, England losing her empire and Germany becoming the master of all.

September 26, Saturday. . . . Today the Minister from the Netherlands said to me: "We are all sure that Germany intends to annex our country in due time, also Switzerland and other countries where people of the medieval German race lived or left descendants." . . .

He was both anxious and pessimistic as he went away, saying: "Unless your country and England and France and Russia work together for world peace there is no way to avoid a world war."

November 15, Sunday. . . . The Argentine Minister said . . . that Paul Scheffer of the Berliner Tageblatt, who had been visiting Latin American representatives here, spent an hour with him. Scheffer had represented the Foreign Office, he thought, and perhaps the Propaganda Ministry. He criticized the whole American program in Latin America, said it was a renewal of the Monroe Doctrine in its former aggressive shape and that Roosevelt had no right to influence South American policy. . . .

The real fear here and in Rome is that the President may organize all American peoples against Fascist Europe and even boycott any power that starts another war.

June 2, 1937, Wednesday. . . . The new English Ambassador here is reported to be in full sympathy with the German-Italian aggression in Spain. His name is Henderson, and he was in Argentina several years before coming here. He had already revealed his complete pro-Franco attitude, seemingly unaware of the dangers to England. He is also reported to have informed the German Government that England would make no objections if Hitler seized Austria and Czechoslovakia. . . .

June 17, Thursday. Hitler has made a speech to young Italians just at the time when the papers are boasting of the peace talk with England which Von Neurath is going to London to negotiate. Hitler talked of his readiness for war. People in the United States seem determined to stay neutral even facing a Europe under the control of a single dictatorship. . . .

June 20, Sunday. . . . The Latvian Military Attaché spoke freely of the dangerous probable consequences of Russia's weakening position. The Czech Minister was more concerned about the threats to his little country. . . . He reported that he had made a formal protest to the German Foreign Office about falsehoods as to his government's encouraging maltreatment of Germans in Czechoslovakia. His wife said to my wife: "If Germany attacks our country, Russia will come at once to our defense." I doubt this, unless France attacks Germany in the Rhine zone.

June 23, Wednesday. Concerned about the British attitude, I went to see Ambassador Henderson. . . . He said: "My government has been unwise in its relations with Germany. I told Von Neurath that, and also told him Hitler's decision to keep Von Neurath at home was equally unwise."

He turned to a general discussion of things: "Germany under Hitler is renewing the Bismarck policy of annexing all European peoples of German descent, Austria, Czechoslovakia, and other countries." Although I had suspected Henderson was inclined to favor German annexations, I did not think he would go so far in his statements. He then added: "Germany must dominate the Danube-Balkan zone, which means that she is to dominate Europe. England and her Empire is to dominate the seas along with the United States. England and Germany must come into close relations, economic and political, and control the world." He said: "France is a back number and unworthy of support. Franco is to control Spain." . . . I wonder if Ambassador Henderson really represents his government? What would happen to Britain if Germany annexed all the peoples all the way to the Black Sea?

One-Sided Horse Trade

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, January 25

THE BAR and the press become exercised over the problems of administrative law only when some important administrative agency is in danger of performing its task effectively. The Interstate Commerce Commission was established in 1887, but few worried about its procedure as long as it was rendered innocuous by judicial decision. Then Congress in 1906 gave the Commission explicit power to make railroad rates.

"Once the inevitability of clothing the Commission with rate-making power was recognized," I. L. Sharfman writes in his monumental study of the Commission, "a bitter legislative conflict was waged on the issue of judicial review." The railroad lawyers seemed to be concerned with lofty problems of jurisprudence. Their purpose was so to multiply the possibilities of appeal to the courts as to render it difficult for the I.C.C. to make use of its powers.

The Walter-Logan bill sprang from a similar desire to render New Deal regulatory agencies ineffective by interminable litigation, after it became clear that the laws establishing them could neither be repealed in Congress nor overturned in the courts. The chief target of the forces behind the bill was the National Labor Relations Board, but the campaign for its enactment was represented as a kind of crusade for the reform of administrative law. Mr. Roosevelt's strategy was to appoint a committee to make a study of administrative agencies. The committee was not encouraged to be hasty, and until last month the President's lieutenants in Congress were able to stall a vote on the Walter-Logan bill on the plea that the experts had not yet reported. Unfortunately the Committee has now made its report, and its publication, after the President's veto of the Walter-Logan bill, will only serve to revive a campaign the report was intended to moderate. For the Committee has accompanied it with a bill, and the bill represents an attempt to appease.

There is good reason to suspect that the bill was the result of a one-sided horse-trade. The majority, including Chairman Dean Acheson, had its heart set on a unanimous report. In order to obtain that unanimous report the majority seems to have agreed to certain proposals it might not have accepted otherwise. The minority then resorted to a maneuver. Arthur T. Vanderbilt, former president of the American Bar Association; Dean E. Blythe Stason of the University of Michigan Law School, and former Assistant Attorney General Carl McFarland, filed what is in effect a vigorous minority report, embodying proposals worse if anything than the Walter-Logan bill. But instead of calling it a dissent, they call it "Additional Views and Recommendations."

Chief Justice D. Lawrence Groner of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, who seems to have been a fellow traveler of the American Liberty League, filed a separate dissent, disagreeing with both the majority and the minority. He did not think the minority went far enough. Yet even his dissent is entitled "Additional Views." It is true that both Groner and the minority are willing to accept the majority bill if they can get nothing better, but this is an odd kind of unanimity. It is as though a committee to investigate prohibition had "unanimously" reported that wise public policy called only for legalization of 3½ per cent beer, while three members appended an "additional view" proposing the sale of light wine, gin, and whiskey, and another member put in a word for corn likker.

"No single fact," the Committee found, "is more striking in a review of existing Federal administrative agencies than the variety of duties entrusted to them. This central fact makes generalization in description difficult. It makes even more difficult generalization in prescription." The Committee has nevertheless attempted a prescription for the thirty-two agencies covered by its 1,000-page report. These involve bodies as dissimilar as the I.C.C. and the Bureau of Entomology, legislation as diverse as the Federal Reserve Act and the Importation of Adulterated Seeds Act, activities as far apart as the licensing of live-poultry dealers and the fixing of rates for soft coal. Yet the Committee seeks to establish some uniformity among them beyond the uniformity of fair hearing and due process imposed by the courts. All would be authorized to issue declaratory rulings, in advance of an actual case. All would be required to establish independent hearing commissioners for the taking of testimony, and to accept limitations on their own power to review that testimony. Lawyers outside any of these administrative bodies could propose rules and regulations of their own devising, a pastime which would be limited only by the amount of their retainers. The administrative agencies would have to let Congress know why it had rejected proposed rules submitted to it. Finally the President, by and with the advice of the Senate, would appoint a Director of Federal Administrative Procedure with full power to make life miserable for any administrative officer by conducting investigations, hearing complaints and making uniform rules.

These changes would weaken the independence of the administrative agency, and increase the area of litigation and legalistic arguments. This is not the way to preserve the "poor man's law" which the President's great veto message on the Walter-Logan bill championed.

It is a pity that the majority of the Committee were led to espouse these measures, for the report itself is a splendid document, clearly and vividly written, without legal gibberish, and with an undertone of dead-pan humor. Professor Walter Gellhorn of Columbia, as head of the technical staff which prepared it, deserves to be congratulated on the accomplishment of the huge task assigned to him. The humor may be unconscious, but it is implicit in the Committee's solemn acceptance of the pretense that the forces behind the Walter-Logan bill were primarily interested, not in cutting the gizzards out of the Labor Board and the Federal Power Commission and the S.E.C., but in administrative law as a whole.

While the Labor Board is found to have already applied most of the general recommendations made by the Committee, and the S.E.C. is criticized only for leaning over backwards in its anxiety to be fair, older agencies come in for more serious reproof. The Post Office Department, which has many administrative duties, has yet to formulate rules of practice. The Alcohol Tax Unit of the Bureau of Internal Revenue is unreasonably unwilling to issue declaratory rulings. In cases where the widow of a veteran "is accused of open, notorious, adulterous cohabitation," the Board of Veterans' Appeals need not disclose the identity of her accuser. The War Department is a model of bad behavior. It fixes rates for toll bridges without "formal findings of fact or conclusions of law" so that persons affected are "unaware of the methods of computation or standards applicable." Most of these agencies, notably the War Department, were thoughtfully exempted from the Walter-Logan bill.

India and the War

BY JAWAHARLAL NEHRU

[The following article is a newly written epilogue to the autobiography of Jawaharlal Nehru, published in England five years ago and soon to be brought out here by the John Day Company in a revised edition. Shortly after its completion Nehru was imprisoned by the British authorities for "publicly advocating passive resistance to the British war effort."—EDITORS THE NATION.]

FIVE and a half years ago, sitting in my prison barrack in the Almora District Jail, I wrote the last line of my autobiography. Eight months later I added a postscript from Badenweiler in Germany. That autobiography, published in England, had a kindly reception from all manner of people in various countries, and I was glad that what I had written had brought India nearer to many friends abroad, and had made them appreciate, to some extent, the inner significance of our struggle for freedom. Unfortunately this book did not reach the American public, and various happenings conspired to delay an American edition. I am happy that at last it is going to appear in a new garb in America.

My publisher asked me to add to it in order to bring it up to date. His demand was reasonable, and I could not deny it. And yet I find it no easy matter to comply with it. We live in strange times, when life's normal course has been completely upset, and it is difficult for me even to communicate with my publisher. America seems to be very far away from India now, and sometimes it takes many months for letters to cross the oceans.

I was affected more than others by the development of events in Europe and the Far East. Munich was a shock hard to bear, and the tragedy of Spain became a personal sorrow to me. As these years of horror succeeded one another, the sense of impending catastrophe overwhelmed me, and my faith in a bright future for the world became dim.

And now the catastrophe has come. The volcanoes in Europe spit fire and destruction, and here in India I sit on the edge of another volcano, not knowing when it may burst. It is difficult to tear myself away from the problem of the moment, to develop the mood of retrospection and survey these five years that have gone by, and write calmly about them. I shall endeavor, therefore, as best I may, to refer briefly only to certain events and developments in which I have played a part or which have affected me.

Again and again, during the past few years, I considered resigning from my position as head of the Congress executive. I found it difficult to work smoothly with my own colleagues, and it became clear to me that they viewed my activities with apprehension. It was not so much that they objected to any specific act, but they disliked the general trend and direction. They had justfication for this, as my outlook was different. I was completely loyal to Congress decisions, but I emphasized certain aspects of them, while my colleagues emphasized other aspects. I decided finally to resign, and I informed Gandhi of my decision.

Soon afterward a far-away occurrence, unconnected with India, affected me greatly and made me change my decision. This was the news of General Franco's revolt in Spain. I saw this rising, with its background of German and Italian assistance, developing into a European or even a world conflict. India was bound to be drawn into this, and I could not afford to weaken our organization and create an internal crisis by resigning just when it was essential for us to pull together. I was not wholly wrong in my analysis of the situation, though I was premature and my mind rushed to conclusions which took some years to materialize.

The reaction of the Spanish War on me indicates how, in my mind, the problem of India was tied up with other world problems. More and more I came to think that these separate problems, political or economic, in China, Abyssinia, Spain, Central Europe, India, or elsewhere, were facets of one and the same world problem. There could be no final solution of any one of them till this basic problem was solved. And in all probability there would be upheaval and disaster before the final solution was reached. As peace was said to be indivisible in the present-day world, so also freedom was indivisible, and the world could not continue for long part free, part unfree. The challenge of fascism and Nazism was in essence the challenge of imperialism. They were twin brothers, with this variation, that imperialism functioned abroad in colonies and dependencies while fascism and Nazism functioned in the same way in the home country also. If freedom was to be established in the world, not only fascism and Nazism had to go, but imperialism had to be completely liquidated.

Jawaharlal Nehru

This reaction to foreign events was not confined to me. Many others in India began, to some extent, to feel that way, and even the public was interested. This public interest was kept up by thousands of meetings and demonstrations that the Congress organized all over the country in sympathy with the people of China, Abyssinia, Palestine, and Spain. Some attempts were also made by us to send aid, in the shape of medical supplies and food, to China and Spain. This wider interest in international affairs helped to raise our own national struggle to a higher level and to lessen somewhat the narrowness which is always a feature of nationalism.

Soon after my return from Europe at the end of 1938, two other activities claimed my attention. I presided over the All-India States' Peoples' Conference at Ludhiana and thus became even more intimately connected with the progressive movements in the semi-feudal Indian states. In large numbers of these states there had been a growing ferment, occasionally leading to clashes between the peoples' organizations and the authorities, which were often helped by British troops. It is difficult to write in restrained language about those states or about the part that the British government has played in maintaining these relics of the Middle Ages. A recent writer has rightly called them Britain's Fifth Column in India.

In the summer of 1939 I paid a brief visit to Ceylon, as friction had grown there between the Indian residents and the government. I was happy to be back again in that beautiful island, and my visit, I think, laid the foundations for closer relations between India and Ceylon. I had the most cordial welcome from everybody, including the Ceylonese members of the government. I have no doubt that in any future order Ceylon and India must hang together. My own picture of the future is a federation which includes China and India, Burma and Ceylon, Afghanistan, and possibly other countries. If a world federation comes, that will be welcome.

War and India. What were we to do? For years past we had thought about this and proclaimed our policy. Yet in spite of all this the British government declared India to be a belligerent country without any reference to our people, to the Central Assembly, or to the provincial governments. That was a slight that was hard to take, for it signified that imperialism functioned as before. The Congress Working Committee issued a long statement in the middle of September, 1939, in which our past and present policy was defined and the British government was invited to explain its war aims, more particularly in regard to British imperialism. We had frequently condemned fascism and Nazism, but we were more intimately concerned with the imperialism that dominated over us. Was this imperialism to go? Did they recognize the independence of India and her right to frame her own constitution through a Constituent Assembly? What immediate steps would be taken to introduce popular control of the central government? Later, in order to meet every possible objection of any minority group, the idea behind the Constituent Assembly was further amplified. It was stated that minority claims would be settled in this Assembly with the consent of the minority concerned, and not by a majority vote. If such agreement was not possible in regard to any issue, then this was to be referred to an impartial tribunal for final decision. This was an unsafe proposal from a democratic point of view, but the Congress was prepared to go to almost any length in order to allay the suspicions of minorities.

The British government's answer was clear. It left no doubt that they were not prepared to clarify their war aims or to hand over control of the government to the people's representatives. The old order continued and was to continue, and British interests in India could not be left unprotected. The Congress ministries in the provinces thereupon resigned, as they were not prepared to cooperate on these terms in the prosecution of the war. The constitution was suspended, and autocratic rule was reestablished. The old constitutional conflict of western countries between an elected parliament and the king's prerogative, which had cost the heads of two kings in England and France, took shape in India. But there was something much more than this constitutional aspect. The volcano was not in action, but it was there and rumblings were heard.

The impasse continued, and, meanwhile, new laws and ordinances descended upon us by decree, and Congressmen and others were arrested in ever-growing numbers. Resentment grew and a demand for action on our side. But the course of the war and the peril of England itself made us hesitate, for we could not wholly forget the old lesson which Gandhi had taught us, that our objective should not be to embarrass the opponent in his hour of need.

As the war progressed, new problems arose, or the old problems took new shape, and the old alignments seemed to change, the old standards to fade away. There were many shocks, and adjustment was difficult: the Russo-German Pact, the Soviet's invasion of Finland, the friendly approach of Russia toward Japan. Were there any principles, or any standards of conduct in this world, or was it all sheer opportunism?

April came and the Norwegian débâcle. May brought the horrors of Holland and Belgium, June the sudden collapse of France, and Paris, that proud and fair city, nursery of freedom, lay crushed and fallen. Not only military defeat came to France, but, what was infinitely worse, spiritual submission and degradation. How did all this come about, I wondered, unless there was something rotten at the core? Was it that England and France were the outstanding representatives of an old order that must pass, and therefore unable to hold out? Was it that imperialism, though apparently giving them strength, really weakened them in a struggle of this nature? They could not fight for freedom if they denied it themselves, and their imperialism would turn to unabashed fascism, as it had done in France. The shadow of Neville Chamberlain and his old policy still fell on England. The Burma-China route was being closed in order to appease Japan. And here in India there was no hint of change, and our self-imposed restraint was understood to mean an incapacity to do anything effective. The lack of any vision in the British government amazed me, its utter incapacity to read the signs of the times and to understand what was happening and adapt itself accordingly. Was this some law of nature that in international happenings, as in other fields, cause must inexorably be followed by effect; that a system that had ceased to have any useful function could not even defend itself intelligently?

If the British government was slow of understanding and could not learn even from experience, what can one say about the government of India? There is something comic and something tragic about the functioning of this government, for nothing seems to shake it out of its age-long complacency; neither logic nor reason, neither peril nor disaster. Like Rip Van Winkle, it sleeps, even though waking, on Simla hill.

The developments in the war situation posed new questions before the Congress Working Committee. Gandhi wanted the committee to extend the principle of non-violence, to which we had adhered in our struggle for freedom, to the functioning of a free state. A free India must rely on this principle to guard itself against external aggression or internal disorder. This question did not raise itself for us at the time, but it occupied Gandhi's mind, and he felt that the time had come for a clear enunciation. Every one of us was convinced that we must adhere to our policy of non-violence, as we had so far done in our own struggle. The war in Europe had strengthened this conviction. But to commit the future state was another and a more difficult matter, and it was not easy to see how anyone moving on the plane of politics could do it.

Mr. Gandhi felt, and probably rightly, that he could not give up or tone down a message which he had for the world. He must have freedom to give it as he liked and must not be kept back by political exigencies. So, for the first time, he went one way and the Congress Working Committee another. There was no break with him, for the bond was too strong, and he will no doubt continue to advise in many ways and often to lead. Yet it is perhaps true that by his partial withdrawal a definite period in the history of our national movement has come to an end. In recent years I have found a certain hardness creeping into him, a lessening of the adaptability that he possessed. Yet the old spell is there, the old charm works, and his personality and greatness tower over others. Let no one imagine that his influence over India's millions is any the less. He has been the architect of India's destiny for twenty years and more, and his work is not completed.

Mohanda Gandhi

The Congress, at the instance of C. Rajagopalachari, made yet another offer to Britain. Rajagopalachari is said to belong to the right in the Congress. His brilliant intellect, selfless character, and penetrating powers of analysis have been a tremendous asset to our cause. He was the Prime Minister of Madras during the functioning of the Congress government there. Eager to avoid conflict, he put forward a proposal which was hesitatingly accepted by some of his colleagues. This proposal was the acknowledgment of India's independence by Britain and the immediate formation at the center of a Provisional National Government, which would be responsible to the present Central Assembly. If this were done, this government would take charge of defense and thus help in the war effort.

This Congress proposal was eminently feasible and could be effectuated immediately without upsetting anything. The National Government was inevitably going to be a composite affair with full representation of minority groups. The proposal was definitely a moderate one. From the point of view of defense and war effort, it is patent that any serious effort involves the confidence and cooperation of the people. Only a national government has the chance to get this. It is not possible through imperialism.

But imperialism thinks otherwise and imagines that it can continue to function and to coerce people to do its will. Even when danger threatens, it is not prepared to get this very substantial help if it involves giving up political and economic control over India. It does not care even for the tremendous moral prestige which would come to it if it did the right thing in India, and the rest of the Empire.

As I write this, the Viceroy has given us the British government's reply. It is in the old language of imperialism, and the content has changed in no way. The sands of time run out here in India, as in Europe and the world.

So many of my colleagues have gone back to prison, and I envy them somewhat. Perhaps it is easier to develop an organic sense of life in the solitude of confinement than in this mad world of war and politics, of fascism and imperialism.

But sometimes there is an escape for a while at least from this world. Last month I went back to Kashmir after an absence of twenty-three years. I was only there for twelve days, but these days were filled with beauty, and I drank in the loveliness of that land of enchantment. I wandered about the valley and the mountains, and climbed a glacier, and felt that life was worthwhile.

Passports to Nowhere

BY JOACHIM JOESTEN

San José, Costa Rica, January 10

ON THE heels of every cataclysm comes the marauder. Whether it be an earthquake, a flood, a fire, or an exodus of refugees, the hyenas always hover near, eager to prey on the victims. By and large, the laws of nations are rightly severe on this particularly repulsive kind of evildoer, but it is usually the petty thieves that receive the roughest treatment, while the big shots get away with their plunder. Pilferers who loot a ruined town are shot, but men in consular positions who profit from the misery of hunted refugees go scot-free.

Thousands of anti-fascist refugees are at present stranded in the few countries of Europe yet uninvaded. Most of these have found only a temporary sanctuary, and being continuously harassed by the local authorities, they are ever on the lookout for a better place to go. These are the predestined victims of certain representatives of the smaller Central and South American republics who trade in unauthorized visas. Many an unwary refugee, setting all his hopes—and often enough spending all his money—on a visa granted him by the seemingly respectable consul of this or that Latin-American country, has been led on a tragic odyssey.

Practically all the countries of Latin America recently agreed upon a common policy toward refugees from Europe, a policy based in effect on these two rules: (a) Jews are to be denied admission on principle, in future; and (b) all applications for visas must be referred by consul to the immigration authority of his country. As a result of this agreement, the most important states of South America—Argentina, Brazil, and Chile—have issued stern instructions to their consuls in Europe not to extend any visas not previously approved by the home authorities. And so far as I know, the representatives of these countries follow directions strictly. This cannot be said, however, of the consuls of a good many Central American states—like Costa Rica, Honduras, Panama, Haiti, and Santo Domingo—who are not, as a rule, officials on the payrolls of their respective countries but merely local business men getting nothing but their share of the visa fees from the country which they represent. When their former right to issue visas as they pleased was restricted or entirely abolished, the more unscrupulous of these "honorary" consuls simply continued on their own, selling visas which they knew to be unauthorized and therefore not valid.

In some cases such visas are issued under conditions which must betray to the most naive of customers the fraud in the transaction. For instance, when a Jewish couple whom I know bought visas for a thousand dollars each from the consul of Costa Rica at Berlin, he required them to sign a formal undertaking not to go to Costa Rica. They were willing, however, to buy those obviously phony visas for this reason: the prospective emigrant needs a visa, any visa, not so much for going to a particular country as in order to be able to get their transit visas.

Not all countries, of course, would grant a transit visa to the holder of a questionable visa of destination; American consuls in Europe, for example, would laugh at the suggestion. But the consuls of some other countries are not so fastidious. Most people traveling from Europe to America nowadays go east, not west. If they are bound for some place in Central America or the Caribbean, they have to provide themselves, as a rule, with transit visas for Russia, Japan, and Panama. It is not too hard, as yet, to get such transit visas upon the presentation of a seemingly valid visa to, say, Costa Rica or Haiti.

In the case of our Jewish couple the Costa Rican consul in Berlin knew that he had no right to grant the visa and he told the applicants so, more or less explicitly. However, he was not unwilling to help—at a price. And since the essential thing for them was to get out of Germany, no matter how, he offered to provide them with unauthorized, hence non-valid, visas to Costa Rica which would help them to get transit visas to Russia and Japan. Once they were started on that long journey, they believed, as others have done, that some chance would turn up for them to get off the boat somewhere. At the worst they would stay some time in Japan and run the risk of being deported from there to Shanghai. So the deal was concluded, the consul charged his 2,300 marks each for "fees and stamp-duties," and the pair started on their journey.

Theirs is by no means an isolated case, nor is the Costa Rican consul in Berlin alone in this business. Dozens of "honorary" consuls in Berlin, Vienna, Warsaw, Kaunas, Stockholm have been in this racket for a long time, some of them for years. The prices they charge vary enormously but are always exorbitant; the Haitian consul in Berlin, I have been told by several of his clients, used to charge wealthy Jews as much as 6,000 marks for a visa.

I myself had no reason to doubt the authenticity of my visa when I started, late in September, from Stockholm to Costa Rica on the strength of a nine-month visa from the consul general of that republic in Sweden. It happened like this. After the Nazi invasion of Denmark forced me to flee to Sweden without a visa, I was given the choice by the Swedish authorities of getting out of the country as best I could or staying in a concentration camp for the duration. I applied at once to half a dozen Latin American countries for a visa, but they all turned me down, or rather, promised to forward my application to their respective governments, a procedure which would take from four to six months. At long last I struck oil. One day in July a letter from Victor Andersson, consul general of the Republic of Costa Rica, arrived at the camp informing me that I had been granted a visa for that country. On the strength of that letter I was given a day's leave from the camp and went to see Mr. Andersson in Stockholm. I found him to be a hard-boiled, voluble business man, a real-estate dealer, who talked glibly of his sympathies for the victims of oppression and still more glibly figured out his fees. After some hard bargaining we settled for $35. The legal fee which a Costa Rican consul is entitled to charge, I learned afterward, is $3 per visa.

In addition to a beautifully sealed and stamped visa, Mr. Andersson handed me two letters written in not so beautiful Spanish—this singular consul of a Latin American republic, I found out later, didn't speak a word of Spanish; all his correspondence with his government was done by a translator. One was a "laissez-passer" addressed to the minister of police at San José, stating among other things that I was of "Aryan race"; the other was a letter "to whom it may concern," requesting all competent authorities in Costa Rica to lend me benevolent assistance. Both letters were also richly adorned with seals, and provided with my photograph and the consul's signature.

How could I know that it was all worthless trash—the visa, the "laissez-passer," and the "to whom it may concern"? Mr. Andersson had assured me in emphatic tones that I was lucky to be an Aryan, for if I had been a Jew he would not have been permitted to give me a visa, for all his sympathy, or for all the money in the world. (Later, I learned that Mr. Andersson did sell visas to Jews also, only at a much higher tariff.) I honestly believed what he told me, that Costa Rica was one of the last few countries in the world that had not closed its doors to political refugees.

On the strength of my Costa Rican visa I acquired transit visas for Russia, Japan, and Panama, and started out late in September, together with my wife. We sailed from Yokohama on the Japanese liner Ginyo Maru and arrived at Balboa, Canal Zone, on December 4. There, to our dismay, we learned that we could not land. When I presented my passport to the quarantine officer, he merely shoved it aside with a curt "no good." Every other passenger with a visa to Costa Rica received the same treatment, as did scores of others who held visas for Santo Domingo, Haiti, Honduras, and a few other countries. Our visas, we were informed, were not valid, since they had not been explicitly confirmed by the respective governments, and under these conditions our transit visas for Panama would not be acknowledged either. The Canal Zone authorities had just received stringent instructions from Washington not to allow anybody ashore who could not satisfy them that he was strictly in transit. The United States, we were told, could not take any chances with refugees, whether genuine or not, in a territory so vital to its defense. The quarantine officer was sorry, but he could do nothing about it; all those who had unconfirmed visas—and there were at least thirty of them on the Ginyo Maru, which carried mostly refugees from Europe—would have to go on with the ship.

It is not really relevant that my wife and I eventually did get ashore. We owed this happy ending to the vigorous intervention of a local newspaper man, Editor Ted Scott of Panama-America, who happened to know me by name and offered his help. A forceful article which Mr. Scott published in his paper clinched the case. After two days of tantalizing suspense we were permitted to land. The Costa Rican government, yielding to urgent representations from its Minister in Panama, Dr. Fonseca Zuñiga, at last agreed to admit us into the country. It did not, however, honor the phony documents of Mr. Andersson in Stockholm; when we arrived, a few days later, in San José, it was on a new visa issued by the Costa Rican consul in Panama.

But that was our personal good luck. When the Ginyo Maru at long last left Balboa, nearly three days behind schedule, there were still some thirty hapless refugees on board, a majority of them Jews. The Panama authorities had, characteristically, declared themselves willing to admit them all if the proper sum could be "deposited"—$3,000 per family, which might be refunded if the family left Panama again within a year, in addition to $100, pure graft, per person. In the short period of time available it proved impossible to raise the money, and the scheme fell through.

Where are those thirty unwanted passengers on the Ginyo Maru going now? No one can tell. The ship will have to take them along to Peru and Chile, with not the slightest chance of their being allowed to land there, then back to Japan. Perhaps they will finally arrive "home" again, after five months' useless traveling.

FACE AT THE WINDOW

Copyright in all Countries.

Our Gerrymandered States

BY RICHARD L. NEUBERGER

Salem, Oregon, January 24

AT ANY moment now the legislatures of the states which showed substantial population increases in the 1940 census can be expected to petition Congress for additional membership in the national House of Representatives. With equal assurance, these same legislatures can be expected to disregard the census figures when the question arises of adjusting their own membership to population shifts and changes.

The final results of the 1940 census, announced recently by the Department of Commerce, put up squarely to almost every state an issue long avoided—the issue of legislative reapportionment. Most of the country's legislatures are as off balance as a waltzing dinosaur. Rural districts are greatly over-represented and the cities, conversely, are shockingly under-represented. In many instances, the situation practically adds up to a state-wide system of rotten boroughs.

This is not a new problem. Yet it has aspects never so conspicuous as now. President Roosevelt's reelection was mainly brought about by the vote of the larger industrial centers. In general, he carried the big cities and ran close or slightly behind in innumerable rural precincts. Thus the present gerrymandering of state districts amounts to supporters of the New Deal being denied equal voice with its opponents in choosing the personnel of legislatures. With state collaboration necessary in pension benefits, power and reclamation undertakings, and now in certain national defense plans, this may lead to a thwarting of the will of the majority.

Consider the dilemma in Oregon, one of the most progressive states and the first to adopt the initiative and referendum. Portland is the only city of any size. With its environs, it has a third of Oregon's population yet only 22 per cent of the membership in the legislature. Each representative from Portland has more than 25,000 constituents. Contrast this with some of the backwoods districts where constituencies number less than 7,000. Vernon Bull, railroad worker who represents the Union Pacific division point of La Grande, speaks for 18,000 people. Anti-labor legislators from nearby ranch areas have a third that many constituents.

Such a situation was not the intent of the adventurous souls who crossed the Continental Divide and in 1857 drafted the first state charter in the Pacific Northwest. Oregon's constitution provides that the legislature shall be apportioned according to population and that reapportionment shall take place at every census. The constitution has not been followed. In 1907 the last reapportionment of the Oregon legislature took place. Since then the population of the state, stimulated by constant migration westward, has nearly doubled and the census has been enumerated four times. Singularly enough, all attempts at reapportionment have been blocked by the loudest and noisiest constitution-lovers.

Oregon is merely an example of a national situation. Rural districts cling to representation in state legislatures out of all proportion to the number of their inhabitants. Because legislatures are masters of their own apportionment, the condition cannot be corrected unless rural legislators are willing to vote away the unequal power they now enjoy. This is not the way of mankind. Professor Joseph P. Chamberlain of Columbia University pointed out recently: "In states where both major parties are strong, the Democrats usually have greater strength in the cities, while the rural districts return Republicans. Therefore, the chiefs of the latter party will naturally oppose any change which would lessen their political power."

St. Louis has 29 per cent of Missouri's population, yet only 14 per cent of the membership of the state house of representatives. Wilmington with 63 per cent of the population of Delaware has 28.6 per cent of the house of representatives. Baltimore has 58 per cent of Maryland's people but elects only 38 per cent of the lower house of the legislature. These anomalies are repeated in many states. Legislators from Los Angeles and San Francisco, for example, must represent 70,000 people apiece while each lawmaker from a California rural district has an average of 36,000 constituents.

A few states have constitutions which arbitrarily limit the size of legislative delegations from large cities. But in many states the legislatures are defying constitutional requirements to allocate representation on the basis of population. Legal suits even have been instituted asking that the courts restrain the collection of taxes until legislative membership was made to conform with the census figures. Judges, although remarkably scrupulous about other constitutional provisions, have held that legislative apportionment is a political rather than a judicial question and they have refused to interfere.

In the final analysis, public opinion is the only lever which can force legislatures to restore representative government in their states. A few years ago the people of Seattle got tired of a situation which virtually restricted their suffrage. The Washington state constitution declares that both senate and house shall be apportioned according to population, but for thirty years—three decades in which Seattle expanded mightily—reapportionment had been unfinished business on the legislative calendar. One Seattle district, with 166,000 inhabitants, had equal representation with Skamania and Wahkiakum Counties, with 6,000 inhabitants between them.

Seattle voters took matters into their own hands. They drafted an initiative petition reapportioning the legislature. In their opinion, something had happened to democracy when a fourth of the state's population could elect a majority of the law-makers. Fifty thousand signatures were obtained to the petition and the proposal went on the ballot. After a bitter campaign it was adopted at the polls by a narrow margin. As a result, the Washington legislature today dovetails with the population. Seattle with 29 per cent of the people of the state has 26 per cent of the senators, 24 per cent of the representatives.

Nor may it be an accident that Washington is one of the most forward-looking states, with advanced legislation in labor, education and hydroelectric power and with a liberal State Planning Council which is generously provided for by the legislature. The anachronistic legislative apportionments in many states are a bar to progress. Throughout the Far West, counties where rich, irrigated land has attracted thousands of Dust Bowl migrants possess no more legislative voice than counties which have remained gaunt and desolate and dominated by a handful of cattle ranchers. Yet the people in one county are interested in social changes and additional school facilities, while those in the other want primarily to preserve the status quo and keep down taxes.

In our American rotten boroughs men and women in the cities and in newly settled agricultural areas are denied equal legislative representation with the older rural regions. Sometimes this unfair advantage attains a ratio of three or four to one. In such cases, representative government ceases to exist. The fresh presence of the 1940 census figures offers a new chance to remedy a situation which the authors of most of our state constitutions never dreamed would come about.

Everybody's Business

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

Exploiting the Conquered

ON SEPTEMBER 14 last I described in this column some of the methods of plunder which the Nazis were employing in the occupied countries. They included such dodges as fixing exchange rates so as to give additional purchasing power to the mark and the forcing of exports paid for by Reichsbank credits which could only be drawn upon to a limited extent.

In the past four months the economic experts who follow behind the German army have been busy perfecting these and other methods by which the victims of Blitzkrieg are being bled white. But in the same period the channels of communication with the conquered countries have been improved, and, despite efforts by the Nazis to conceal the evidence of their depredations, a good many new facts have come to light.

I am now able, for instance, to present statistics of German-Dutch trade for the three months, June to September, 1940, and the corresponding period of 1939. The contrast is most revealing:

	1939	1940
	Millions of Guilders
Imports from Germany	120	84
Exports to Germany	46	127

Holland, it will be seen, has changed a large passive balance with Germany into a large active balance and mercantile-minded persons, who believe that in international trade it is always more blessed to give than to receive, may jump to the conclusion that the Dutch have benefitted from conquest. The fact is, however, that in return for its excess of exports Holland does not obtain the means of purchasing the goods it needs for its own consumption. All it gets is a Nazi I. O. U., an entry to its credit in the books of the Reichsbank which can only be used for the acquisition of such German goods as the authorities chose to release for sale abroad.

All the conquered countries find that their blocked balances with Germany are piling up continuously, for the Nazis have a great hunger for goods while the demands of their war machine, the lack of raw materials, and the shortage of transport make them unwilling to send out of the country more than the absolute minimum necessary. Thus, although there is an abundance of coal in Germany, the Danes and the Norwegians cannot get enough to keep warm despite their wealth in marks. And for the entirely inadequate supplies they do get, they have to pay heavily, for the German authorities have fixed the price at least 20 per cent higher than the rate charged Sweden, which still has some power to bargain.

Germany is also drawing large sums from the conquered territories by charging them occupation costs. In the case of France the amount of the bill has been officially published—no less than 400 million francs per day. With regard to other countries, which are officially enjoying "protection," there has been more reticence, but it is understood that Norway's payment has been fixed at the total appropriation for its own military and naval establishments this year—an appropriation sharply above normal owing to last-minute efforts to build up defenses. The amount per day, on this basis, would be approximately one million kroner, or $250,000, a very heavy burden for a country of less than three million people. Estimates for the levies on other countries, which have been published in London, are on the same scale and altogether, according to the same source, Germany is collecting from its victims something like 15 per cent of its total war expenditure.

Abundantly supplied with cash in these ways the German armies of occupation have rapidly made inroads into stocks of consumers' goods in the conquered countries—stocks which cannot be replaced. They are also in a position to obtain first pick of the fresh foodstuffs which come on the market. The provisioning of the German army in Norway is believed to be carried out almost entirely from local resources, and since it comprises at least 300,000 young men with healthy appetites it is easy to explain the shortage of food in that country.

In Paris, Amsterdam, Copenhagen, and all other cities under the swastika the stores are rapidly becoming bare of necessities and luxuries alike. Now with money to burn the Nazis are employing their looted funds to buy up industrial concerns in the occupied lands. Two weeks ago an article in The Nation, written by an American in Paris, described the way in which French enterprises are disappearing into the German maw. A recent issue of the London Economist gives particulars of a working arrangement between the German steel firm of Otto Wolff and one of the largest Belgian producers in the industry. A full merger is expected to follow the present agreement which covers production and exports.

Nor are activities of this sort confined to the conquered countries. Diplomatic and economic pressures are being employed to obtain control of key industries in states which have been brought within the German orbit. The German firm of Wintershall has acquired all rights of digging new oil wells in Hungary, together with the control of Standard Oil of Hungary, a company hitherto partly financed by American capital. Another German dominated concern has recently been organized to exploit oil and minerals in Yugoslavia.

Thus, in the midst of war, the Nazis frantically organize their economic empire. Their undisguised aim is to obtain a firm hold over the raw materials and vital industries of Europe. So far as possible they intend to concentrate manufacturing activity within Germany itself, for they know that military might in these days rests on an industrial foundation. If they can force France to revert to an agricultural state they know they can prevent its revival as a great power. In the same way they hope to organize the small states which they dominate into providers of cheap foods and raw materials for their own economy.

Pursuing this program they tend to favor the agrarian as against the urban interests in the conquered countries. This policy has the additional advantage of promoting schisms between the two groups and thus weakening resistance to the invader. In Norway the puppet Quisling is proposing a reduction of mortgage interest and taxation for farmers while simultaneously insisting that wages and salaries must be cut in spite of sharp rises in the cost of living. German purchasing methods help to promote the same ends. Danish farmers are paid good prices for their slaughtered livestock and are thus assisted to clear their debts. Were they Balkan peasants this might impress them with the benevolence of Nazism. But since they are, for the most part, economically sophisticated, thanks to the Danish educational system, they are well aware that money in the bank is little good if it cannot be used to replenish the herds or provide fodder for the remaining animals. And in Western Europe generally people are not being deceived by the Nazi's refined methods of burglary. They recognize the New Order for what it is and know that whichever way you slice it is still baloney.

In the Wind

AMONG POST-ELECTION developments list the sharp and bitter break between Roy Howard and Russell Davenport, the Fortune managing editor who joined Willkie's brain trust. Howard and Davenport clashed over the publisher's appeasement stand.

A MINOR MYSTERY among New York newspapermen is the present whereabouts of Clarence Hathaway, purged Communist editor. Reporters have been scouring the city in an attempt to interview him but so far without success.

HERE'S A HOLLYWOOD tale via Variety. Herman Mankiewicz, script writer, protested to the Screen Writers' Guild, demanding screen credit for his work on "Citizen Kane." When Hearst interests started a row over the film, which parallels the publisher's life, Mankiewicz withdrew his protest. Now the studio has decided to give him full credit.

JURISDICTIONAL BATTLES between the A. F. of L. and C. I. O. on defense construction projects have gotten some publicity, but the fight has just begun. Rival picketing is starting in key areas and labor leaders fear that this kind of battle—which makes no sense to the public—may lead to real anti-labor curbs. And nobody knows what to do about it.

SHORT-WAVE listeners report that Ezra Pound's broadcasts from Italy are becoming more frequent. He advocates that America stay out of the war and solve its economic woes with Social Credit.

WAR NEWS: St. Claire McKelway's biography of Walter Winchell—"Gossip, the Life and Times of Walter Winchell"—will be published shortly in England.

WHEN TWO New Haven dailies were struck recently, Yale students put on a show of anti-social consciousness. The editors of the college daily started to transform their paper into a city-wide daily to replace the commercial papers.

REPORTS THAT Phil Murray has been urging a vigorous pro-British stand by the C. I. O. are true. At the last executive board meeting he pressed hard for the position—and the left-wing spokesmen at the session moved very cautiously. Insiders say there was no clear-cut opposition but some sentiment for "moderate" action.

UNCENSORED, the isolationist news-letter, reports this puzzle. In its story of the meeting in Glasgow at which Winston Churchill and Harry Hopkins appeared on the same platform, the city edition of the New York Times carried the following sentences: "Whether the former United States Secretary of Commerce acknowledged the introduction [by Mr. Churchill] or said anything in response must be left to the reader's intuition. If he had, the defense regulations would prohibit the citation of his words and phrases." These sentences disappeared from later editions.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

A Native at Large

BY JONATHAN DANIELS

The Naval Censor

ALONG with every other newspaper editor from Beeswax to Boston, I got a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, who, as the saying goes, used to be a newspaperman himself. The envelope was marked "personal" though I never had the pleasure of meeting the Secretary. The letter inside was marked "confidential" in capital letters and underlined. I can keep a secret, even one I did not ask to receive and one that is shared with several thousand other people. But I am saying that I feel very strongly that any regulation of the press in America in the emergency ought not to be a personal and confidential matter between an official and the editors. If I understand the freedom of the press, it does not belong to either the editors or the officials but to the people. And if there are going to be any modifications of it, at the very least the country ought to know about it.

An encouraging proportion of the newspapermen understand that. I attended a meeting of a good-sized group of us country editors not long ago. None of them would print any news which he thought would serve any enemy and hurt the nation. But all of them were anxious to give to the entire defense effort the honest and adequate reporting of legitimate news to which they think their readers are entitled. And they had a feeling that they were not everywhere being permitted to do it.

"My actual experience with the War and Navy Departments," said one of them who is not a trained seal or a syndicated columnist but a man who works his legs as well as his head, "has been mixed. Generally, I find that if I can get to the head man, I get courteous treatment. The man who has been through the mill does not have such an inflated sense of his own importance. He is also more conscious of the fact that promotion of good-will is important to the army's growth. Men like Deputy Chief of Staff General Richard Moore will listen to your questions, tell you what they can tell you on the record, add some information off the record, and often-time frankly reply that it is impossible to answer such a question. With the pressure of work, however, the real difficulty is getting to see these big boys.

"Rather than deliberate suppression of the news," he said, "I find confusion more often the trouble. Yesterday a friend of mine had a simple question about plans for establishing a Negro army corps. He was referred to thirteen people before he was able to get a definite answer. Another man—a methodical and determined guy—recently called on fifty-two people in defense agencies before he was given a definite answer on a relatively simple fact. This shows that there are a lot of people who just don't know what is going on, and another bunch who are adept at buck-passing.

"In fairness, two things must be said. Some of the men are genuinely afraid of the rather sweeping application now being made of the espionage act. They don't know just how far they can go in giving information before they open themselves to possible violation of the act. Some of them just don't know what is and what is not 'legitimate' information. Also many inquiries get little consideration simply because of the pressure of work."

Of one thing he was certain: "There is hardly a correspondent here who does not complain about the difficulty of getting news, but I have heard few complain of the manner in which they are treated. There are, of course, exceptions to this statement. In normal times a press section is often a help in getting the news you are after. Now this office is apt to be a bottleneck, so we steer clear of it as much as we can. There is a small group in the War Department who will invariably reply that they can give out no information except through the press section. This usually means you get no information."

The sum of what he said and what I have heard from local newspapermen up and down the country seems to be not suppression so much as confusion. There is an increasing feeling among newspapermen like that I heard one conservative, mature publisher express recently.

"Ninety-five per cent of the military secrets," he said, "are to cover up military mistakes."

That may not be so. But both the army and the people would be safer from the consequences of military mistakes if there were a clearer understanding all down the line in Washington about just what constitutes legitimate information and a more efficient system of getting it through the press to the people. Secretary Knox, as a former newspaperman, might serve defense and security better if he spoke publicly and not personally, publicly and not confidentially, about this matter, so that subordinates would know what they can give and the people could know what they could expect,

BOOKS and the ARTS

A NOTE ON ORDER

BY W. H. AUDEN

LA TYRANNIE est de vouloir avoir par une voie ce qu'on ne peut avoir que par une autre."—Pascal.

1. As Mr. H. G. Wells remarked recently in The Nation, this war is not a war of ideologies: the totalitarian "New Order" is "just theoretical eye-wash for a purely individualistic control." Fascism is what happens to an industrial society when disorder is accepted as inevitable but has reached a point where it is felt as intolerable. It provides a positive satisfaction to the ambition of the few, and a negative satisfaction to the inertia of the many. Hitler is our immediate enemy because it is in his positive interest to increase the social disorder upon which his power depends, but, even if he is defeated, unless we overcome our own inertia against understanding and removing this disorder, he will only be succeeded by others.

2. A society in disorder is one which is only partially influential in imposing its characteristics in the form of prevalent laws. The laws of a society are those relations between the entities of which it is composed that are unconditionally required. A primitive or low-grade social order displays a massive and uniform vagueness which masks contrast and in which requiredness consists of immediate responses to unrelated objective stimuli—for example, conditioned reflexes. An advanced or high-grade social order displays a differentiation in which diversity is consciously felt as contrast, and requiredness is a constellation of subjective general notions. A degenerate social order displays a trivial multiplicity in which contrast is dismissed into incompatibility and requiredness disappears.¹

3. Civilization (high-grade social order), as we know it, makes two presuppositions: (a) that throughout this universe there is one set of laws according to which all movements and events in spite of all differences agree on happening; (b) that, nevertheless, there are in this universe many different realms or societies, each composed of a class of things peculiar to itself to which events of a peculiar kind happen (one important peculiarity is position in time), and that the peculiar laws of these several realms are modifications of the universal law mentioned in (a).²

4. Corresponding to these there are two heresies by which civilization has been constantly threatened, heresies respectively defined in the Athanasian Creed as "dividing the substance" and "confounding the persons." (a) Dualism. The denial of any relation between the universal and the particular, that is, that the particular laws are modifications of the general law. Examples: Stoicism, Manicheism, the sentimentality of business men. Social result: an other-worldliness which regards all attempts to establish social order as vain, or a secularism which regards progress as inevitable. (b) Monism, that is, the assumption that the peculiar laws of one of the peculiar realms are the universal laws from which all the others are derivative. Examples: the dominance in the Middle Ages of the laws of Aristotelian logic, the Marxist theory of history, the Freudian psychology. Social results: tyranny or violent revolution.

5. During the last four hundred years a third heresy, really a modification of (a), has appeared, an empiricism which denies the necessity of any metaphysics. Bacon's description of science as putting nature to the torture is a good one. Science is a method of questioning which presupposes that the questioner has a particular question he wishes to ask of a particular subject. An essential feature of the method is a deliberate isolation of the experimental field from the rest of nature. The practical success of this technical device has led society to believe that this isolation is a characteristic of nature itself, and, while admitting in theory that the peculiar laws are modifications of the universal law, to deny it in practice by ignoring that this implies relations between the peculiar realms themselves.

The social aspect of this has been the atomic view of society as a multiplicity of unrelated special individuals pursuing special unrelated occupations, typical of liberal capitalist democracy. (In education it appears as a doctrine of "self-expression"; in literature as the formless "naturalistic" novel.)

A curious corollary of this view is that it really identifies the universal with the political, a conclusion implicit in Locke's theory of government as the ringmaster of competing interests. As long as this competition remained comparatively mild, that is, as long as politics did not have to be taken seriously, this corollary was not apparent.

The conditions that made liberal democracy possible were two: first, an expanding economy, a progress from

¹A. N. Whitehead: "Process and Reality."

²R. G. Collingwood: "Metaphysics."

an economy of scarcity toward an economy of abundance; and, second, a margin of scarcity, however narrow. A static economy of scarcity prohibits free social movement; an economy of abundance prohibits a free market. Men can bear being exploited better than they can bear being unwanted; the injustice of oppression is perhaps just bearable, the injustice of unemployment is certainly not.³

On the liberal assumption that the politician has the unique occupation of keeping order between all the other unique and non-political occupations, the moment serious disorder occurs he is obliged to become the dictator. The politician is, after all, the true empiricist. Fascism is theoretically perfectly consistent with Locke.

6. Modern society is a differentiated society in disorder, the result of our ignoring the relations between its different elements. As long as we continue to do so, disorder will seem due to the social differentiation itself instead of to our false conception of it. The only remedy, therefore, will seem the fascist remedy, that is, a return to primitive uniformity and multiple objective requiredness—a theirs-not-to-reason-why obedience to unrelated military orders. But this is simply to substitute for the disorder of triviality the disorder of vagueness, and since our technological and economic development obliges us to remain differentiated, this is a vain attempt that produces a worse disorder than ever. We must not, however, give the fascists the credit of being the first to attempt this return to vagueness; the advertising firms, film directors, Sunday reviewers have been at it for years.

7. The restoration of a civilized social order, which now means a world order, calls, among a multitude of other things, for the following:

(a) A recognition in every field of intellectual and social activity of the importance of metaphysics. The cohesion of an undifferentiated and segregated society is secured by tradition, that is, a multiplicity of commands in which the right thing to do is inseparable from the right way of doing it—an identity found today only in compulsion neuroses. The cohesion of a differentiated and open society can only be secured through a common agreement upon a small number of carefully defined general presuppositions, from which each individual can deduce the right behavior in a particular instance. These presuppositions must be consupposable with each other. Aesthetics, ethics, economics, science, though each a peculiar field, are not unrelated, and unless this relation is recognized, errors appear in their own peculiar results.

(b) A recognition, on the other hand, that these presuppositions are not knowledge, that a clear distinction must be drawn between presuppositions and propositions which are experimentally verifiable, between matters of faith and matters of belief, and the fullest acceptance of the principle of doubt.

I believe $X = I$ believe the proposition X to be true.

I have faith in $X =$ The existence of X is, for me, an absolute presupposition.

I doubt $X =$ I admit the possibility that at some future unspecified date, for reasons also unspecified, I may come either to believe the proposition X to be false or to find that, for me, the presupposition that X exists is no longer absolute but relative.

(c) A recognition that, as a society changes, its constellation of presuppositions, that is, its orthodoxy, changes too, but that the effect of social change per se is only destructive. History can be counted upon to expose propositions which are false, or supposedly absolute presuppositions as only relative, but it does not automatically create new presuppositions. Every orthodoxy, in fact, is, in an absolute sense, heretical. It can only represent the greatest degree of intellectual freedom from its own temporal limitations possible to any given society at any given time.

(d) A recognition of scientific method as the only way of asking questions to obtain valid knowledge.

In the New Republic for October 28, Professor Sidney Hook took Professor Mortimer Adler to task for dismissing science as a series of opinions about reality and therefore unimportant. If Professor Adler really said this, Professor Hook was perfectly justified in his attack. But the latter is naive when he asserts that "more universal agreement exists about scientific ideas than metaphysical axioms have ever given," and draws from this the moral that the scientific method must be extended to "the questions and problems in social life about which there is disagreement." That disagreement exists precisely because there is a lack of metaphysical agreement.

8. The words "orthodoxy" and "heresy" at once raise the problem of freedom. In a primitive society orthodoxy is secured by tradition, that is, assent is automatically and universally conditioned, and the problem of freedom has not yet arisen. In a semi-civilized society, that is, one which is changing but thinks of itself as static, the majority are still orthodox by tradition; the recalcitrant minority are coerced by some form or other of Holy Office.

In a degenerate society, that is, one with no standards, orthodoxy becomes an arbitrary succession of fashionable fads, frequently manipulated for profit by individuals (for example, the faith of the average American in doctors). In a civilized society, that is, one in which a common faith is combined with a skepticism about its finality, and which agrees with Pascal that "Nier, croire, et douter bien sont à l'homme ce que le courir est au cheval," orthodoxy can only be secured by a co-operation of which free controversy is an essential part.

For what at the time appears to be a heresy never arises without a cause. Either it is a real advance on the old orthodoxy (for example, the Copernican cosmogony was an advance on the Ptolomaic) or it is an unsatisfactory reaction to a real abuse (for example, Manicheism was an intellectual heresy caused by the moral corruption of the relatively orthodox church). Persecution is futile in either case: in the first because the persecutor is wrong, and in the second because he is only suppressing a symptom while leaving the cause of disease untouched.

³ Nazi Economics. Charles Noyes, The Nation, September 14, 1940.

Elegy for James Joyce

BY IVAN GOLL

L'Aveugle aux grands yeux semeurs de phosphore
 Nous a guidés par le camp des dormeurs
 Lui qui fut phare sur la plage incolore
 En riant annonça les siècles de malheur

Il m'a conduit en me prenant l'épaule
 Dompteur de l'inconnu gardien de l'amitié
 Je l'ai conduit en lui prenant l'épaule
 Mais c'est lui qui trouva la Rue de la Pitié

Nous nous sommes assis près du fleuve de pierre
 Cueillant la fleur du mal au pré des Capucines
 Nous avons écouté le chant des lavandières
 Et le bavardement des Proserpines

Il était comme un arbre plein d'adolescence
 Voyant avec ses feuilles quand on ment
 Roseau qui las d'avoir trop pensé danse
 Et deviendra la Tour de notre temps

Soudain avec son rire il fracassait des villes
 Il déchirait la nuit avec son rire de hibou
 Avec son rire d'aulne il séduisait les filles
 Il arrêtrait le meurtre avec son rire roux

Avec ce rire il charmaient les rivières
 Et les trompait en confondant leurs lits
 Il leur montrait des chemins de chimère
 Qui conduisaient vers l'océan Oubli

Choréographe des quatre danses du vent
 Grammairien des douze langues de la médisance
 Horloger des vingt-quatre heures du drame
 Fumeur des cent pipes du rêve

Mécano des moteurs de la fécondité
 Tisserand des tapis volants de la fuite
 Ramoneur des vieilles cheminées du vice Chasseur de la bête de l'Apocalypse

Il montait tous les soirs à une balustrade
 Où l'attendait la folle aux cheveux de mélisse
 D'une racine d'Eire il tirait la ballade
 Pour mourir avec elle de sa propre musique

The Way of the Vanguard

NEW DIRECTIONS IN PROSE AND POETRY, 1940.

Edited by James Laughlin. New Directions. $3.50.

THIS LATEST edition of Mr. James Laughlin's annual anthology seems to me by far the best of the five volumes that have appeared to date. It not only includes more varied material but also reflects a more rigorous principle of selection than was evident in preceding issues. In his preface the editor ingenuously confesses to the discovery that mere self-expression is not enough—that formal discipline is necessary. He has obviously consulted the conscience of craft, for this time he has refrained from giving professional exploiters of avant-gardist attitudes the free play they previously enjoyed under his auspices. The level and interest of this collection suggest, furthermore, that experimental and "new" writing is at long last recovering from the ten years' slump caused by the intervention in literature of political dogmatists and Comintern-appointed representatives of "progress." The energy of literary people is now flowing back into its proper channels; and, if only one could assume that the present war will not end in the wrecking of all cultural endeavor, one might reasonably look forward to a revival of imaginative curiosity and to the further extension of creative norms. Of course, it is neither possible nor desirable to recapture the spirit of the 1920's. What is to be aimed at is the critical renewal, rather than the resumption along nostalgic and purely reiterative lines, of the modern tradition in letters—a renewal based on an assimilation of both the positive and the negative lessons that the past decade has taught us.

Several of the contributors to this volume are evidently trying to formulate some such new attitude. Thus, in his two stories and short verse-play, Mr. Paul Goodman shows himself capable of putting to good use all kinds of knowledge—esthetic, philosophical, and political. He is a young writer of keen and agile intelligence, in possession of qualities that one usually misses in the typical American story-teller, who in most cases is a "natural," a naïf who supports his literary personality by regaling the big-city public with horrendous tales of his home-town. Not that we can take in Mr. Goodman the measure of the younger generation, about which very little can be said because as yet its features remain undefined. Moreover, most of its members are, unfortunately, still cowering in the shadow of their elders. Mr. Goodman, on the other hand, is resourceful enough to arrange his intellectual environment to suit himself. In his story, A Ceremonial, he handles a very risky theme—the life of man "after the establishment among us of reasonable institutions." The result is neither a Wellsian fantasy nor a propaganda-poster of musclebound happiness such as tourists used to bring back from Soviet Russia. His projection is idyllic, to be sure, yet sufficiently concrete and psychologically intimate to reveal the outlines of a possible reality. His second story, A Cross-Country Runner at Sixty-Five, is, to my mind, less successful, an idea-piece linked to no credible experience. Eudora Welty's Keela the Outcast Indian Maiden seems the most vivid and technically formed of the other items of fiction. David Kerner, a newcomer from Philadelphia, writes about immigrant Jews in a style which is something of an innova-

VAN WYCK BROOKS'S

new book

"Allston and His Journals" will be serialized in part in

THE NEW REPUBLIC

"My friend Oliver Allston, who died last year in his early fifties, was a literary man of some distinction. A few of my readers, at least, will remember his name. He had published half a dozen books, collections of critical essays, which had a certain point of view in common, and I am not alone among his friends in feeling that, if he had lived a little longer, he might have made some impression on the mind of his time."

From 1916, with the publication of "America's Coming of Age," to the present, the years of the magnificent and widely read "Flowering of New England" and "New England: Indian Summer," Van Wyck Brooks has exercised an influence on the minds of his countrymen second to that of few living American writers.

These readers will not fail to be struck by the similarity between Van Wyck Brooks's opinions and those of "Oliver Allston."

Allston's journals tell of a "predestined writer," his problems, his methods of work, his friends, his penetrating observations on his country, its character and its people.

It is no accident that such a writer as Van Wyck Brooks should wish his work to go first to New Republic people. Plans under way guarantee that 1941 will be the year in which The New Republic most completely fulfills its mission as a challenging, critical journal. COUPON BELOW!

13 WEEKS' TRIAL OFFER $1

THE NEW REPUBLIC
40 East 49th Street, New York, N. Y.

For the enclosed $1 (check or money order if possible) please send me The New Republic for the next thirteen weeks.

Name.....

Address.....

2-1-41

tion, and which recommends itself by its tonal and dramatic adjustment to its subject matter, but I wish I could disentangle the story Mr. Kerner tells from his style.

The critical section also contains a number of very good things. Miss Katherine Anne Porter's "Notes on Writing" are so just and penetrating that they bring to mind the superb discussions of craft-problems that Chekhov entered into his diary. But the most formidable critical contribution is offered by Mr. George Orwell, an English critic. In his long essay, "Inside the Whale," he takes the work of Henry Miller for his point of departure and then proceeds to evaluate in a lucid and forceful fashion the last decade of English literary history, with special reference to the political relations into which literature was drawn during that period. Mr. Orwell understands the social psychology of the writers he analyses, also the doctrinal meanings of Marxism, also the role of those groups that use Marxism to hide their shame. And I might add that he is the first critic I have read on Henry Miller who makes sense.

Among the chief features of "New Directions" this year is a documentary compilation of surrealist texts, edited by Nicolas Calas, an orthodox surrealist who apparently has the ear of his chef d'école, M. André Breton. Mr. Calas's summary of the surrealist creed is enlivened by defiant gestures and militant epigrams. The three principles of surrealism, he states, are Objective Hazard, Estrangement of Sensation, and Black Bile "served hot or cold at all times of the day." The main impression the texts give is that surrealist theory is somewhat at odds with surrealist practice. Instead of exploring the Unconscious, the writers of this school seem more intent on "imitating" and idealizing it in the same sense that the Romantic poets imitated and idealized Nature, which was discovered and appropriated in the eighteenth century in much the same way as the Unconscious was discovered and appropriated in the twentieth. Freud, of course, was a scientist, whereas Rousseau was an ideologist; but art has taken from both what it could and wanted to take.

I should mention that the surrealist section is rounded out by two essays, one by Herbert J. Muller and one by Kenneth Burke, which attempt to estimate the value and meaning of this movement. Mr. Burke is his usual brilliant notion-spinning self, while Mr. Muller carefully formulates most of the standard objections.

PHILIP RAHV

Literary Autobiography

LIFE FOR LIFE'S SAKE. By Richard Aldington. The Viking Press. $3.

MR. ALDINGTON was born in 1892. This means that in 1914 he was twenty-two. And when he was just short of twenty and quite old enough to go traveling by himself to Paris in search of adventure and the literary life it was the year 1912, and the month was May.

It is more than likely that all persons who had a taste for poetry and who knew Paris in May of 1912 were especially blessed by the gods. Good food and wine were cheap, the lilacs were in bloom, life was gentle, charming, and civilized, and in any café friends could sit all day and all night and talk largely about philosophy, music, books, love, and every other subject under the sun. For a young poet it was the Golden Age, and one need not wonder that Mr. Aldington has never ceased to mourn its passing. It was then that he began to live. In this account of his life, more literary than personal, he describes briefly and with a pleasant humor his childhood in London or on the Dover coast, his schooling at the proper sort of school, his brief experience with the university. When the family fortune failed, he was perfectly willing to quit college and get himself a job. To the astonished chagrin of his elders, it was a job as a writer and he did not starve at it. He made friends among other writers and his memorable Paris holiday was with Ezra Pound and H. D. As was natural in that age of innocence, having seen Paris, one saw Italy, with the Roman gentry riding out every afternoon in their carriages and white violets blooming in Anacapri.

At that point the clock struck 1914. For Mr. Aldington as for everybody on the wrong side of forty, life has never been the same, and probably it never will be. Nevertheless he lived through it. Through three years of soldiering which he hated. Through the bibulous twenties, during which he retired to a cottage in the country and worked. And through many more years of writing poems and essays, reviewing and translating French books, and finally writing novels. During these same years he cemented the literary friendships which are the most interesting part of his book. First the imagists—Pound, Amy Lowell, Harold Munro, John Gould Fletcher, John Cournos; Yeats, also D. H. Lawrence and Frieda; later T. S. Eliot, Orage, Ford Madox Ford, and many others. Mr. Aldington's portraits of Pound, Eliot, and Lawrence are noteworthy. Comparing Pound and Eliot, he says:

Tom Eliot's career in England has been exactly the reverse of Ezra's. Ezra started out in a time of peace and prosperity with everything in his favor, and muffed his chances of becoming literary dictator of London—to which he undoubtedly aspired—by his own conceit, folly, and bad manners. Eliot started in the enormous confusion of war and post-war England, handicapped in every way. Yet by merit, tact, prudence, and pertinacity he succeeded in doing what no other American has done—imposing his personality, taste, and even many of his opinions on literary England.

But work and friends and literary success were not enough. Mr. Aldington wanted to be a "good European," and the good life in Europe was shutting up shop and retiring in favor of brainless tyranny. The Golden Age had vanished as perhaps it always vanishes. Mr. Aldington packed up and came to the United States where he now lives. And for all his nostalgia, one may say that he has not done so badly. He not only lived for a while in Arcady but he has written books about it. He has made an adequate living doing work he enjoyed. When one part of the world became unbearable he was able to retire to another, less so. Even with the Golden Age irrevocably liquidated, there have been worse fortunes than this.

DOROTHY VAN DOREN

Coming Soon in The Nation
"THE STRUGGLE FOR JUDICIAL SUPREMACY"

By Robert H. Jackson

Reviewed by Thomas Reed Powell

Your home deserves a Custom-built Radio Installation

Everything you have wanted in a radio or radio-phonograph combination, can be yours with a Lafayette Custom-built Installation. In close collaboration with you and your decorator or architect, we will give you a truly individualized installation in complete harmony with any decorative scheme, and meeting all requirements of performance. The moderate cost of a Lafayette Custom-built Installation will be a pleasant surprise. We invite your inquiry.

Lafayette Radio

100 SIXTH AVENUE • NEW YORK, N. Y.

901 W. JACKSON BLVD., CHICAGO • 265 PEACHTREE ST., ATLANTA
110 FEDERAL ST., BOSTON • 24 CENTRAL AVE., NEWARK
111 E. FORDHAM RD., BURELLE • 166th ST., JAMAICA, L. I.

"ESPECIALLY TIMELY"

Based on sensational new information, this fascinating new biography throws new light on the life and career of one of the greatest revolutionaries of all times. Illus. $3.75

"This sane, well balanced biography is an excellent antidote to popular misconceptions of the Jacobin leader. . . . In these days, when the democratic revolution has reached its critical phase, this able, swiftly moving biography of the first great public leader to have faith in those watchwords is especially timely."—Book-of-the-Month Club News

Robespierre

AND THE FOURTH ESTATE

by Ralph Korngold

MODERN AGE BOOKS

432 Fourth Ave., N. Y.

IN BRIEF

MY SISTER AND I: THE DIARY OF A DUTCH BOY REFUGEE.

By Dirk van der Heide. Translated by Mrs. Antoon Deventer. Harcourt, Brace, and Company. $1.

This is a twelve-year-old boy's day-to-day story, amplified by himself, of what the Blitzkrieg means to an average middle-class family; and it is a document you will never forget. It lays directly before the reader the simple details of tragedy and endurance as they were burned into an intelligent child's memory. The basic facts of the experiences recorded here have been known before, but they have never been presented with such lack of self-consciousness, directness, and simplicity. It is a book of both human and historical significance.

DELILAH. By Marcus Goodrich. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.75.

Like a contemporary "Two Years Before the Mast," this novel evokes poignantly and at times almost lyrically what it meant to live and serve on a United States destroyer in 1917, during the six months before we entered the war. The U. S. S. Delilah, an "over-age" craft even at that date, churns up the South Seas on a score of arduous missions, and like a woman, commands the devotion of her oddly sorted crew as much for her crotchets and faults as for her sleekness and strength; yet Mr. Goodrich, who served for many years with the fleet, does not romanticize the buffetings that make up a large part of life on the tough, mettlesome little "black boats."

THE GREAT AMERICAN MYTH.

The True Story of Lincoln's Murder. By George S. Bryan. Carrick and Evans. $3.75.

From a really vast background of study of manuscript sources, newspaper files and other contemporary accounts, there emerges a fairly clear picture of the actual happenings connected with the assassination of Lincoln, as distinguished from the insoluble mysteries created by the acceptance by different historians, and by the public, of conflicting legends founded on rumor. The author makes no pretense of solving these mysteries, and probably every reader will feel aggrieved that some story on which he was brought up is here waved aside with nothing to take its place. (Southerners particularly will not be satisfied with the treatment of Booth's motives.) The illustrations are enlightening as well as attractive. The index, compiled by Richard Webster, is of a rare completeness.

NOT FOR THE MEEK. By Elizabeth Dewing Kaup. The Macmillan Company. $2.75.

The meek don't inherit the earth, or any appreciable part thereof, in this meaty, forthright novel about Martin Lyndendaal, a Danish immigrant who worked hard and purposefully, took what he wanted, and battered and cajoled his way to the ownership of a large steel mill. The point is grimly driven home at the end of the book; for, as Martin lies dying at seventy-three, recalling the highlights of his long, robust life, his native Denmark is being overrun by the Germans, who likewise have made no fetish of meekness.

PRESENTING MOONSHINE. By John Collier. Viking Press. $2.50.

A madcap collection of the eeriest, screwiest tales this side of Never-Never Land, by a man who is Dunsany, "Saki," and S. J. Perelman all rolled into one, not to mention Anatole France, Sax Rohmer, and J. B. Cabell. It shouldn't be missed by those who like to take their peris, goblins, and bottle imps straight, or with a grain of salaciousness and a dash of pungent innuendo.

DRAMA

Tragedy Is Not Easy

SOME ten years ago when Lynn Riggs's "Green Grow the Lilacs" was a current production of the Theater Guild its author was commonly set down as a more than usually promising young playwright who had chosen to cultivate the "folk play" rather than any one of the other more popular genres. Broadway has not been especially hospitable to the folk play (vide Paul Green), and despite two subsequently produced works Mr. Riggs rather fell out of sight. Now he has reappeared with an extremely ambitious and solemn piece called "The Cream in the Well" (Booth Theater) which the Guild is sponsoring, though Wharton and Gabel are listed as producers. Here the time is 1906 and the scene Indian Territory—which is familiar ground for the author. But "The Cream in the Well" is not really folk drama. It is, in intention at least, high tragedy. It does not, that is to say, exist for the purpose of exhibiting the "manners" of a particular scene but for the sake of the passions portrayed, and Indian Territory in 1906 is merely a local habitation. The scene might be New York City or Singapore without essentially changing the play, and, as a matter of fact, the remoteness and relative unfamiliarity of the setting tend only to make the whole seem almost abstract.

The central character is the hellion daughter of a benevolent and hard-working farmer couple on a Cherokee allotment. Before the play begins she has already succeeded in separating her brother from his fiancée and in sending him upon an adventurous as well (one gathers) as a somewhat debauched career with the United States Navy. During the action she further succeeds, before her ultimate suicide, in driving the deserted fiancée to her death and in making a drunkard out of the weakling she herself has contemptuously consented to marry. Rather early in the play the audience has begun to realize what, it later appears, the principal parties concerned also understand, namely, that the girl is in love with her own brother and that her malice springs from conflict and frustration. In fact, near the end, the brother actually suggests that it would be better for them to yield to their impulses, that even unnatural love is less destructive than hate. But she is not able to face that possibility and prefers self-destruction instead.

Mr. Riggs writes, not only with obvious sincerity but also on a rather high level of literacy and competence. The result is that he holds the interest and commands respect. Yet it is impossible not to feel that the whole thing is somehow gratuitous, to ask what the play "means," why it was written, what it is ultimately "about." I have already said that it is not a folk play whose raison d'être is the presentation of a local culture. Neither is it primarily a psychological study, since the interest is not really centered in the psychological problem. And that leaves one asking for the sake of what it does exist.

Mr. Riggs, to be sure, might reply with a rhetorical question. "What," he might ask, "do 'Oedipus' and 'Agamemnon' mean?" "What, for that matter, did Mr. O'Neill's 'Desire Under the Elms' or his 'Mourning Becomes Electra' mean?" Such questions, however, suggest their own answers. Obviously it is not necessary for a play to "mean" anything in the sense in which the word is here being used, provided that the passions revealed are really convincingly intense to a superlative degree. But they must be intense and convincing for beyond anything that is necessary in another kind of play. We easily grant our cooperation to the writer who is managing to amuse us. We demand somewhat more if he is presenting an interesting thesis, if he is proposing to demonstrate some truth we want to know. But we demand most of all of the author who invites us to a high tragedy. We resist it as we resist all things which are even superficially unpleasant or painful.

What's Hecuba to us or we to Hecuba? As the tired business man says, we have troubles enough of our own. We must, if the tragedy is really to succeed, be caught up and carried away in spite of ourselves. We must find ourselves concerned whether we want to be or not, too moved to ask why we should care. And if Mr. Riggs commands respect and holds attention without quite stilling question or complaint, the reason probably is simply that though his play is good it is not quite good enough to meet the requirements of the most difficult and exacting of dramatic forms—even though, as happens to be true in this case, it enjoys the advantage of a generally good production and a fine piece of acting contributed by Martha Sleeper as Julie, the unhappy sister. Several of the other parts are at least competently played, but Miss Sleeper's role is so much the most vivid of the play that other performers have little chance to shine conspicuously. She plays with a good deal of necessary restraint but she suggests very vividly Julie's hate and her suffering.

Any musical review which engages Willie Howard as principal comedian has made a very good start. It has also taken another promising step if it has acquired the services of Luella Gear to back him up. "Crazy With the Heat" (Forty-fourth Street Theater) did both these things and still manages to be something less than first-class entertainment of its kind. After a very feeble start it picks up somewhat, but it lacks the all but indefinable air of smartness which we have come to expect in Broadway musicals and though I know nothing of the previous activities of the producers many of the scenes suggest the more elaborate "production numbers" familiar in movie houses. In at least one scene, however, Willie Howard gets an opportunity to be very funny indeed. He is a Cossack singer in a Russian restaurant and a loving couple can't chase him away from their table because, as he explains, "I come with the dinner." JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

There isn't much of a story in John van Druten's "Old Acquaintance" (Morosco Theater), and there is certainly no dramatic excitement, but it is a good show all the same. Mr. van Druten is a playwright who pulls no punches in exposing the shoddier aspects of his characters, but his sympathies run deep. Within the narrow confines of his play, which is greatly enhanced by the beautiful performances of Jane Cowl and Peggy Wood, he does a remarkable job of steering a group of civilized people through situations which bring out their pettiness and jealousies, without stripping them of their essential kindness and decency. For all the smartness of the writing and sophistication of the plot, such as it is, Mr. van Druten's play conveys a peculiarly warm conviction that humanity, even on its less rarefied levels, is capable of a modest sort of nobility.

ROBERT BENDINER

ART

Greco for Greece

DOMENIKOS Theotokopoulos, a Cretan who lived in Spain and was given the nickname El Greco by the Italians, has been reclaimed for the Greeks on the occasion of his 400th anniversary by the Countess Mercati, Grand Duchess Marie and half a dozen other titled ladies who are raising baskets for the brave at Knodler's and would probably have preferred getting their hands on Phidias whose origins are more certain. We know war is nothing to joke about; and for just that reason, we find it difficult to think of it as a pretext for an art show or to think, for that matter, of El Greco hastily called in like a specialty dancer at a masquerade ball, to raise money for relief. There is something absurd about associating the great painter with an Americanized Almanach de Gotha or visualizing him, profoundly melancholy as he was, with a Red Cross to bear.

However, the work of the worthy committee ends at the door with the entrance fee, and the rest is Greco, magnificent and miraculous. Sixteen of his paintings are on exhibit—"The Penitent St. Peter" is listed in the catalogue but absent from the walls—from the early "Purification of the Temple" to the late "Landscape Near Toledo" (1610) which Stephan Bourgeois, in his notes describes as belonging to the Cretan's third phase "when he became greatly interested in the influence of climatic changes on the human mind." Further on, Mr. Bourgeois becomes specific about the climate of Toledo whose "rapid desiccation due to its proximity to Africa produced [such] mental states . . . that its inhabitants were drawn toward extra-terrestrial experience as though by a supernatural power."

We somehow must take objection to this quasi-scientific attempt—like the theory that Greco's distortions were due to astigmatism—to analyze a talent that essentially escapes definition. The creative act of genius is a little like death, subjective, mysterious, and yet universal. It seems an error on the side of pedantry to reduce it to a litmus test. Historically speaking, Mr. Bourgeois's climate seems to have had little effect on the development of Spanish painting in general. That atmosphere produced no painters of first magnitude before or after Greco's time until the advent of Velasquez. And yet many of the influences supposedly singular to the Cretan are to be found in Spanish art. From the tenth to the thirteenth centuries, for example, we find a strong Oriental and Byzantine tendency in illuminated manuscripts, icons, and the early mural paintings at Toledo. In the late fourteenth and early fifteenth century, two Italians, Gherardo Starnina and Dello, began the invasion which ended with the school of exaggerated Italian manner (under Philip II) and actually retarded the development of any national painting in Spain. Llanos and Yáñez both studied under da Vinci and it was Charles V of Spain who said of Greco's master: "There are many princes but only one Titian." His son Philip II, on Titian's death, displayed a ruinous prejudice against native art and imported as many Venetians as he could obtain to decorate the Escorial, among them the inadequate Zuccaro. And out of all this confusion came Greco whose Greek origin may be factual but obscure, who hurried on to Rome, then to Venice, and actually spent three quarters of his working life in Toledo. His influences, like his biographical data, are incomplete and cannot be accounted for in terms of environment, religiosity, or reason. The landscape in question as a matter of fact has much the same quality that Greco brought to the painting of a face or the drape of a cloth, and might just as readily be a portrait of Xanadu as of Toledo for all its "tropic desiccation." That quality is luminosity, ambiance, there is no right word for it, the element which Taine in his "Philosophie de l'Art," rediscovered for the Impressionists when he observed that "the principal personage in a picture is the light in which all things are plunged." (Later paraphrased by Carrière: "A picture is the logical development of light.") The most extraordinary factor in a canvas like the "Adoration of the Shepherds" or "Christ in Gethsemane" is not its palette or its almost contrived design, but its inner radiance which spreads and catches like fire, moving everywhere with such continuous intensity, that none of the painting's parts may be conceivably separated from its whole. The absence of that "perpetual motion" in both the versions of St. Francis at Knoedler's (there are more than fifty St. Francis credited to Greco) creates some doubt in this reviewer's mind as to their authenticity. The "St. Francis in Ecstasy" seems to bear all the recognizable marks of Greco, one might almost say his clichés, the tapering fingers and prominent cheekbones, the typical "Greco face," and yet the areas in the background are almost opaque, the Saint's sleeve stiff and his eye heavy, static. The same remarks may be made of "St. Francis in Prayer" hung near the superb "Portrait of an Unknown Man" whose brush strokes (if one compares the beards for example) belie the same hand. "The Portrait of El Greco or His Son," despite its obviously damaged condition, is unmistakably Greco in its central figure and in its likeness of the child, probably Greco's grandson. As for the others, they are Greco at his best, and Greek or Spanish, however deserving or meretricious the sponsorship, must be experienced in themselves, they cannot be adequately described.

CHRISTOPHER LAZARE

RECORDS

THE best—which is to say the most devastating—commentary on the "Henderson Stomp" and "Nobody" of Benny Goodman's new large band (Columbia 35820) and "Royal Garden Blues" of his new Sextet (35810) is Columbia's reissue of "Moonglow" (35839). This is one of the finest of the performances Goodman recorded with musicians assembled for the purpose in 1933-34—performances with the freedom, vitality, and exciting improvisatory invention of good "hot" musicians playing in small groups. Further commentary of the same sort is provided by the "hot" playing of Goodman and Muggsy Spanier on the previously reissued record of "Royal Garden Blues" made in 1931 by Ted Lewis with a special group (to say nothing of the reissued Beiderbecke record of the tune). In 1931 Goodman and Spanier were two "hot" musicians earning a living with "commercial" jobs—for example, in large bands—when they had to, and playing "hot" in small groups whenever they could—mostly in private sessions for their own pleasure, and sometimes in recording studios for pay. When Spanier organized a band of his own a year or two ago he made it one that satisfied his love of "hot" small-group performance; and rather than make it anything else he accepted financial failure and went back to a job in a large band. On the other hand Goodman, after those 1933-34 records, organized a large band and popularized a new "commercial" style with which he made a fortune; starting the Trio as a small group for improvisatory performance, he soon commercialized that too; and even with a fortune to make it possible he did not go back to a small band, and did not even make records like the 1934 "Moonglow" on the side. If it is true that the "hot" improvisation of small groups is what he loves best to participate in, it is a love he has kept from costing him a dollar; and one might say that in comparison with Spanier he has held uncompromisingly to doing what he doesn't care about, at a sacrifice of the smaller income he could have had by doing what he loved. And I won't say this is the reason, but it is interesting to note that Spanier last year gave us some of the finest jazz performances ever put on records, whereas Goodman not only gives us the smooth slickness of his "Henderson Stomp," but even with a small group produces only the sheer pretentious phyness and sterility of much of his "Royal Garden Blues."

Columbia has reissued also a number of 1932 and 1933 Ellingtons (Set C-38; $2.50). On the first record (35834) is "Lazy Rhapsody," which is as fine example as I know of the Ellington composed piece put together out of the idioms of jazz and the styles of his players, and in this instance put together with simplicity and taste; but the same process operating with inferior material gives us the dull "Blue Rumble" on the reverse side of the record. I like also "Bundle of Blues" (35836) and "Drop Me Off at Harlem" (35837), except the growl trumpet passages, "Baby, When You Ain't There" (35835) moderately, the others not at all. Every Ellington record, that is, gives evidence of his skill in combining and spacing instrumental colors, his ear for sophisticated harmony; but not every one offers interesting musical ideas. Moreover the arrangements of tunes are often too elaborate and tricky and impose too great restraint on the soloists; and as someone who gets most pleasure in jazz from the Muggsy Spanier type of performance I like the simpler Ellingtons which leave more to be improvised and to be improvised with more freedom. Among recent records I like, then, only "Without a Song" and "My Sunday Gal" (Bluebird 10946), made by a small Ellington group headed by Rex Stewart, and parts of "In a Mellotone" (Victor 26788) and "Across the Track Blues" (Victor 27235), which have some fairly good solos in addition to their tricky backgrounds and ensembles.

Stewart does fine work in the 1930 McKinney Cotton Pickers' "I Want a Little Girl" reissued by Victor (Bluebird 10954); and he and Earl Hines are excellent in the recent Sidney Bechet New Orleans Footwarmers' "Stomp Jones" (Victor 27240). I have had great pleasure from the beautiful solo playing of Paul Mares, Santo Pecora, and Charlie Cordella in the 1925 New Orleans Rhythm Kings' "Everybody Loves Somebody Blues" (Bluebird 10956); and the 1932 Bennie Moten Kansas City Orchestra's "New Orleans" (Bluebird 10955) is enjoyable. I don't care much for Louis Armstrong's previously unissued "Last Time" and "Ory's Creole Trombone" (Columbia 35838), Bessie Smith's "Preachin' the Blues" and previously unissued "At the Christmas Ball" (Columbia 35842), and the 1930 Fletcher Henderson Baltimore Bellhops' "Hot and Anxious" and "Comin' and Goin'" (Columbia 35840); and I like only Joe Sullivan's piano solos in the 1932 Rhythmackers' "Oh Peter" (Columbia 35841). But I have enjoyed the recent "Blue Washboard Stomp" of Johnny Dodds's Washboard Band (Bluebird 8549), the Coleman Hawkins "Jamaica Shout" (Decca 3358), the playing of Teddy Bunn, Douglas Daniels, and Marlewe Marrio in the Lionel Hampton "Pig Foot Sonata" (Victor 26793), and the playing of Artie Shaw, Billy Butterfield, and Al Hendrickson in the Gramercy Five's "Keepin' Myself for You" (Victor 26762).

B. H. HAGGIN

Letters to the Editors

The Refugee Council

Dear Sirs: Recent discussions in your pages of the duties of anti-fascist émigrés are marked by certain illusions. The task and the position of the political exile of today are very different from those of the romantic figures who were compelled to leave one or another European country in the period 1815 to 1859. Such changes always occur in history, even in much wider fields. A principle, an idea, a myth perhaps, renders, at a given moment such an essential service to the cause of freedom that it helps to change the situation radically—so radically that even the myth should share the changes, but it doesn't. It lives embalmed in its past glory, and everybody still salutes it even when it has become a lifeless formula. That is what happened to the national idea. When it was the outstanding force of European progress it gave us a Mazzini, a Cavour, a Kossuth. But when wider action became necessary to insure the democratic peace of the world, it contracted into nationalism—that caricature of patriotism. And the hateful stupidity of nationalism rises now to make us forget that the highest apostles of the idea of nationality in the nineteenth century never considered nations an end in themselves; during his long struggle for the freedom of Italy, from 1830 to 1860, Mazzini never ceased to proclaim that national freedom was but a station on the way to complete European union.

In an analogous sense the political function of the exile seems to me to suffer, in the present world and in the present war, from illusions and delusions which are a relic of the past. In the first half of the nineteenth century Italy gave Europe—and even America—the highest type of political and intellectual émigrés; to London came a great poet with Foscolo, the purest political thinker with Mazzini, scholar with Panizzi; to France, Maroncelli, Tommaseo, Princess Belgioioso; to America, the martyrs of the Spielberg who became professors at Columbia. They worked miracles for Italy, because before they spread the word nobody knew how cruel and mean was Austrian rule in the north, how corrupt was papal rule in Rome and Bourbon rule in Naples. Europe and America learned of these things from our exiles; whence the long tradition of respect for free Italy which marked all fields of political and intellectual life in England—with one exception: Queen Victoria hated Palmerson and Russell because of their sympathy for "those revolutionary Italians."

But now, alas, there is nobody to illuminate or to convince; everybody knows. When—until yesterday—political leaders acted against the interests of their country in favor of policies or of men mortally dangerous for the life of democracy, they well knew what they were doing.

The truth is that the world is no more divided by political frontiers but by the barriers between different social strata, in some of which the love of country is less potent than the fear of losing economic privileges. Did I myself not see in France last summer the ill-concealed joy of gens de qualité to whom the French defeat meant the end of the republic? That is why many exiles of today might repeat with Ghiberti, who added so much to the beauty of fifteenth century Florence: "Am I not more at home where I may live free than in my native land if there I am enslaved?" And that is why the exiles today are perhaps less exiles than a century ago, but at the same time enjoy less authority. Men with the moral prestige of a Salvemini or of a Sturzo were not listened to in England during the fateful Baldwin-Chamberlain period when they warned their Tory personal friends that fascism wanted war. I was not listened to in France when from the very first day I told all the Blums and Daladiers that the Nazi-Fascist invasion of Spain would become the first and probably irreparable defeat of France. Is it admissible that more attention would have been paid to assemblies of political émigrés—when we know the naive superiority complex of people "in power" toward the eternally "bitter, dissatisfied, dubious" elements of the political emigrations? (The quoted adjectives belong to the common vocabulary of all foreign offices.)

From our own point of view there is only one thing which we must hate even more than not to work for freedom; it is to pretend that we work when in reality we issue only "resolutions" and "orders of the day." Let us remember how non-existent has been the influence of the Second Internationale in spite of the fact that it was led first by Vandervelde and, after him, by de Brouckere—two men of great intellectual and moral force.

One last remark: I do not think that the form of action proposed by Señor Alvarez del Vayo might "lay the basis for the United States of Europe." The United States of Europe or, even better, a federation of free peoples, some in Europe and some out of Europe, is bound to come some day. But it will come sooner if it grows naturally out of some sort of union between two or three free nations, wise enough and generous enough to keep their covenant open to free newcomers. When I favored with all my strength the formation of the Little Entente and wanted Italy to be a sincere friend to the liberated peoples of Central Europe, my first idea was, of course, the creation of a common line of defense against a possible resurrection of some new mad German attempt at hegemony, but my deepest hope was to help the birth of a loose federation which might become a nucleus for future additions. That is why, at that time, I regarded as a very bad omen the blindness of the Polish rulers who resisted—out of nationalistic vanity—all my recommendations to join the new group. I observed with less surprise the selfishness of French statesmen, who did all in their power to transform the Little Entente into a mere pawn on the diplomatic chessboard.

Political exiles must—each in his own field—try to be near to those in power who work for democracy. Knowing the schemes and the lies of the totalitarian rulers, they must warn and inform all the time, but they must do it discreetly, even in a free country like America. We shall be much stronger if—having found at last statesmen who understand—we offer facts instead of solemn advice.

Eloquent victims? yes; most useful and loyal experts? yes. But why teachers?

COUNT CARLO SFORZA

New York, January 24

Dear Sirs: I am not interested in the destiny of any ruling dynasty. I am not concerned over the vested interests of any given social group. I am thinking of democracy—of its ideological struggle with Nazism. Even above that I am anxious about the struggle of the 150,000,000 men and women whose nations have been conquered by the dictatorships of Europe.

The need is not only for a common front but for a joint program. Because they lacked what Hitler had—a plan—the democracies fell. Not the genius of Hitler but the weakness of the democracies brought on disaster. Since 1934 I had led a strong Czechoslovak movement which significantly was called "The Mobilization of Moral Power for the Defense of the State." Thus we were prepared—yet in vain.

After my escape to the United States, I wrote my "Ten Million Prisoners." It is my expression of gratitude and regard for this country. My time is spent traveling through the United States, organizing people of Czechoslovak origin for the defense of democracy. Our emigrant group is prepared. I speak to Americans gathered in clubs, schools, and churches. I broadcast and grant numerous interviews. I attempt to show that the real reason for the defeat of European democracies lay in their fatal shortcomings. This analysis is of a most useful kind for the American democracy. It is, indeed, a mirror held up to it. Whether they be united in a council, as planned by Mr. Del Vayo, or act as individuals, the exiles are in duty bound to do all they possibly can for democracy.

VOJTA BENES,

Superintendent General of Czechoslovak Public Schools
New York, January 15

Dear Sirs: Mr. Del Vayo is right to remind those who have been saved from fascist terror of their duty of solidarity with the anti-fascist exiles still in Europe and of their not less important duty of active participation in the anti-fascist struggle. Only by carrying out his appeal can we justify our life in this country. All who have tried to fulfil these duties during the last seven years know the difficulties. But difficulties exist to be overcome.

Hitler has succeeded by dividing his opponents. We can defeat him by uniting them under the slogan—For Democracy. Hitler has won by brutal violence and by eliminating all possibility of changing the government in a constitutional way. He can be destroyed only by revolutionary action. This slogan and this action have been proposed by Del Vayo. And I agree. As a Spaniard he would exclude from the united anti-fascist forces only Señor Madariaga and the archdukes and charlatans to whom the appeasers confide the rebirth of a new Europe. As a German I propose to exclude also the Legitimists of the former imperial countries, particularly the Hapsburgs, the Wittelsbachs, the Hohenzollerns, and their dangerous puppeteers.

No exile knows now what role, if any, he can play in the revolutionary struggle in the various Nazi-dominated countries. That depends upon our heroic comrades now living and fighting over there. We can offer in all modesty only our cooperation. We need a short and clear anti-fascist program of action and a council of militant anti-fascists from all subject countries. Naturally we must act independently of the different governments in order not to be suspect in the eyes of the suppressed peoples in Europe. Men who are not interested in the continuation of our quarrels of the last ten years must organize in united action against fascism. Go ahead, Mr. Del Vayo! The time is ripe for action.

KURT ROSENFELD,

Former Member of German Reichstag
New York, January 14

Labor Education Service

Dear Sirs: May I call the attention of your readers to the activity of an organization that seems of particular importance in these days of challenge and threat to our democratic way of life. Labor is aware of the danger from within as well as from without and has developed its educational projects more and more during the last years. Its Labor Education Service has recently reorganized its Teachers' Registry to serve as a central place in the nation where all leaders and teachers in the workers' education field may register. All men and women who are prepared to put their services as discussion leaders or in other capacities at the disposal of labor classes and seminars are invited to register.

Another project of Labor Education Service may also interest you. A large number of persons who have been very active in the labor movement of one or another of the European countries have recently arrived in the United States. It is often difficult for them to get in touch with the labor movement of their new homeland. American labor, however, wants these new citizens as friends. In order to further mutual understanding Labor Education Service will open a class on American Labor in January, 1941, for newcomers who have been active in the labor movement of their own country and for those who are working in shops here. The class will be held in the evening in the form of a discussion group for two or three months. Further information can be secured at the American Labor Education Service, 437 West Fifty-ninth Street, New York.

TONI SENDER,

Secretary, Teachers' Registry
New York, November 20

Correction

Dear Sirs: A correspondent has called my attention to an error in my article, Labor's Catholic Bloc, which appeared in The Nation for January 4. The Chrysler strike in which the Association of Catholic Trade Unionists was influential took place in 1939, not 1937. The strike of 1937 was, of course, the famous sitdown strike; in 1939 the Chrysler workers struck again, and the A. C. T. U., as my article showed, played an important part in helping them to victory.

RICHARD H. ROVERE

New York, January 15

CONTRIBUTORS

JAWAHARLAL NEHRU, former president of the India National Congress, shares with Gandhi the leadership of the movement for Indian independence.

JOACHIM JOESTEN, a German liberal journalist, prophesied the invasion of Denmark in his "Rats in the Larder."

RICHARD L. NEUBERGER, Portland journalist, was recently elected to the Oregon State Assembly.

W. H. AUDEN, distinguished English poet and critic, is now living in this country.

IVAN GOLL was a close friend of James Joyce for twenty years. He collaborated in the translation into French of Anna Livia Plurabelle.

PHILIP RAHV is an editor of the Partisan Review, a radical literary journal.

DOROTHY VAN DOREN, formerly associate editor of The Nation, is the author of "Those First Affections" and other novels.

CHRISTOPHER LAZARE, formerly art editor of the North American Review, is now assistant editor of Direction.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 55 Fifth Ave., New York. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $6; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 152

NEW YORK · SATURDAY · FEBRUARY 8, 1941

NUMBER 6

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

EDITORIALS

Close the Blockade

Labor's Plan for Steel

The Moral Embargo by Louis Fischer

ARTICLES

The Halifax Debut by I. F. Stone

Mediterranean Scene by Harry J. Greenwall

Caveat Investor by Kenneth MacNeal

What War Has Done to Japan by Barbara Paine

WPA Is Defense by Frank Ryblick

In the Wind

A Native at Large by Jonathan Daniels

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Notes by the Way by Margaret Marshall

After Verdun by Albert Guérard

Now It Can Be Told by Louis Kronenberger

A Study of Multiple Births by Hugh H. Darby

Tales of China at War by Maxwell S. Stewart

In Brief

Drama: Darkness Visible by Joseph Wood Krutch

Art: All-American by Jean Charlot

Music by B. H. Haggin

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

Editor and Publisher

FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor

ROBERT BENDINER

Washington Editor

I. F. STONE

Literary Editor

MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors

KEITH HUTCHISON

MAXWELL S. STEWART

Dramatic Critic

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager and Director of Circulation

HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager

MARY HOWARD ELLISON

The Shape of Things

141

GRAZIANI'S DECIMATED ARMY IS FALLING back on Bengazi between which and Tripoli stretch 400 arid miles. No doubt Mussolini has ordered a desperate last stand at this point but there seems little doubt that the well-led and confident British troops will repeat their successes of Bardia and Tobruk. It is true that the Italians, are now receiving assistance from the German air force, which has been attacking British supply ships along the Libyan coast. But this aid does not seem to be on a scale sufficient to turn the tide. Once Bengazi is captured it appears likely that General Wavell will call a halt, for at this stage in the war the capture of Tripoli hardly seems worth the risks involved. His campaign has shattered all Italian hopes of invading Egypt and has provided him with a well-protected outpost in the comparatively fertile Barce peninsula where a small force will serve to keep an eye on Graziani. The bulk of the now seasoned British Near Eastern army should thus be available for action elsewhere. Already at least one division which took part in the capture of Sidi Barrani has been switched 1,500 miles to the Red Sea and has now penetrated deep into Eritrea. There and in Ethiopia the Italians are in a sorry plight with the British advancing at many points and Haile Selassie's rearmed warriors rising everywhere in the rear. Mussolini's East African empire seems ripe for dissolution. The essential British base in Egypt is thus secured on all sides and new operations become possible. It is reported that General Wavell has promised reinforcements to Greece in the near future. Their arrival at Salonika would have diplomatic as well as military significance.

★

WITH THE VOTING OF A THREE-DAY LIMIT to general debate, the Lease-Lend Bill seems likely to achieve passage of the House by the end of the present week. It was approved by the Foreign Affairs Committee by a majority of 17 to 8 after the inclusion of amendments which do nothing to weaken the bill. An attempt by part of the Republican minority to turn it into a straight "lend" bill was defeated. But this plan has been commended by Mark Sullivan and appears to have the support of important business interests. From their point of view a loan to the British government, which would enable it to continue placing orders on its own account, is preferable to a plan which will channel all purchasing for Britain through our own procurement authorities. Nor is it hard to see why, when it is considered that up to now British orders have been filled on a much larger profit basis than is permitted on our own defense contracts. It would not be surprising, therefore, to find this straight loan plan being pushed again in the Senate. It is not likely to succeed any better there than in the House but it may serve to cause additional delay in a debate which threatens, in any case, to drag on into March. The Senate isolationists are a definite minority but they are well schooled in the tactics of obstruction and can be counted on to fight a bitter rearguard action. But there is increasing evidence that public opinion overwhelmingly favors the bill and we hope that the Senate will be made so aware of this fact that it will shorten its usual leisurely procedure. The suggestion is being made that there is no need for haste since the bill cannot give the British material aid in resisting the expected spring assault. But its passage will afford them moral aid by letting them know that succor is on the way.

★

THE NAZI CAMPAIGN TO FORCE LAVAL ON Marshal Pétain appears to have succeeded, and by the end of the week he is expected to be in Vichy, endowed with greater power than before. The executive powers of the French government, it is reported, are to be concentrated in a four-man board, over which the new Gauleiter will preside. This is only a first step: the next move will be to obtain from Vichy the kind of "collaboration" which Hitler needs to finish off Britain quickly. It cannot be doubted that his requirements go far beyond economic cooperation. He wants use of the French fleet and bases, and military control of Tunisia if not of other colonies. These needs grow in urgency with the progressive deterioration of the Italian position. Moreover, there is good reason to suppose that they are essential to plans for the spring campaign which may combine an attack on Gibraltar with an attempted invasion of Britain. The French fleet is still fairly powerful and might prove invaluable by creating a diversion which would keep the British navy away from the Channel. But Hitler's hopes of supplementing his own inadequate fleet are still thwarted by the obstinate refusal of Marshal Pétain to accept the Nazi interpretation of "collaboration." Nor would it suffice to push him aside, for no Frenchman acceptable to the Nazis, and Laval least of all, could command the allegiance of France and particularly of the North African army. In this connection it is noteworthy that General Weygand, answering the recent radio appeal of De Gaulle, referred to the armistice "which ended the struggle for France." Listeners must have realized that, if the Free French want to denounce the armistice, Hitler wants it rewritten in his favor.

JAPAN APPEARS TO HAVE WON A COMPLETE, though bloodless, victory in the first stage of its drive for mastery of Southeastern Asia. As the price for mediation of the undeclared war between Thailand and French Indo-China, it is reported to have exacted concessions from both countries which will leave the Japanese in complete economic and military control of the area. In a separate agreement concluded simultaneously with the armistice between Thailand and Indo-China, the French are reported to have yielded Japan a free hand in the exploitation of Indo-China's rich natural resources, including a virtual monopoly on all exports of rice, rubber, and coal. They are also said to have granted Japan the right to establish military garrisons on the border between Indo-China and China, to allow Japan free use of all present air bases in Indo-China, and to permit the establishment of a Japanese naval base at Cam Ranh Bay and a defense concession at Saigon. The only barrier to complete Japanese control of South Indo-China—a development invaluable as a stepping-stone for an attack on Singapore, the East Indies, or the Philippines—is a reported appeal of French authorities to the British. Should this fail, Japan is likely to postpone immediate efforts for the conquest of China, and devote itself in the coming weeks to the easier task of picking off sections of the French, Dutch, and British empires. This effort will in all probability be timed to coincide with the threatened Nazi offensive against the British Isles.

★

ALTHOUGH THE RIVER PLATE CONFERENCE was called primarily to take economic measures for the relief of land-locked Bolivia and Paraguay, its proceedings reveal substantial progress toward a more substantial Pan-American unity than has hitherto prevailed. Particularly significant is the fact that Argentina, the traditional stumbling-block to Pan-American unity, has in this instance taken the leadership not only in offering concessions to the smaller states but in safeguarding the rights and interests of the United States so as to prevent the conference from becoming narrowly regional in character. While no sweeping economic readjustments are expected to result from the conference, agreement has already been reached on a number of projects which should work to the advantage of the five countries represented. These include suspension of the most-favored-nation clause in concessions made to Bolivia and Paraguay; special arrangements facilitating banking, credit, and foreign exchange operations among the five countries participating in the conference; arrangements for the setting up of free port zones; and agreement to study the possibility of organizing a regional customs union, lowering of consular fees, and unification of customs regulations. Nazi spokesmen may profess complete indifference as to the outcome of the conference on the ground that it is concerned entirely with local issues, but they cannot fail to be disturbed by this tangible evidence of new unity in the Western Hemisphere—a unity which is a direct answer to Nazi policy.

★

MELLON'S ALUMINUM COMPANY OF AMERICA has been indicted with the German dye trust and four other concerns for a long-standing conspiracy to curtail the supply of magnesium, a vital war material useful chiefly for airplanes, in both this country and Great Britain. A few weeks ago, it will be recalled, the aluminum trust was on the carpet because the Reynolds Metal Company was unable to get enough raw aluminum from it to take care of orders from airplane companies. The present charges are even more serious. It appears that the Dow Chemical Company, America's only producer of magnesium, has been exporting it to Germany for 21 cents a pound while maintaining a 30-cent price in this country. Exports to England were limited to such English concerns as were licensed by the German dye trust. Complete monopoly of the important metal—one-third lighter than aluminum—was assured by a patent pool in which the Dow Chemical Company and the German dye trust participated. Whether because of the high price or of undisclosed restrictions, American production of magnesium has been allowed to fall far behind that of Germany. Quite apart from any illegal conduct that may be established by the courts, the situation in both the magnesium and the aluminum industries provides a graphic illustration of the fact that monopoly is the worst enemy of the technological progress so essential to national defense.

★

WILLIAM GREEN'S CLAIM THAT A MAJORITY of Ford workers at the River Rouge and Lincoln plants have joined A. F. of L. unions and his bland announcement that "none of these employees was ever discriminated against by the management of the Ford Motor Company because of membership in A. F. of L. unions," are both mysterious and ominous. On the face of it, it does not seem possible that the A. F. of L. has succeeded where the more powerful and aggressive C. I. O. has encountered such difficulties during the past few years; and it is significant that Mr. Green refrained from being specific. He gave no figures and he failed to make it clear whether he was talking about the long-established craft unions or the federal union chartered when the United Automobile Workers split. His announcement raises the suspicion that the A. F. of L. may have offered Ford what amounts to a company union wearing the A. F. of L. label—the federation has done just that in other instances—but there are no indications so far that Ford would accept even a docile union that carried the name of an "outside organization." Only one thing is clear. Mr. Green has in effect exonerated Ford of discrimination against unions just at a time when the issue was at last being raised in connection with defense contracts and when one minor contract had been withdrawn from Ford for his refusal to accept the labor clause.

★

DEMOCRACY GAINED A LOCAL VICTORY OF considerable importance when a jury in Bridgeport, Connecticut, acquitted Joseph Spell of the charge of raping Mrs. John K. Strubing, Jr. Spell is a Negro; he was employed as butler and chauffeur by the woman who accused him of attacking her. He admitted freely that he and Mrs. Strubing had had sexual relations and that he had driven her on the same night to the Kensico reservoir near where she was found dripping and hysterical early in the morning. All these facts, colored by class and race prejudice, might easily have tipped the scales against Spell. The evidence pointing to his guilt was, to be sure, unconvincing and contradictory, and its credibility was not increased by the obvious mental confusion of the alleged victim, who was the only eye-witness. But in many circumstances and places, such factors would have weighed very little against the emotions aroused by the charge of rape brought by a white woman against a colored man. That they brought a verdict of acquittal in this case is a tribute to both the men and the women who made up the jury and to Judge Foster whose charge was a model of fairness and detachment.

★

A DANGEROUS PRECEDENT WAS ESTABLISHED last week when, upon order of the Court of Appeals, Charles J. Hendley was compelled to surrender the membership list of the New York Teachers Union to the Rapp-Coudert legislative investigating committee. The legislative committee has insisted that it required the lists in order to uncover possible "Communists" in the school system. But as it has never indicated how it will distinguish between Communists who happened to be on the list and ordinary union members, there is reason to suspect that the step is intended as an attack on the union itself. Frightened by the unfavorable publicity resulting from the investigation, a number of teachers have already deserted the union, and the organization's efforts to obtain a restitution of full state aid for education has been severely hampered. If teachers protected by tenure can be intimidated by these tactics, there would seem no limit to the havoc that might be wrought if, say, the employees of a Ford or a Girdler could be forced to yield their union lists to an investigating committee set up by a labor-baiting legislature. Since the highest court in the state has upheld the procedure, labor's only protection lies in the passage of the Zimmer bill in Albany, which would make the seizure of labor-union membership lists illegal.

Close the Blockade

IN the field of war diplomacy no problem is more difficult than the question of how to conduct relations with Russia. Is the Soviet Union to be treated as an irreconcilable enemy or as a potential ally? We know that relations between Moscow and Berlin are officially friendly, that Russia has recently undertaken to increase greatly its exports to Germany, and that, with the approval of the Comintern, Communist parties in the democratic countries carry on campaigns calculated to react harmfully against the British war effort. On the other hand, the Soviets are still aiding China and to this extent are impeding the axis. Moreover, there is good reason to believe that Moscow's influence in the Balkans has acted as a partial check to Hitler's plans for a drive through Bulgaria or Yugoslavia.

The problem has recently been put up to Washington as the result of pleas from the British government for aid in plugging what it believes to be the worst hole in the blockade—the Pacific route to Vladivostok. This request has been received somewhat coolly in the State Department which, according to I. F. Stone's report on page 147, has been confused by conflicting advices from London. Be this as it may, it is unlikely that the British government would complain were Washington to decide that provisioning Germany through the Russian channel was hardly consonant with a policy of all aid to Britain.

During the past twelve months Soviet imports from this country of such commodities as cotton, copper, wheat, hides and skins, brass, lard, and machine tools have shown a big increase over 1938. These are all articles of strategic importance and among them are commodities that Russia has agreed to furnish to Germany. While it is not thought that these American goods are actually being shipped across Siberia to the Reich, there is good reason to suppose that by filling the requirements of Eastern Siberia they enable the Moscow government to release equivalent quantities from stocks in European Russia. An additional cause for concern in London is a recent large Soviet order for oil-drilling equipment. At present Russia can spare little oil to Germany but it has huge reserves waiting to be tapped and every new well brought into production is a potential source of supply for Hitler's war machine.

Various government departments are said to be studying the questions raised by these facts but Secretary of State Hull has been inclined to belittle the extent of the leakage through Vladivostok. It is also being pointed out that Russia's increased purchases in the United States in most cases are cancelled out by the absence of normal imports from the British Empire. Nevertheless, the fact remains that the U. S. S. R. has contracted to supply Germany with foodstuffs and raw materials of the same kind which it is buying from us, ostensibly for home consumption. It is undeniable that without our assistance Russian surpluses available for export will be reduced.

The question to be considered then is whether we should stop this trade with Russia altogether or, at least, reduce it to its pre-war volume. It may be argued that such action ought to be avoided lest we offend Moscow and drive the Soviets into closer bonds of friendship with Germany. For our part we are more inclined to agree with the view set forth by Louis Fischer on page 146. We do not believe that if Britain and America are sufficiently kind to Stalin he will be weaned from his unnatural liaison with Hitler and hurl the Red Army into the fight against fascism. But we find it equally hard to believe that he can easily be pushed into joining Germany as a military ally for he is well aware that the Third Reich is as dangerous to its friends as to its enemies. Under these circumstances it seems stupid to try and appease Russia by refraining from actions which otherwise are judged desirable. The only result would be an invitation to Moscow to make threats and levy blackmail.

On the other hand, it would be futile to embargo or limit exports to the Soviets without taking equally strong action in regard to Japan. There is good reason to believe that the Japanese are acting as trade agents for Germany, particularly in Latin America. But still more important is the strategic aid which Japan affords to the axis by serving as a standing threat to American and British interests in Asia. And with its steady encroachment on Indo-China this threat grows more serious. Yet we are continuing to underpin Japan's rickety economic system despite moral embargoes and export licenses. It is true we no longer allow it to buy aviation gasoline but we permit the purchase of slightly inferior grades which help to keep its planes in the air even if they are a trifle slowed down. Nor have we stopped selling strategic metals to Japan, including some in short supply here.

The growing demands of the defense program are ample excuse for the institution of a strict system of priorities for exports in respect of most goods now reaching Russia and Japan. Home demand should be satisfied first; then the requirements of Britain and its allies and of Latin America. It is improbable that much would be left over except in the case of cotton, wheat, and gasoline, and in regard to the last of these it should be noted that domestic consumption is rising so rapidly that export losses due to the war have already been made up. However much Russia might resent interference with its blockade-busting activities, its wrath would be tempered by the simultaneous blow to Japan's war potential. Hitler is working hard to bring the Soviet Government and Japan together but Russia's terms are believed to be stiff and any weakening in the Japanese position would make them stiffer. It is certainly not to our advantage for these two powers to reach an understanding about the division of the Far East. Now is the time to discourage such a development and to plug up a leak in the British blockade which is apt to grow larger if left unattended.

Labor's Plan for Steel

BEHIND the C. I. O.'s badly written and clumsily presented "plan" for steel lies a story as dramatic as that behind the Reuther plan. A preview of the possibilities of coordinated planning in the steel industry was given by our Washington editor in his dispatch on Little Steel Soviets in the issue of December 28. The proposals now submitted to the President by Philip Murray provide a complete picture of the idle or half-used facilities which could be brought into the defense program if the steel industry were treated as one production unit. Every steel company has a "top scheduling clerk," whose job it is so to arrange the filling of orders as to get the utmost use of that company's facilities. The C. I. O. proposes that the President give the entire steel industry a top scheduling clerk in the shape of an industry council equally representative of capital and labor, with a government representative as chairman. The C. I. O. declares that although the steel industry claims to be working at 99 per cent of ingot capacity, a total of 5,920,195 net tons of steel melting and finishing capacity is still idle. It is idle because there is no one person or agency to do for the whole industry what the top scheduling clerk does for one steel company, itself often a conglomeration of many scattered plants.

The obstacle to the creation of such an agency is that it would take business away from the larger companies, now bloated with orders, and pass more business on to smaller companies, many of them partially idle and a few wholly idle. According to the C. I. O. report:

Each of these [steel] companies is operating as an entity unto itself, and is engaged in compiling the largest and most diversified possible backlog of orders. This is done to assure profitable operations as far into the future as possible. This may be economically desirable to the individual company, but, permitted to run its course unchecked, it can be disastrous to our defense program. Much of the demand for increased ingot or certain finishing capacity is evidence of mal-distribution of orders. This "shortage" is a company shortage, not a national inadequacy. Over-taxed and idle facilities—similar or complementary—are found side by side, but in different companies, and due primarily to this illogical distribution of orders and lack of coordination.

Within the boundaries of any individual company, no such lack of planning is permitted, for it would be as costly to the individual company as the over-all planlessness is to the national economy and to the defense program. "Each integrated steel company," the report explains, "constantly coordinates its facilities with the needs of its customers. One such firm operates its own pig-iron and steel-making furnaces." In these furnaces the company makes its steel ingots. From these ingots, with its finishing capacity, the company makes sheets, tinsplate, tubular goods, structural shapes, wire, and nail products. Combined, these finishing capacities considerably exceed the company's ingot capacity, yet by spreading the peak months for various finished products over the year, it is "able to meet all the demands of its customers for finished products with its existing steel melting facilities." This coordination is the work of the top scheduling clerk, and it is just such a function which the C. I. O. would give its proposed industry council.

The C. I. O. does not think that coordination would make expansions of plant unnecessary but it believes present programs for expansion are as ill-planned as is the industry as a whole. "Expansion plans already announced," the C. I. O. report declares, "are mostly for steel plants that neither have the necessary working force or housing facilities for an increased working force, while more than a score of steel ghost towns have industrial buildings to house new steel facilities, a well-rounded working force to man such facilities, and adequate housing to care for the working force." These expansion programs, like present production programs, owe their weaknesses to the fact that they are geared to provide the highest profit to the big steel companies rather than the maximum output for defense.

There is much besides the mere idea of coordination in the C. I. O. report. It is full of concrete suggestions not now being applied because individual steel companies have no profit interest in applying them. The C. I. O. wants a wider application of the Bessemer flame-control process developed by Jones and Laughlin but adopted by few other companies. It believes the steel castings section of the industry is capable of producing cast armor plate, and thinks funds should be made available for experimentation. If successful, this would reduce the serious shortage of armor plate. Many production hours are lost because mills must cease operation while "mill changes" are made for different types of orders. The C. I. O. believes half this time could be saved by dividing orders among the different companies on a basis of efficiency and specialization rather than competition. Many of the smaller or medium-size companies cited by the C. I. O. have "lopsided facilities," too much ingot capacity for their finishing capacity, or vice versa. Comparatively small R. F. C. loans to build up the missing factors would immensely increase their usefulness, but they lack sufficient prominence or "pull" to obtain the loans. The Nation believes that sooner or later defense needs will drive the government to the use of these suggestions. It also believes that since the big steel companies by their very nature will oppose any such program as a threat to their profits, a plan of this kind can only be put across by establishing an industrial council, and giving labor equal representation in it.

The Moral Embargo

BY LOUIS FISCHER

THE recently announced decision of the United States government to lift the moral embargo on shipments of certain commodities to the Soviet Union seems to me a bad one chiefly because its consequences may be detrimental to American interests. It could easily contribute to an improvement of Russo-Japanese relations.

Russia's present embarrassing international situation arises from the exposure of its western frontier to German pressure and of its eastern expanses to simultaneous Japanese pressure. Russia is too weak to cope with Germany or to antagonize Germany. But if it could weaken or divert Japan its position would be improved and the fear of Germany lessened.

Russia can weaken Japan by supporting Chinese armed resistance. It has done this. But the method is expensive. The Russian government started aiding Spanish Loyalists in October, 1936; when the Chinese "incident" began, Moscow sent arms to China, and Spain got fewer. During the Czech crisis beginning May, 1938, both China and Spain received fewer planes, and it was Czechoslovakia's turn to get something from Russia. But, principally, Russia was worried about the possibility of becoming involved in war itself and kept as much material as it could at home. In parallel and worse circumstances today Stalin would wish to cut his arms shipments to China.

A better way of relieving Japanese pressure on Russia—better than reinforcing Chinese resistance—would be for Moscow to try to direct Japanese expansion southward towards Siam and the Dutch East Indies. This would also serve Germany's interests. Even a great Japanese victory in China would not help Hitler soon in Europe. But the end of the Chinese war would help Hitler immediately by enabling Japan to concentrate on areas to the south of her where the United States and the British get vital war materials.

A Russo-Japanese agreement could envisage some kind of peace or truce or demilitarization near Siberia, and the end of the Chinese war. The Russians could end the Chinese war by encouraging the Chinese Communists to get a divorce from Chiang Kai-shek. Signs of trouble between the Communists and Chiang have multiplied of late. The Russians could take the Chinese Communists, in provinces contiguous with the Soviet Union, under their wing, and Japan would have an easier time with Chiang.

An agreement with Russia becomes all the more important to Tokio since the United States is helping Chiang. Help from America and Russia to Chiang might spell disaster to Japan. If Russia dropped Chiang, American help to China would not be effective.

An agreement between Russia and Japan is facilitated by any appearance of improvement in the relations between the United States and Russia. Fearing such an improvement, Japan will court Russia the more ardently. If Washington could get Russia to abandon Hitler, any American concession would be worth while. But Russia is at present too exposed and too much in doubt about the outcome of the war to be actively or openly anti-Hitler. Accordingly, America's friendlier attitude toward Moscow can only frighten the Japanese into coming to terms with Russia.

The lifting of the moral embargo is a feather in the cap of Constantine Oumansky, the Soviet ambassador in Washington, and that is probably why he urged it with such insistence. The State Department may have yielded to him on the purely legalistic ground that since Russia is no longer at war and no longer bombing civilians, the embargo imposed by the United States after the red air fleet bombed Finnish non-combatants ceases to be justified. But in the summer of 1939 the Russians used every concession and friendly gesture by London and Paris to sell themselves more dearly to Hitler. And the real objection to the recent steps toward a rapprochement between the United States and Moscow is that Stalin might easily use them to intimidate the Japanese into signing a pact which would channel Japanese aggression southward, undermine Chiang's position, and give the Russians a Communist zone of domination in China—partition of China à la Poland.

The release of a few million dollars worth of American machine tools or the lifting of the moral embargo will not alter or shape Moscow's attitude toward the war. Countries like Russia decide their course in this war by their estimate of its possible outcome. Stalin will remain tied to Hitler until Hitler appears to be losing. Then the fear which now inspires the Kremlin's policy will diminish and in its stead will come a greater freedom of action. At that time, America can play an active role in producing a shift in Moscow's allegiance. If, thanks to increased American aid, England looks as if it would be the victor, Stalin will have a change of heart. Until then, America's diplomatic overtures can only serve Japanese and German ends.

It is in no sense a matter of idealism versus realism, as Arthur Krock has suggested in the New York Times. No one expects idealism from foreign offices these days. The question is whether the realism will achieve or defeat its purpose.

The Halifax Debut

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, February 1

I AM sorry to have to fall back upon a much-abused phrase, but I am "reliably informed"—and that is just what I mean—that the State Department last Friday morning received a rather extraordinary cable from the British government. This cable said that the statements of Minister of Economic Warfare Hugh Dalton were not to be construed as criticism of the United States for lifting its "moral embargo" on the sale of planes to the Soviet Union. It also declared that since the unfortunate incident—for so it was described—conversations had taken place between representatives of the British and Russian governments and an understanding had been reached, an understanding presumably about American-Soviet trade.

I have no crystal ball in which to determine the cable's significance. However, it adds to the jigsaw puzzle of Anglo-American relations with Moscow. The "moral embargo" was lifted on January 21. Lord Halifax arrived on January 24. On the morning of January 28 he spent an hour with Sumner Welles, who has been in charge of the painfully slow and mutually suspicious negotiations looking toward better relations between this country and the Soviet Union. After this conference, Halifax told reporters that "a considerable amount of materials" was reaching the Reich via the Soviets, and informed them that the British were bringing pressure on the United States to stop the leak of essential war supplies, notably cotton, to the Nazis. Dalton made much the same statement in the Commons the same day, but he did not go quite so far as Halifax. He said there was little evidence that American supplies were reaching Germany directly, but "ample evidence" that the Soviets were exporting their own products and replacing them with imports from this country.

Hull at his press conference on January 28 explained apologetically that the lifting of the moral embargo was a psychological move designed merely to get rid of a point of irritation. He said cotton shipments to Russia were up only 125,000 bales last year.

The next day in London "a spokesman for the Ministry of Economic Warfare" took issue with Hull on the question of the cotton exports. Hull and Welles are already under fire from Catholic sources and from the Republicans in Congress for "appeasing" the Soviets. The cable arrived two days later.

The feeling in the State Department seems to be that this incident reflects differences between Eden, on the one hand, and Halifax and Dalton, on the other; that Halifax was instructed to check on possible leaks through Russia to Germany but was not instructed to do so in a way that would embarrass Hull and Welles in their Soviet negotiations. Two months ago, talking with a British correspondent, I was told there would be no improvement in Anglo-Soviet relations as long as Halifax was Foreign Secretary. I wonder whether he will play a similar role at the British Embassy in Washington.

Best news in a long time was the War Department's action in rejecting a Ford bid because he refused to accept a clause calling for compliance with the labor laws. Many factors went into the achievement of this victory. Credit goes first to Sidney Hillman, and his aides, for a long and vigorously waged fight. The new OPM setup also plays a part, for under it Hillman's division has a check on contracts that it did not have before. The publicity given the odd circumstances surrounding the "midget car" contract, brought to light in a Nation Washington letter on December 14, helped put pressure on the War Department. On the day the Ford bid was rejected, the War Department also withdrew its application to grant the canners exemption from the overtime requirements of the Walsh-Healey Act. Secretary of War Stimson, by these moves, has demonstrated his good faith. But it would be a serious mistake to believe that the fight has been won. The Department gives signs of taking fright at its own courage, and Undersecretary Patterson wobbled badly on Friday before the House Military Affairs Committee. The big-business crowd on the Defense Commission is determined to make the War Department reverse itself.

I suspect all this is not unconnected with an announcement which William Green will make tomorrow morning. He will say that "the production workers employed at the Lincoln Plant and the River Rouge plant of the Ford Motor Company have become organized into unions chartered by the American Federation of Labor." It looks as though Harry Bennett and Edsel Ford have finally won over "the old man" to their contention that the smart way to fight the C.I.O. organization drive is to play along with the A.F. of L. It is doubtful whether Green has been promised recognition for these, as yet, imaginary unions, but he has probably received stronger hints than he has in the past that Ford would look with favor on the A.F. of L. The fear that the War Department may be forced to continue its new labor policy, and concern over a possible investigation into influences favorable to Ford in the quartermaster corps, make it desirable to "change the subject" and give Ford's opposition to unionism the appearance of a jurisdictional dispute. This is especially important because of the growing demand for a Congressional investigation.

Congressman Charles I. Faddis, Democrat, of Pennsylvania, a member of the House Military Affairs Committee, promised ten days ago to introduce a resolution to investigate the "midget military car" contract given to Ford, but he now seems to be hesitating. Colonel Faddis has an intimate knowledge of military affairs.

The Nation, in an editorial on January 26, called attention to the fact that the weight specifications on this midget car, which the General Staff has tried to keep as light as possible, had been raised to a point that accorded with Ford's wishes. Only a Congressional committee could find out how this happened.

A Congressional committee would find a similar change in specifications for the new half-ton truck contract on which Ford's bid was finally rejected. I want to call attention to an unnoticed aspect of this contract. Last August the Fargo Manufacturing Company, a subsidiary of Chrysler, was awarded a contract for 14,000 of these half-ton trucks. Fargo was the low bidder, and the contract contained an option for 7,000 more. The War Department shortly afterward decided that it wanted an additional 11,000. It could have taken up the 7,000 option and ordered an additional 4,000 from Fargo and thus been certain of a standard type of truck. The task of repair and parts replacement behind the lines becomes a nightmare, when many different types are used. But instead of taking up the option, the War Department "in the light of experience in maneuvers, decided to change certain specifications of the truck to increase manufacturing sources of this item." (I am quoting from an earlier release by the War Department.) This statement is contradictory. It could mean that the change in specifications was made "in the light of experience in maneuvers" or that it was made "to increase manufacturing sources of this item"; that the change was made for military reasons or to let Ford in on the contract.

Mediterranean Scene

BY HARRY J. GREENWALL

Cap d'Antibes, France, January 15

AT NIGHT, when the entire French Mediterranean coast is blacked out, when every lighthouse, according to Italo-German orders, has its beams extinguished, British bombing planes hum over the seaboard country. Scattered along the coast, German and Italian agents spread fantastic stories of British bombings to come, bombings which the British who still live along this coast will be warned about in time to escape. These tales have a measure of success, because the French are only too willing to listen to any talk about British perfidy.

On the one occasion when Marseilles really was attacked, the German-controlled press in French unoccupied territory stated that British planes had bombed the city; that an energetic protest had been forwarded to London, via Washington, and that the Vichy government demanded apologies and reparations from Britain. The following day there appeared a statement that the French note had been sent through Madrid, not Washington, and that the fragments of the dropped bombs had been examined by experts who were certain that the bombs were of British make. That the bombs were British is true, but the report failed to state that they were British bombs that had been part of the booty captured during the German thrust to Dunkirk. In Marseilles it is whispered that these bombs were dropped from Italian planes. In any event nothing more has been heard of the Vichy demand for British apologies and reparations.

The prologue to this Mediterranean scene goes back to June 8, when the battle of the Alps began. It was the last battle between French and German forces, a campaign not yet fully recorded. I saw part of that battle, as an onlooker caught up in the fleeing masses of French soldiers and refugees. Finally on June 19 we came to rest at Valence, the headquarters of General Orly's army, a scratch force of some 25,000 men who stemmed the advance of German motorized divisions which had been moving at thirty-five miles a day.

The Stuttgart radio had announced that the German-Italian armies would "link hands in the center of France." I believed that Lyons was the chosen center, but according to definite information which came eventually into the hands of the French High Command, Chambéry, the capital city of the province of Savoy, was the place chosen for this merry meeting. The Germans were planning to march to Marseilles, believing that the French would not seek an armistice before the whole of France was in pawn to Germany and Italy.

The Italians? The Italians were to sweep into France, overrun the whole Alpes-Maritimes province and take the province of Savoy. It is possible that the Italians might have been able to carry out the major part of their program, but the last stand of General Orly's army (which consisted partly of sailors) drove a wedge between the Germans and Italians and threw the enemy war machine out of gear. The armistice came before the Germans could overcome the barrier General Orly provided. The General merits a niche in French history, alongside that of Marshal Joffre. I mean no offense to the bravery and cran of Orly's army when I write that it was not his men but his personal genius which stemmed the rising tide. General Orly had the brilliant idea of blowing up the huge dams which held back millions of tons of mountain waters, flooding the river Isère and making it impassable to the German troops. At this point I will leave the battle of the Alps, which, I suggest, formed the prologue to Mediterranean hostilities, and pass on to the first phase of the later battle.

In the early days of September the Italians in North Africa swung into action and thrust eastward, invading Egypt and gradually taking British Somaliland. The success was spectacular and good for home and foreign consumption; moreover, it was a grave threat to the security of the Suez Canal.

After the initial success of the Italians in September and early October, strange rumors flowed back across the Mediterranean. The Italian official version of the halt of operations was that a new and good road had to be built to carry stores, men, munitions, and gas for the tanks and lorries. Yet it was apparent that unless the Italians hastened on with their operations, the comparatively short dry season would end before the conquest of Egypt was accomplished. It was reported persistently that there had been a personal quarrel between Graziani and the Duce; the General was not prepared to cry "Avanti" to his men. Then came reports that Graziani was under "open arrest."

No real light was thrown on the situation until the attack on Greece. I happened to be in Italy directly after the seizure of Albania. I found displayed outside every bookshop maps of Albania showing the alleged riches—petrol, rice, and tobacco—the little country contained, although from my own observation I thought its riches could better be listed under the twin headings: scraggy mountains and goats. However, inside the bookshops there were offered for sale booklets which appeared to ignore the economic resources of Albania and to call more attention to the strategic and political advantages to be extracted from the possession of the country. A student of European affairs could not have failed to conclude that Albania was intended as a springboard for the eventual attack on either Yugoslavia or Greece.

An attack on Yugoslavia had two disadvantages. The country was, and is, more or less under the benevolent protection of Russia, and German economic penetration of Yugoslavia meant a "keep out" sign to Italy. Yet, Greece as a conquest token would be of no great value to Italy. Of no value, that is, unless Graziani had won his point: that he could not attack because, contrary to Italian intelligence service reports, the British had strongly reinforced their armies. Is it not possible that the attack on Greece was intended as a diversion, a side-show staged to call troops and planes to the northern shores of the Mediterranean, leaving the British armies in North Africa weakened and easier to crush? If that is so two errors of judgment were committed. The Greeks themselves were able to meet and defeat an Italian army whose heart was not in the fight; and second, Britain could and did send assistance to Greece without endangering her situation in North and East Africa. Plans which had been rather slowly maturing for an attack on Graziani's men before the end of the dry season were hastened on. Risks were taken, as Mr. Churchill said in the House of Commons on December 19. Yet before the British took these risks, and won out, the Mediterranean battle had entered still another phase.

It has been suggested that Italy attacked Greece without the agreement of the Germans. This seems barely possible in the light of Germany's attempt to force Bulgaria into the war in order to strike at Greece on Italy's behalf. When the stage was set for this act Molotov went to Berlin. The Neue Zürcher Nachrichten, the best-informed European newspaper, gave the full story of that visit. In brief it was as follows:

Hitler wished to obtain Russia's consent to the partial occupation of Bulgaria, an attack on Greece, and war with Turkey if Turkey went to the assistance of its Greek ally. Hitler, it seems, pointed out to Stalin's envoy how he had smoothed the path which Russia of the Soviets trod in the footsteps of old imperialistic Russia: the path to Finland, the reconquest of Esthonia, Lithuania, and Latvia; how German engineers had built the very roads for the Russian forces which retook Bessarabia. Molotov, it is reported, agreed with everything, but then went on to state that Soviet Russia intended to follow further the foreign policy of the Tsars, that Russia preserved its interests in the Slav people of Yugoslavia and Bulgaria. And moreover, so far as Moscow was concerned, the policy was still "hands off the Straits." Soviet Russia means to keep its entry from the Black Sea to the Mediterranean Sea wide open. This frank statement of policy, said the Swiss journal, was the first setback to Axis policy.

We are now obviously rapidly approaching the fourth phase of the Mediterranean war, and the permanent question now is: how much will Germany help Italy?

The possibilities, as an observer sees the situation here, are these: Germany without in any way violating the armistice agreement with France could pass its troops into Spain, try and capture Gibraltar, and with the assistance of Spain close the western end of the Mediterranean. Spain has, despite British protests, laid heavy hands on Tangiers and thus holds one of the Pillars of Hercules, of which Gibraltar forms the second. But the control of the western end of the Middle Sea would not hamper to any considerable extent British operations in the eastern section. British sea power is still able to convoy ships bringing supplies round to East Africa via the Cape of Good Hope.

Germany could and, if she wanted, would violate the armistice with France and invade unoccupied territory, seizing the ports of Toulon and Marseilles. But would that help Italy very much? My own opinion is that before very long we shall see Germany occupying Trieste and the whole of the former Austrian territory which passed into the hands of Italy following the signing of the treaty of St. Germain. Germany has long since cast sheep's eyes on the fat lands of Lombardy, whose plains are even now but a stone's throw from her Austrian frontier. The seizure of Trieste would immediately make Germany a Mediterranean power. Maybe this would not be of any great assistance to Italy, but it would be one more successful circus for Hitler to present to Germany.

It is perhaps permissible to carry these premises still further. An early occupation of northern Italy would shut and possibly bolt the back door to Germany through northern Italy into Bavaria, should Britain and its Allies decide, after the defeat of the Italian troops in Africa, to carry the Mediterranean war into Italian metropolitan territory by landing troops at various points along the 4,000 miles of Italian coastline.

One can easily delve a little further into the not very distant future. The fact that French mobile guards have been mobilized on the new Franco-Italian frontier to push back the hundreds of civilians who want to cross over into France is a living proof that all is not so well in the heart of Mussolini's Roman Empire. Italian trains are being taken off by the score, because the supply of German coal is falling off. American newspapermen coming from Italy report stories of strong criticism of highly placed officials. It is not a matter of indulging in wishful thinking. One must visualize the moment when Germany will cast away the mask and set about making its ally of today the vassal of tomorrow. This might well come about, if and when the army revolts against the regime—and Germany, already installed in the North, marches south, just to keep order, of course.

MEDITERRANEAN OUTLOOK - VISIBILITY BAD

Caveat Investor

BY KENNETH MACNEAL

SHORTLY after the turn of each year thousands of American corporations mail out millions upon millions of neat little booklets to their stockholders. If you are a stockholder you will receive one from each corporation on whose stock list your name appears, whether you own one share or ten thousand.

These booklets all bear on their covers the inscription: Annual Report, Financial Report, Annual Statement, or some similar name. Each looks as though its purpose were to tell you how much profit your company made during the past year and how much wealth it possessed at the end of the year. If you believe that it will do this you are a perfectly normal stockholder and you are also, if you back your belief with money, perfectly ripe for the cleaners. For only rarely will a report supply this information, even approximately, and if it does it will be by accident rather than by design.

Suppose, for illustration, that you have recently purchased some stock on the advice of your banker, but you have since had some misgivings because you cannot afford to lose your money, and you have heard that even bankers sometimes make mistakes in recommending investments. One day in February you receive through the mail a booklet called "Annual Report of the Candid Company." It contains a letter from the president and several pages of financial statements. It occurs to you that this is your chance to learn for yourself what kind of investment you have made. So that evening, after dinner, you sit down in your favorite chair with a determination to read and understand the report even if it kills your whole evening.

First you read the list of officers and directors named on the inside of the cover. You are pleased to find some well-known names among the directors. But it is likely that you would be much more impressed if you realized that this page stands an excellent chance of being the only one in the entire booklet that actually means what it appears to say.

Next you read the president's letter, which starts with the words: "To Our Stockholders." This letter states that a balance sheet and an earnings statement for the year ended December 31, 1940, are being submitted herewith, and that the net earnings for the year amounted to a certain sum. It then asserts that the company's current assets are so many times its current liabilities. Finally, after some general remarks about the amount of business done, it winds up by thanking all the company's employees for their loyal cooperation during the year. You will do well to withhold judgment on the remarks about the earnings and the current assets. The president may believe these but, as will shortly become apparent, the odds are against either being true.

Following the president's letter is a financial statement occupying a double page, with the caption, "Balance Sheet, December 31, 1940," at its top. Below this caption the left-hand page is headed "Assets," and the right-hand page "Liabilities and Net Worth." Do not conclude from the date at the top that the figures in the balance sheet are meant to inform you of the value of the assets and net worth of your company on December 31, 1940, because if you do you will have fallen into a trap that has snared thousands. Some of the figures relate to that date, it is true, but others state only historical costs incurred at a variety of dates in the near or distant past, and still others are, well—just figures.

You can confirm this by examining the assets, which start with a group of items called "Current Assets." This group comprises assets whose function is to supply money in time of need, or to be converted into money in the ordinary and usual course of business operations. The first asset in the group is "Cash." This is the real McCoy. It represents actual cash on hand or in the bank at the close of business December 31, 1940. After cash come "Accounts Receivable" and "Notes Receivable." These also mean just what they say. They represent the total face value of the accounts and notes owed to the company by its customers on December 31, 1940, less an allowance for any that may ultimately prove uncollectible. So far so good.

The next asset is "Inventories," and the sum at which they are stated may or may not represent the value of the merchandise and material owned by your company on December 31, 1940. If the market value of the inventories is less than what they cost, this market value will usually, but not always, be shown. If, on the other hand, the market value of the inventories is more than what they cost, then only their cost will be shown. In other words, if your company's inventory includes ten million pounds of copper purchased at 6 cents per pound, and the present price of this copper is 12 cents per pound, it will be included in the inventory as an asset worth only $600,000, even though it be instantly salable for $1,200,000. In this case your company will have a concealed profit of $600,000 which will appear neither on its balance sheet nor in its earnings statement. Since inventories are current assets, and usually the most valuable current assets, you can see that your president's statement about current assets being so many times current liabilities may frequently be something less than the truth. If you are waiting for an opportunity to sell your stock at a fair price, the concealment of profits in this manner may have an important bearing on your financial welfare.

The last item in the current asset group is "Marketable Securities." These are securities with a ready market which may be sold at any time without injury to the business. They do not include investments in subsidiaries, or any investment whose sale would rule out working relationships with other businesses. Like inventories, if their market value is less than their cost, they will usually, but not always, be shown at the former figure. If, however, their market value is more than their cost, they will be exhibited at cost, with their market value appearing only in parentheses as a sort of obiter dictum. In this case a profit will again exist which will not appear in the earnings statement, and your president's statement about the ratio of current assets to current liabilities will again be in error. If your company's holdings of marketable securities are large, it is possible that many millions of dollars of profits may have been obscured in this manner.

Following the current assets is a group of large items known as "Fixed Assets." These consist of "Land," "Buildings," "Machinery," and in general those assets which are presumably never to be sold because their possession is essential to the operation of the business. With few exceptions they are always valued at cost, less an allowance for depreciation in the case of such assets as buildings and machinery, which deteriorate with use or the passage of time. The actual value of these assets may be many millions more or less than shown but you will never learn about it from your company's financial report. If the value is greatly less than shown, it may have long been obvious to insiders that your company will be unable to refund its first mortgage bonds, and that it is headed for bankruptcy. The first intimation you will receive of this, however, will be from newspapers which announce the bankruptcy. On the other hand, if the value is greatly more than shown, you may be deprived of enormous profits that are rightfully yours.

Consider, for example, the case of one corporation which for years owned and occupied a plant covering a number of acres in a large city. As time went by, the city grew and the value of the plant increased enormously. No mention of this increase was made in the reports of the corporation, and consequently most stockholders remained in complete ignorance of the value of their company's property. Speculators accumulated a portion of the company's stock in the open market and, as the price rose, many small stockholders sold their holdings because the certified published statements of the corporation showed that from neither the standpoint of assets nor earnings was the stock worth so much. However, the stock continued to rise and eventually the corporation moved into the country, selling its old plant at a profit of several million dollars. This was sufficient to pay the large funded debt and to place the corporation in a different financial category altogether. The point is that stockholders of the corporation were, in effect, deprived of profits that their company had been accumulating over many years, because they were kept in ignorance of these profits and were not supplied with facts necessary for the formation of a rational estimate of the value of their stock.

Following "Fixed Assets" on your company's balance sheet come a number of items under the caption, "Deferred Charges." The assets grouped under this heading comprise, on the one hand, a number of prepaid expenses such as "Prepaid Insurance" and "Prepaid Taxes." The unexpired portions of these prepaid expenses are real assets, because they represent legal claims for services or protection that have been paid for but have not yet been received. Other items grouped under this heading, however, may comprise expenses that are not assets at all because they represent nothing material that can be used nor do they represent a legal claim on anybody for anything. They may consist of legal fees, stock-salesmen's commissions, advertising expenses, discount on bonds sold, and, in some cases, even the early operating losses of the business. As assets they are nonsense. They are really expenses or losses that the management of your company does not yet wish to acknowledge as such by exhibiting them as expenses in its earnings statement. To the extent that they exist your company's reported earnings have been exaggerated.

The next asset is "Patents." It is probably the most difficult item of all to value correctly because nobody knows its true value. In actual practice it may be valued at almost any figure deemed expedient by the management. Sometimes it is called "Patents and Good Will" and appears at a huge valuation. On the other hand, the General Electric Company values all of its priceless patents at the total sum of one dollar. You will have to do some tall guessing on this one. Bear in mind, however, that if it is overvalued or undervalued then the reported profits of your company have been overstated or understated by the same amounts.

Finally you come to the last asset of all—"Good will." This is the prize phony of the lot. Theoretically it is supposed to represent the value of the established popularity of a business, but usually it represents the exact reverse of this. Companies whose large earnings prove that they possess it in abundant quantities scorn to display it. Other companies, whose earnings are such as to entitle them to claim no good will whatever, display it in profuse amounts, only to write it off if later good fortune grants them a real claim to it. Recognizing this, many sound companies display good will prominently in their balance sheets opposite a valuation of one dollar, to indicate that they possess it and that they therefore do not intend to exhibit it as an asset. Under these circumstances good will has become meaningless. No intelligent method is used to value or to revalue it from time to time, and accountants will sanction its reduction or total elimination at any time. Frequently it is combined with patents in an effort to conceal its amount. On the whole you will act wisely if you regard it, not as an asset, but as a concealed loss.

So much for the assets. You have scrutinized them all. The total at the bottom of the page seems to indicate that they are worth so much money. Now it is up to you to decide what they are really worth. By looking at the "Liabilities" section of the balance sheet, you can see that trade creditors, employees, the government, bondholders, and others, have a claim on these assets for various amounts. By looking at the "Net Worth" section, you can also see that the stockholders have a claim on them for everything that is left over. The earnings statement, which follows the balance sheet, merely shows the amount by which the stockholders' claim has increased or decreased during the past year.

But do not forget that if the value of the assets is incorrectly shown, the amount of the stockholders' claim will be incorrectly shown, and that therefore the amount of the earnings to date will have been incorrectly shown. Furthermore, remember that although you may be morally certain that the assets are incorrectly valued, you still do not know their correct value. You may be more suspicious, but you are no wiser than before. Perhaps your company has made twice as much as it says it has. Perhaps it has lost twice as much as it says it has earned. It's your guess, and you will not be aided by relying on the accountant's certificate following your company's balance sheet and earnings statement, which assures you that these "fairly present the position of the company at December 31, 1940, and the results of its operations for the year ending at that date."

Finally, however, if like many others you perceive the futility of pitting your guesses against the knowledge of insiders who know, don't you think it is time that you cast your vote in favor of a change in our system of financial reporting?

What War Has Done to Japan

BY BARBARA PAINE

THE Japanese standard of living has undergone some startling modifications since 1935. The per capita income, although still very low by American standards, has nearly doubled, but ordinary commodities have become so scarce, so expensive, and so cheapened in quality that the standard of living has fallen sharply. Today farmers are the only people in Japan not suffering from shortages. They raise their own food, make their own charcoal, are the only group allowed by law to eat 100 per cent polished rice, and never spend much money anyway on store-bought objects. Farmers can get rubber-soled tabi or split-toed shoes when city workers can't. But the middle classes are gradually becoming impoverished. Before the war in China the majority of pawnshop patrons were day laborers; today that distinction is held by white-collar workers. While laborers are said to use the pawnshops now only when collecting money for a spree, the small-salaried men are driven to pawning their staple fiber clothes in order to obtain rice for their families. Wage levels are unbelievably low. A rookie policeman, for example, receives 30 yen, or $7.50, a month, plus a uniform and a sword. Salesgirls and waitresses get about the same amount, domestic servants somewhat less, school teachers start at $15 a month, factory workers and miners get $20 a month, and government employees average $25 a month. Nevertheless, there are compensating factors which in normal times prevent mass suffering.

The Japanese diet, while it would horrify an American dietitian, is extremely cheap and moderately healthy. (On their part the Japanese not only dislike our food but consider it very indigestible.) Domestic architecture in Japan is well adapted to housing large families in a few rooms and still giving scope for a certain natural elegance and refinement. The literacy rate is quite high in spite of the difficulties of the written language.

Most workers either receive the benefit of, or actually possess, sources of income not mentioned in bare statistics. At New Year's and in July workers receive a bonus equal to from one to six months' total salary or even more. The bonuses of workers in key industries such as the munitions factories, in many big firms such as the Mitsubishi Company, and among various classes of small salaried workers are equal to at least their total year's wages. Besides this, most large firms provide retirement and pension allowances for their employees, extra for overtime, and for medical treatment and hospitalization. Moreover, the family system is powerful in Japan, and it is a rather unusual family that must depend on the earnings of one individual.

The average Japanese petty official with three dependents spends $7 a month on food, $4 on housing, $1 on light and heat, $2 on clothing, $7 on education, personal gifts, amusements, and other incidentals, and whatever remains on insurance, government bonds, and interest on debts. The bonuses are arranged so that poor families, with their supposedly feeble capacity for planning, can twice a year pay off debts and make big purchases such as winter clothing.

These low-salaried men and their families live in two- or three-room houses; eat rice and tea, and some fish, pickles, and fruit; take baths three or four times a week in the public bath house for half a cent a person, wear their clothes threadbare; and perhaps can manage to send their most promising sons through a higher school. The head of the family smokes Golden Bat cigarettes costing two cents for a package of ten, reads a one-cent newspaper, and can travel ten miles daily by train for less than a dollar. More likely than not he has a few debts.

In normal times this life, stringent though it is, is not too hard, but it has been badly dislocated by the war. Taxes have soared. A flat 6 per cent income tax is now paid on incomes over $180 a year with surtaxes beginning at 10 per cent for incomes over $2,000 and increasing to 85 per cent for incomes over $200,000. An enterprising newspaper figured out that this year every man, woman, and child in Japan will pay nearly $2 a month in taxes, some direct but most indirect.

The pressure to save and buy government bonds is unceasing. New Year's bonuses for 1940 were supposed to be paid in government bonds, and over 500,000 soldiers and civilians who distinguished themselves in China were awarded bonuses of bonds which they were not supposed to cash. Billboards on every street corner and in every street car announce postal savings bonds which can be bought for fifty cents. To make enforced savings palatable, lottery bonds have been introduced. This year the government hopes to raise twelve billion yen in bonds, 120 yen or $30 for every individual in Japan. A high official of the finance ministry said, "I realize that it will be extremely difficult for minor officials, low-salaried men, and wage-earners to have 120 yen each, but the people must grin and bear it for the fulfillment of the lofty ideal for which the country is fighting."

After the typical Japanese citizen has paid his new and burdensome taxes and contributed his share toward the absorption of every new bond issue, he still has to face the most disagreeable effect of the holy war—rising prices. Since the "China incident" started in 1937, wages have increased by 28 per cent and the price of commodities by over 40 per cent. Increasingly serious shortages and shabby and cheapened substitutes make this situation more serious every month.

The Japanese have few needs, so they become doubly alarmed when their necessities are threatened. Among foods, for example, fish became so scarce and expensive last winter that it practically disappeared from middle-class tables. In May, 1940, fruit and vegetables cost 11 per cent more than in March and 114 per cent more than before "the incident." Worst of all, Japanese rice is so adulterated with imported rice and barley that about half the population is complaining bitterly of indigestion. Those who are not satisfied by the new rice are being advised by the government to drink more water just before meals.

Next to food in importance is an adequate supply of charcoal, coal bricks, and other fuels. Last winter every form of heating except wood was affected by serious shortages. Where the Japanese felt the lack of fuel most deeply was not in their homes but in the public baths, thousands of which closed down entirely while others lowered the temperature of the water so that their patrons found themselves deprived of their last resources for getting warm.

Among other commodities it is impossible to buy a spool of cotton or a ball of wool in Japan. The current textile is sufu, a very cheap and flimsy staple fiber which has only 5 per cent the strength of cotton and which disintegrates completely after its second washing. Half a dozen would-be suicides who have tried to hang themselves with staple fiber rope failed because the rope snapped. Sufu is bad for babies, and six yards of cotton are rationed to the mothers of new-born infants upon presentation of their birth certificates, but the rest of Japan suffers greatly from lack of cotton.

The tale of Japanese shortages is endless. There is so acute a lack of drugs that major operations are performed without ether. The nail shortage is such that sneak thieves steal nails at night from fences. Flints are used again in kitchens because of the match shortage, and shoes are no longer resoled but merely patched because of the leather shortage.

The inferiority of commodities has diverted considerable income to the amusement business. Amusement taxes for 1939 were 56 per cent higher than estimated. In Tokyo alone over 78,000 women are now engaged directly in the amusement business; many big movie theaters sold the house out four times daily in 1939; and there are 220 cafés and bars in one small district of the city. Purchasing power where entertainment is concerned shows no signs of abating.

Industrial workers, in spite of the increasing demand for their services, are not to be envied. Hours are so long, and many of the workers so young and inexperienced, that the accident rate is very high and constantly increasing—last year 30 per cent of all factory workers were reported as injured, disabled, or killed. Eleven-hour working days are still the rule, but the possibility of shortening them is being discussed and factories which put undue pressure on their workers are kept under police surveillance. There are many new laws for the protection of women and minors employed in factories, and police give frequent instruction in accident prevention.

Since rising prices constantly threaten the feeble security of the industrial classes, it is expected that eventually both wages and prices will be frozen by government decree. The first attempt at such stabilization in September, 1939, was a total failure, but the next will be more successful. As a temporary palliative the Welfare Ministry decided in May to boost the wages of workers in heavy industries by 40 to 60 per cent of the increasingly high cost of living. To laborers of low earning capacity with children under fourteen the government gives a special allowance of from fifty cents to a dollar a month. The Welfare Ministry has also subsidized the erection of 5,000 new houses and apartments this year to ease the housing scarcity, and compulsory schooling is going to be gradually increased from six to eight years, partly as a health measure to protect children who would otherwise go to work.

Among measures designed to help the hard-pressed white-collar workers there is one providing for the founding of several new government loan companies from which they may at least borrow money at a fair rate of interest. Within the last year, too, the government has extended its gigantic pension and health insurance system to about half a million very minor officials who were reported to be affected by rising discontent. School teachers have been granted a five-yen ($1.25) monthly increase in salary. According to the Japanese sense of responsibility, those in superior positions have very pronounced obligations toward their underlings. At periods of stress like the present all the virtues of this system become especially apparent. For instance, most large firms maintain lunchrooms for their employees. The food is exactly the same for everyone, but prices are graduated according to ability to pay. Important officials by paying $2 for their meal absorb most of the rise in prices and make it possible for lowly clerks to get a good meal for three cents.

The worst effect of the lowered standard of living in Japan has been the decline in national health. The infant mortality rate has risen; the birth rate has fallen, mainly, the Japanese think, because of over-employment of married women in factories and lack of money in the low-salaried groups. Young children aren't up to previous standards in height and weight. Office workers require more and more sick leave. The amount of tuberculosis has increased by 50 per cent within the last three years, and the disease is so prevalent that one school child in seven in Tokyo is in immediate need of treatment.

The government is trying to cope with health problems by building hundreds of new hospitals and putting emphasis on gymnastics in primary schools; by establishing country health clinics and marriage relations bureaus, and free lunch kitchens for undernourished children, and by regulating the employment of pregnant women. Last year the government built six new tuberculosis sanitariums for urban children, and the army is planning to establish twenty-five, each to accommodate five hundred patients and intended solely for soldiers suffering from relapses.

It is obvious to anyone living in Japan, and to the Japanese themselves, that the standard of living will continue to fall until the war in China is settled. There is little serious suffering, and what there is, is mainly confined to the small-salaried men. In general the rest of the nation is superficially satisfied, but how much further it can see its meager standards reduced is something that must keep its leaders awake at night.

WPA Is Defense

BY FRANK RYHLICK

Washington, January 30

ONCE again the Work Projects Administration is facing its annual fight for life. And this time most of the cards in the deck are stacked against it. The tory junta in Congress is hopeful that before the end of the session the agency will be reduced to little more than a paper organization. This prospect brings a pleased smile to the lips of Messrs. Cox, Woodrum, and Co., who look at the defense program through the small end of a mental telescope and see a vast arsenal of guns and battleships constructed at the expense of human needs and liberties. But it is a matter of grave concern to those in the Capital who believe that under many circumstances a WPA project may prove more important to the defense of democracy than a flying fortress.

Already forming are the economic and political battle lines along which the WPA's future under the defense program will be decided. The complexities of the situation are many, not the least of them being such imperious as the role the United States may play in the war a year from now.

President Roosevelt fired the opening salvo in his budget message with the announcement of a $400,000,000 cut in WPA funds for the 1941-42 fiscal year and the disclosure that he would seek a deficiency appropriation of about the same amount to finance work relief for the balance of the current fiscal year. He asserted that employment expectations more than justify the proposed reduction.

Congressional conservatives promptly replied by attacking the President for not cutting next year's appropriation enough and for requesting too much for this year's deficiency. They proposed to slash the requested deficiency by at least one-half and the appropriation for next year by a minimum of two-thirds. Their rationalization was avidly expressed by the Washington Post in an editorial holding that "with the prospect that the defense program will create millions of jobs in the next two years, we might well reduce the WPA to a skeleton and shift the remaining public relief problem to the states where it belongs." There is more than a chance that something along this line will be done, for the powerful Southern bloc has bedded down with the New Deal only to the extent of supporting its foreign policy and will always coalesce with the Republicans on social issues.

A third position is held by Acting WPA Administrator Howard Hunter. He contends that reemployment during the next fiscal year will make only a small dent in work relief rolls and not even tap the huge waiting list of certified and uncertified eligibles.

Here are the available facts:

President Roosevelt asked that $995,000,000 of his $17,500,000,000 budget be appropriated to WPA for the next fiscal year. It was the first time he had attempted to estimate WPA needs for a full year ahead. WPA received $975,000,000 for the current fiscal year, with the proviso that it could be spent in eight months if necessary. Most of the money will be gone by the end of February. Of the amount requested for next year, about $20,000,000 must be earmarked for miscellaneous obligations, leaving about $975,000,000 for work relief. The effect of spreading this sum over an entire fiscal year would be a cut of $400,000,000.

At his annual budget "seminar" for reporters, the President claimed that the list of those waiting to get on WPA had dropped from nearly 1,000,000 to less than 500,000 in the past six months, and predicted that his budget estimate would care for all unemployed except those who couldn't hold a job anyway. "It will not be necessary," he added, "to use this full amount if the defense program should result in more general employment than is presently indicated."

As of January 8, there were 1,886,824 persons employed by WPA. At the present cost of $64.50 per month per person, including wages, materials, and administrative expenses, an average of 1,300,000 could be employed in the next fiscal year, about 500,000 less than this year's average. However, Acting Administrator Hunter predicts that the monthly cost per man will rise to $70 and possibly $80 because WPA plans to put increasing emphasis on strictly defense projects, such as airports and military roads, on which more must be spent for materials. In other words, between 500,000 and 800,000 workers will have to be pruned from the rolls under the contemplated budget.

Hunter disagrees with the President's statement that the waiting list has been reduced to less than 500,000. He produces WPA records to show there are about 600,000 on waiting lists in states which certify all applicants. He estimates there are nearly 400,000 more in states which do not formally certify applicants until there is a place for them on the rolls.

Various government and private economists have predicted that anywhere from 2,000,000 to 5,000,000 new jobs will be created by the defense program during the coming year. The largest annual increase of the World War era was 2,700,000, but there are so many new factors involved that this figure is of doubtful value now, even as a guide. Hunter says WPA economists anticipate an employment gain of 2,000,000, with approximately 400,000 coming from WPA.

Thus, according to Hunter's figures, WPA rolls would have to be cut at least 500,000 under the new budget, while only 400,000 would be absorbed by private industry. This, presumably, would add another 100,000 to the waiting list, which Hunter says is already close to 1,000,000. Allowing for the general gain in employment, however, WPA would continue to aid about 24 per cent of the unemployed. As one of the liberals in the House observed dryly, 24 per cent from 100 left 76 per cent when he went to school. As this calculation in higher mathematics undoubtedly still holds true, it leaves too many people on various state and federal direct relief programs or without known means of livelihood at an hour when democracy is facing its greatest challenge.

The Federal Security Agency report for January 18 indicated that reemployment had not kept pace with seasonal declines during November. It showed that total federal payments for public assistance and for earnings of persons employed under federal work programs amounted to $281,176,000 for that month, an increase of about 3.4 per cent over the October total of $272,006,000 and a similar increase over November, 1939.

At least as much weight must be given to official WPA statistics as to any others. But if all these figures prove anything, they prove the folly of leaving the problem of unemployment to estimates, predictions, arithmetic, and other such forms of economic crystal-gazing. The mere fact that two such experts on WPA as the President and Mr. Hunter disagree should be a warning of the danger in a small and inflexible appropriation. A small bloc of progressives in Congress has advanced informally the suggestion that enough money be appropriated to take care of the maximum number of unemployed, and that this be spent on a month-to-month basis of actual need. But this will remain little more than a suggestion, unless the Administration and labor are willing to fight.

"Total defense," said President Roosevelt in his budget message, "means more than weapons. It means people of health and stamina, conscious of their democratic rights and responsibilities."

WPA can play an important part in translating the President's words into a program for human defense. It can also contribute to the material defense of the nation, as the record discloses. More than $157,000,000 of WPA funds were earmarked for national defense projects during the first six months of this fiscal year; a total of 772 defense projects was approved. On January 9 over 400,000 workers were assigned to these projects. "For the past five years," Hunter declares, "the WPA has been the nation's front line defense against unemployment. Now it becomes one of the most important forces in the second-line trenches of the nation's defense of democracy. And General George Marshall, Army Chief of Staff, declared recently that "in the great task of preparing for national defense, the WPA has proved itself to be an invaluable aid."

In the Wind

THE Daily Worker has been giving Jan Valtin, author of the best-seller "Out of the Night," the Shmelka Ginsberg treatment accorded General Krivitsky two years ago. Valtin, says the Communist organ, is either an invention of Eugene Lyons and Isaac Don Levine or a character out of the German underworld. What the editors have not said, and may not know, is that their paper published Valtin's picture some years ago.

DOROTHY THOMPSON, whose sensational shift to Roosevelt during the Presidential campaign irked the New York Herald Tribune, will soon move her column over to the liberal New York Post.

IN A RECENT listing of draftees in the New York World-Telegram, only Nelson Rockefeller was dignified with a "Mr." before his name.

SOME HOLLYWOOD musicians, who hoped to escape draft duty, joined a California marine band. Recently the band was ordered to the Philippines for active service with the marine corps stationed in the islands.

GOVERNOR COOPER of Tennessee was asked by a Scripps-Howard reporter in Knoxville if he approved of teachers joining unions. "I think they should be patriotic and not do so," replied the Governor.

NEW YORK State Senator Charles Muzzicato won in the last elections as a regular Republican and also as the candidate of the left wing of the American Labor Party, which means that he received active Communist support. To celebrate his victory a party was given by Carmelo Amoroso, who is associated with the openly fascist Il Grido della Stirpe. Among the more distinguished guests was Gaetano Vecchiotti, Italian consul general in New York.

THE MAYOR of Cambridge, Mass., recently discovered he had no funds for snow removal. He therefore suggested that the townspeople petition God to remove the snow. "The Almighty sends snow," he said, "and, if we have patience enough, He will remove it. He always has." The Mayor also ordered that, when snow threatens, factory whistles are to blow to summon the people to prayer.

AN ENGLISH schoolteacher asked her students who wrote the poem beginning, "Oh, to be in England. . . ." No one answered for a time, but a young Cockney finally broke the silence with "Itler."

WALLACE DEUEL'S ADDRESS on the war situation to the Council on Foreign Relations was reported by a Chicago daily in a brief story that appeared on the society page. One inch was devoted to an account of the speech. Four-and-a-quarter inches were given to a description of the hats of the ladies in the audience, one of which was "a confection of pink flowers and wings."

NEWEST STUNT in the drive to organize Ford is the use of a 1914 "tin lizzie." C. I. O. leaders are driving it through the city of Detroit with placarded suggestions that Ford's labor policy is a couple of decades behind the times.

THE GUARDIANS of political morals who are investigating the socially progressive Rugg textbooks may be interested in these quotations from Fairchild, Furniss, and Buck, the standard economics text at many large colleges, including Yale: ". . . the efficiency of labor is dependent on three factors—race and inheritance, health and energy, training and social environment. . . . A high degree of intelligence, the ability to learn, the ability to persevere are the recognized characteristics of certain races. Inability to receive more than a small amount of instruction or to grasp abstract ideas, fickleness of purpose, and lack of the power of concentration are found in certain other races. . . . Self-interest is the spur which drives the private business man to make his business efficient. To the public official this motive is weak or absent."

IN HIS ARTICLE, Passports to Nowhere, in last week's Nation, Joachim Joesten told of his thirty fellow-refugees on the Japanese liner Ginyo Maru who might, for lack of valid visas, be carried back to Japan and "finally arrive 'home' [Germany] after five months' useless traveling." The American Joint Distribution Committee reports that through its intervention twenty-one of the passengers have been given temporary asylum in Ecuador and none will be returned to Japan.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

A Native at Large

BY JONATHAN DANIELS

Lynching without Bloodshed

NEGROES have obtained jobs in the defense program. Many who have obtained jobs needed them badly in a South in which neither tobacco nor cotton has felt the effects of the boom. One of the stories told for laughter in a crowded military boom town is of a group of Negroes commuting in a second-hand hearse. But while defense has invented no new racial discriminations, it has given the most dramatic demonstration of the disappearance of the Negro skilled craftsman in the South—and beyond the South as well.

There is bitterness—and natural bitterness—among Negro leaders against the scarcely concealed Jim Crow lines in the army and navy. Thoughtful white men in the North and South have spoken sharply about the dangers to democracy in a policy in defense industries which shuts the door in the face of Negro workmen. The unfortunate fact seems to be that such protests come too late. In an America which has been assuring the Negro of more legal rights, in a South which has been growing less and less violent and even, though slowly, more and more equitable in its educational and other public services, the one right of the Negro which has been steadily destroyed has been the basic right to earn a living by the use of his skill. National defense projects are not so much taking that right away from him as they are demonstrating how far that process has already gone.

Every friend of the Negro knows that such a condition is not limited to the South. If it were, there would be no sense or reason in the protests of Lieutenant Governor Charles Poletti as coordinator of the New York State Council of Defense. But in the South it is most striking and most serious. I take as example one Southern state, my own North Carolina. It has been rather proud of itself in matters of race relations, in the justice of its dealings with the Negro third of its people. It has had in its history fewer lynchings than any other state in the South. But in North Carolina something significant is shown in the big body of workers mobilized to build two army camps. In the total number of men given jobs the Negroes have received their proportionate share on a population basis. But among the skilled workers in a state in which nearly a third of the people are colored, only one job in twenty has gone to a Negro.

Is that discrimination in defense? I don't think so—at least it is not merely a discrimination born of the emergency. I wish it were, because then there would be a better and quicker chance of doing something about it. It represents rather, I think, the long process by which not in a crisis but across the years the old-time Negro craftsmen have been decreasing in number and younger Negroes have been barred from the trades. In all the years during which the number of Negro doctors and lawyers, teachers and dentists, has been growing in a segregated all-Negro world, the essential middle class of skilled men has been disappearing. This leaves the race empty of strength in the skills between the bottom and the top. A Negro must be a leader or a laborer. There is hardly a chance for him between the two categories.

More serious than any present discrimination against the Negro is, I think, the showing that the rights of a minority may be effectually denied in a democracy in the very years in which they seem to be growing. They are establishing a graduate school at the North Carolina College for Negroes now. It is needed. But it makes me mad that a Negro may be a Ph.D. but has increasingly less chance to be a plumber. He may be a lawyer with a great deal more ease than he can be an electrician. I am for equal pay for Negro teachers but more concerned about the discrimination which is destroying the Negro barber.

The Negro undoubtedly has special legal rights in the defense program. The country is spending the money, and the Negro is the particular citizen whose rights as citizen the Constitution was amended to protect. Treatment of the Negro in the mobilization of American powers for defense of democracy obviously tests the honesty or the hypocrisy of the democracy we defend. But the discrimination in employment is deeper and sadder than anything involved in legal rights. The skilled Negro laborer whose crafts were a pride of the plantations under slavery, whose work was known and approved in the early years of his freedom in the South, has been all but destroyed. In quietness, often with the aid of craft labor unions, the skilled Negro worker has been lynched. And the body can be found North and South now in long lines of Negroes seeking relief. So far as Negro skill is concerned, what we face now is not discrimination in defense but a murder which has already taken place under democracy.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Notes by the Way

IN THE weeks since the death of Scott Fitzgerald I have read or reread each of the nine books he published. It has been on the whole a depressing experience—partly because one must agree with the glib epitaph assigned to him in the newspaper obituaries: a man of talent who did not fulfil his early promise; and partly for other reasons. To reread Fitzgerald's early books is to be plunged back into the attitudes and ferment of the early twenties; and to feel a little duped. For one is brought up sharply against the fact that in the perspective of 1941, the "disillusion" of the twenties, on which we wasted so much gin and eloquence, seems poignantly youthful, romantic, affirmative—allied with the age of innocence which preceded it rather than with the age of guilt which it prefigured. The gusto with which "This Side of Paradise" and "The Beautiful and Damned" were written was certainly affirmative, though the theme was disintegration; and we have only to remember the joy with which the "lost generation" battered down the standards and taboos of its ancestors, immediate and remote, to recognize that not believing was a driving faith. The "lost generation" gave itself that sentimental and exuberant title because it didn't really believe it was lost—like the small boy who didn't really think there was anything wrong with the watch until he had taken it to pieces. Fitzgerald's rich boys and girls might be going to the dogs but the post-war intellectuals, even Scott Fitzgerald himself, were destroying the past to make way for the future. The outlines of that future were obscured by the blazing light of the October Revolution, but its portent was certainly socialism, freedom, the good life, art, music, love; and it was not far off.

Fitzgerald published his only enduring novel, "The Great Gatsby," in 1925, on the crest of that first wave of disillusion which was a form of belief. This book and a few short stories—I am thinking particularly of The Diamond as Big as the Ritz and May Day—will continue to be relevant because they caught and crystallized the underlying "values" of a period. But the novels and stories which preceded "The Great Gatsby" are for the most part dated by their fatal preoccupation with the sensational surfaces of contemporary life. They seem as quaint, and in the same way, as the evening dresses of 1921. As usual the Saturday Evening Post, with its fabulous prices and its fabulous circulation, exploited his weakness, not his strength. Fitzgerald's very facility for transferring to print the excrescences of contemporary life—combined with the importunities of editors who do not care what they sell as long as it sells—betrayed him into spending far too much of his energy and skill on short stories about glamorous and, today, boring girls, and boys who are not even glamorous.

After 1925, when "The Great Gatsby" was published, Fitzgerald wrote very little. In 1934 he published his fourth and last novel, "Tender Is the Night," a confused exercise in self-pity. In 1935 came a book of stories, "Taps at Reveille." Its title and much of its contents are nostalgic and static.

If I seem brutal in my judgment of Scott Fitzgerald, it is perhaps because my first impulse on laying aside his last book was to set him down as the talented victim of a social generation, between wars, which might also be summed up in the epitaph: A man of talent who did not fulfil his early promise. It is a neat and appealing idea and a case can be made for it. I remember the bitterness and defeat of that moment when we became disillusioned with disillusion as a way of life; when we discovered that the future had been delayed and that the October Revolution was nothing but a heap of Stalinist cinders; when self-pity became the only solution for the insoluble. The external events of twenty years may certainly be cited in extenuation of the failure of Scott Fitzgerald to "fulfil his early promise." But that explanation will not explain to posterity why a Joyce, half-blind and beset by personal tragedy, and not a Fitzgerald could overcome the hazards thrown up by an old world disintegrating into a new; why, even in twice-chaotic America, talents lesser than Joyce but stubborn, have survived.

For this fundamental weakness Fitzgerald cannot be blamed. And it must be said for his integrity and his common sense that he did not accept, so far as I know, any of the substitutes for order which have become current in the past decade. It is reported that he was making a new beginning at serious writing just before he died, so perhaps my judgment, like his death, is premature. But I think it is easy to overrate Fitzgerald's powers. He was so touted in his heyday, and there are so many unfortunate circumstances to explain his failure, that he has become a romantic figure, one of the "sad young men" of his own fictions. Yet one cannot read his books, one after the other, without feeling that his was a fair-weather talent which was not adequate to the stormy age into which it happened, ironically, to emerge.

OF THE thousands of books published every year, the great majority deserve to be forgotten and promptly are. But everyone can cite important books which have been buried so completely under the yearly avalanches of print and the exaggerated claims of "best-sellers" that their existence is known only to the unfortunate authors, the custodians of publishers' stockrooms, and a few loyal readers. The Readers Club, newly launched, has therefore a fruitful field in which to operate. This new club proposes to send to its members, for one dollar a copy, twelve books a year which its committee selects as deserving of new and wider circulation. The committee consists of Clifton Fadiman, Sinclair Lewis, Carl Van Doren, and Alexander Woollcott.

The Readers Club has got hold of an excellent idea. But I must confess I was a little dismayed by one note in its ambitious first announcement. The advertisement starts off by proposing to rediscover some of the "best already-published books"; its first paragraphs describe the venture as a movement and speak with crusading zeal of its intention of rescuing important books from their undeserved obscurity. The anti-climax comes when we read that "Mr. Woollcott has on a number of occasions called your attention to good books. 'Good-bye, Mr. Chips!', for one example, was languishing on its publisher's shelves until Mr. Woollcott told you about it." Mr. Woollcott is a good salesman and it would be less than realistic not to expect to find a good deal of commercial sugar in a concoction designed to be successful. But I hope the elaborate machinery of the Readers Club is not being set up to perpetuate the trivial. That would make the obscurity of the "best already-published books" doubly bitter.

SPEAKING OF the "best already-published books" I have been rereading "The Lives of the Poets" by that well-known literary critic Samuel Johnson. His essay on Milton has a quality which no contemporary account can capture: the quality of a world from which Milton was scarcely a century removed and to which he was still more man than genius. As we read Johnson's testy yet sympathetic account, as of a neighbor whose politics he does not approve but whose ability he recognizes, the writing of "Paradise Lost" becomes for us the actual travail of a human being, blind and beset by the struggles of an earlier age, rather than the creation of a "great poet" remote in time and not quite human. Johnson, as you may remember, took issue with those who had contended that the sales of "Paradise Lost" were shockingly small. The first edition numbered thirteen hundred copies and was sold in two years. But Johnson reminds us that between 1623 and 1664 only two editions of Shakespeare were issued, "which probably together did not make one thousand copies."

HAVING BEEN, as the saying goes, "born and raised" a Mormon, I was interested to see what Maurine Whipple had accomplished in "Giant Joshua" (Houghton Mifflin, $2.75). I found a careful reconstruction, obviously based on conscientious research, of the settlement of a community in Utah by a group of Brigham Young's devoted and hard-working followers. Polygamous family life is given a great deal of attention, and one understands why one of the most frequently sung of Mormon hymns celebrates "Love at Home." But the book is pretty hard going. The fact that Miss Whipple is a pedestrian among writers is largely responsible, but I doubt very much whether even a first-rate novelist could make much out of the Mormon saga in its internal religious, as opposed to its more conventional external pioneering aspects. Joseph Smith was one of the duller prophets and his transcriptions from the "golden plates" were dictated by a heavy-footed spirit. Brigham Young was a superb organizer but there is no mystic excitement to be found in his career or personality. A friend of mine wrote me last summer that he liked Utah so much that he was tempted to settle down and become the T. S. Eliot of the C. J. C. L. D. S. But I'm afraid he would find little grist for his æsthetic or intellectual mill. Mormonism is a practical religion—eccentric but quite guiltless of ecstasy.

I WAS rather touched by a letter which took me to task for my strictures on the characterization of Maria and the love story of Roberto and Maria in "For Whom the Bell Tolls." This "Nation Reader" insists that it was a beautiful and true relation. "I speak so emphatically," he goes on, "because it is an experience I have had recently. If you have not been in real love, you won't know what it is that makes the world move under you, you won't know how it is that as you are in an embrace, you feel that you want to die." I still think—though I would swear that I have been in "real love"—that the affair in "For Whom the Bell Tolls" borders on pulp fiction. My correspondent assures me that he is not a reader of True Confessions and I believe him; but it is quite possible that this view of women and this vernacular of love have become so imbedded in the national consciousness that they have become conventions in the love life even of people who don't read True Confessions. It is a startling thought—but it doesn't make Maria any more real.

Incidentally, I have been reading the highbrow reviews of Hemingway's book. The pretentious solemnity of some of them made me reflect that even in book-reviewing it is a good idea to let the punishment fit the crime. I was particularly struck by Christopher Isherwood's discovery of a whole series of reincarnations in Hemingway's novels. As the ads so truly say, "For Whom the Bell Tolls" has something for everybody.

MARGARET MARSHALL

After Verdun

AFTERMATH. By Jules Romains. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.75.

"VERDUN" was a magnificent epic; "Aftermath" is inevitably an anti-climax. History offered no other choice. In the West, at any rate, it was an anti-climax to be alive. We had been overwhelmed by the crash and blare of a barbaric and mighty orchestra. In the sudden dramatic hush, a small placid voice was heard: "And I always fry mine in butter." For some, the anti-climax took the form of "normalcy"; for others, of "abnormalcy." There was a desperate clutching at the sweets of life, but no genuine joy of living. Jules Romains must have found it easy to recapture that mood: 1938 strangely resembled 1919. But in the ghastly light of the present, the uneasiness, the fatigue, the obscure dread and remorse of two decades before seem shallow, almost futile. So the work, with its tragic background, is curiously light in tone. It is neither frank comedy nor savage satire, but a series of delicate, amusing, slightly repellent, and slightly disquieting caricatures.

The hero of the second part, our old friend Jallez, offers a charming ironical self-portrait of the Normalien (Normale is the glorious premier graduate school in France, and therefore in the world.) Everybody is delighted with Jallez—the shrewd Bishop of Digne, society ladies ripening for a fall, a little newspaper vendor in Nice. Above all, he is well pleased with himself; with the dollars in his pocket—real American dollars; with his resplendent imperial-and-royal dress suit; with his darling sport ensemble ("I had chosen a smallish soft felt hat with a narrow brim in preference to a cap which never suits me well"). He patronizes the older generation in the person of the new academician Allory, and he despises the younger in the person of Vorge. When he condescends to seduce a very young working girl, he will, virtuously, have us know that he has no snobbish prejudices: "The thought-processes of the 'common people' are not always and necessarily elementary." Whether he describes—for American readers whom he scorns—the putrescence of post-war Vienna, or announces his willingness to lend the League of Nations a hand, it is always with the same ineffably superior smile. He is an insufferable young ass, and fast losing the excuse of youth.

Another small voice is heard in the hush—that of Vorge, a young Dadaist poet. Romaines draws him purely and simply as a poseur, a faint distant disciple of Gilles de Rais, Byron, Oscar Wilde, des Esseintes, and most of all as a blurred caricature of Baudelaire. He is an adolescent indulging in horrific make-believe. He needs, in order to fool himself, the faith and admiration of his "gang." His one fear is to be treated as a kid, for then his whole world of silly romancing would dissolve. To impress his public and himself, he stages a Baudelairean masterpiece—the rape of a woman after strangling her. This, at any rate, is tragic reality. But Fate smiles scornfully; the woman revives, the Baudelairean poem turns into a "Droll Tale," and the two pseudo-aesthetes become excellent friends.

The third hero in this volume is Quinette, the quiet, bearded, soft-spoken bookbinder who years ago committed 'the perfect crime,' gratuitously, for art's sake, in the purest André Gide spirit. In later volumes, Quinette took to killing women, and readers exclaimed: "Why, Quinette is turning into Landru!"—an all-too-real assassin of the time. In this book, the historical Landru affair breaks into the headlines. And now it is Quinette who cries: "Why, this Landru is a regular Quinette!" He is beginning to worry about his identity. Are there two of them, miraculously alike, or a single mind in two bearded bodies? His confusion grows to the point of madness when Landru is charged with killing one of Quinette's victims. His head reels; he is tempted to go to the police and ask them: "Tell me, in Heaven's name: am I I, or am I Landru?"

This gruesome fantasy on the old Hoffmannesque theme, Doppelgängerie, is in the purest Jules Romaines vein. He has always loved a hoax (cf. "Les Copains") and he has even evolved a profound theory of "creative mystification." Dr. Knock the quack creates the diseases he diagnoses. Le Trouhadec invents a city, Donogoo-Tonka, and lo! the city springs into existence. It is a form of romantic irony. The poet explores the very limits of the possible (like Vorge with his 365 intercommunicating apartments) but he is ready to add with a disarming smile: "It is a good story anyway."

That element exists in the solemn spookery of "Quand le navire," and in the learned psycho-physiological disquisitions of Dr. Farigoule on extra-retinian vision. It exists also in Abbé Mionnet's mission to Rome, in Laulerque's romantic "Organization." There is more than a touch of it in "The Seven Mysteries of Europe." To be at the same time an epic and dramatic writer of undeniable power, a "man of good will" in the noblest sense of the term, and also a pince-sans-rire, a pokerface mystifier—such is the paradoxical achievement of Jules Romaines.

ALBERT GUÉRARD

Now It Can Be Told

MARK TWAIN IN ERUPTION. Edited by Bernard DeVoto. Harper and Brothers. $3.75.

OUT of material intended for Mark Twain's "Autobiography," but not used, Mr. DeVoto has produced a remarkably lively and instructive book. It contains about half the left-overs, in as effective a form as first-rate editing can achieve. As for the other half, Mr. DeVoto's excellent preface convinces you it was better left out. Here is a book in which Twain, having his say in the knowledge that it would not be made public until after his death, speaks without compunctions about the world he lived in and the people he met. It is no gentle outpouring, as you may judge from the title.

If brutal frankness and enraged commentary were enough, these opinions from beyond the grave would indeed belong among the great examples of self-revelation. But as Mr. DeVoto says, it was only in certain fiction, like "The Mysterious Stranger," that Mark Twain could nakedly confess his innermost feelings and thoughts: when he chose an overtly personal form of expression, he might be blunt and scathing, but the final revelation was withheld. For one reason, his instinct was stronger than his conscious desire; for another, he knew his emotions far better than he knew what precipitated them. The most interesting things about "Mark Twain in Eruption" are the least intentional. It is clear that while Twain had strong feelings about the human race, he had only a partial perspective on it; and that while he consciously arrived at one philosophy of life, he never completely got rid of another.

Here is a book (most of it dictated between 1906 and 1908) about America, about people, about Twain and his career. It is for the most part a gossipy and anecdotal book, about equally filled with tart and lively humor, a somewhat querulous dissent, and a feeling of outrage. There are some affectionate memories, but it is largely a blast at things and people as they are, full of dislikes and distrusts, of a sense of ubiquitous treachery and impending disaster. Yet the mood of the book as a whole is not one of violent protest but of inveterate cynicism. Twain's final role is rather that of a healthy misanthrope than of an embattled satirist—simply because he did not care enough about things. His never-ending discoveries of how small man is, and how vain and vicious and corrupt, produced disgust, no doubt; but there is a kind of satisfaction in the disgust, almost a kind of pleasure. His exposures pull people down, with no desire ever to lift them up; and he was so absorbed in what facts he found that he never sought very profoundly to learn their causes.

Or perhaps it was all much simpler than that: Twain was pulled two ways, by being a nineteenth-century American as well as a great individual. He might expose and deride the successful, he might even expose and deride "success"; but from childhood he had been taught to believe in the gospel of success, and he never in any philosophic sense achieved better standards of his own. He did not revolt: he reviled. He could not be, obviously, a credulous Republican, or a complacent celebrity, or a flag-waving American. But what (for all his denunciations) did he become except a cynical Republican, a joking celebrity, an American to whom Europe failed to teach very much? He attacks the Republican oligarchy—whom he calls "the monarchy"—on page after page, then remarks quietly: "I shall vote for the continuance of the monarchy." The trouble was he was muddled by his own insights into things as they were because he had no real vision—and possibly no real concern—about things as they might be. He never perceived how paralyzing it is to discover what is wrong without knowing what is right.

There was much more to Mark Twain than this, but somehow this is what strikes you most strongly in reading this book. Much of it, taken casually, is merely amusing; most of it is so personal in tone that it seems at times to be settling old scores rather than passing judgment. The judgments, indeed, are too severe without being severe enough. With his fundamental loathing of human nature, it is men's natures that Twain seems to be reviling rather than their values. He sees the fool and fakir in Carnegie, but not what Carnegie represented in modern life. He makes Teddy Roosevelt seem a dangerous wild man rather than a dangerous product of civilization. Even corruption is regarded more as a personal than as a social evil. Twain thought the world was base, not that things had debased it; and such a feeling produced a cynicism that might have its corrosive uses, but that ate into Twain as well as into his victims.

I ought certainly to add how much fun this book is. Twain erupting over Marie Corelli or Senator Clark or Leopold II, or describing his California days or his London dinner parties, or encountering the young Winston Churchill, or telling how he lost fortunes backing all kinds of contraptions, only to balk at backing the telephone—it isn't necessary to add that one does not come upon such good reading too often.

LOUIS KRONENBERGER

Nation Readers are invited to a Conference Luncheon on DEFENDING AND ADVANCING SOCIAL GAINS

Saturday, FEBRUARY 15, 1 P. M.

Hotel Commodore, New York

SPEAKERS:

DONALD E. MONTGOMERY PHILIP H. VAN GELDER
ROGER BALDWIN NORMAN THOMAS
BISHOP FRANCIS J. McCONNELL, Chairman

TICKETS: $1.50

Round Table Discussion 10 A. M. - 12:30 noon on defense of consumer, labor, civil liberties and on economic security by Congressman Jerry Voorhis, Wallace Sayre, Abraham Epstein, Nathaniel Minkoff, Edith Ayres and others.

Round Table Fee, 50 cents.

Send reservations at once to

LEAGUE FOR INDUSTRIAL DEMOCRACY
Harry W. Laidler, Executive Director
112 East 10th Street New York City

Don't Miss An Issue!

To keep THE NATION coming regularly

just fill out and sign this form

THE NATION ■ 55 FIFTH AVE. ■ NEW YORK

Please enter my subscription for the period indicated below. I inclose $_____

☐ One Year $5

☐ Two Years $8

☐ Three Years $11

Special Introductory Offer
to new subscribers only

☐ 13 Weeks $1

Name

Street

City

State

Extra postage per year: Foreign and Canadian, $1.00

2-8-41

A Study of Multiple Births

MULTIPLE HUMAN BIRTHS. By Horatio Hackett Newman. Doubleday, Doran. $2.50.

THE problem of multiple birth has had much publicity recently in connection with the Dionne quintuplets. Professor Newman has made this problem his own for many years, and the present book bears the mark of the thoroughness of his study. Twins and other multiple births present a unique method of attacking the problem of heredity and environment. Moreover, the study of Siamese twins and related phenomena furnishes some information on the nature of intra-uterine growth. Dr. Newman outlines for us to what extent such studies have added to the knowledge of human development.

As we ascend the evolutionary scale, we find that the number of progeny becomes increasingly smaller; the lowering of the reproductive rate is offset, however, by the care taken to preserve the offspring to maturity. Twins are therefore of great importance because at one step they double the birth rate. They are apparently far more frequent than one would imagine. "One out of every forty-four babies born is a twin," writes Dr. Newman. Triplets are much rarer and quadruplets, of course, rarer yet.

The number of twins to be found in the population and their lack of prominence in the professional, political, and artistic fields suggest that the disadvantage of the twin at birth is carried into his later life. The natal death rate of twins is much higher than that of single births. This is caused in part by unfavorable intra-uterine conditions, not the least of which is mechanical crowding due to the upright posture of the human species.

There are, of course, two kinds of twins, those brought about by the fertilization of two separate eggs and those resulting from the subdivision of a single egg after fertilization. The first kind are merely coincidental brothers and sisters. The second kind are exact duplicates with respect to chromosomal origin. These identical twins present a fascinating study to the environmentalist. In the earlier days of Soviet Russia an immense laboratory was started in which hundreds of twins were observed with great care and their likenesses and differences recorded. These experiments were unfortunately abandoned before much definitive work had come out. From Dr. Newman's study, however, this much seems clear: as a class, identical twins have a telepathic communication with each other that normal brothers and sisters do not possess. Indeed, Dr. Newman proposed identical twins to Dr. Rhine as crucial subjects to test the theory of extra-sensory perception.

This book is noteworthy for another reason: it is an official publication of the American Association for the Advancement of Science. In sponsoring a series of popular books by capable authors the Association is performing one of the functions for which it was organized. The very existence of the book implies the recognition of the inter-relation between science and society. Dr. Newman has set an excellent pace in this initial volume of the series.

HUGH H. DARBY

Tales of China at War

IN CHINA NOW. By Winifred Galbraith. William Morrow and Company. $2.50.

A GREAT many books have been written about China in the past few years, but none has been more entertaining than Miss Galbraith's volume of brief portraits. Miss Galbraith has lived in China for some fifteen years and has come to know and appreciate the people with whom she has lived. Although there are points in her otherwise mature pen sketches at which she reveals her missionary background, the latter portions of the book, which tell of the impact of the war in vivid, personal terms, are free of this emphasis. The book does not deal with actual front-line fighting or guerrilla activities. Most of the sketches have as their setting the city of Changsha, which has never been occupied by the Japanese. But because the setting is an interior city, we are able to see the impact of the war on Chinese life even more clearly than if the locale had been the occupied areas.

All sectors of Chinese life are covered by one or another of the sketches. We see the war successively through the eyes of peasants, merchants, bandits, soldiers, refugees, Chinese Christians, old women, students, spies, and many others. The stories are all true ones, with names and places changed so as to protect individuals. In some cases the disguise is more apparent than real, for it is not difficult to recognize certain well-known foreigners in some of the stories. Only a person of wide experience, keen powers of observation, and unusual ability as a story-teller could have achieved the scope of this book, its vividness and understanding, while limiting herself to stories from actual life. The results of Miss Galbraith's rather unusual technique are all that could be desired. No one who has experienced the burning of Changsha through the eyes of Lima or Li Han will ever forget or condone this horrible blunder. It is, in a word, the sort of book that makes you feel you have lived through some of the most stirring events of present-day history. And yet the tragedy is so interspersed with humor and ordinary human frailty that—as in life itself—it becomes quite bearable.

MAXWELL S. STEWART

THE NATION

Franz Hoellering

"...a historical document of the first rank, a biography, an adventure story, and in places, so it seems, a brisk novel. It is all these in one, and in addition the structure and writing are excellent..."

752 Pages. $3.50

Approaching 200,000

Jan Valtin's

Out of The Night

AN ALLIANCE BOOK

DECISION

Editor: KLAUS MANN

BOARD OF EDITORIAL ADVISORS

Sherwood Anderson
W. H. Auden
Edward Benes
Stephen Vincent Benét
G. A. Borgese
Ernest Boyd
Julian Green
Horace Gregory
Frank Kingdon
Freda Kirchwey
Thomas Mann
Somerset Maugham
Robert Nathan
Vincent Sheean
Robert E. Sherwood
Stefan Zweig

ASSOCIATE EDITORS:

Alan Hartmann
Christopher Lazare

DECISION'S February issue is now on sale at first class newsstands and in book stores. Articles by Thomas Mann, Somerset Maugham and A MODERN GREEK ANTHOLOGY, are featured in this issue.

THE reading public's widespread demand for DECISION is proof that DECISION meets the day's most vital need—a cultural solidarity among readers and the creative artists and thinkers throughout America and abroad. DECISION is not confined by any exclusive ideology nor subservient to any political group.

A WORD TO THE WISE . . .

We have on hand only a small amount of our first issue copies. We are servicing subscribers with this first (valuable) number and will continue to do so for the short while until our supply is exhausted. Among the galaxy of authors whose articles (stories, essays, poems, reviews, etc.) appear in our first number are Sherwood Anderson, W. H. Auden, Max Ascoli, Stephen Vincent Benét, Henry Bernstein, Ernest Boyd, Jean Cocteau, Jannet Planner, Horace Gregory, Aldous Huxley, Christopher Isherwood, Frank Kingdon and Heinrich Mann.

DECISION, 141 East 29th Street, N. Y. C.

Enroll me as a subscriber as checked below:

OUR OFFERS FOR SPECIAL INTRODUCTORY READING SEASON RATES.

☐ 1 year $3.00 (you may $1.20)

☐ 3 mos. $2.00 (you may $1.80)

I enclose $.....

NAME

ADDRESS

CITY..... STATE.....

IN BRIEF

ALWAYS THE LAND. By Paul Engle.
Random House. $2.50.

An Iowa idyll in which Mr. Engle has stirred together equal portions of young love, high-spirited horses, horse guys, and arguments over government crop loans, to produce a fragrant but not very significant potpourri. To those who languish in the soot-laden air and gasoline fumes of city streets, the book offers a pleasant three-hour escape among the odors of alfalfa hay and buckwheat cakes, to say nothing of more robust whiffs from barn and manure pile.

THE REMARKABLE ANDREW. By Dalton Trumbo. J. B. Lippincott Company. $2.50.

The author of that gruesome memento mori called "Johnny Got His Gun" has tied one hand behind his back and tossed out a jaunty little fantasy about the ghost of General Andrew Jackson intervening to save an honest young bookkeeper from the machinations of a crooked political clique in a small Western town. Aside from being a rather thinned-out version of "The Devil and Daniel Webster," it gets in some easy and not very telling cracks at political corruption and at our present foreign policy. It all adds up to nothing more than an entertaining little scherzo.

DRAMA

Darkness Visible

"LADY in the Dark" (Alvin Theater) is a superlatively "good show." The fact is indeed so sensationally obvious that standing room was already being sold at the second performance and the safest course for a reviewer might be to commit himself no further and to let it go at that. But when a chronic spectator finds himself, as I certainly did, following the progress of a "good show" with a great deal more than merely professional interest, he is justified in concluding that the goodness of the show is at least of some novel sort. And that far I must let myself go, even to begin.

First of all, and as Broadway prophets would say, "Lady in the Dark" "has everything." In Moss Hart, who wrote the book, and in Ira Gershwin, who wrote the lyrics, it has two experienced authors with a long record of success behind them. In the composer, Kurt Weill, it has a musician whose talents are at least beginning to be recognized in this country and in Gertrude Lawrence it has a star who, besides being extremely popular, is a superb trouser, willing and able to do everything that practiced technical skill plus great personal charm can do. In addition, there is the imaginative choreography by Albertina Rasch, and some very ingenious as well as smooth-running stage machinery. Finally, someone, it is not quite clear who, has contributed faultless showmanship which has so coordinated everything that the maximum of effect is achieved from each of the elements and one gets, not a series of stunts, but a whole.

You may think that a psychoanalysis, taken seriously and, as it were, acted out on the stage, is an odd subject for even an unconventional musical comedy. You may also think that the scheme by which straight dramatic scenes in the business office of the heroine or the office of her psychiatrist alternate with fantastic musical interludes representing her dreams, is a scheme sure to result in either simple awkwardness or something absurdly pretentious. But if you do think this last you are wrong. The transitions are smooth and come to be expected; the actual content of the fantastic scenes is curiously evocative. They employ certain methods and materials which seem familiar enough parts of a current theatrical tradition but they give to them a subtle and imaginative twist which somehow freshens and almost transforms them. I do not mean to suggest that these scenes are in any sense pretentious or solemn. I do not mean that intellectually one takes them seriously. But I do mean that, artistically, they are astonishingly right, that they achieve more completely than any recent musical comedy or operetta I can remember that mysterious thing called style, and that the style includes both satiric and psychological overtones which give new meaning to otherwise conventional routines. Take, for example, the first of the ballet-pantomime scenes—that in which the heroine dreams herself a reigning belle showered with fantastic luxuries by hosts of suitors and the subject of a song which begins, "The Girl of the Moment! The Smile of the Hour! The Charm of the Week!" In broad outline this "number" and the "routine" through which it is developed are familiar parts of the technique of the review as practiced during the last few decades. In fact, Cole Porter, let us say, would probably regard them as old-fashioned. Yet as here employed the whole takes on a new meaning, thanks to the satiric touch and to the even subtler psychological insight referred to before. Or take the uninhibited ballad called "The Saga of Jenny." Ethel Merman might almost sing it straight in one of her rowdy climaxes, but as superbly performed by Miss Lawrence it is parody plus a touch of hysterical desperation which makes it play its part in the development of the theme of the play as a whole.

In fact, though the fantastic scenes might be expected to be the most difficult to manage they are actually the most interesting parts of the evening. Capably as the straight drama is written and capably as it is acted, especially by Miss Lawrence who switches styles with amazing virtuosity, I am not sure that the play merely as a play is anything more than very slick stage writing. Certainly it is in the scenes where playwright, composer, choreographer, and performer combine that the most striking effects are achieved, and it is not easy to analyze out the contributions of each. That all do contribute I am quite sure, but I am inclined to suspect that the music is the most important and probably most thoroughly original element.

Unfortunately I am not equipped to discuss it as music and can only say that it struck me as more interesting and more effective than any I have heard in the theater for a very long time. In one scene—that of the circus—I thought I recognized unmistakably the idiom of Mr. Weill's score for "The Three Penny Opera," an idiom which I had not discovered in any of the other music he has written since coming to America and one which, indeed, I do not detect in most of the present usually less obviously acid score. Beyond that I can say only that it seems to me wonderfully adapted to its purpose. Whether or not any of the songs will be hits I do not know. Neither do I know whether or not the music would be interesting in a concert program. But I do know that as an accompaniment to an action it is delightfully unhackneyed, expressive, and evocative.

Though Miss Lawrence is the star and shines very brightly, indeed, it would be unfair not to mention an unusually good cast which includes Bert Lytell and Margaret Dale as well as Danny Kaye who deserves special praise both for his performance as the photographer in the dramatic scenes and for various contributions to the fantasies. All in all, and to return to the beginning, "Lady in the Dark" is a good show and something more. In fact, I think I should even be inclined to call it "an interesting experiment" if that phrase had not come to be reserved almost exclusively for occasions upon which "experiment" really means "regrettable error in judgment" and "interesting" really means that everybody was bored stiff.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

ART

All-American

THE pioneer Tribal Arts show of 1931 marked a turning point in the appreciation of United States Indian arts. An effort was made to assess their æsthetic value rather than to tolerate them as scientific specimens or as tourist curios. The show now current at the Museum of Modern Art finds Americans stranded on their own continent in recoil from a beset world; the patriotic angle may well weigh the scales in favor of these hundred-per-centers of American art, beside whom even Thomas Craven's roster of Americans acquires an immigrant flavor. However genuine our pride in the æsthetic achievements of the Indian, it should be tinged with introspective compunction: some of the objects now on exhibit were "collected" by our War Department, presumably as spoils, while the cover of the extensive catalogue is a shield design that pictures a bear charging fearlessly into the thick of a salvo of United States bullets.

Lest we be accused of sighing for bygone days, let us add that the coming of the white man had also its beneficent influence. The sculptors of the Northwest boomed into a renaissance with the importation of metal tools; to the paleface the plains hunter owes his horse, the forest Indian his beadwork, the Navajo his silversmithing.

That a museum dedicated to modern art stages this show is no haphazard event, for Indian crafts are one of the sources of our own modern style. Amédée Ozenfant, whom I met at the opening, suggested mischievously that Indians were imitating Picasso; but it is a fact that Chilkat blankets were admired by early Cubists as the living tradition on to which their own plastic inventions were grafted, while the distorted spirit masks of the Eskimos, conceived in visions induced by fasting or by drugs, receive today the praise of orthodox surrealists. The élite of each succeeding generation may flirt with what in the vast and complex body of aboriginal art approximates most its fancy of the day, yet, at its best, it far transcends such modish standards.

As is the case in our own art history, where the golden age lies in the past, Indian Michelangelos have long been dead. Unlike its modern counterpart, struggling in a morass of folklore, prehistoric Indian sculpture exhibits a beauty of form strikingly set forth against an unfocused background of ritual pageants that no explorer scooped. Its might is at its best in the group of eastern pipes for the most part made from hardened clay, a material that suggests in spite of direct carving the caress of the modeling thumb. Some artists, relying on texture and geometric shape alone, root the cylinder of the bowl into the leaf shape of the stem at an angle evolved through centuries of use; such specimens match in their functional purity that other great civilized achievement—an English briar pipe. For those less puristically inclined, pipes adorned with animal shapes combine uniquely the observed vivaciousness of animal life, the Egyptian dignity of monolithic masses, with details of minute refinement; for example, the interplay of crossed wing tips and tail feathers on the back of a crested duck, or the wet ripple of muscles on the otter catching its prey.

For the critic who can measure an artist's size only as he matches his skill, Greek-like, against the proportions of the human body, a pipe from Adena Mound erects a chanting warrior whose eight inches of height have been enlarged by the impresario of the show into a photo-mural of heroic size without losing a mite of its compact humanness. A Mexican influence has been advanced for this piece, but it shows none of the loss of power that provincial art is bound to show, so far-flung from its center of civilization.

All Indian fine arts came into being as side-products of some utilitarian instincts, if one postulates the practical validity of religious instinct. Owing to this lack of cleavage between fine and applied arts, one is dragged imperceptibly in this exhibition from the consideration of the sublime to a limbo of moose-hair embroidery, porcupine-quill mosaics, ribbon appliqué, that prove the squaw a potential subscriber to the Ladies' Home Companion.

Indian artists have an amphibian gift of moving at ease among abstract as well as realistic pursuits. In its rare bonafide examples, realism is used for purposes of farce, fable, or history, but most often is a not undignified pandering to the taste of the paleface. Objects classed by our standards as great examples of Indian art—the bear woman suckling her child, the mask of a maiden, the dancing medicine-man—were pot-boilers in the eyes of their makers. The deepest thrust of the Indian mind, the language it chooses to exalt its clan pride, wield magic power, or address the gods, is the language of abstract art: thus the Zuni amuse their children with dolls that are acceptable sculptures by our standards, while the fearful image of their war-god is hewn in such austere primitive style that we despise it as childish; the Eskimo humors his baby with teething-toys that we treasure as ivory statuettes, while his religious masks, carved to perpetuate lofty visions, remain for us shapeless.

One must discard such labels as realistic and abstract if one is to share further the Indian point of view. To illustrate without departing from the organic world: the "abstract" art of the Northwest is more deeply realistic than is the formula for reality in our art. The Haida painter splits the creature he paints and exhibits its innards too—heart, liver, stomach. For not only has he seen the bear and the whale, but he has hunted both, has killed, quartered and cooked them, and his painting sums up the knowledge acquired through all senses and his brain; while the white man is satisfied that he represents a creature when all he describes is its outer bag of skin. One is reminded of the visitor who asked Picasso, apropos of a "still-life with fish," how the fish kept while the work was in progress and of the artist's admission, "I ate it first."

Unfamiliar as we are with the Indian mode of life, our natural reaction to this show is to stress its picturesque and romantic connotations; but the Indian artist manages to assert his greatness within an accepted frame of tribal norms. The pipe-carver, basket-weaver, or sand-painter does not seem to suffer from the infirmity of our own artists who strengthen their personality insofar as they weaken the thread between their work and tradition. The spiritual content that loads the Indian work, a manual perfection deepened by technical impediments, the balance obtained between objective conventions and the personal quota of individual genius, mark the attitude of the Indian artist as one of classical integrity. It is on such a plane that this show may bear valid fruits, rather than in a shop-window revival of feather-work and leather tooling.

Though the choice of individual specimens is impeccable, one would wish to admire with more confidence the murals from Awatovi; the original fragment exhibited, as sensitive as a Paul Klee, does not jibe with the cocksureness of the restoration.

The show is staged with ingratiating versatility, even if inverted lighting increases the Hallowe'en note of the collection of masks, rather than furthers an understanding of their beautiful carving. While most will justly delight in the surprises strewn in their path, the serious student may grumble a bit as he is made to grope his way through dim-lit detours. But serious students have already visited the Museum of Natural History and the Heye Museum of the American Indian, where many of the treasures exhibited here managed, up to now, to escape popular adulation.

JEAN CHARLOT

MUSIC

NOT long ago I was playing records for a pianist who is one of the finest musicians I know; and at one point, without telling him what it was, I started the first side of Gieseking's recording of the Beethoven Piano Concerto No. 4. He listened expectantly until the piano's phrase that opens the work began to emerge; with the first chords his face darkened; and almost before the phrase had ended he jumped up and demanded angrily: "Who plays in that terrible way? The music is not right with such staccatos"; and rushed to the piano to show me what the phrase sounded like when it was "right."

His reaction, I dare say, will appear excessive to some people—the people who probably find my comments on Stokowski's performances just as wildly extravagant. These people cannot believe that a performance on the Gieseking or Stokowski level of competence can be that bad; or that the differences between the performances of a Schnabel and a Gieseking, a Gieseking and a Horowitz, a Toscanini and a Stokowski are that considerable—enough to make one performance so much better or worse than another; or that there are any criteria for such judgments. But they would not express these doubts about differences in ways of speaking a Shakespeare sonnet or one of Hamlet's monologues. They bring to poetry an understanding that each arrangement of words constitutes a form in which a large part of the meaning of the poem is implicit; that the process of speaking the poem is a process of giving it one physical form or another in actual sound, and in this way one meaning or another; that the process may distort the form and falsify the meaning. And they bring to the particular poem a precise idea of what it is and what it is not, what it means and what it does not, in what spoken physical form it has this meaning and in what form it has not. It is because they bring all this to poetry that they know one way of speaking the poem can be better or worse than another, and recognize better or worse when they hear it; and it is because they don't bring the same understanding and knowledge to music that they can't tell better from worse in musical performance and don't believe anyone else can.

But the musician I have mentioned did bring to Gieseking's treatment of the opening phrase of Beethoven's concerto the understanding that the arrangement of sounds in a musical phrase constitutes a form in which the content of the phrase is implicit; that the process of performing the phrase is a process of giving it one physical form or another in actual sound, and in this way one meaning or another. He did bring a precise idea of what this particular phrase was and what it was not, what it meant and what it did not, in what physical form it had this meaning and in what form it had not. And he was angered by a form which—with its swift, light, detached chords—destroyed the spaciouly meditative quality that he thought the phrase should have, and that it does have, for example, in Schnabel's recorded performance. And for the same reasons I am angered by a Stokowski performance of Bach that gives the work a distorted physical form in which it acquires the feverish excitement of the Bacchanale from "Tannhäuser."

There are no Stokowskis acting Shakespeare; and if the public brought to music what it brings to poetry and drama there would be no Stokowski playing Bach. Because it doesn't, the public which understands that a man may speak the lines of Hamlet with sounds that are exciting in themselves but inadequate or wrong or absurd for the effect and meaning of the lines, does not understand this about Heifetz or Horowitz or Stokowski playing Beethoven. For myself, I am bound to marvel at the beauty of the sounds that Heifetz or Horowitz or Stokowski produces with his instrument, but I am equally bound to note that the meaning conveyed by these sounds is not the meaning Beethoven has for me. And if, on the other hand, Toscanini's recent performances of Verdi's Requiem and Beethoven's Missa Solemnis were great performances for me, it was not merely because of tonal marvels like the supple radiance and sheen of the choral sonorities that he produced with the superb Westminster Choir ("They're a fine chorus," as some one remarked, "but they're not that good"). Certainly I had ears for these things, and emotions for what was behind them—that completely personal and wonderful feeling of Toscanini's for the plastic quality of musical sounds. But what made these great performances for me was the effect and meaning which the two works had in the tonal embodiments that Toscanini gave them.

And so with Mitropoulos. What excited the New York Philharmonic audience to cheers, in a performance of Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, was his demonstration of power—power over the minds and wills and bodies of the Philharmonic players, which he demonstrated by exerting power over the music: with fp's on a single chord augmented to explosive ffffpppp's, with crescendos and decrescendos over a measure or two augmented to violent expansions and contractions of sonority, with phrasing that twisted the shape of the phrase. Certainly one wants a conductor to have competence in conducting; but this competence—like competence in manipulating a violin or a piano—is not properly an end in itself; it is the means for the achievement of the proper end of musical performance—a form in actual sound in which the piece of music has the meaning and effect it should have. If that Philharmonic audience had brought to the performance an idea of what Beethoven's Fourth Symphony is and what it means and what it must sound like to have that meaning, it would have realized that Mitropoulos—in effect using the work as something with which to demonstrate his virtuosity—was distorting its form and falsifying its character and meaning. As for me, since my only interest in a conductor—whether it is Toscanini or Mitropoulos—is in what meaning the music has when he conducts it, and since I have an idea of what Beethoven means, I don't want Mitropoulos around conducting Beethoven.

B. H. HAGGIN

Letters to the Editors

Who Owns the Future?

Dear Sirs: The only proof Max Lerner brings forward to show that socialism and fascism cannot be the same thing is that "if they are, millions of blasted lives have had no meaning." Unfortunately, history has a long record of lives blasted for false or unproven beliefs. Lerner insists on using the term socialism only for the society he and many others of us would like to see established. Dennis insists that one must use terms to describe actualities, not aspirations or dreams. This is not, it seems to me, Dennis's "clever strategy," as Lerner thinks, but his realism. Socialism in practice, i. e., state ownership or control of the means of production and distribution has proved in Russia and Germany to mean a party tyranny, persecution of all dissenters, terror, and the concentration camp, and an end to trade unions and all other safeguards of workers' rights and everyone else's rights and liberties. The fact that this is not what socialists the world over desired does not prove that it is not socialism. We can still believe that a democratic form of socialism is possible and work to achieve it, but we never shall if we treat fascism as an accident or as the result of the peculiar wickedness of a man or of a nation.

When Lerner says that the snags which prevent the establishment of a democratic form of socialism lie in the realm of politics ("in the realm of class resistance and press distortions and in the realm of power"), he is begging the question. It is precisely these snags in the realm of politics which so far history has shown cannot be unraveled except by compulsion and fear. The liberal socialists failed to unravel them in the post-war years; the Nazis have done it by compulsion in preparation for war, the British are doing it under the stimulus of fear of defeat. That fear is producing in Britain the whole array of strategic controls of the economic system which we must call national socialism, since it is socialist and certainly not international. So far the steps taken in Britain have been taken by consent because, as Dennis truly says, war is the great unifier. But can we be sure that the capitalist wolf and the labor lamb will lie down together once they have no lion to fear? Once the national unity engendered by the war is destroyed how are the "snags" Lerner speaks of to be dealt with except by compulsion—whether the snags be the opposition of capitalists to surrendering their economic power or the opposition of wage earners to surrendering the right to strike, or the right to starve rather than work under any conditions the state decrees? Schuman, while retaining his liberal values, faces the problem; and it is only by facing it that we can hope to solve it. FREDA UTLEY

New York, January 28

Housing Economics

Dear Sirs: The dynamic side of capitalism is its machine production of consumption goods. Its static side is its handicraft production of "long-term investments," chiefly in the form of land improvements (building construction). The latter is the part of capitalism we inherited from our feudal forbears, and it is the dying part. The feudal formula that made the manipulation of land and credit easy rested on the agglomeration of populations for safety within walled areas where land was scarce, and on the fact that the low-income masses were compelled to live in forms of shelter so costly as to drain off much of their earnings in rent and interest. So long as the alternative was death by violence, the consumer paid his 10 per cent interest per month and up to 40 per cent of his income in rent without complaint. But as mass freedom, leisure, and mobility increased, the very basis of the feudal formula was undermined.

When this formula collapsed in 1933 and it became necessary to revive confidence in it, we began to plaster a prettier façade over small bits of the spreading area of urban decay. Liberal magazines quickly fell in behind this sentimental and wholly vicious plan. Why vicious? The investment per family in slum areas for shelter and appurtenances is already $15,000. With slum clearance, public works appurtenances, and cost of amortization, this investment is doubled. How amortize an investment of $30,000 per family from an average yearly family income of $1,200? It can't be done under socialism or any other system.

Because the funds that private investors used to put safely into congestedarea construction now go sour there, even with 100 per cent federal subsidies and 80 per cent mortgage guaranties, the private investor is acquiring the habit of loaning his excess funds to the government to make work. The most exciting kind of made work, the kind for which funds are most easily appropriated and soonest spent, the kind that makes us all shout for the lifting of debt limitations, is military made work. This is the kind of work people are doing in every nation where the old feudal formula is being retained. In Italy and in Germany a program of public works shifted inevitably into one of military made work so designed that someone else will have to pay the bill. England and America are now following suit.

The design of shelter lies at the very core of the world problems now confronting us. All design tends to conform to the pattern of the successful man's house. Once this pattern falls behind changing ways of work, war, leisure, and mobility, all design soon falls behind. Then private investments go sour. Hoarding compels made work. Military programs quickly become necessary. The victory or defeat of Italy, Germany, England, and America will do nothing to solve this problem except as the bomber effectively drives a final nail into the coffin of the feudal formula: land and money monopolies built on pushing the masses into houses many times too costly in areas where land is scarce.

No matter what the form of political control, our machines will compel us to industrialize shelter design—reduce the home increasingly to a form of semi-durable consumption goods owned by its occupant. For a generation the motor car has been a small portion of the total shelter of a majority of American families. The motor car is shelter that has allied its design with the dynamic side of capitalism. Today the small boy defines "home" as the place where everyone waits for dad to get back with the car. But not in New York, the place of all others still in the grip of the feudal formula.

That nation will win its war and its peace that merges the technics of war and of peace. The factories, machines, mechanics now building weapons of defense can be turned overnight, almost, to the production of "machines-for-living-in" if design is now adapted to this end. The static side of capitalism still thinking in terms of long-term investments in improvements on its scarcest land gave England its Munich and is now making it easy for the Germans to erase London from the map. The static side of capitalism, the dying half, still dictates shelter design for the world masses. Have these facts no importance for your readers?

CORWIN WILLSON

Flint, Mich., December 30

Progressive Students League

Dear Sirs: Robert Spivack, in his recent article "Youth Reorganizes" (The Nation, January 18), indicated a complete misunderstanding of the relation between the Progressive Students League and the Youth Committee Against War.

The Progressive Students League was organized in the New York colleges about a year ago by a group of independent students who felt that they needed some other means of expressing their united beliefs than that offered by existing organizations. Last spring it had grown to the point of sponsoring the annual Spring Strike Against War on most of the New York campuses. Since that time we have been spreading on a national basis.

Spivack, in calling the PSL "isolationist," attempts to label us with a term in general disrepute. "Isolationist" has now been so overused that it is meaningless in describing the aims of an organization.

It is illuminating to note that the major portion of Spivack's article is devoted to a pro-war group, the Student League for Progressive Action, whose actual student membership is negligible, while only a paragraph is devoted to the Youth Committee Against War, whose student membership in itself represents one of the most powerful of anti-war forces.

JOHN DIEHL,

National Correspondence Sec'y, PSL
Yellow Springs, O., January 25

Labor's Rights Contest

Dear Sirs: May I call the attention of your readers to two contests for worker-students being conducted by the Workers Defense League, national non-partisan defense agency of the labor movement? Persons attending trade union, WPA workers' education, or other labor educational classes in community centers, Y's, etc., are eligible. Prizes are $25, $15, and $10 in each contest. Closing date is April 30, 1941.

The first is for "letters-to-the-editor." Students are asked to write a letter of about 200 words to local editors calling attention to current violations of, or threats to, labor's rights in the neighborhood or the nation. If printed, the clipping should be sent to us; if not, a copy of the letter. The second contest is for essays of from 250 to 400 words on "How Are Labor's Rights Threatened?"

Judges are George Baldanzi, executive vice-president, Textile Workers Union, C. I. O.; Rose Pesotta, vice-president, I. L. G. W. U., A. F. of L.; Thomas W. Patterson, international vice-president, Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters, A. F. of L.; Harry W. Laidler, New York City Councilman, executive director, League for Industrial Democracy; and Arthur Garfield Hays, counsel, American Civil Liberties Union.

Available to students and teachers by writing the undersigned at 112 East 19th Street, New York City, are free study material and a 35-page booklet on "Labor's Rights in the United States," which sells for 15 cents (10 cents in quantities of 10). The winning letters and essays will be published by the Workers Defense League.

ISABEL TAYLOR,

Workers Defense League
New York, January 23

Poll-Tax Jury

Dear Sirs: Jonathan Daniels's excellent column on the Odell Waller case in your issue of December 21 summarizes the issues accurately and fairly. However, I changed my opinion of the case's significance about a week after I discussed it briefly with him over long-distance telephone, and when I was better informed as to the circumstances. It is therefore no longer accurate to say that I regard it as "merely a murder, not involving injustice to the convicted Negro." I am not prepared to say definitely that injustice was done, but I confess that I am not sure either way.

We have published two editorials in the Richmond Times-Dispatch stating that the case seems to provide one more argument against the unjustifiable poll tax, since the grand jury which indicted Waller, and included two Negroes, was composed of persons "entitled to vote and to hold office under the constitution of this state," in accordance with Virginia law. Officials of Pittsylvania County, where the trial was held, deny that the poll tax entered in any way into the selection of the petit jury which gave Waller the electric chair. Governor Price has granted him a reprieve until March 14 to permit an appeal.

Early handbills on the case were misleading and inflammatory, but later literature is much more nearly in conformity with the facts. However, there is nothing anywhere therein to inform the public that Waller shot Davis twice in the back, when Davis, according to uncontradicted witnesses, was unarmed.

VIRGINIUS DABNEY,

Editor, Richmond Times-Dispatch
Richmond, Va., January 30, 1941

Correction

Christopher Lazare is assistant editor of Decision, Klaus Mann's new publication, and not of Direction as was stated in The Nation of February 1.

CONTRIBUTORS

LOUIS FISCHER, for many years The Nation's Moscow correspondent, is the author of "The Soviet in World Affairs."

HARRY J. GREENWALL is an English writer whose articles have appeared in the New Statesman and Nation.

KENNETH MACNEAL is the author of "Truth in Accounting."

BARBARA PAINE has recently returned from her second visit to Japan, where she lived two years in a Japanese household.

FRANK RYHLICK, Washington correspondent of the New York Post, is co-author of "Dixie Demagogues."

ALBERT GUERARD is professor of comparative and general literature at Stanford University.

LOUIS KRONENBERGER is the editor of "An Anthology of Light Verse" and of "An Eighteenth Century Miscellany."

HUGH H. DARBY is an associate in the department of biological chemistry at the College of Physicians and Surgeons of Columbia University.

JEAN CHARLOT, well-known painter of Mexican subjects, is an archaeologist and the author of "Art from the Mayans to Disney."

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 55 Fifth Ave., New York. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $6; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $3; Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 152

NEW YORK · SATURDAY · FEBRUARY 15, 1941

NUMBER 7

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 169

EDITORIALS

H. R. 1776 172

Vienna 1934: The First Battle by Franz Hoellering 173

Why Hitler Hesitates by Freda Kirchwey 174

ARTICLES

Belated Magna Carta by I. F. Stone 175

British Communists Help Hitler by Harold J. Laski 176

Tax for Defense by Maxwell S. Stewart 178

Spain in Prison Anonymous 181

Missouri Has No Governor by Irving Dilliard 183

Everybody's Business by Keith Hutchison 184

In the Wind 185

A Native at Large by Jonathan Daniels 186

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Friends of Dr. Johnson by Joseph Wood Krutch 187

Gladiatorial by Sherman Conrad 187

Over the Burma Road by Maxwell S. Stewart 188

A Georgian Poet by John Peale Bishop 189

Banking: Two Views by Paul M. Sweezy 190

Genghis Khan by Louis B. Salomon 191

Photographs of New York by Paul Rosenfeld 191

Drama: The Irish of It by Joseph Wood Krutch 192

Films by Anthony Bower 192

Music by B. H. Haggin 194

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS 195

Editor and Publisher

FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor

ROBERT BENDINER

Washington Editor

I. F. STONE

Literary Editor

MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors

KEITH HUTCHISON MAXWELL S. STEWART

Dramatic Critic

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager and Director of Circulation

HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager

MARY HOWARD ELLISON

The Shape of Things

"SOBER CONFIDENCE" WAS THE KEYNOTE OF Winston Churchill's radio report to the nation, the Empire, and the neutral world, a confidence given substance by a long series of victories in the Mediterranean and by the proved ability of the island fortress to grow stronger despite punishing attacks. But the British Prime Minister at the same time warned against over-confidence. Hitler, he pointed out, must attempt to destroy Great Britain itself and while preparations to meet invasion have been immensely strengthened since last summer, it is only to be expected that the Nazis have been using the winter months to organize a far more formidable assault than they could have staged at that time. Nevertheless, Mr. Churchill was clearly as unconcerned about the state of domestic morale as he was anxious to combat defeatism in the neutral countries. He spoke particularly about the difficulties of convincing the small Balkan countries that by accepting Hitler's "new order" they were backing the wrong horse, but his words were also intended as an answer to those Americans who have so energetically been echoing Goebbels's thesis that Britain is doomed and American aid will be useless. More emphatically than ever before he declared Britain was not expecting the assistance of American armies. Its need was for war material and ships to transport it—and for our faith in its capacity to win out. We believe such confidence warranted and that there is no justification for Lindbergh's thesis that Britain cannot defeat Germany. The deciding factor will be nerves and there is reason to hope that, in the face of setbacks, German morale will prove as brittle as Italian.

✱

THE DEAD CATS TOSSED BACK AND FORTH between President Roosevelt and Senator Wheeler make a rather sordid byplay to the controversy over the Lease-Lend bill. The exchange started when the Senator, never conspicuous for subtlety, described the measure as another "New Deal Triple-A foreign policy—plow under every fourth American boy." Mr. Wheeler's analysis, remarked the President, was "the rottenest thing that has been said in public life in a generation." Touché! Unfortunately the President was not content to stun his foe and has lately been engaged in an unworthy effort to reduce him to a pulp. At a press conference he identified Wheeler as the unnamed Senator referred to in the late Ambassador Dodd's diary who is said to have remarked confidentially that Nazi domination of Europe was inevitable. What is more, Roosevelt implied, the Senator was not averse to such a catastrophe and even based his policy on it. Wheeler denied the whole story ("a slanderous attack on me—attributed to a dead man") and countered within a few days by charging that the President had given away so much American air strength that we now had not a single war plane capable of holding its own in a European war. Instead of analyzing this grave accusation Roosevelt merely remarked that of course one could work out all kinds of things with figures and that the Senator's interpretation must be very satisfactory to Adolf Hitler. That answer is fair neither to Senator Wheeler nor to the country, and it lowers the President's prestige. Even allowing for an inevitable degree of secrecy on military matters, the Administration has done a bad job of keeping the people posted on the general state of their defenses. That obligation is not lessened by the tactics required to carry on a private feud—even with so inviting a foe as Senator Wheeler.

★

COMPLAINTS REGARDING EXCESSIVE TAXES on business make interesting reading these days alongside reports of 1940 earnings. In one of the most recent of these reports, the General Motors Corporation indicated net earnings, after payment of all regular and excess-profits taxes, of $195,500,000, or $4.32 per share of common stock. This may be compared with earnings of $183,290,000, or $4.04 per share, in 1939, which was an exceptionally good year. An increase of $80,000,000 in taxes over the previous year was not sufficient to wipe out all the war gains. This was even more true of the steel companies which because of the capitalization provision in the Second Revenue Act of 1940 are practically exempt from the excess-profits levy. The United States Steel Corporation reported net profits of $102,181,000, or $8.84 a share, the highest since 1930. This was more than double the $41,226,000 profit for 1939. The Bethlehem Steel Corporation, with more defense orders, did still better. Its earnings of $48,677,000, or $14.04 a share, were one-sixth better than in 1929, the next best year in the corporation's history. These may be taken as illustrations of how we must all sacrifice for the defense program.

★

CHILD LABOR WOULD HAVE BEEN ILLEGAL in this country twenty-two years ago had not the Supreme Court in Hammer v. Dagenhart outlawed the 1916 Child Labor Law by a vote of five to four and made necessary the long, painful process of constitutional amendment.

Justice Stone has specifically overruled that decision in holding that both the wage-hour and the child-labor provisions of the federal Fair Labor Standards Act are constitutional. Justice Holmes, as he noted in his famous dissent in the old child-labor case, could not understand why the federal government was allowed power to prevent the shipment of lottery tickets, impure foods and drugs, stolen goods, and convict manufactures in interstate commerce but denied the right to forbid the channels of interstate commerce to the products of child labor. "The conclusion is inescapable," Justice Stone now says, "that Hammer v. Dagenhart was a departure from the principles which have prevailed in the interpretation of the commerce clause both before and since the decision." The Supreme Court nevertheless managed to escape these inescapable conclusions for twenty-two years. The new decision, which was in no way surprising after the decisions upholding the Wagner and Guffey Acts, should not be used as a means of blocking ratification of the Child Labor Amendment. That is still needed to end child labor in intra-state business.

★

THE FUNDS APPROPRIATED FOR HOUSING defense workers last summer have been almost entirely allocated, according to C. R. Palmer, Defense Housing Coordinator, and Congress is now to be asked for supplementary appropriations totaling $156,750,000. Of this sum $150,000,000 is to be used for the construction of 37,000 units in sixty defense areas and the balance is to be employed for providing temporary accommodations in places where there is urgent need for shelter for short periods. In addition, Mr. Palmer is asking for an amendment to the National Housing Act which would enable the FHA to set up a separate insurance fund to underwrite 90-per-cent mortgage loans on dwellings to be erected by private builders and either sold or rented. At present the FHA will insure loans of this proportion only when the builder is the owner-occupier and puts up a 10 per cent cash equity. By this change Mr. Palmer evidently hopes to lure private enterprise into defense housing. Perhaps he will do so, for most of the risk will be shouldered by the government while operators taking advantage of the scheme will have a fair chance of a speculative profit. What is not clear from Mr. Palmer's announcement is whether there is to be any control of rents in the case of houses built under this program. For rents are mounting in those areas where defense contracts have been concentrated. According to Miss Harriet Elliott, chief of the consumer division of the NDAC, increase of from 6 to 29 per cent in the year ending December last have been noted in a dozen districts. Rent takes from one-fifth to one-quarter of most workers' incomes and nothing is more likely to provoke demands for increased wages than a rise in rents. Nor, as we have pointed out before, will men be willing or able to work longer hours when lack of houses near their jobs forces them to commute long distances.

★

THE WALL STREET JOURNAL INFORMS US with refreshing frankness that "Squeeze plays were pulled everywhere on Army's rejection of Ford truck bid," and goes on to give the details, as follows:

Squeeze No. 1: Army was ready to give Ford a negotiated contract for trucks. Competitors kicked. Army invited general bidding. Ford was low, Chrysler second. Labor clause barred Ford; Chrysler got the order.

Squeeze No. 2: Army uses labor clause in bid invitations, omits it from negotiated and fixed-fee contracts. Soon it must either: (1) add clause to negotiated contracts or (2) drop it from competitive bidding.

Using Ford case to stir resentment, generals and colonels hope to jettison labor clause entirely. Officers announcing Ford rejections told newsmen it showed arms costs are higher "just because labor uses defense program as club to unionize Ford."

We can think of worse uses for the defense program. Meanwhile, we think it would be a good idea if someone with a loud and authoritative voice told the generals and colonels that the right and the obligation to bargain collectively have been legally established and it is not their business to nullify federal laws.

★

THE JAPANESE DRIVE NORTH OF HONG KONG, notable as the first important Japanese offensive in nearly a year, is a serious threat to China's supply line to the outside world. For contrary to the usual impression, China has been receiving a greater amount of supplies through devious routes along the South China coast than over the widely publicized Burma Road. Much of this has been smuggled in through Hong Kong and then transported to free China either by inland waterways or on the backs of coolies. The occupation of the area north of Hong Kong will not stop this traffic but it will tend to bring it all under Japanese control. Most of the goods now entering China is carried past the Japanese patrols after payment of an illegal bounty to the Japanese officers. This traffic is well organized, being controlled in many instances by written agreements between the importers and the highest Japanese naval officials. So profitable has this trade become that some observers have expressed doubt whether the Tokyo government could withdraw its troops and naval units from China even if it so ordered. Although the extension of Japanese control will not stop ordinary trade, particularly that of Japanese goods, it will cut down the flow of arms and ammunition destined for free China. For there is a limit even to Japanese cupidity.

ALTHOUGH THE BACKGROUND OF THE Cuban "revolt" remains somewhat obscure, there can be little doubt that President Batista's energetic measures saved the island from more serious disturbances. Colonel José Pedraza, former army chief, who was charged with leading the "seditious" clique, has long been known as an ardent pro-Nazi. While there is no evidence that the alleged plot against Batista was in any way the result of foreign influence, it may be assumed that a regime headed by the three plotters would have been more susceptible to totalitarian wiles than is the present government. There was a day when Batista maintained as ruthless a dictatorship as may be found on this side of the Atlantic, but during the past two or three years he has reestablished a large measure of practical democracy. His promptness in restoring full civil rights after temporarily suspending them at the time of the arrests, seems to indicate that he means to continue his experiment with the democratic method.

★

CORPORATION LAWYERS IN VARIOUS PARTS of the country, apparently under guidance from some central source, are employing a new legal device for circumventing the Norris-La Guardia Act. It is an ingenious one and it is being used with alarming frequency and success. It is aimed immediately at the Teamsters' Union but is capable of being used against other unions as well. When a union employer refuses to handle non-union cargo, the affected non-union employer institutes proceedings to enjoin the "fair" carrier from refusing to handle non-union freight. Since such litigation is between employers, the courts have in general prohibited interference from interested unions which sought to show the existence of a labor dispute and the consequent applicability of the anti-injunction law. The sued employer, more often than not, is sympathetic to the action and does not contest it. The practice has become so widespread that Daniel T. Tobin, president of the teamsters, and Joseph A. Padway, general counsel, have assumed personal direction of a nationwide drive to combat it.

★

WE HAVE RARELY ENCOUNTERED REASONING more specious than that adopted by Circuit Court Judges Maris, Clark, and Goodrich in the Agnes Fahy case. The judges confirm the Labor Board's finding that Miss Fahy was discharged by the Newark, New Jersey, Ledger for her activities as head of the Newark Newspaper Guild. But they rule that the board has no power to reinstate her or to punish an employer for an unfair labor practice once the employer has entered into a collective-bargaining agreement. We have no hesitation in saying that the Wagner Act affords no support for this extraordinary interpretation. It would invite the employer to enter into an agreement with the union and then proceed to discharge its more militant members. This is exactly what happened in the Fahy case. Few cases coming before the Labor Board exhibit a more shameful record of interference by management in union affairs than this one. Miss Fahy, after eight years of employment by the Ledger, was discharged in September, 1937, as "a warning upon all other editorial employees of the hazards of militant trade unionism." This was the conclusion of the then chairman, Warren Madden, and of Edwin S. Smith. William M. Leiserson, the third member of the board, thought no complaint should have been issued. While the court would ignore any unfair labor practices which occurred after the agreement, Leiserson proposed to ignore those which happened before it. Without citing any evidence, he dismissed the Fahy discharge as the result of "internal differences in the union."

H. R. 1776

THE PURPOSE of H. R. 1776 is to enable the President to carry out the policy of all aid to Britain short of war with more effectiveness than is now possible. That policy is not the personal property of Mr. Roosevelt or of any party in this country. Repeated tests have proved that an overwhelming majority of the people endorse it. In the late election Mr. Willkie supported it as heartily as Mr. Roosevelt and, indeed, had he not done so he would have polled millions fewer votes.

Despite this evidence, the Republicans in Congress, with a number of honorable exceptions, are insisting on treating the Lease-Lend bill as a partisan measure, regardless of how much damage they may do to national unity in this time of crisis, regardless of the effects of their action in Europe. Mr. Willkie has been telling us that Britain's courage remains undaunted, but we must remember that one element in its morale is faith that America will not fail in supplying material aid. Blind to the risks involved, Republicans in Congress are missing no opportunity to indulge in misrepresentation and obstruction. While part of the Administration forces were lurching last Thursday, an amendment was slipped through giving Congress power to rescind at any time, by concurrent resolution, all and any powers assigned to the President under the bill. By smart tactics Representative Dirksen of Illinois, who proposed this amendment, hitched it to the one limiting the period of the bill to June 30, 1943—an amendment already accepted by the Democratic leadership. Thus the problem arises of how to remove the Dirksen amendment without at the same time sacrificing the time restriction clause.

An amendment, introduced by Hamilton Fish, to recommit the bill and substitute a simple credit to Britain of two billion dollars was defeated. But it may be brought forward again in the Senate by Senator Taft, who has also announced his intention of offering a string of amendments to the bill apparently designed to insure that aid to Britain will be "too little and too late." The supporters of the straight loan plan argue that the danger of providing additional powers to the President would be avoided and the British would be furnished with the means to continue their purchasing program on present lines. Congressional supporters of this plan have omitted to mention how welcome it would be to certain manufacturers who have been charging the British all that the traffic would bear. They do not like the bill because it means that future orders for Britain will be consolidated with those for our own defense forces and will therefore carry a lower rate of profit. But this is really one of the great advantages of the measure since it permits the smooth planning of procurement and also makes possible a standardization of armaments which will contribute to the economy and speed of our own program. Apart from these considerations, there is ground for questioning the motives of Messrs. Taft and Fish. We remember that in the fall of 1939 they both opposed lifting the arms embargo because, they argued, that would involve us in war. Now, they profess to favor arms for Britain and to be anxious to make loans to that country. Is this just a maneuver or does it represent a real change of heart and a confession of error in 1939?

With voting very largely following party lines, the bill went through the House with the inclusion of a new amendment placing a ceiling of $1,300,000 on the value of existing war equipment or that under appropriation which may be transferred to other governments. This ought to dispose of absurd accusations that the President could and would give away the whole navy.

We have little hope, though, that reasonable amendments will silence those irreconcilables who seem determined to use the Lease-Lend bill as a vehicle for attacks on both Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Willkie. Against the President they continue to hurl the accusations of attempted dictatorship, asserting that he hopes to use the bill both to put the country in the war and to seize control of private enterprise. If there were truth in the first charge, we might wonder why he should seek such means to accomplish this end when his existing powers as Commander-in-Chief gives him far broader authority. As for the control of industry, Congress has already granted him wide powers through the defense appropriations it has voted and in the Conscription Act. H. R. 1776 neither adds to nor subtracts from these powers.

In the election we vigorously opposed Wendell Willkie but we feel disgusted with the venomous onslaughts now being made on him by some of his erstwhile friends. His crime is that he has lived up to his promise of "loyal opposition" by giving general, although not unqualified, support to the Lease-Lend bill.

Two elements in the Republican Party are now out for his blood. The appeasers and isolationists, who supported him during the election because, as they candidly explained, they regarded his stand on foreign policy as mere vote-catching, now have the gall to accuse him of betrayal. They are joined by some of the party hacks, who have always resented him as an outsider and take the line that an opposition has no responsibility except to oppose. We believe both these elements to be far more widely represented among Republican office-holders, in and out of Congress, than among the twenty-two million voters who endorsed Mr. Willkie. Consequently, we do not fear the effects of Republican antics in relation to H.R. 1776 on the unity of the country: it is far more probable that they will shatter the ranks of the G. O. P.

The First Battle

BY FRANZ HOELLERING

THE FIRST BATTLE for the liberation of Europe was fought seven years ago this week. It was then for the first time that common people took up arms against the fascist onslaught. They were defeated, as were the Spaniards a few years later.

It happened in Austria. On February 11, 1934, the Minister of Police in the Dollfuss government made a speech. The occasion was the celebration of the Holy Field Mass after the Sunday maneuvers of the fascist Heimwehr—Mussolini's fifth column in Austria, led by Prince Starhemberg, the same man who marched with Hitler in 1923 and who today is allowed to wear and to dishonor the uniform of De Gaulle's Free French forces. The Minister of Police declared that he could not say much; he did say that Chancellor Dollfuss was now of one mind with the Heimwehr and that the Heimwehr would do a thorough job, beginning the next day.

The promise was kept. After a successful bloody provocation of workers in Linz, the capital of Upper Austria, in the early hours of the morning, the Dollfuss government declared martial law and dissolved the trade unions and the Socialist Party which in the last election had received 75 per cent of the vote in Vienna and 45 per cent of the vote of the country. The government arrested the Socialist leaders, dragging even the seventy-year-old mayor of Vienna into prison, and started a wholesale attack with tanks and cannon on the workers' quarters. By nightfall the Schutzbund, the defense organization of the workers, was fighting back. Outnumbered, insufficiently armed, and without leadership, they held out for three days and four nights. They knew they could not win, but they fought. "Hunger hurts," they argued against the appeasers, "but we must resist injustice. Otherwise, we won't get anything to eat either."

Injustice! By this single word the workers of Austria understood in their own way the fascist ideology with which they found themselves confronted, after having built up over a period of more than thirty years the most advanced labor movement on earth. They had fought until then with "spiritual weapons," as their leaders liked to call the democratic processes. "One more election," many an Austrian worker thought, "and we'll have the majority in the country and take over the government and lead Austria on the way of peaceful progress, as we are already doing so successfully in the city of Vienna." Precisely this possibility and this conception of a dynamic democracy were the reasons why the workers of the Austrian republic had to be liquidated at a time when the ruling classes everywhere were still united in underestimating Hitler and in appeasing him by meeting him halfway, as they thought they were doing, with the glorious program: The status quo minus the Bill of Rights.

Today, to more and more people, this program seems like madness. It was then; but the semi-fascist Dollfuss believed in it and had the blessing of the Catholic Church which still believes in it, and everywhere the sympathy of the great press, which played him up as Little David defending his country against Goliath Hitler. The pretension was that Dollfuss represented the Austrian people and its freedom while he was dragging the most upright Austrians to the gallows. When the battle ended, on February 19, 1934, the New York Times wrote in an editorial: "Whatever form of government the Austrian people may decide to set up in Vienna is no concern of outsiders." As if the Austrian people had still any say about it! And as if G. E. R. Gedy, the most clear-sighted of the American correspondents in Vienna at the time, had not written the day before in the same paper: "While making the utmost of the Nazi danger, which instantly invoked the sympathy of foreign powers, the government actually always paltered with the Nazis while steadily preparing for the real objective—the destruction of democracy and socialism in Austria."

The destruction of democracy—or the building of democracy: this main issue of the present world conflict was clearly posed in the first battle in the February days of 1934. In the last analysis the poor tool Dollfuss and the whole Austrian people became the victims of Hitler because the ruling classes of France and England and the United States thought then, and for too long a time afterwards, that they could handle Hitler and Mussolini by throwing them a few crumbs—Ethiopia, Austria, and Czechoslovakia. Democracy, of course, meant nothing more to them than a convenient method for keeping their privileges. How seriously they have changed their minds in the meantime and how many of them only for the duration will be an academic question when the last battle has been won by the Schutzbund of England.

Why Hitler Hesitates

BY FRED KIRCHWEY

AT no time since the war began has the future of Europe seemed more obscure than it seems today. For the moment Hitler's path seems blocked in several directions, but it is certain that this setback can only produce a more intense and terrible attack. Hitler cannot afford setbacks.

The only serious obstacle he faces is Britain; every other interference with his plans exists only because British resistance is still undiminished at home and because the British offensive in Africa rolls on without check. Undoubtedly Great Britain is now aroused to full determination. The drive against Mussolini will be pushed to the limit; no one who heard Churchill's bold report last Sunday can doubt his intention to crush to powder the Italian empire in Africa. The bombardment of Genoa by British ships was an act of tremendous significance, for it was a demonstration both of Britain's mastery of Mediterranean waters, even along the Italian coastline, and of its ability to attack Italy on its own soil.

It is British strength that gives Pétain and Franco and the Bulgarians and the Yugoslavs courage to resist, even for a time, the pressure Germany has put upon them. Newspaper reports hint that American diplomatic efforts are largely responsible for the stronger stand taken by Hitler's satellites. Relief supplies from the United States have reached Spain and unoccupied France, and it is rumored that the State Department has promised oil and equipment for Pétain's North African army in case it finds itself fighting against the Italians. The "moral embargo" against Russia was lifted as a gesture designed to encourage anti-Axis feeling. But if these tokens of appeasement should prove to be effective it will be only because they supplement the successful efforts of British arms.

Because Britain is fighting with undiminished courage and growing success, Pétain has in the past few days begun to be looked upon as a ruler rather than as a victim. The people in the street crossed themselves and prayed when he walked to church last Sunday. For the moment the unanimous hatred of the French people for the treasonable plotting of Laval finds expression in the old Marshal's resistance. By tomorrow this precarious interlude of French independence may be ended. The new Darlan government may give Hitler the substance of his demands, even if Laval is not forcibly installed as his agent. Or he may set Laval up as head of a separate cabinet at Paris, recognized by Germany as the valid government of France. He must take risks if he cannot win without, for time is against him. But his temporary defeat at Vichy this week will remain a British victory; a by-product of Britain's successful campaign on other fronts. So with Spain. Franco can afford a show of firmness in the face of Nazi demands only because Britain's success lends him a strength that he could never muster by himself. So, too, with Bulgaria. That poor country, stepchild in a miserable family, has lately been infested with Germans at a season when the Balkans are least likely to attract innocent tourists. At any time it may see the transformation of Teutonic salesmen and sight-seers into the advance guards of a Nazi army. But for weeks Bulgaria has blocked the way to Greece and the Dardanelles, not because it is strong but because Britain is strong and British advances in Africa have encouraged Russia to encourage Bulgaria to resist.

In this train of events there is a lesson for America—and for Britain, too. An ounce of military power is worth a million tons of appeasement. And appeasement is worth less than nothing except when it is an adjunct of power.

But since Hitler is not defeated, and since he cannot tolerate even a temporary halt, these past days will certainly serve as a prelude to new and more terrible destruction. Hitler could afford to wait only if waiting weakened the enemy. The next weeks may or may not produce the attempt at invasion which Churchill expects. It is true, as he said, that only a defeat of England would bring final victory to the Nazis, but Britain might be dangerously weakened by successful attacks elsewhere. In spite of the weakness of his chief partner, Hitler may decide to move toward Gibraltar or the Dardanelles or both. If he makes these attempts he will have to abandon most of the pretenses which have hitherto smoothed his road in France and the Balkans; this much the events of recent weeks have accomplished. He will have to treat Italy as a protectorate. He will have to drive through Bulgaria and perhaps Yugoslavia, through France and Spain—using these countries as military highways. If they acquiesce in his invasion, it will be a surrender, not a collaboration.

The reluctance of the rulers is rooted in the feeling of the peoples, feeling which even dictators must regard with respect and apprehension. In France hatred and an energy of resistance have replaced the apathy that followed defeat. Italy is boiling with suppressed rebellion; every private report tells a story of growing resentment against a continued, hopeless war and the regime that is responsible for it. In Spain the unarmed but unanimous opposition of a hungry population would break out in open rebellion the moment a well-fed German army crossed the frontier. Hitler must move, even against a tide of popular resistance. The British, for their part, cannot afford to let this mood subside or to be crushed into despair; in the end, if they have the courage to use it, the anger of the people at the misery and oppression that characterizes Hitler's "new order" will prove their most powerful ally.

Belated Magna Carta

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, February 6

IT may be said, without much exaggeration, that so far as labor and the anti-trust laws are concerned, the Supreme Court is beginning to follow the 1912 election returns. One of the pledges made by President Wilson in that year was the enactment of legislation exempting labor from the anti-trust laws. The promise was kept in the Clayton Act, but although this was passed twenty-six years ago the Supreme Court didn't put it fully into effect until last Monday. When I say Clayton Act I mean those sections of the law which Samuel Gompers hailed as a labor Magna Carta.

Gompers spoke too soon, and I too may be a little hasty. A few years after the Gompers statement Chief Justice Taft deftly nullified that Magna Carta, interpreting it as "merely declaratory" of "what had been the best practice always" and then applying it in accordance with what had been the worst. A few years from now further changes in the court may in turn undermine or reverse the brave reasoning of Justice Frankfurter in the Hutcheson case. Four judges agreed with him that "Big Bill" Hutcheson of the Carpenters' Union could not have been guilty of violating the anti-trust laws by calling a jurisdictional strike. But only three judges endorsed his reasoning and approved the principles he laid down for the future. These principles are the principles which most of the people of this country thought were enacted into law when the Clayton Act was passed in 1914. On these the court was splintered rather than merely divided, and the curious lineup may serve to warn Mr. Roosevelt that the New Liberalism of our highest bench is still too precariously established to permit the political luxury of appointing a Byrnes to succeed Justice McReynolds.

Justice Murphy took no part in the case, since it was begun when he was Attorney General. Justice Roberts and the Chief Justice, who dissented, belong to a generation of judges for whom the Clayton Act has been a kind of shadow statute, a legislative ghost easily laid by judicial incantation. Justice Stone, of the same generation but of a different temper and outlook, voted to uphold the lower court, which dismissed the Hutcheson indictment. But he could not bring himself to agree with Frankfurter's reasoning. Had the facts been but slightly different, Stone might have felt compelled, by past precedents, to cast a vote for Hutcheson's prosecution.

This leaves but four judges, Black, Reed, Douglas, and Frankfurter, who were prepared to give an unequivocal answer to the questions of policy raised by the Hutcheson case. The Clayton Act specified certain types of labor activities and disputes which were to be exempt from either injunction or criminal prosecution. These four judges might have overruled Taft's drastic limitation of this exemption, but there was an alternative. The Norris-La Guardia Act, which Frankfurter wrote, had already "reversed" the Taft decision by declaring specifically that jurisdictional disputes were to be exempt from injunction. In passing that act Congress made it clear it was correcting judicial misinterpretation of the Clayton Act. True, the Norris-La Guardia Act dealt only with injunctions, not with criminal prosecutions, but to Frankfurter and his three colleagues it seemed ridiculous to say that while the courts might not forbid jurisdictional strikes by injunction they could send men to jail for engaging in them. "Such legislation," they said, "must not be read in a spirit of mutilating narrowness." They threw out the Hutcheson indictment on the ground that Congress had shown its intent to exempt the jurisdictional strike from the anti-trust laws. Roberts and Hughes accused them of "usurping" the functions of Congress, but Frankfurter and his colleagues were merely applying Congressional intention instead of past judicial misinterpretation.

The importance of the Hutcheson decision does not lie in its legalization of the jurisdictional strike, a plague of which labor had best rid itself as quickly as it can. It lies in the fact that the Hutcheson decision makes more explicit the rule foreshadowed in the tangled compromises of Justice Stone's Apex decision. This is that labor activities are exempt from the anti-trust laws so long as they are not part of a combination with employer groups for the control of market prices. The establishment of this rule would sharply narrow the area in which Thurman Arnold has been trying to use the anti-trust laws against labor unions. Of the five types of "unreasonable restraints" outlined by Mr. Arnold in his famous letter of November, 1939, to the Central Labor Union of Indianapolis, only one would still be subject to anti-trust prosecution. This is the case of combinations with employer groups "to enforce illegally fixed prices." By this rule the Supreme Court majority does not imply approval of the labor union practices criticized; it merely registers an intention to limit the anti-trust laws to actions against "trusts," which is how they were intended to be applied. And it recognizes the dangers to legitimate unionism of attempts to use the anti-trust laws as a means of policing the labor movement.

British Communists Help Hitler

BY HAROLD J. LASKI

London, January 20

JUST one week ago today ■ "People's Convention" was held in London. It was an enthusiastic meeting, attended by at least some fifteen hundred persons. It passed unanimously ■ series of resolutions calling for more air-raid protection, higher wages, democratization of the armed forces, the creation of a "people's government," freedom for India, and so on. It also established a working committee which is to organize the intensification of the aims the convention approved, by propaganda which shall bring together the "massed forces of the working-class."

The convention did not receive much publicity in Britain. But it has received interested approval on the German and Italian wireless; and Pravda has reported its main proceedings at length. It was, in fact, essentially Communist-inspired, and its whole effective operation was in Communist hands. While some of the speakers, notably Mr. D. N. Pritt, were not members of the Communist Party, all the principal speakers were of the true faith; and no speech was made which deviated seriously from the Communist "line." The chairman and majority of the Standing Orders Committee were Communists; the resolutions put to the conference coincide in itemized detail with the latest program of the Communist Party; and the main Communist speeches were so little the outcome of the discussion in the conference itself that they were, I gather, distributed in multi-graphed form to the press while the discussions were proceeding. It was symptomatic of the habits of those who organized the conference that the "simple soldier" who addressed it (his name being withheld from the audience) was, in fact, one of the best-known Communist speakers in this country.

It is unquestionable that some of those who supported the conference do not belong to the Communist Party, either overtly or secretly; and some who did so would, as they have publicly said, withdraw their support if they believed that its purpose was "appeasement" in any shape or form. It is certain that many of the organizations represented in the convention sent delegates because on a number of matters they had real grievances to formulate and welcomed the chance of doing so. Some of those present, however, represented nothing at all. The workers, for example, in one aircraft factory protested that their shop stewards, who happened to be Communists, sent delegates to represent them without even a pretense at consultation. Other delegates went from organizations which were created simply for the purpose of doing Communist propaganda under another name. Others were picked at hole-and-corner meetings utterly unrepresentative of the bodies they were chosen to represent. Others, again, like the delegates from the South Wales miners, voted for resolutions which, when put to a full conference of the miners themselves, were rejected by a three to one majority. The local labor parties which sent representatives were in many cases bodies dominated by members who are believed to belong to the Communist Party but deny their membership even while they carefully follow the party "line."

It is, I think, worth while to analyze a little closely the policy which lies behind this latest alias of the Communist Party. For what was important in the convention was not the resolutions which dealt with immediate questions, but the demand for a "people's government," and the insistence that it must be brought into being by the massed effort of the workers. It is based on certain beliefs that Communist writings in recent months have made unmistakably clear. They are: (1) that this is an imperialist war; (2) that a victory of the Churchill government would be a victory for British imperialism and against the interests of the working-class, the world socialist movement, and the Soviet Union; (3) that everything possible must be done to destroy this government and replace it by one chosen by working-class organizations free from the taint of imperialism or of fascism; (4) that such a government would offer Germany ■ "people's peace," based on the principles of no annexations, no indemnities, and of self-determination for the conquered and occupied countries; (5) that the offer of this peace would probably provoke revolution against Hitler and Mussolini in Germany and Italy; (6) that failing this peace, the people's government could wage war on Germany, with the help of the Soviet Union, until the European socialist revolution swept over the continent.

This is, I think, a fair summary of what the British Communist Party is now preaching. I hardly need to point out that it is an adaptation to the present conflict of Lenin's famous slogan "Turn the imperialist war into a civil war." Its purpose, essentially, is the overthrow of the Churchill government. Since it is clear that this cannot be accomplished in the present Parliament, or at a general election (only one anti-war candidate has saved his deposit at any by-election since the war began), it must be accomplished by extra-parliamentary means. The exponents of this policy must therefore look to civil war as their method. To promote it they must destroy the national unity by every means in their power: strikes, demonstrations, exploitation of grievances, permeation of the armed forces, etc., on the well-known Bolshevik model of 1917. If they were to succeed in this purpose, it is clear to any rational mind that the resultant confusion would give Hitler the one certain chance he possesses of successful invasion. From this, the conclusion follows that the Communists believe, in 1941 as in 1917, that defeat is the prelude to revolution in the defeated country and that revolution in the defeated country would be the signal for revolutionary uprisings in Germany and Italy against Hitler.

It is important to remember in this context (1) that the Russian revolution did not provoke any attempt at a revolution in Germany while the latter was undefeated; that came only after the rapid demoralization of the German army consequent on the defeats of July, 1918, and subsequently; (2) that had Germany not been defeated in 1918, it is at least improbable that the Bolshevik revolution would have survived; (3) that the defeat of France has not seen any movement toward a workers' revolution and that this is unlikely until the hold of Hitler upon France has been broken; (4) that no evidence exists of any willingness on the part of the Soviet Union to come to the assistance of the French workers, directly or indirectly. On the contrary, the months since the fall of France have seen the constant reiteration of its neutrality by the Soviet Union.

It is impossible not to conclude that either the British Communist Party is dwelling in cloud-cuckoo land or its purpose is to assist in the defeat of Great Britain. The second result, whatever its intentions, would be bound to follow if its present policy was in any serious degree successful. A wave of strikes which paralyzed British production; the growth, deliberately fostered, of unrest in the armed forces; the organized conduct of anti-war propaganda which involved deliberate stimulus to seditious conspiracy—all of these would obviously hamper our power to hold Hitler, and might do more than hamper it. If it led to our defeat, the spectacle of France does not suggest that there would be an opportunity for working-class revolution. On the contrary, it shows that we should become a tragic province of Hitler's dominion with no hope of revival for long years to come.

It is significant, I think, that in the literature issued to expound the principles of the People's Convention, as in the resolutions of the convention itself, while there is much talk of liberty and democracy and socialism, and of the Churchill government as the enemies of these, there is no mention of their greatest enemy in the world today—Hitler and Hitlerism. That is characteristic of all Communist propaganda since the famous volte-face of October, 1939. In the first month of the war the Communist Party had no doubt that Hitler must at all costs be defeated, even though it hated and distrusted the Chamberlain government. Since October, 1939, it has had little to say of, or against Hitler; all the artillery of its hate has been directed against Great Britain, which is now accused, in concert with the Roosevelt Administration, of looking eagerly toward a war against the Soviet Union.

What underlies this attitude? I cannot believe that the Communist Party really desires a Hitler victory. I can understand that it is disturbed at some of the policies of the Churchill government, notably its indefensible blindness over India. But to seek, as it is now seeking, its extra-parliamentary defeat, is clearly to court civil war; and, as I have said, a civil war here means a Hitler victory. For not even Mr. Dutt can believe that if Hitler struck, the Soviet Union would come to the assistance of a disorganized Britain. Not even Mr. Dutt can believe that Russia, granting a desire to help a revolutionary Britain, would be capable of doing so if Hitler decided simultaneously to attack the Soviet Union. In the light of Soviet experience in 1917-18, he cannot seriously believe (or, if he does, he cannot be taken as a serious observer of affairs) that a victorious Germany would accept from a Britain emerging from the confusion of revolution terms of peace which deprived it of all the fruits of her conquests. Certainly that acceptance is no more implicit in the terms imposed on France, or in the speeches of Nazi leaders, than it was explicit in the Treaty of Brest-Litovsk twenty-two years ago.

What, then, explains the Communist attitude? It is, I think, due, essentially, to two causes. The first is the necessity of defending the position of the Soviet Union in this war. If it were to be accepted as a war against fascism, then the defense, not indeed of the neutrality of the Soviet Union, but of a neutrality largely benevolent to Germany, would be impossible. Its more obvious explanation—the fact that the Soviet leaders fear the effect of a major war on their experiment, and, hardly less, upon their personal control of the experiment—is not an explanation which easily fits Communist boasts of the impregnable strength of the Soviet Union. It is not easy to admit that the leadership in the fight against fascist dictatorship has, after all these years, passed from Moscow to London. It is therefore necessary for the Communists to maintain that this is no longer a war against fascism. To do otherwise is to reveal the weakness of the Soviet Union.

The second cause is more recondite. The Communist Party is assuming that with the end of the war there will be immense social problems causing profound discontent. This, it believes, will recoil upon the heads of the two major parties, and leave the way open for a third party which not only predicted its coming, but opposed the war because it saw this condition as its consequence. The Labor Party, it believes, will be the main sufferer from this discontent, and the Communists will be able to take advantage of Labor's unpopularity to seize the leadership of the working-class forces in Great Britain.

This view is, of course, one that it is easy to see might well become a strongly founded one. If, at the close of the war, nothing has been made ready to grapple with the issues of reconstruction, there will be swift and condign punishment for the responsible leaders; and the main punishment will rightly be visited on the Labor Party, whose inescapable obligation it is to prepare now to meet problems it is possible to foresee, and for which there are clear and obvious remedies. The workers will not tolerate mass-unemployment and distressed areas after this war as they did after the last. They will not tolerate the continuance of the grave inequalities, in wealth, in housing, in education, in public health, which now deface our social system. They will expect gigantic plans to be ready for dealing with these matters; and a failure to deal with them may easily and, indeed, rapidly, produce a revolutionary situation in Great Britain.

I would add two things only. The Communists are not alone in their awareness of these dangers; the leaders of the Labor Party are equally alive to their imminence, and, if they were not, they would be constantly reminded of them by their experience at the party conferences which go on every week-end. Preparation to deal with these matters has long been in hand; and a strong team, under Mr. Greenwood, has just been appointed by the War Cabinet to lay down the general principles of post-war reconstruction. It is, no doubt, too early to say that we shall be able to carry through the task of reconstruction upon an agreed basis. It is not too early to say that the leaders of both great parties understand that without this agreed basis the dangers ahead will be enormous. Neither is it too early to insist that there has never been a time in our history when the whole people was so united in its recognition that large-scale experiment in matters of social constitution is imperative.

The second remark I would add is that no recognition of the difficulties we must face after the war can justify the risks the Communists are taking in their present policy. Were it to be successful, it would fasten the domination of Hitler upon Europe at least and possibly beyond. That is not a risk anyone is entitled to take who recognizes the meaning for the workers of a Hitler victory. It may be, of course, as one fellow-traveler has remarked to me, that the Communists have adopted this line because they know it will fail, but believe that, on this account, it will in the long run give them the best of both worlds. If this is indeed their view—as it may well be—it indicates a levity before the call of great events which is, I think, impossible to pardon. Men who can lie on the scale this attitude implies could not be charged with the destiny of any people without ultimately assisting in its betrayal.

Tax for Defense

BY MAXWELL S. STEWART

NOW that the Lease-Lend bill is past the hearing stage and well on the way to passage, Congress must face the even greater problem of determining how the defense program shall be financed. Although the issues involved are perhaps not so spectacular as those growing out of the President's proposal to lend war supplies to the democracies, they affect our daily lives even more fundamentally. For the decision will affect not only our pocketbooks, but, to a large extent, the kind of society we shall live in after the emergency has passed.

The very immensity of the problem may cause it to get less attention than it deserves. For years we have been hearing that the government was facing bankruptcy because of annual deficits of from two to four billion dollars. The deficit for 1941-42 has been estimated at nine billion! Unless drastic steps are taken, it will be even greater the following year. An expenditure of seventeen and a half billion dollars was authorized last year for defense. No one can foresee what the total will be this year, but domestic defense authorizations are expected to go above ten billions, and the cost of materials for Great Britain, Greece, and China may amount to half as much again. In the face of these amounts, lopping off a half billion dollars from the regular budget seems almost a futile gesture.

Congress has the choice of three ways of meeting the huge but necessary expenditures for defense. (1) It can decide to meet the defense costs primarily by borrowing. This would involve merely a continuation of the deficit financing used to pay the costs of recovery and relief during the past eight years. (2) It may permit some form of inflation and thus pay for defense by "new" money. (3) It may follow the President's injunction and, by increasing taxes, seek to put defense, so far as possible, on a pay-as-you-go basis. Or, as it not unlikely, it may adopt some combination of these methods.

One thing is clear. Whatever method is adopted, we cannot dodge the full costs of the defense program. These costs are approximately the same regardless of the way they are financed. But the method of financing will determine who pays the bill and the nature of the problems which will face us after the emergency has passed.

Present indications are that the greater part of the costs of defense will be met, as were the costs of the first World War, by borrowing. We have become so accustomed to large-scale deficit financing during the depression that the huge sums at present required seem to cause little concern. But it cannot be too strongly emphasized that deficit financing for recovery and relief is very different from supporting the defense program by borrowed money.

During the depression a large portion of our manpower, factories, mines, transport equipment, and capital resources were idle because of lack of consumer purchasing power. The money which was borrowed for recovery and relief was used to provide jobs in constructive undertakings. Roads were improved, schools erected, airports built, new bridges constructed, and other useful work was done that added to the country's wealth. Consumer purchasing power was raised both directly through relief grants and indirectly through the stimulation of the construction industries. This, in turn, stimulated the entire economic process, creating real wealth as it did so.

Having just learned, with great difficulty, the laws of an economy of abundance, it is hard to adjust ourselves once again to an economy of scarcity. But we must recognize that the situation has been completely reversed. Our factories, mines, and transport facilities are, with a few exceptions, being strained to the limit. We still have unemployment, but it has been substantially reduced; skilled workers are at a premium in the defense industries. The money which is being spent on tanks, aircraft, guns, and warships adds substantially to consumer purchasing power, but it does not add to the country's wealth. Except where necessities such as food and housing are in question, we dare not utilize our resources to increase the number of things which people will buy with their greater purchasing power. On the contrary, some of the resources now utilized in producing goods for consumption may soon have to be diverted to imperative defense needs. Our national output is bound to suffer when men are taken away from their present jobs and given unproductive work in either defense industries or the armed forces. Yet these men will continue to consume, in some cases more than before, thus placing an increasing drain on our resources.

The creation of new purchasing power without ■ corresponding increase in the amount of goods available for purchase must of necessity result in a rise in prices. The reason that a considerable increase in prices has not already occurred is that we had huge unused resources when rearmament first got under way. During the first year of intense defense effort, we have done little more than take up the slack. But the pressure is beginning to be felt, and the coming months will see a tremendous stepping up of the defense effort.

The effect of large-scale government borrowing on this situation will depend largely on whether the money is predominantly obtained from individuals or, as is now the case, from banks. Money borrowed from individuals will have a much less inflationary effect than money borrowed from banks. For individuals have a choice between lending the money to the government or spending it on themselves. And every dollar they lend to the government will cut down the demand for consumers' goods, particularly luxuries. There is, however, a serious objection to financing the defense program primarily by borrowing from individuals, assuming that this could be done. Even a casual examination of the figures for accumulated savings by income classes will reveal that only the comparatively wealthy group can claim a substantial amount of savings. But if the wealthy buy most of the bonds, they will be in a favored position when the emergency is ended. The country as a whole will have to shoulder the burden of heavy taxation in order to repay them, and their descendants, for the "sacrifices" made for national defense. The British population has been laboring under just such a burden for the past twenty years because this method was chosen to finance the last war.

One of the gravest objections to financing defense by voluntary, interest-paying loans lies in the fact that it sets up a dual standard for wealth and human life. We do not hesitate to draft men for service in the armed forces, even though we know that some of them may be called upon to sacrifice their lives for their country. The draft board does attempt to invoke a doctrine of equality of sacrifice, or even of a proportionate sacrifice. It takes the strong, rejects the weak. The welfare of the nation comes before all other considerations. The dependence on voluntary loans invokes an altogether different standard, comparable to reliance on a voluntary, mercenary army enlisted on the promise of fat pensions for life. The existence of a double standard soon comes to be recognized by draftees and may seriously undermine morale.

To borrow from banks in order to avoid this danger is like jumping out of the frying-pan into the fire. The money provided by the banks would be largely new money and would increase the amount of available purchasing power. The danger is particularly great because we have, as a result of devaluation, some billions of dollars of excess bank reserves which not only may be transformed into effective purchasing power but may serve as the basis for an even larger expansion of credit.

Since this new money cannot be balanced by a corresponding amount of new consumers' goods, we should soon have an unmanageable inflation on our hands. An inflation is both dangerous and unfair. For while the increasing cost of living imposes a heavy burden on workers, white-collar employees, and all others dependent on a fixed income, a favored few may benefit substantially. Business in general flourishes in a period of rising prices. A disproportionate amount of the national income would go to business men and shareholders, already a favored group. Speculators would reap an even bigger harvest. But the gravest objection to inflation, from the standpoint of national defense, is that it would discourage thrift and encourage needless expenditures for luxuries. For once inflation gets under way, people cannot be blamed for seeking to spend their money as soon as possible. As a result, we might be forced to adopt priorities, rationing, and other restrictions in order to maintain defense production.

The only practical alternative to borrowing is, of course, some form of taxation. Since in any event defense must be paid for out of current income, there is much to be said for drafting the money needed to finance defense instead of enlisting it on a voluntary basis. Few would deny that placing defense on a pay-as-you-go basis would involve the fewest headaches for the future. But it is usually assumed that this is wholly impossible.

Perhaps it is. But if so, the obstacles are political rather than economic. Given a sound system of taxation, there is no purely economic reason why the United States should not defray the costs of the present arms program out of taxation. Dr. Harold G. Moulton of the Brookings Institution has estimated that if the federal, state, and local governments took 25 per cent of a national income of $85,000,000,000, all our defense needs could be cared for. And he added that a 25-per-cent levy on a national income of $85,000,000,000 would be less burdensome than the 22 per cent actually taken by the federal, state, and local governments during 1938 out of a national income that was then only about $66,000,000,000.

Whether or not it is desirable to attempt to finance the defense program on a pay-as-you-go basis depends entirely on the kind of taxes levied. Obviously we do not want an increase of taxes that might impede the growth of defense industries or seriously undermine the health and strength of any part of our population. Taxes which increase business costs are dangerous because they are likely to be seized upon as a pretext for higher prices, and thus contribute to inflation.

Because no one likes to pay taxes, we may expect a sharp political controversy on the question of financing the defense program. Already the National Association of Manufacturers has indicated its advocacy of a general sales tax. Such a tax, it need hardly be said here, falls most heavily on those least able to pay. Families earning less than $1,500 usually spend their entire incomes, and therefore would bear the full brunt of it. The well-to-do, though spending more per family, relatively spend less, and, as a group, accumulate practically all of the country's savings. Although a sales tax would scarcely touch them, they would be caught by taxes on such luxuries as furs, liquor, new automobiles, and jewelry. Taxes of this type would also be useful in diverting to the defense industries labor and raw materials now expended in producing luxury goods.

But if we are to avoid injury to the health and efficiency of the low-income groups, it is evident that the bulk of the needed revenue will have to come from the so-called progressive taxes. The President has already indicated that the new taxation should be based on capacity to pay. And apart from some increase in inheritance taxes and a tightening in the gift-tax provisions, said to be recommended by the Treasury, the only important sources of new revenue available under this principle are the income tax and the excess-profits tax. Neither of these can be said in any sense to constitute a burden on production since they are levied only at the final stage, after a profit has been made. It is true that some economists have argued in recent years that these taxes discourage new investment. But since it is in the interest of national defense to discourage investment in non-essential enterprises during the emergency, this has become an argument for rather than against progressive taxation. Special measures have already been taken to offset the effect of such taxes on investment in defense industries.

The political considerations affecting taxation are extremely elastic. In recent years it has been difficult to achieve even moderate increases in the income tax. In an emergency such as we now face some increase is inevitable, although it is doubtful whether it will be large enough to make much of a contribution toward putting defense costs on a pay-as-you-go basis. Some idea of the margin of maneuverability may be had by comparing the federal government's 4.4 per cent basic tax rate with Great Britain's basic rate of 42.5 per cent. If the American income and excess profits levies were raised to the British level, virtually the entire cost of national defense could be met without the need for additional new taxation. This is assuming the retention of the present exemptions of $800 for single persons and $2,000 for families. Reduction of these exemptions to the British level of $400 for single persons and $680 for married couples would yield several billion more.

No such increase in taxes is, of course, within the bounds of political realism. But it is important to know that the money is there if we choose to draft it. And although it may be utopian to speak of financing the defense program on a complete pay-as-you-go basis, the further we go in that direction, the milder will be our post-war headaches.

Spain in Prison

[The author of this article is a woman who was prominent in the socialist movement of her country. After the Hitler invasion she fled to France and, when the Nazi armies entered Paris, tried to get to Lisbon. She was arrested on the Spanish border and thrown into prison. Well acquainted with Spanish as a former teacher of Romance literature, she was able to come close to the prisoners and to write this vivid report of the present spirit of the Spanish people. Although she is now in this country, her identity cannot be revealed.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

I FIRST conceived this article as one that might be called "Prisons in Spain," but as I thought about it I saw that it had to be "Spain in Prison." According to figures given me by the most cautious Spaniards, between two and three million people are in prisons, work-battalions, and prison camps. The strongest impressions one gets are of immense hatred of the government, of the total insecurity and inefficiency of the rulers, and of a suppressed population suffering from famine and police persecution.

"All decent people are in prison," is a frequent consolation offered to old-fashioned women who are upset or ashamed on their arrival there. Certainly I never saw any criminals among the hundreds and hundreds of women in the prisons I lived in, unless those like the half-witted girl and the gitana (gipsy), both of whom had been caught stealing field corn for their starving families, are to be counted as such.

"Where are the criminals?" I asked in one ward, talking with a group of completely non-political factory girls, shop-assistants, and dancers. "Why, outside, of course! They govern us," was the quick reply of seventeen-year-old Remedios, busy arranging the curls of her friend Pilar.

In one of the prisons Concepción, a nice, bright-eyed, black-haired young woman, whom I had been teaching to spell and write her name, had to interrupt her lesson to take the daily walk. I stayed inside as a punishment for not having raised my arm high enough during the singing of the Franco hymn. When she returned, she was in tears. "My husband has been in prison since the civil war," she sobbed. "When my brother came home from France he was sent to a concentration camp as a welcome. My father has been arrested on the same false political charge as I. And this moment I've found my brother-in-law's nightshirt on the water-tap, where we prisoners wash our things! So he, too, is in prison, and he was the only one left to look after the children and the job." "But, my poor dear, perhaps it isn't his nightshirt; they all look alike, don't they"? "No, no. I recognized it; I embroidered his initials on it!"

Hay de todo (There are all sorts of people) can be said of prisoners too. All classes, all kinds, all types of Spaniards are represented within the grim walls. Well-to-do young women with smart frocks, embroidered lace-edged cushions, soft, warm blankets, and as much food as money can now provide in hungry Spain; stout middle-class women, bringing their own mattresses and stiff, old-fashioned white linen nightgowns; college instructors, schoolteachers, writers, physicians, midwives, people of high intellectual level and good political education; peasant women, illiterate and unwashed; ardent factory girls provided with bright lipsticks and even with small instruments for curling their eyelashes; dancers with high-heeled shoes, who never tire of responding to pleas for their wonderful jotás and tangos; young mothers with their babies. Yes, their babies. I saw a charming eighteen-months-old baby in one prison who had been born in another. The vagabonds of the Lumpenproletariat and the incomprehensible, curious tribe of the gitanas are represented too.

High or low, all of us were equal when it came to the prison soup. This is distributed at seven in the morning and seven at night, and is either too thick or too thin, and swimming with cooked peas and loathsome black noodles, or with rotten potatoes or a handful of rice, or a few green leaves, or, occasionally, cow bones. The women eat this disgusting dish out of their tin plates, as they walk slowly up and down a narrow corridor, not even stopping to sit on their cots: they are all hungry and want to get a second plateful the moment the last prisoner is served.

Most of the prison work—technical, administrative, and "cultural" is assigned to the prisoners themselves. They are made responsible for all office work except censorship—and in desperate cases even for that; they do the cooking and run the Economato, the "official" food store in which bad food is sold at high prices. They are also group-wardens (the outside watch is done by military guards), and, grossly hampered by lack of medicines, they are the physicians too, and must be careful not to insist on certain necessary medicines or diet food, lest they be put into the dark cell as nuisances. So they prefer to treat all diseases with cold water, hot water (when it is obtainable), and strong, cheap laxatives.

Spanish prisoners even write and edit a weekly, called Redención (Redemption) because prisoners assigned to editorial work shorten their terms thereby. Certain privileges are granted to encourage subscriptions; for example, one more visiting day a month, if I remember rightly. But as every peseta is precious to those poor, even hungry people—it represents four sardines or four bananas or one hundred grams of almonds—not many copies to be found in the wards.

Redención is rather well written and edited; its articles and cartoons, though largely limited to sports subjects, are good; it is allowed to publish the British war communiqués (otherwise nobody would read it at all) after the German and Italian ones, but of course only as “freely” as the “free” papers in Spain. Naturally, it has space for official articles—an eight-column speech by the Señor General Prison Director, giving a rosy account of Spanish prison life, but insisting on the wholesome effect of capital punishment and warning his audience of prison officials not to be too tender toward the enemies of the state. In one copy I found a small news item: “Twenty prisoners have been shot in the presence of the whole prison population for planning (!) to escape by attacking prison guards.”

Yet even without a Redención coming sometimes two weeks late, you may be sure that prisoners would quickly learn the news of the world and the war, and of Spain, especially anti-fascist news, from visitors, office-holding prisoners, and perhaps from guards. From time to time they may have to swallow some gross lie but on the whole they are in touch with the world.

Passionate discussions, hatred of the axis, fervent vows for England, deep disdain for the Franco government and its clerical backers are heard daily in prison—even from the mouths of politically uneducated women. They don’t know that the Catholic Church in Spain, having given Franco full help, now feels cheated. In the prison churches (and perhaps in all churches), at the most solemn and mystical moment of the mass, when choirs and organ keep silent, the Franco hymn must be played; and at the end of the mass the prisoners must sing it—with outstretched arms.

Educated prisoners talk angrily of the schools the priests destroyed and of the spirit of hypocrisy they introduce everywhere; the factory girls indulge in fantastic dreams of vengeance. In a ward, where a picture of the crucified Christ hung on the wall, an old crumpled peasant woman walked up and down for hours in sullen silence, a kerchief drawn down low over her eyes. Suddenly she stopped in front of the picture and shook her bony fist threateningly at the Christ. A gloomy-looking, plump young woman stood up against the back wall on the evening she arrived in our overcrowded ward, took a rosary out of her pinafore pocket and summoned us all (we were already lying on our dirty mattresses) to pray with her or at least to give the responses. There were growing murmurs, protests, grumbling, until finally a fellow-prisoner went to her and said that the others did not want to pray, and that if they did, they had better do it silently with only their God to hear them.

All this hatred, all this obstinacy and violence in the Spanish people is an answer to the hatred, based on fear, with which the weak tyrants persecute them. The civil war is not ended. Nearly two years after the final surrender the slightest, most absurd political denunciation from anyone is still sufficient cause for imprisonment. Catalina, a pretty young dancer, was denounced as having worked for the Service of Military Investigation. This primitive creature had a fit of hysterical screaming when her fingerprints were taken on her arrival in prison. She thought it a magic way of executing people. The abuelita (little grandmother) with her snow-white hair, quietly knitting the whole day long, was accused of having helped her son escape to France. Whether or not such cases are passed on to the military tribunal, depends on mere chance; any rate the thousands of accused people spend months and years in prison before trial. The political sentences are savage, between five and fifteen years for women, up to thirty years for men.

The rulers’ deep mistrust of the population shows everywhere, in prison and outside. Posters in all state offices tell everybody that it is as important to watch and disclose Free Masons, “the worst enemies of the state,” as to die for the country. Everything free is feared: Free Masons, freethinkers, “You give the fascist salute when I enter the ward, but you are still a freethinker, aren’t you?” shouted one prison officer to the sincere astonishment of the slender French girl he addressed. Is it not mistrust when a Spanish citizen cannot travel in Spain without a safe-conduct guaranteed by two members of the Falange? The Catalan language, for example, is strictly prohibited, not only in the schools, but everywhere. Grim posters face you in every public building: “This is a Spanish office. Speak Spanish!” And yet near these same posters you can very often overhear a conversation between two officers—in Catalan! The wonderful popular dances and songs of Catalonia have been banned—but wherever in Spain I met Catalan women, young or old, I saw them dance and sing their sardanas.

I come to the end of this tale of my prison experiences. Just two last glimpses. It was evening—the last signal had been given for lights out and silence. But now and then, in the big darkened room a beam of light passed across a beautiful Murillo Madonna. It came from a flashlight in the hand of a woman busy searching her chemise for lice. You simply cannot avoid them, so you must catch them—a difficult job as they are nearly invisible. The evening before my release I was in a cell with five young women, nearly all of them political prisoners. I casually pronounce Del Vayo’s name. I shall never forget the excitement, the fear—for me and for themselves—the enthusiastic and burning remembrance.

Next morning I arrived in Madrid, free and eager to see "free Spain." First I went by subway from the station to the Puerta del Sol. The subway is decent, but in the staircase one can see, all along the steps, children sitting or lying in an incredible state of neglect, dirt, and indifference, wrapped up in filthy blankets, begging for centavos. Children are always the main victims of civil war, but in Spain you must add to prison and famine the incapacity of the government to deal with food distribution in an area which after all could be mastered if there were active interest and technical ability. In all the beautifully kept streets and avenues of Madrid are ragged small boys and girls selling useless little things, offering the latest lottery tickets, shouting at the top of their shrill voices, besieging every foodstore, coffeehouse, tea-room, chocolateria, asking the customers for pennies. Misery, famine, and abandonment. Near the station a group of escorted prisoners walk along. People watch them with profound sadness and comprehension. Spain in prison.

But all of them hope and are convinced of a change to come. Every morning in prison, after the monotonous three stanzas of the Franco hymn, which we had to sing standing in line, with outstretched right arms, came the fascist watchwords. "España!" shouted the underwarden. "Una!" replied the prisoners' chorus. The warden again: "España!" "Grande!" came the response. "España!" for the last time. "Libre!" rang out the answer, and surprisingly full and loud it sounded. Not a forced reply, but a menace, a promise.

Missouri Has No Governor

BY IRVING DILLIARD

St. Louis, February 6

MISSOURI has a new Governor and it hasn't. Forrest C. Donnell, Republican, was elected over Lawrence McDaniel, Democrat, last November, but the Democratic majority in the legislature, acting under the whiplash of the Democratic politicians, has prevented Donnell from taking his seat. He should have been inaugurated January 13. Now there is no telling when that ceremony will take place.

This attempt to steal the governorship—for that is exactly what it is—has aroused Missouri as nothing else in state affairs in memory of the oldest political observers. Nothing Boss Pendergast ever did provoked anything like the indignant public reaction. The crudity as well as the stupidity of the Democratic bosses who are responsible is nothing short of incredible. Instead of contesting Donnell's election, which they might well have done on the basis of his thin majority of 3,616 votes, they hit on a plan to keep him out of his seat first and then sustain that action by a partisan presentation of evidence, not from all the ballot boxes, but from such ballot boxes as a controlled legislative committee would decide to investigate. The result is that Lloyd C. Stark is staying on as Governor although his constitutionally limited four-year term has expired.

The background of the present situation begins with Governor Stark's fight on Pendergast. Many Missourians felt that Stark should be continued in the public service and so he became a candidate for the Senate seat, held by Harry S. Truman, a hand-picked choice of the Kansas City boss in 1934. But United States District Attorney Maurice M. Mulligan, who had prosecuted the Kansas City vote fraud cases so successfully, also wanted to be Senator. Ignoring pleas that he run for Governor and thus enable the Democratic ticket to present two boss killers, he ran against Stark and Truman in a three-cornered race for the senatorial nomination. The result was that Stark and Milligan divided the anti-machine vote and Truman was renominated in August and re-elected in November.

The Democratic nomination for Governor, which Milligan could have had, went to Lawrence McDaniel, a popular St. Louis lawyer. But honest doubts began to arise even before McDaniel was nominated. He was Excise Commissioner in St. Louis by appointment of the Democratic Mayor. He held the power of life and death over the liquor outlets. When he resolutely refused to resign as Excise Commissioner during his primary campaign, even after it was pointed out to him that his office had become relatively inactive against violators of liquor regulations, many people were convinced that the saloons and politics were tied up again.

McDaniel became the symbol of political bossism, transferred from Kansas City to St. Louis. His Republican opponent, on the other hand, was a symbol of precisely the opposite sort. An eminently respectable St. Louis lawyer, Donnell had not held public office before. In bar association activities he had been on the side of those seeking to improve professional standards and to better the name of the legal profession before the public. He sought to make the issue one of bossism, but in the excitement of the Roosevelt-Willkie campaign not much attention was paid to the governorship race. Nevertheless, in county after county voters scratched their ballots to vote for Donnell. Conditions being what they were, Missourians felt that their combination of a New Deal President and a Republican governor was an altogether logical choice at the polls.

C. Marion Hulén, chairman of the Democratic State Committee, takes full responsibility for the plan to keep Donnell from his seat, but the fact remains that the state politicians by and large were apathetic until pressure was applied. Even then in many counties the committees failed to meet, let alone take action against Donnell. But when the legislature met early in January, its members were put through the paces by their bosses. St. Louis, for example, has twenty-five members in the two branches, and only one refused to go along with the plan to keep Donnell from the governorship.

The State Constitution makes the Speaker of the State House of Representatives the officer who must open and publish the returns on the governorship election before the legislature can proceed to other business. The Speaker, following Democratic orders, held up the returns, after which the Democratic majorities rammed through a joint resolution to "investigate" Donnell's election, meantime keeping him out of his seat.

A public outcry went up at once. St. Louis and Kansas City newspapers protested. As opinion came in from the rural press, it became clear that country editors, Democratic and Republican alike, were almost unanimously opposed.

Then came the bombshell that left the state stunned. Governor Stark appeared before the legislature to present his delayed valedictory, required by the constitution, and announced at the end, in a postscript, that he had vetoed the "investigation" resolution under his power to pass on all measures calling for the expenditure of state funds. Democratic Attorney General Roy McKittrick, who had already produced one opinion that the barring of Donnell was legal, forthwith ground out another saying Stark had no right to veto the resolution but that he had the power to pass on the appropriation of funds.

At this writing things are in a royal mess. The Democrats are trying to decide whether to start all over again or to go out and try to raise funds among themselves to carry on the "investigation" or to drop the whole business. Meantime, the legislature can't take up any appropriations out of the constitutional order, so that Missouri may soon be confronted with serious legislative questions involving payment of relief funds and the like. Governor Stark continues to sit and will until his constitutional successor takes over. Everyone agrees that nothing of importance in the way of state business can be transacted until the governorship tangle has been cleared away.

Everybody's Business

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

Heresy in High Places

IT IS hardly news when the president of a great corporation makes a speech upholding the system of free enterprise; but it is news when he tells his audience that, if the system is to survive, it must justify itself by providing "total security," and goes on to outline a program which contains much of the essence of the New Deal.

For this reason I propose to discuss an address recently given before the American Institute of Electrical Engineers which, although adequately reported in the New York Times, seems to me to have attracted less attention than it deserves. Its author is Charles E. Wilson who after forty years with General Electric—he started as office boy—succeeded Gerard Swope as president of that corporation a little more than a year ago.

To the average business man, private enterprise is more than an economic system; it is a part of the moral order which, he believes, should be accepted with blind faith. Such a devout believer is shocked by a request for proof that the system works. Sure, he growls, it would work all right if only "that man" in Washington would give it a chance, and then he gives the usual tirade against the New Deal. For somehow the average business man has conveniently forgotten that the people chose the New Deal just because private enterprise had broken down in so many directions. And he fails to understand that the only adequate defense for the economic system he cherishes is a demonstrated capacity to produce and distribute the goods. No free people will long tolerate poverty in the midst of plenty.

The refreshing thing about Mr. Wilson's speech was that it recognized and attempted to meet this challenge. Its whole stress was on the opportunity and the obligation of the controllers of private enterprise to show that this system could provide "total security." Better still, it ignored that easy refuge for the perplexed business man—complaint against the government—and thrust aside the defeatism which is almost epidemic among business spokesmen at the present time. This defeatism takes the form of an assumption that the defense boom must inevitably be followed by complete economic collapse and that there is really nothing that can be done about it.

Mr. Wilson, on the other hand, believes that intelligent planning can carry us through the economic perils of both the current emergency and its aftermath. His program recognizes four stages, each requiring a special strategy. At the present time, he suggests, we are in a recovery stage which is likely to continue until the Federal Reserve Board index of industrial production averages 140 over a two-month period. (In December it was about 136.) Until this milestone is passed we need to avoid restraints on employment and on expanding purchasing power. The development of new inventions and new products should be encouraged, rural electrification and industrialized farming should be promoted, and, finally, new sources of raw materials should be developed, by subsidy if necessary, in Latin American countries.

Next, according to Mr. Wilson, will come a "stabilization stage" during which we shall approach capacity production and must therefore take steps to keep a balance between the flow of purchasing power and the flow of goods and so avoid inflation. The maintenance of a full supply of non-durable goods must continue, but there should be credit controls to restrict long-term commitments on durable consumer goods and non-essential personal loans. At the same time modernization of all means of production, including utilities and transport, should be speeded up so as to make possible an increased supply of goods and services at less cost. At this stage, also, non-defense government activities should be gradually curtailed and a larger proportion of the budget covered by taxation. Economic development of Latin America should be extended, with efforts to promote industrial enterprise in the temperate zone.

After the Federal Reserve index has averaged 145 for two months Mr. Wilson thinks we shall have reached a "backlog-building stage" at which part of the demand for goods must be dammed up to provide a reservoir of unfilled non-essential wants ready to tap when diminished defense expenditure begins to check the rate of production. New restraints on consumer credit will now be required and, in addition, business investment for non-defense purposes should be checked. Personal and business savings should be encouraged and in this connection there should be increases in social security and unemployment insurance payments accompanied by extended coverage and benefits; medical and hospitalization insurance on a national scale should be provided for all unable to purchase such protection from private organizations; and, finally, there should again be increases in taxation and a drastic curtailment in government investments unconnected with defense.

To what heights he expects production to rise during this period Mr. Wilson does not say, but his fourth and last stage, during which "the free enterprise system will meet its most serious challenge," will be heralded by a decline in the industrial index to an average of 150 for two months. Now will be the time to promote consumption by every possible device. There must be more goods and more services for more people at less cost," and first of all there must be more and better housing. At the same time there must be intensified industrial modernization and conversion of surplus defense plants for the production of peacetime goods. Finally there must be permanent government public works.

The inclusion of this last item is an interesting tribute to the necessity for government intervention if a balanced economy is to be achieved, and I wish Mr. Wilson had been a little more expansive on this point. I should also like to see greater elaboration of his views on pricing policy. He appears to disagree with the theory held by most big industrialists that price maintenance is more important than production maintenance, but he does not tell us how, in a semi-monopolized economy, a more flexible price structure is to be established. Perhaps he should have included in his fourth stage a bigger appropriation for Thurman Arnold's sharpshooters.

However, the speech as a whole gives a forthright lead to business in looking forward instead of backward. And not to be overlooked is Mr. Wilson's insistence that private enterprise must accommodate itself to the democratically expressed wishes of the people. "An eternal essential," he says, is "universal respect for the rules which the people, through their freely chosen representatives, establish for the protection of their rights; which is, of course, only another way of saying universal respect for the sanctity and spirit of the laws of our land." Detroit papers please copy!

In the Wind

IN A STORY filed from Montreal on February 4, Pertinax, the French journalist, reported Laval as admitting that 90 per cent of France was not behind him: The original version of that story is somewhat different. Laval, in a talk with Göring, is said to have told the Marshal that he had the support of most of France in his anti-British, anti-Pétain stand. "Don't be foolish," Göring replied, "we know that over 90 per cent of France hates you and wants Britain to win."

SOCIETY NOTE: Jasper McLevy, Socialist Mayor of Bridgeport, has been entertaining Prince Otto von Hapsburg.

PRESS NOTES: A new left-wing magazine, U. S. Week, will appear on April 1. Published in Milwaukee and financed by the William E. Dodd foundation, its contributors will include William E. Dodd, Jr., son of the former Ambassador to Germany, Leo Huberman, Richard O. Boyer, Sophie Boyer, Marian Bachrach, and Doris Berger, daughter of the former Socialist Congressman from Wisconsin. . . . Modern Industry, edited by Harwood Merrill, will make its appearance at about the same time. It is expected to be a serious rival to Fortune.

SEQUEL: As was reported in The Nation two weeks ago, Roy Howard has threatened to "break" Willkie because of his vigorous support of aid to Britain. When advertisers complained to Howard about his attacks on Willkie, Howard is reported to have telephoned the former Republican candidate and said, "I know you wouldn't want to injure me." He then suggested that he and Mrs. Howard should see Willkie off on the Clipper and have their pictures taken together. Willkie refused.

ACCORDING to the Communists, every isolationist who is not a party member or a fellow-traveler is a concealed interventionist. When Colonel Lindbergh testified recently in Washington, the Daily Worker headlined the story, "Lindbergh Claims He Is Against Lend-Lease Bill."

D'ARCY COOPER, president of Unilever, Ltd., the great soap and margarine trust, and organizer of the Anglo-German Fellowship, has been in this country on a secret financial mission.

[The $5 prize for the best item in January goes to Mr. R. S. of New York City for his story about General Franco and the State Department, published on January 11.]

A Native at Large

BY JONATHAN DANIELS

Housing for Everyone

WHAT Mrs. Roosevelt said about the inadequacy of housing in the crowded defense towns made more impression on me, I think, because I read it on a rainy Sunday as the train moved in Alabama from Montgomery to Mobile. The fields were brown or gully-red. The ponds were alternately red and a rain-gray. But the cabins on the farms were all mule-brown, unpainted, and looked in the rain as if they were leaky and cracked for the wind.

As Mrs. Roosevelt told the Public Housing Conference, the situation is serious. The housing in many of the towns, where defense spending has congregated men eager for wages, is either wretched or a form of highway robbery in rents. These facts are not altered by the statement of Defense Housing Coordinator Charles Francis Palmer that sociology is not part of his job. They are not altered by the amusement of naval officers—broadcast from Norfolk by the Associated Press—over reports that many men in that area are sleeping three shifts to one bed, and that Hudson River steamers have been brought to Norfolk to provide living quarters for hundreds of families. There may have been cases of the "hot flop" bed rotation system, but not many, the officers thought. Negotiations to bring one Hudson River boat to Norfolk to house single men were under way but they had not yet brought the boat to town. It was needed, nevertheless.

Mrs. Roosevelt is right, as she so often is, but the tragic thing is that in so many of the crowded defense towns the housing is not much worse than normal housing the workers gladly left for the jobs and the pay. A queer thing, also, is that, in general, the housing seems the best in defense towns where there has been the most complaint and is certainly the worst where hardly any complaint has been heard at all. I know that some defense housing in industrial cities is bad. There has been crowding in them. Rents have gone up, and some of those who oppose defense housing projects are getting the higher rents. But such city housing is, at its worst, remarkably good beside that from which men in Mississippi and Maine, and other rural states, commute in jalopies to build new camps and new ships.

Defense has dramatically crowded the housing problem around its camps and essential plants. It is patriotically disturbing now to see such crowding. I wish all the winter travelers to increasingly pleasure-crowded Miami were required to go by the little town of Stark, Florida, which the construction of Camp Blanding has packed like a sort of civic sardine can. The crowding there, I think, would impress even those who travel so far to be part of a costlier Coney Island crowding on Miami Beach. But even then, I'm afraid, they might fail to see that bad housing is not so much a new and important aspect of defense as it is an old and sad aspect of democracy.

People who are suddenly concerned about the housing situation around the building of destroyers in Bath, Maine, cannot have seen the old, long-occupied houses on Maine farms with roofs sagging like the backbones of starving horses. Conditions around camps and powder factories in the South are bad. They have been bad for a long time. In one representative Southern county a study of the shelter of little farmers showed that one-third of the cabins have no window sashes, one-half no window panes. Two-thirds of them have leaky roofs. Only two out of every hundred of them have fly-proof privies—and the majority of these were recently erected by the WPA. Even the crowding is not new; it does not even seem deeply disturbing to those who share it or see it. (Sometimes it is "quaint.") The biggest families live in the poorest shelters in America. Poverty can crowd people into too little space as effectually as a national effort to create military power. And the school and hospital facilities available to most people in such housing have for years been worse than any deficiencies that defense's quick crowding may be expected to create anywhere now.

Perhaps as we prepare to defend democracy we must recognize that there is an absolute difference between the housing of defense and the housing of democracy itself. Undoubtedly in a push for production there is a relationship between the condition of the workers and the quality and the pace of their work. The most essential housing may be that nearest the most essential jobs. All that makes sense. But it should be recognized as a sort of American choice between guns and butter, as it is a choice between arms-plant people and just people who produce the less exciting things like fibers and food. Of course, America needs defense housing, swiftly and in volume, but this does not mean that a nation preparing to defend democracy can forget it needs—and lacks—housing for democracy too. Even at a time of preparation for total war the concept of decent housing for all the people should not be discarded.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Friends of Dr. Johnson

JOHNSON WITHOUT BOSWELL. A Contemporary Portrait of Samuel Johnson. Edited by Hugh Kingsmill. Knopf. $2.50.

MR. KINGSMILL, author a few years ago of an entertaining popular biography of Samuel Johnson, has here the happy idea of collecting into one volume the most illuminating and amusing anecdotes of the Doctor not recounted by Boswell. Little or none of the material is, to be sure, either new or even particularly inaccessible, but Mr. Kingsmill has arranged it well, in chronological order and with the briefest of annotations, to make a delightful book.

Much has of course been written concerning the extent to which Boswell's portrait is accurate and complete, and Boswell himself has been represented as everything from a transparent fool whose own nullity enabled him to transmit a perfectly literal image, to a consummate artist who created the accepted image of Johnson by skilfully synthesizing selected elements into a predetermined pattern. "Johnson Without Boswell" inevitably suggests again the questions at issue and confirms what has always seemed evident to me, namely, that there is little difficulty in harmonizing the various accounts of Johnson, provided only the bare minimum of allowance is made for differences in temperament between the various reporters. Mrs. Piozzi, Fanny Burney, Anna Seward, and the others naturally saw Johnson through their own temperaments; moreover, each made him a slightly different person by her very presence. But the differences are surprisingly slight rather than surprisingly great. He was a little gayer, a little more worldly with Mrs. Piozzi, a trifle kittenish when conversing with that devilishly clever little snob Fanny Burney. But he is recognizably the same man, and even the account of his conversation with the Quaker lady—given by the notoriously unfriendly Anna Seward and probably the most unattractive item in the whole long list of Johnsoniana—is not unbelievable.

Only one important element in the coloring which Boswell gives seems to me to have been perhaps insufficiently allowed for. Bozzy was a furious rake and an amateur of piquant personal relationships. Because he was tickled to think that he was a chosen intimate of The Great Moralizer he plays the situation up by emphasizing and perhaps overemphasizing the extent to which Johnson was most Johnson in moments of moralizing pontification, and he tends to underemphasize, not perhaps the great man's wit, but at least his superb sense of fun. Everybody knows the phrase from "Rasselas" which declares that "The remedy for the ills of life is palliative, rather than radical"; but it is a mistake not to realize that Johnson, who was no ascetic and no puritan, believed almost as much in the effectiveness of the palliatives as he did in the radical misery of life. Fun and food came high, next perhaps to literature, in the list of those things which made existence endurable.

Characteristically, it is in Mrs. Piozzi, not in Boswell, that one finds the reply, reprinted by Mr. Kingsmill, which Johnson made to the friend who feared that confinement for a mental disorder would undermine the general health of Christopher Smart by depriving him of exercise: "Exercise! I never heard that he used any: he might, for aught I know, walk to the alehouse; but I believe he was always carried home again." And it was also Mrs. Piozzi who told the story of the new-rich young man who came to Johnson to ask how he might add a suitable amount of learning to his other accomplishments. The talk turned upon natural history and upon the distinction between oviparous and viviparous animals. "And the cat here, Sir," asked the young man about to devote himself to knowledge, "pray in which class is she?" "You would do well," replied the doctor, "to look for some person who would be always about you, Sir, who is capable of explaining such matters, and not come to us to know whether the cat lays eggs or not: get a discreet man to keep you company, there are many who would be glad of your table and fifty pounds a year."

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Gladiatorial

ARENA. By Hallie Flanagan. Duell, Sloan and Pearce. $3.

HALLIE FLANAGAN'S Federal Theater Project, as her scenario-record of it now makes a matter of exciting fact, was a central and dominant experience in modern theater history. It was the most extensive use ever made in this country—and possibly in the world—of the theater as an instrument of social therapy and public education. And by its free play through every existing kind of American theater, much of it on the most experimental fronts, the project pushed forward noticeably the development of theater forms and the rewelding of the theater arts.

The work-relief philosophy which fostered the project implied, of course, and aimed at just such a two-fold accomplishment. The primary tenet of that belief is that wages paid a man for doing his chosen work are a more economical expenditure than hand-outs of demoralizing home-dole. A close corollary is that the end-product of his work will be of value in itself. It was not too hard to find engineers and production experts who could do this two-horse riding: give first attention to employment-rehabilitation of workers and also manage to produce a good viaduct, housing unit, tin of beef, or quilt. But in this country where pioneer distrust and Puritan clucking do not yet see the theater as a normal part of life (and indeed finally would not accept the Theater Project as part of the Works Program) Hallie Flanagan's directorship seems like a miracle: a profound social sensibility running always beside an acute artistic consciousness, a double vision which was matched with a double ability to actualize. But then, such miracles occurred so frequently in the first years of the New Deal that they seemed almost to be a part of calculated government planning.

The Theater, along with the Music, Art, and Writers' Projects, came into being in the summer of 1935. Mrs. Flanagan's first arena was Washington during that torrid carnival of red-tape confetti. As I remember, it took Roman fortitude just to get through an order for an electric fan. But here she set up the United States government in show business, employed a cast of ten thousand in forty-eight states, put on a children's-Negro-Yiddish-religious-vaudeville-circus-puppet-dance-radio-drama, which ran for four years, entertained one-fifth of the country's whole population, and showed a profit. As a Guggenheim student of Europe's social theaters, she knew all the answers there were; but in this job you wrote, learned, taught the instruction-book as you went, each day, every day. Based on ■ belief in the rooted growth of regional theaters like Pennsylvania's Hedgerow, North Carolina's Playmakers, the Cleveland and Pasadena Playhouses, the WPA plan created a network of central theater projects throughout the country, each serving as a capital for its whole section or state. From time to time national productions—"It Can't Happen Here," "One-Third of a Nation"—cut across and united the work of these units. One indication of how well they worked, if such demonstration were needed, is that before their close in 1939, 2,600 theater workers had been returned to the commercial theater.

"Other colonists will come," writes Mrs. Flanagan in the face of that needless, gigantically wasteful, criminally ignorant Congressional action which terminated the Federal Theater. To such colonists—and that means all future American theater-people—she names as the project's greatest bequests: the discovery of a vast new audience who want theater; the decentralization, away from Broadway, into small indigenous units; the forging of a means of understanding and communication for almost every element in our population. "Such ■ theater," she says, "is the necessarily many-voiced speaking of democracy—an illustration and bulwark of it—this democracy which is never won but has always to be won."

The stage itself was Mrs. Flanagan's second arena. Here that taste which had distinguished the work of the Vassar Experimental Theater, again exercised its strength, though mostly from the wings and aisles. More than mere "good" taste, Mrs. Flanagan's is a perceptive intelligence of the "terrifying implications," the explosive change that touches every part of living now—and the conviction that the theater must grow up to reflect this or rightly dwindle into a museum piece. The Federal Project revived widely those matrices of theater energy—vaudeville, circus, and spectacle. Productions of the best classical and modern plays were "rethought rather than remembered"; and the still tentative poets', dancers', and radio dramas had more serious reading and frequent trial than ever before. Orson Welles worked out his streamline technique on a WPA Harlem "Macbeth," a "Faustus." That new montage of theater devices, the Living Newspaper, through various editions evolved a theater form which in Mrs. Flanagan's opinion and that of many critics is the most considerable discovery of this century, capable of a rich development.

Humorous and informed, "Arena" reads more like a play-script than a government report. In the deep sense of the words, the project was theater: mess of raw material; giant obstacles of temperament, opposition, inertia; the slow, slow shaping to the action-line seen only in the director's imagination; and finally the running vehicle, the show, the thing—and its curtain. Through it all emerges Mrs. Flanagan as a figure active in every one of the forty-odd situations she quotes on the title-page as synonymous with "arena": platform, hippodrome, playground, battle-field, airport, no man's land, scene of action, theater. In 1921 Yeats wrote to Lady Gregory that he had given the Irish people a theater, but in so doing he had missed finding his own ideal poet's theater. For Mrs. Flanagan no such division exists. Her notion of the theater is the ancient one; theater and life make one, create and reflect each other. Because "Arena" shows this truth and this person, as well as for its bank of facts, it will become, surely, the first handbook of the national American theater.

SHERMAN CONRAD

Over the Burma Road

INTO CHINA. By Eileen Bigland. The Macmillan Company. $3.

MRS. BIGLAND was the first Western woman to travel into free China over the Burma Road. If this does not sound like the basis for an absorbing book, it is only because no one who has not made the trip or read of it can imagine the primitive hardships, the danger, the sordid adventures encountered on the journey. Mrs. Bigland made it early in 1939. Not only was the road not really completed, but she traveled it in the middle of the rainy season which added not a little to her trials. As a result, a trip which is supposed to take three or four days took her more than a fortnight. Although she started in a brand-new bus, breakdowns were too numerous to count. On several occasions she and her party were detained three or four days in frontier villages, without accommodations and practically without food. They were delayed by landslides, by breakdowns, and by sickness. A number of the trucks and buses in her convoy never got through. Some were swallowed in the deep gorges along the edge of the slippery, muddy highway. The remainder simply broke down, and there were no tools to fix them.

A substantial part of the trip was through the fever belt. In some of the villages almost the entire population seemed to be down with malignant malaria. Along the road her party encountered twelve engineers who had lain for eight days in an open, broken-down truck. All twelve were desperately ill. They were taken aboard the bus, but only four of them survived the long trip over the mountains to the nearest hospital. Several other fever victims were picked up from time to time, but few survived. The dead were pushed overboard into the nearest ravine. Social and economic conditions in many of the villages were as wretched as health conditions. Few more poignant stories of human misery have been penned than this picture of the situation in these remote villages on the frontier of China—villages that combine all the horrors of ghost towns of an ancient civilization and of boom towns of a modern war.

Perhaps because of this abnormal introduction to China, Mrs. Bigland, throughout the book, pictures the country as a never-ending series of contrasts between the sublime and the sordid. She is enthralled by its magnificent vistas, its architecture, and, above all, by the philosophy and basic humanity of the Chinese. But at the same time she records more ugliness, more cruelty, exploitation, and plain stupidity than any other writer on modern China. There can be no doubt of her sincerity or of the essential accuracy of her observation. But there are times when she seems to be using contrast as a somewhat artificial literary device to enhance, quite unnecessarily, the reader's interest. The result is not wholly fair to China.

Only a person who has made the trip on the Burma Road in the rainy season can testify as to the accuracy and balance of this part of her story, but it bears all the earmarks of authenticity and is as absorbing a tale as has ever been told by a modern traveler. But when it comes to China proper, where she remained only a few days, Mrs. Bigland is betrayed into making certain generalizations which are patently untrue. For example, she tells a lurid tale of a rat being tortured by a street entertainer while "the crowd swayed and shouted in ecstasy." She quotes an old-time foreign resident as saying that this "is the favorite street corner entertainment in China." This reviewer is not prepared to say that the incident did not occur, but in his own six years of experience in China, mostly in the interior, he encountered nothing of the sort. The same is true of other gruesome incidents which are presented as typical of China.

Shortcomings of this kind are to be expected in a travel book, and are more than offset by the vividness which can be contributed only by the newcomer to a country. And despite criticisms that at times seem unfair, there can be no doubt that Mrs. Bigland is intensely sympathetic with China in its life-and-death struggle against Japan. Her story is not a pretty one, but it is essentially a true one and is of absorbing interest.

MAXWELL S. STEWART

A Georgian Poet

POEMS 1930-1940. By Edmund Blunden. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

IT HAS been said of the Georgian poets that they turned to the countryside for subjects because, with their limited poetic equipment, there was nowhere else for them to go. But it might also be thought that by an unconscious premonition they went to find the one England they could love, before they were called on to defend all England. Of these, Edmund Blunden was one of the best, for he was, beyond any possibility of choice, a pastoral poet. His first poems appeared in 1914; his present poems are like a recollection of that time. Since then the English countryside has diminished and, if now threatened by another war, has never for the poet ceased to be haunted by the dead battalions of the last war. But if his poems are haunted, they are not haunting; they are mild and comforting, not exhilarating. They are well made, but the freshness that once pervaded them has somehow gone. The volume might very properly have been brought to a close by the elegy on King George V. For it is, even though only now published, Georgian poetry.

JOHN PEALE BISHOP

BARGAINS in BOOKS

UP TO 75% OFF FORMER PRICES

Offered by America's Oldest Mail-Order Book House

ORIGINAL EDITIONS—NOT REPRINTS

1. AMERICAN INDIAN MYTHOLOGY. North American Mythology. By H. B. Alexander. Profusely illus. Archaeological Inst. 1936. A very thorough and most authentic study of the beliefs, myths, etc., of the Indian tribes of N. America. Our special price, $3.88

2. AUDUBON'S BIRDS. Each box contains 50 magnificent full-color reproductions, 9 1/4" x 12 1/4", of American birds painted by Audubon. Grouped by a famous Ornithologist into their various localities. Each box of 50 color prints, for only $2.98

Here is your opportunity to get the famous Audubon color prints of the birds in your vicinity.

(A) Atlantic Coast (Water Fowl and Shore Birds). (B) California. (C) Canada. (D) Florida. (E) The Great Plains (Oklahoma, Kansas, Nebraska, So. Dakota, No. Dakota). (F) Illinois. (G) Indiana. (H) Kentucky and Tennessee. (I) Maryland. (J) Mexico. (K) Michigan. (L) Minnesota. (M) Missouri. (N) New England. (O) New Jersey. (P) New York. (Q) Ohio. (R) Pacific Coast (Water Fowl and Shore Birds). (S) Pennsylvania. (T) The Rocky Mountains. (U) The South. (V) Texas. (W) Virginia. (X) Washington and Oregon. (Y) Wisconsin. Order the collections that are nearest to where you live. Be sure to specify sections wanted. Ideal for framing.

3. RUBAIYAT OF OMAR KHAYYAM. Rendered into English verse by Edward Fitzgerald. Profusely illustrated with magnificent full-color plates by the famous Persian artist, Hamzeh Abdullah Kar. hand-mounted and ready for framing. Bound in full levant grained fabricoid. Boxed. ($10.00). $1.98

4. THE VIOLINIST'S MUSIC SHELF. The famous 11 vol. library of the World's Greatest Music (for the violin) from Bach through Beethoven, Mozart, Chopin, etc., to Tchaikowsky. 339 most important compositions of all time, practically the entire standard repertoire of violin music. Piano accompaniment included. Over 2,000 pages. Standard sheet music size, 9" x 12". Semi-stiff binding. Harcourt, 1937-'34. ($20.00) but having 11 sheet music value of over $200.00. The 8 vol. set, $8.89

5. GOULD'S HISTORY OF FREEMASONRY Throughout the World. With over 450 interesting illus. 8 1/4" x 11". In 6 vols. "The story of Masonry throughout the world, since its earliest days, is one of the most fascinating narratives ever written." ($49.00). The 6 vol. set, for $17.88

6. THE PIANIST'S MUSIC SHELF. The famous library of the World's Great Music (for the piano) from Bach through Beethoven, Mozart, Chopin, etc., to Tchaikowsky. 300 most important compositions of all time, practically the entire standard repertoire of piano music. Over 1,200 pages. Standard sheet music, size 9" x 12". Semi-stiff binding. Harcourt, 1937-'34. ($15.00) but having 6 sheet music value of over $150.00. The 6 vol. set, $6.88

7. ELBERT HUBBARD'S LITTLE JOURNEYS to the Homes of the Great. In 14 illustrated volumes. Size 6 1/4" x 8 1/2". Containing 183 brief biographies of the most famous lives ever lived. One of the most popular sets ever published in America. (Formerly sold by subscription only at $80.00.) The 14-volume set $14.88
Only $14.88

8. FAMOUS VAN GOGH PAINTINGS IN FULL COLOR. Zuave—Still Life—Cornfield—Blossoming Apple Orchard. Four famous Van Goghs beautifully reproduced in full color. Ideal for framing—they look like original oil paintings. ($10.00) Our special price $1.98
for all.

9. ELLEN TERRY and BERNARD SHAW. Edited by C. St. John. 1st edition, limited to 3,000 numbered copies, 6 1/2" x 10 1/4". Boxed. Putnam. "The outstanding literary sensation of recent years." "Ellen Terry emerges amazingly as the best woman letter-writer in the language." —Saturday Review. ($30.00) Only $3.88

10. CURRIER AND IVES COLOR PRINTS. Magnificent lithograph reproductions in full color. Measure up to 13 1/2" x 18". "When framed they look just like the originals which fetch hundreds of dollars at art auctions." ($10.00) The 12 prints, only $1.49

11. THE ART OF MARRIAGE. By J. F. Hayden, B.Sc. Extensive, frank, complete, this book includes notable chapters on unequalized sexuality, frigidity of wives, sexual satiety, prematurity, lack of art in procedure, impotence, prudery, etc. Also contains the fullest treatise on Frigidity that can be found today, as well as on Reservatus. Illustrated, Revised, Enlarged. ($2.50). 69c.

THE UNION LIBRARY ASSOCIATION N-38

Established 1884

121-123 East 24th Street, New York, N. Y.

Gentlemen: I enclose $..... for which please send me the items I have encircled below, delivery charges prepaid.

1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11

(Mark circle around items desired)

☐ Please send me FREE Catalog No. 818-N, containing hundreds of equally unusual Book Bargains—just off the press!

Name

Address

City State

Banking: Two Views

MONEY IN MOTION: THE SOCIAL FUNCTION OF BANKING. By Arthur C. Holden. Harper & Brothers. $2.50.

THE SEARCH FOR FINANCIAL SECURITY. By Robert B. Warren. Columbia University Press. $1.25.

THESE two recent semi-popular works on banking cover different ground from different points of view. Mr. Holden, an architect by profession, is primarily interested in banking reform as a method of raising and stabilizing the level of economic activity; while Professor Warren has "undertaken to explain the recent changes in our money and banking system in terms of the word 'security'." It may be remarked parenthetically that some of Mr. Holden's comments about the present status and importance of the banker suffer from a failure to take adequate account of the very changes which Professor Warren places in the forefront of his analysis.

Mr. Holden appears to have no doubt that the root cause of our economic troubles is to be found in a faulty mechanism for financing long-term investments. If I understand his argument correctly, he believes that there are two chief weaknesses in this mechanism: (1) it maintains the cost of long-term capital at too high a level; and (2) it does not assure a strict relationship between repayment of principle and the using up of physical assets. The result is that despite relatively high carrying charges, society's debt burden tends to grow cumulatively and in such a way as to constitute a chronic threat to economic stability. The remedy advocated envisages the establishment of a capital reserve system to occupy a position in the long-term field analagous to that now occupied by the federal reserve system in the short-term field. Its functions would be to bring down the level and reshape the structure of long-term interest rates on the one hand, and to introduce sound practices with respect to amortization on the other. The plan, as Mr. Holden recognizes, has a great deal in common with the proposal for a new system of capital credit banks which was laid before the Temporary National Economic Committee by A. A. Berle, Jr., and which enjoys considerable favor in certain quarters in Washington.

As this brief summary indicates, Mr. Holden confines his attention almost exclusively to the terms on which long-term capital is made available for investment purposes. Therein lies the weakness of both analysis and proposed remedy. When the economic problems of the last decade are considered in their true historical perspective, it seems pretty clear that the distinguishing feature of this period has been a serious dearth of opportunities for profitable investment, or, in other words, a stagnant demand for capital. There is unfortunately no reason to suppose that reform of our financial machinery would make a significant contribution to the solution of this problem. That Mr. Holden ignores this difficulty altogether is no accident. His economic theorizing never gets beyond the realm of the circulation of commodities and the technical role of money and credit therein. Nowhere does he press through to the underlying relations of production: the determinants of wages and profits, the relationship between aggregate consumption and aggregate investment, etc. Under the circumstances it is only to be expected that his proposals for reform, though interesting and intelligent in themselves, fail to touch upon the basic economic issues of modern society.

Professor Warren has performed a useful service in tracing the changing nature of the functions of the banking system in the period since 1914. Before the first World War the function of a bank was largely the financing of commercial transactions. Since then, however, the bank has become increasingly dependent, directly and indirectly, on bonds and stocks and hence on the security markets. With the virtual stoppage of new corporate issues in the 1930's, the banks have been obliged to turn more and more toward the federal government until today, as Professor Warren says, "the business of banking is the financing of the United States Treasury." This is an extremely interesting development with important implications for the whole structure of our economy. In the book before us, however, Professor Warren has limited himself to one small aspect of the problem, namely, its significance for the solvency of the banking system and the security of the depositor. In these two respects he seems to think, and probably correctly, that all foreseeable dangers have been fully guarded against. One may hope that in the future he will return to the more general issues which his treatment inevitably suggests.

PAUL M. SWEETZ

Don't Miss An Issue!

To keep THE NATION coming regularly

just fill out and sign this form

THE NATION • 55 FIFTH AVE. • NEW YORK

Please enter my subscription for the period indicated below. I inclose $.....

☐ One Year $5

☐ Two Years $8

☐ Three Years $11

Special Introductory Offer

to new subscribers only

☐ 13 Weeks $1

Name

Street

City

State

Extra postage per year: Foreign and Canadian, $1.00

2-15-41

Genghis Khan

THE EARTH IS THE LORD'S. By Taylor Caldwell. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.75.

THE indefatigable author of "Dynasty of Death" and "The Eagles Gather" has written another long novel about ruthless schemers and conquerors, but for the munitions-making Bouchards she has substituted the Mongol scourge Temujin, who became Genghis Khan, and the semi-legendary Prester John, whom she depicts as a wily, cowardly, conscienceless scoundrel.

In spite of a needlessly lush style, a lot of pseudo-archaic dialogue that does not always ring true, and a great deal of melodramatic intrigue with motives that sound complex but are really oversimplified, the narrative has a barbaric rush and verve; and from its many unflinching accounts of gruesome battle scenes and murders you would never guess that the author is a woman. Furthermore, in Temujin's lust for power and conquest, and his worship of relentless force, you are obviously supposed to recognize the morbid psychology of the dictator-complex—though, as the writer protests in a coy little disclaimer, "any resemblance between the characters of this novel and personages living today is indignantly denied by the author! Ghost of Genghis Khan should notify author if such libelous rumor begins to circulate."

LOUIS B. SALOMON

Photographs of New York

ROBIN CARSON, part-English, part-Spanish photographer, is not one of your manufacturers of "stunning" prints, but a quick, bold, bitter observer whose camera records vivid personal perceptions. Some of his studies rank with the photography most alertly and trenchantly descriptive of New York. Their energetic lines, marks, shapes, and hues are wonderfully graphic; their caustic and incisive comment reveals, along with the appearance of the city, some of the very quality and nature of its life. Especially gratifying is his capacity to project inner states through movement, through well-articulated motions of heads. His pictures lack fine print quality and imaginativeness—certainly his black and white design at best is less than original and is sometimes neglected—yet one cannot refrain from thinking of them in connection with the outstanding camera studies of Manhattan types such as those of Baron de Meyer and the young Paul Strand. It's the decadent contemporary New York—coarse, shoddy, dull, half worn out in its very lubriciousness—that Carson mainly depicts. The feeling he most frequently projects is that of inadequacy, the outcrop of unemployment even more than of inefficiency. This is but to say that his experience is pretty much everyone's today. His little exhibition current at the New School for Social Research is a must: it includes, along with a half-dozen sculpturesque studies of artists' heads, some of his liveliest New York photographs—West Forty-second Street, elegant Fifth Avenue; Sixth Avenue of the employment agencies; side-walks of Little Puerto Rico and the East Side; theaters and night clubs, and their types and typical incidents.

PAUL ROSENFELD

Lafayette Overture

15-TUBE RADIO PHONOGRAPH with GARRARD RECORD CHANGER

$245

To you who will not accept second-best, Lafayette is proud to offer this masterpiece. An outstanding achievement in modern custom-built radio, the Overture will be just as modern tomorrow, for it gives you every known advance in high-fidelity broadcast and record reproduction—in a beautiful English Regency console, styled in rare hand-rubbed mahogany. We invite you to see and hear the Overture at your Lafayette showroom, or write for a detailed illustrated description.

Lafayette Radio

100 SIXTH AVENUE • NEW YORK, N. Y.
901 W. JACKSON BLVD., CHICAGO • 265 PEACHTREE ST., ATLANTA
110 FEDERAL ST., BOSTON • 28 CENTRAL AVE., NEWARK
542 E. FORDHAM RD., BRONX • 90-08 166th ST., JAMAICA, L. I.

To Beat Hitler—

WHAT DOES BRITAIN NEED?

FIVE FOLD AID TO BRITAIN

... to save her and keep us out of war

By FRITZ STERNBERG

DO YOU KNOW Germany is exacting more planes, steel and goods from conquered Europe than we are sending England?

Most Americans agree that, in our own defense, we must aid Britain, but—Here is the First Book to Tell How Much Aid England Must Have to Beat Hitler.

The author of "Fivefold Aid to Britain" is an internationally famous war economist, whose first warning in his famous book, "Germany and the Lightning War," Britain failed to heed until too late. His new book may be our last warning against Hitlerism. Read this factual evidence, graphically illustrated, and know how we can tip the scales to help Britain win and keep the U. S. out of war. Get your copy today.

$ 1

WITH CHARTS, GRAPHS AND PICTURES

THE JOHN DAY COMPANY, N. Y.

DRAMA

The Irish of It

AFTER the first three minutes it wouldn't be very hard to guess that "Tanyard Street" (Little Theater) comes to us by way of the Abbey in Dublin. Never having been, myself, any closer to Ireland than the harbor of Cobh, I don't know just how much stylization is involved in the making of the stage Irishman as the Abbey conceives him, but I do know that the characters of an Irish play have become almost as standardized as those of the commedia del arte.

There are usually three men and three women. First, there is the virile young man who distrusts priests and has an eye for the girls; second, the intense young man with a mystical turn and a love of his country; third, Mr. Barry Fitzgerald, a comic rapsallian well along in years. The three women are, respectively, a soubrette to flirt with the first man, an intense young girl to love the second, and, finally, a hard-working wife to support the third. Any others who may be introduced for the sake of variety are strictly minor and do not have much to do with the plot.

All this being true, such plays ought to be easy to deal with were it not for the fact that even rather inferior specimens of the genre so often manage to be flavorful and interesting. Even aside from its conventionality, there are several reasons why "Tanyard Street" is not really a very good play, at least for American audiences. It turns around the case of a wounded soldier who is cured by what looks like a miracle but possibly isn't, and one is never quite sure just what the point which the author seems trying to make really is. Even if one did know, all this talk about the Church and its priests is obviously a good deal more exciting in a country like Ireland, which is seething with religious disputation, than it is in New York or than, for that matter, it would be in a country where established Catholicism was not a storm center. And yet I must report that I followed the play with a good deal more interest than seemed to me wholly explicable at the time, and I recommend it at least to those whose prejudice is favorable rather than unfavorable to the Irish school.

All this is certainly in considerable measure due to the inevitable but grateful presence of Barry Fitzgerald who has walked right out of something by Sean O'Casey and manages to be so funny as a hypochondriacal martyr to indigestion and soda bicarb that he very nearly steals the show. Yet he has so little to do with the plot that he wanders right out of the play again before it reaches its last big scene and leaves one ribald spectator wondering why the Virgin couldn't have paused a moment during her visitation to do something for his heartburn. Two other former Abbey players familiar to Broadway audiences, Arthur Shields and Aileen O'Connor, also do good work and so, for that matter, do the others, including Margo, who surprises everybody by turning up as a colleen.

But it isn't all the acting. Louis D'Alton, the author, has obviously picked up some useful hints from the works of other Abbey playwrights and he proves again that the Irish, at least as seen by Irish playwrights, are good dramatic subjects for a reason which also suggests why the English seem such bad ones in most contemporary English plays. To be too persistently concerned with good form and too afraid of any emphasis except that of understatement is likely to make one a rather dull protagonist. Your well-bred Englishman doesn't like to make a scene; but scenes are necessary to make a play. And that is where your stage Irishman comes in. He loves high talk and he loves a scene. Abbey plays are usually interesting, partly because everybody in them is so interested and so willing to show it.

"Liberty Jones" (Schubert Theater) resembles "Tanyard Street" in nothing at all except, perhaps, the fact that it too is somewhat more effective in the theater than any description is likely to suggest. Philip Barry, the author, has made rather a habit of going off deep ends whenever he gets tired of writing excellent polite comedy, but he has never thought of anything odder than this morality play with music. In the course of it Miss Liberty, sick unto death, is finally brought back to health and hope by a plain American named John Smith. Smith hates to commit himself, but finally decides not only that he is willing to marry and settle down but also that the proclamation "Give me liberty or give me death!" is not really old-fashioned. The method of the piece—a judicious compromise between the method of "Everyman" and that of the musical comedy—permits the author to scatter allegory so plentifully about that one is not always sure just how far one ought to exercise ingenuity in discovering meanings. The fact, for instance, that Mr. Smith, the liberal, doesn't learn to dance until he becomes enamored of Miss Liberty seems easy enough to interpret—but is it? Then I am not quite sure whether Miss Liberty's nice red head means something or not, and I haven't the faintest idea what significance ought to be found in the circumstance that, though she has a good enough figure of the bean-pole sort, she repeatedly hankers after what the old-fashioned advertisements used to call "bust development."

I do not believe that anyone since Bunyan has ever written a really popular allegory, and in general I still hold that it is not a currently valid form. To treat solemnly a subject as serious as the present one is almost inevitably to be a little fatuous; to make it merely entertainment is to risk the sort of vulgarity involved in designing street clothes or teagowns on "themes" suggested by national defense. But I must admit that Mr. Barry steers as successfully as anyone could between the two dangers and that his handsomely produced allegory is both more entertaining and less fatuous than I would have been inclined to believe possible.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

FILMS

HOW to reconcile politics and entertainment? The Hollywood studios can hardly ignore the world situation and are scheduled to produce a number of films on controversial themes. Americanism and Pan-Americanism, as well as the democratic anti-Nazi issue, are going to get a liberal share of attention, heaven knows with what results.

The potentialities in the Pan-American field are enormous: the good-neighbor campaign could be considerably furthered by a series of films with a Latin American background, providing that the subjects were handled with tact and intelligence. The possibilities are certainly not being overlooked and audiences are due for a good dose of bright Latin American adventure, but, judging by past performance and current production, it is questionable whether it will be entirely to the taste of our neighbors. Unfortunately, once it has made up its mind on a subject, Hollywood is quixotically loyal, and its conception of the other Americas is, to say the least, regrettable. To someone who knew Latin America only from the average film it must seem a very odd place indeed—hopelessly addicted to the rumba, inhabited by swarthy gigolos and torrid women who reply to any question put by their virile visiting cousins with shrill cries of si si, and are transported with delight by the brief and condescending visit of the white men from the U. S. A. who depart giving the impression that they will be back for another enjoyable romp when they can spare the time.

The reaction of the Latin American public to this type of film is expressed in terms that the industry should well be able to appreciate; box-office receipts from Latin American countries have recently shown a steady decline; no picture about them is even expected to make money there, and moreover visitors from the south have not hesitated to say that their countrymen would welcome a more courteous and accurate approach to the subject of their native lands. It is interesting to note in this connection that in Buenos Aires a local production, "Petroleo," concerned with the villainous activities of North American business men, is playing to packed houses. Germany and Italy are very active in the motion-picture field in Latin America, even financing production units in certain countries, and it seems that Hollywood would be well advised, both financially and politically, to produce pictures in which Latin Americans are treated as equals and not as a sub-race with amusing foibles.

Direct anti-Nazi propaganda also presents the industry with a slightly delicate problem. Again the question arises of the important Latin American market which is likely to be closed to any film that is too outspoken. For instance, both "The Great Dictator" and "The Mortal Storm" have encountered considerable difficulty in Latin America and they have been banned in certain places. Even the home market is becoming a little sated with the present anti-Nazi formula (sadistic storm-troopers, Jewish refugees with, of course, a liberal percentage of Aryan blood, and political persecution). All that has been done too many times and could readily be abandoned for something a little more constructive. What this might be is difficult to imagine, but in this connection as well as in many an other it is to be wished that the democracies would be a little clearer about their peace aims.

In dealing with Americanism the industry is on home ground. The historical approach may encounter a few snags, for historically just about the most American thing that ever happened is the War of Independence, but then of course the British can be conveniently divided into Whigs and Tories; also it can be implied that they have changed a good deal since then. Stories about the draft, with toughs and misfits making the grade, and some fun and adventure in the navy will about complete the program in the field in which the industry is likely to be most successful.

Internally the consent decree and the increasing movement toward the individual touch in pictures may influence the trend of production. The consent decree operates under the Sherman Anti-Trust Act to abolish block booking. Up to now independent exhibitors have been forced to purchase from the studios their entire stock of pictures for the year in a package like the stamp-dealer's assorted envelope—two Gables, ■ Claudette Colbert, and a Ginger Rogers, guaranteed to leaven ■ somewhat doughy remainder. The consent decree provides for a new process of movie selling. Independent exhibitors are offered films by the major studios, at ■ fixed percentage of the gross takings, in packages of five, any one of which they may refuse if they do not consider it good box-office, while accepting the remainder. The industry claims that this will result in the production of higher quality material, and a gradual disappearance of the double feature. Some independent exhibitors seem to think that it will not make much difference either way. They suspect that the producers will have an effective reply to any attempt to separate the wheat from the chaff by offering a package of five, for example, at 40 per cent of the gross takings and in the event of, say, three being accepted by the exhibitor stepping the percentage up perhaps to 70 per cent of the takings, making it hardly worth while to refuse. In the meanwhile a special unit is being set up to supervise the working of the decree, and exhibitors are earnestly invited to air complaints before the unit. Also, a special watch is being kept on purchases of independent theaters by the major studios, which might be considered an attempt to circumvent the workings of the decree.

The industry's sudden emphasis on the value of the individual touch in movie production has been a strange development. The policy of employing as many heads as possible has been suddenly recognized as remarkably unproductive of originality, and the achievements of certain men who were left more or less to themselves have inclined the studios toward allowing men of talent to perform as many of the functions of director, writer, and producer as possible. Preston Sturges is continuing his writer-director activities on a larger scale; Frank Capra and Robert Riskin, a remarkably successful writer-director combination, are branching out into the production end at Warner's, and Orson Welles's debut as director, author, and actor is awaited with keen anticipation for more reasons than one.

Mr. Welles's activities since he arrived in Hollywood have attracted much attention, and he has lived up to every expectation concerning his first picture "Citizen Kane." Mr. Hearst has kindly cooperated in publicizing the film by claiming that the story is based most libellously on his life and fulminating away in his Bavarian village in Northern California. He has been most lately reported as intending to sue every exhibitor who shows the picture. Other courses Mr. Hearst is reported to be contemplating are the complete ignoring in his papers of the activities of the RKO studios and attempting to involve the whole industry by starting a campaign against the aliens employed in it, simultaneously slinging some mud at the morals of the film colony. The industry should be able to deliver ■ few broadsides in reply and is not in a very weak position even on the count of alien employment, since of the few aliens employed, a very large proportion are in any case British. RKO may of course shelve the film, or alter it, but more likely will eventually show it in its present form. It will be a fascinating battle if the issue with Mr. Hearst is ever joined, and it will be interesting to see if, when he takes the lid off Hollywood, there will as usual be nothing but a few puffs of steam.

The most outstanding film to be previewed recently is the David Loew-Albert Lewin production "So Ends Our Night," adapted from "Flotsam" by Erich Maria Remarque. It is an anti-Nazi film on the rather familiar lines mentioned above (refugees shuttled helplessly about from country to country, Gestapo agents, sadistic storm-troopers, etc.). Margaret Sullivan and Fredric March are very good, while Glenn Ford, a newcomer of great charm and talent, will probably, as a result of his performance in this picture, be groomed beyond recognition and shortly emerge a full-fledged standardized star. John Cromwell has directed it with an admirably light touch, though he has out-Hitchcocked Hitchcock in the choice of grotesque extra and bit players, with not altogether happy results.

ANTHONY BOWER

MUSIC

THOUGH I missed the League of Composers' program of music for documentary films I had previously seen "The City," with its Aaron Copland score most of which—except the music for the traffic jam sequence—I had thought poor for its purpose. And last summer I had attended a private showing of "Valley Town" arranged by the Educational Film Institute for the music critics, to get their reactions to controversial features of the score by Marc Blitzstein. On that occasion, waiting for the other critics, who did not show up, I mentioned to a couple of Film Institute members the question in my mind whether music was essential to films, since with the pictures by themselves one not only could convey the bare sense of any situation but—through use of pictorial values, of pace, of cutting, and so on—should be able to give this sense almost any desired emotional heightening and impact. My question was brushed aside with an impatient "Music has always been part of films—like opera." True, there has been drama with music; but there has also been drama without it; by analogy there can be a film without music, which the resources of the medium should be able to make effective (and recently I had occasion to decide that parts of "Our Town" would have been more impressive alone than they were with Copland's music). Certainly I would expect that a documentary, which sets out to present a factual record of people and things as they are and as they function, would be such a film—would, that is, give only the music which happened to be part of the facts of a situation, like a song coming from a phonograph in a room. In a film like "Valley Town," then, I would expect shots of men working in a steel mill to be accompanied by the noises of the mill, not by "steel mill music" composed by Marc Blitzstein.

If, however, the shots of a steel mill are accompanied by music, this music must intensify the effect of the pictures in the way that music, if it is good for its purpose, intensifies the effect of the words and actions in an opera. And the first thing to say of Blitzstein's music for "Valley Town" is that it had no such value for its purpose. This was true of both the uncontroversial portions and the controversial ones, which I will now describe. The documentary film has its own conventions, most of which are derived from its very nature: one uses not actors but the people actually involved in the situation; one films only the things which these people actually do and say. An additional convention is the voice of the commentator, which, adding to what the film has recorded, may tell us what the people think. Now the man who made "Valley Town" went beyond these conventions when, filming an unemployed worker on his way home after a day's fruitless search for work, he did not have him say to another worker: "What am I goin' home for?" or did not have the commentator tell us of the despair in such men's minds, but had the worker himself think his thoughts aloud for us without moving his lips. This procedure Blitzstein carried a step further: at home the worker's wife sang her thoughts aloud. And this brings me to the second thing to say of Blitzstein's score—that while it did not offer any music with the significance and power that were required, it did offer a feature that was novel, daring, provocative of controversy.

I mention this because it is characteristic. Putting aside things like the burlesque torch song, I cannot conceive of sounds being feebler and flatter, sounds having less of the significance and effect they were intended to have, than the sounds which I heard during the first act of "No For An Answer"; but the act had its "Fra-a-a-ancie, ta-ta-ta-ta" which was clever and amusing and covered Blitzstein's inability to write music for the emotions of a couple in love—or in fact for any serious emotions or situations whatever. And it was no less characteristic in Blitzstein's pre-proletarian period. Then as now he was a brilliantly gifted person, with the specifically musical gifts of a superb pianist, but—in my judgment—without the specific gift for composition, the ability not just to manipulate sounds but to manipulate them into designs that had artistic potency. Then as now he could not produce music of any importance but could think up something novel to claim attention with, like a string quartet with the three movements written Largo, Largo, Largo, and achieving differentiation through texture instead of pace.

At that time Blitzstein got the attention only of the few people interested in the novelty of a string quartet with the three movements written Largo, Largo, Largo; today he gets the attention of the larger number of people interested in dramatizations of the class struggle. Writing about Columbia's "Chain Gang" album last September, I pointed out that there were people who, because of what they felt about the cruelties inflicted on Negroes in chain gangs, would be moved by the songs in this album as they would not be if they heard the songs without the words or without any other knowledge of what they were about. Now, recalling the warmth of the Mecca Temple audience's response to Blitzstein's opera, I shiver a little at the thought of what this audience's response would have been to the music if it had been presented without the words or anything else to reveal its connection with unions and vigilantes. For I am sure the response would have been as frigid as the response of such an audience a few years ago to the quartet with the three movements written Largo, Largo, Largo.

B. H. HAGGIN

The NATIONAL ARTS CLUB
15 GRAMERCY PARK

Sponsors

A CONCERT BY

FELIX SALMOND

World-Famous Cellist

FRIDAY EVENING
FEBRUARY 28 AT 8:45

At its Galleries
15 GRAMERCY PARK

Entire Proceeds
For the Benefit of

THE FOSTER PARENTS' PLAN FOR WAR CHILDREN, Inc.

TICKETS:
$1.00 AND $2.00

on sale at

THE NATIONAL ARTS CLUB

Telephone: GRamercy 5-3424

WALTER DAMROSCH
Honorary Chairman

PAINTING EXHIBITION

In Early Issues of The Nation
Herman Rauschnig's
"The Redemption of Democracy"
Reviewed by Franz Hoellering
"Ambassador Dodd's Diary"
Reviewed by Edgar A. Mowrer

Letters to the Editors

Without Representation

Dear Sirs: Mr. Neuberger's article in your issue of February 1 calls attention to a problem affecting not only the states but also the federal House of Representatives. Many state governments have failed to redistrict for members of Congress as well as for state senators and assemblymen. As a result, a rotten-borough system of representation is growing up; New York State and Illinois are the chief offenders. In the former state the largest Congressional district has nearly nine times the population of the smallest; in the latter it has more than six times. But this inequality of representation is not between urban and rural as it usually is in state legislatures, for the largest and the smallest Congressional districts are in the one case in New York City and in the other in Chicago. The small districts are those out of which population has been drifting for years, as in lower Manhattan; the large districts those into which it has been flowing.

The evil is a growing one; the average percentage excess of the population of the largest Congressional district over that of the smallest in the same state was:

1900.... 41	1920.... 86
1910.... 54	1930.... 107

Mr. Neuberger is right in saying that only public opinion can force the state legislatures to restore an equitable representation. But cannot that public opinion work through a legal sanction more easily than through "an initiative petition" such as succeeded in the state of Washington?

The Congressional situation would be remedied if a provision included in all apportionment laws from 1872 on, until the law of 1929, should be reenacted with the addition of a sanction or penalty. The provision reads: "[Representatives] shall be elected by districts composed of contiguous territory and containing as nearly as practicable an equal number of inhabitants." This provision as it stood was merely advice ignored at pleasure by state legislatures; if a sanction were added, they would be forced to act. For example, the federal law might go on to say that if in any state the Congressional districts set up do not, in the judgment of the highest state court, consist of contiguous territory, or if the population of the largest district exceeds that of the smallest by more than one-half, or some other specified proportion, the districting shall be invalid and until the requirement is met all Congressmen in that state shall be elected on a blanket ticket.

To remedy the situation in the state legislatures a similar provision might be incorporated in the state constitutions.

WALTER F. WILLCOX

Ithaca, N. Y., February 1

Washington and Gates

Dear Sirs: In The Nation of January 18 W. E. Woodward reviewed my book, "Washington and the Revolution: A Reappraisal—Gates, Conway, and the Continental Congress." Of the dozen or more reviews of the book I have seen, some favorable, others not so favorable, this is the only one that seems unfair.

Mr. Woodward states: "The title of this book is somewhat misleading. Mr. Knollenberg does not cover all of George Washington's activities during the Revolution, but only a small part of them." The latter sentence is true, but the limited scope of the book is indicated by the subtitle, Gates, Conway, and the Continental Congress, as well as by my statement on the first page of the book: "Without purporting to offer a complete restudy of the war, I have undertaken to present certain episodes and characters in what I believe to be a truer light."

Continuing, Mr. Woodward says: "The value of Mr. Knollenberg's book, as a convincing document, is greatly diminished by his obvious bias against Washington. He . . . gives a general impression—without saying so definitely—that he was a second-rate person." In describing certain of Washington's limitations, I not only expressed my recognition of the fact that "Washington's qualities of greatness . . . tower above his limitations," but proceeded for two pages to set forth in detail my grounds for this statement.

Mr. Woodward remarks:

Before Mr. Knollenberg became the librarian of Yale University he was a lawyer, and his book has all the earmarks of a corporation lawyer's argument in court. A brilliant lawyer, as you know, can take half a dozen minor facts and a few plausible assertions, and produce from them a document, with references and cross-references that will completely confuse both judge and jury.

Several of my critics complained that the flow of my narrative is impeded by an excess of evidence, and, while I did not wholly agree with these criticisms, I thought they were a fair expression of opinion. But Mr. Woodward's intimation that my book is built up on "half a dozen minor facts and a few plausible assertions" is the reverse of fairness and truth.

In my book I set forth evidence presenting Horatio Gates in a more favorable light as a general than is generally given. Mr. Woodward seeks to belittle Gates in his review by saying: "He was conceited, vain almost beyond belief." Mr. Woodward cast similar aspersions on Gates in his "George Washington: The Image and the Man." Neither in his book nor in his review of my book does he present any evidence in support of this statement, and I think the statement is incorrect.

It would be interesting to have Mr. Woodward produce his evidence.

BERNHARD KNOLLENBERG

New Haven, Conn., January 24

Beal's Defenders

Dear Sirs: Jonathan Daniels is safe in his Anthony pro Brutus defense of Fred Beal, for Fred Beal is in prison and cannot answer. Mr. Daniels perhaps intended to write a very kind article on Beal in the December 14 issue of The Nation. Why should the fat little ex-Communist who is doing laundry work in jail, whose work is forgotten by everybody, who is just a zero—why should he not get his freedom? Still, Fred Beal must have made quite an impression on several people. The Governor of North Carolina remembers well the Gastonia strike and considers Beal too dangerous to be released. And some other people remember him also. Mr. Daniels says: "Maybe he is even as some say, a rat, who snapped at the capitalists and ran out on the Communists."

The "some" to whom Mr. Daniels refers have certainly not forgotten Fred

INCREDIBLE—BUT TRUE!

Only $5 for a SIGNED ORIGINAL by GRANT WOOD, THOMAS BENTON or 65 other great Artists . . . if you act promptly!

An exciting new Art Program brings you museum-perfect limited-edition Etchings and Lithographs for a mere fraction of their actual value!

SEND FOR FREE 64-PAGE CATALOGUE

IF, like other persons of culture, you long to possess Signed Originals by famous living artists and have been deterred by prohibitive prices, here's the most exciting art news in a century!

Sixty-seven of America's most famous artists now make it possible for you to own Signed Original Etchings and Lithographs such as acquired from this collection by the Metropolitan Museum, Chicago Art Institute and 81 other museums. And the price of these limited-edition Originals, many of them prize-winners, is only $5 each!

Send for FREE 64-page Catalogue

You can order direct from the catalogue which tells all details concerning this amazing new art program, illustrating over 140 subjects and giving size of each, names and biographies of artists, etc. If not completely satisfied your money will be refunded. Enclose 10c in stamps with the coupon for postage and handling. Address:

ASSOCIATED AMERICAN ARTISTS
Studio 82, 711 Fifth Avenue
New York, N. Y.

Associated American Artists
Studio 82, 711 Fifth Avenue
New York, N. Y.

Please mail me your FREE 64-page Catalogue illustrating all Signed, Original Etchings and Lithographs available, explaining reasons for this American Artists' Program; giving artists' biographies and prizes won, etc. I enclose 10c in stamps for handling and postage.

Name

Address

City..... State.....

THESE NOTED ARTISTS

George Biddle
Gordon Grant
Doris Lee
Aaron Bohrod
Peggy Bacon
Ernest Fiene
Albert Sterner
Adolf Dehn
Alexander Brook
William Gropper
George Grosz

... AND MANY OTHERS
See Free Catalogue

Beal either. Who they are anyone can tell who knows that Fred Beal on his return from Russia wrote a book in which he exposed Stalinism.

ANTOINETTE F. KONIKOW

Boston, Mass., January 8

Dear Sirs: There was no intent on my part to slander Fred Beal; I simply wanted to draw a picture of him. I am sure that Beal himself understands and knows that nobody in the state where he is imprisoned is more anxious than I to see justice done him. I have been urging his pardon for some time. Those who prefer a prettier picture of him and his present state seems to me to be more concerned with appearances than with justice.

JONATHAN DANIELS

Raleigh, N. C., January 15

Beal Himself

Dear Sirs: Through you I would like to thank all my friends who, without monetary reward, are working quietly for my freedom.

I've been in prison now for three years. My sentence of twenty years was cut seven years by former Governor Clyde Hoey. I have grown to like the Southern people, especially my associates, who are sharecroppers, farmers, and textile workers.

I'm quite fat, weighing nearly two hundred pounds. Three years ago I weighed 227 pounds but I guess that it won't hurt me to toughen up a bit. Just now I'm working at building a dam. Four months ago I worked a while in the laundry, washing clothes for my convict associates. So far I have worked at over fifty different kinds of farm jobs. You know, I never worked on a farm before coming to prison.

I don't like Hitler, and I don't like Stalin. I hope the liberal brethren will not crack under the strain of the "democracy" that roars over my radio every night.

FRED E. BEAL

Halifax, N. C., January 21

Books for Southern Workers

Dear Sirs: More and more workers are using the facilities of the Southern Summer School library, and again we need more books or money to buy them with. This library is used for the resident section of the school at Asheville, North Carolina. Also throughout the entire year it lends collections of books to unions, clubs, and individual workers.

Although the chief need is for books in the field of the social sciences and for fiction, drama, and poetry with social import, volumes given need not be limited to those categories since an interested second-hand dealer gives the school a generous allowance of books not suitable for this library. Please send books to the Southern Summer School for Workers, 437 West Fifty-ninth Street, New York, or if in the city send a card asking that the books be called for.

RITA S. HILBORN,

Chairman, Library Committee
New York, December 15

CONTRIBUTORS

FRANZ HOELLERING was a journalist in Berlin until Hitler came to power. He is a native of Vienna, the locale of his recent novel, "The Defenders."

HAROLD J. LASKI, a leading member of the left wing of the British Labor Party, is professor of political science at the London School of Economics.

IRVING DILLIARD, who has been an editorial writer on the St. Louis Post-Dispatch for the past ten years, was one of the first Nieman fellows in journalism at Harvard University.

SHERMAN CONRAD is an associate of the School of Letters at Iowa University.

PAUL M. SWEEZY is instructor in economics at Harvard University.

LOUIS B. SALOMON, a member of the English Department of Brooklyn College, reviews fiction regularly for The Nation.

ANTHONY BOWER begins in this issue a regularly fortnightly column from Hollywood. He was formerly film critic for the New Statesman and Nation.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 55 Fifth Ave., New York. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

Coming soon in The Nation

"De Gaulle at Dakar"

by JUAN S. VIDARTE

"Britain's Home Guard"

by PATRICIA STRAUSS

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 152

NEW YORK · SATURDAY · FEBRUARY 22, 1941

NUMBER 8

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

EDITORIALS

- Ben Stolberg's Revenge 200
The Far East 200
Hitler Moves East by Freda Kirchwey 201
Franco Pays a Call by J. Alvarez del Vayo 202

ARTICLES

- The Frankfurter Injunction by I. F. Stone 203
De Gaulle at Dakar by Juan S. Vidarte 205
Britain's Citizen Defenders by Patricia Strauss 207
America's Food Problem by T. Swann Harding 209
Bulgaria on the Eve by Peter Stevens 211
In the Wind 212
A Native at Large by Jonathan Daniels 213

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

- Idea-Ida by Justin O'Brien 214
Mystery of War Morale by Norman Angell 214
China in Travail by Maxwell S. Stewart 215
Religious Humorist by Philip Rahv 217
African Cocktail by Keith Hutchison 218
Search for the Past by Louis B. Salomon 219
Aesthetics as Science by Clement Greenberg 219
In Brief 221
Drama: Sentimental Comedy
by Joseph Wood Krutch 221
Music by B. H. Haggin 222

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

197

The Shape of Things

THE LEASE-LEND BILL HAS REACHED THE Senate floor with only minor amendments to the text approved by the House. It was voted out of the Foreign Affairs Committee by 15 to 8, a larger majority than at one time seemed likely. There is no longer any question that the measure will now pass substantially unchanged, but the isolationists can be counted on to delay action as much as possible, attempting to gain some weakening of the bill as the price of obduracy. One amendment for which they hope to rally support is a proposal sponsored by Senator Walsh, chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee, to forbid the transfer of any portion of the navy. The Administration leaders expect to be able to defeat this amendment and they are also refusing to adopt the suggestion of Mr. Willkie that the bills should specifically limit aid to Britain, Greece, and China. In this connection it is pointed out that hope of American aid tends to stiffen the resistance of neutral countries, such as Turkey, which may soon face demands by the Axis.

✱

MEANWHILE SENATOR AUSTIN, A SUPPORTER of the bill, has raised the question of peace aims. Although he does not suggest making approval of the bill contingent on British pledges in respect of the post-war settlement, he thinks we may properly "express our views upon what are our peace aims and [to] ask Britain what are her peace aims." We agree with the Senator and it is disappointing to find Prime Minister Churchill once again fobbing off Parliamentary questions on the subject with the statement that there is in the United States "thorough comprehension of what we are fighting for and what we stand for." We know that Britain is fighting for survival and for the destruction of Nazism and we believe that these are very good reasons for fighting. Nevertheless it must be recognized that this war is being fought not only against Nazi arms but against Nazi ideology and that this must be met by positive democratic ideas. We do not ask for a detailed blueprint but we should like to know what kind of political and economic set-up the British government is hoping to establish in Europe. And particularly we should like to be

Editor and Publisher

FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor
ROBERT BENDINER

Washington Editor
I. F. STONE

Literary Editor
MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors

KEITH HUTCHISON MAXWELL S. STEWART

Dramatic Critic

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager and Director of Circulation
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager

MARY HOWARD ELLISON

assured that it is not thinking in terms of a revival of the pre-Hitler status quo. At the same time it is important for Americans to be thinking about the part this country must play in the post-war world if there is to be any hope of achieving stable peace. We cannot again irresponsibly withdraw into isolation. Our refusal after 1918 to accept a role in world affairs commensurate with our economic strength and political influence had much to do with the subsequent decay in international relations. This time we must be ready to share in the task of reconstruction and we should recognize now that uncertainty on that score is a major obstacle to the formulation of peace aims by Britain.

✱

MUSSOLINI SEEMS DESPERATELY ANXIOUS TO prevent news from Italy from reaching the outside world except through official channels. Foreign correspondents have been forbidden to leave Rome without permission and the same restriction has been put on American diplomats. No doubt it is felt that if allowed to move around freely they might learn too much about the state of Italian morale and the effect of British raids. Now the Italian government has asked the United States to close its consulates at Naples and Palermo. It has a right to make this request but there is supposed to be some degree of reciprocity about the number of consuls which two states maintain in each other's territory. We would suggest, therefore, that the State Department seize this opportunity to ask for the closing of two Italian consulates. That would mean two centers of Axis propaganda put out of action.

✱

TWO OF THE MOST DISTINGUISHED GERMAN Social Democrats have been arrested in Southern France and handed over to the Gestapo, to be sent to Germany. Rudolf Breitscheid and Rudolf Hilferding, both prominent during the Weimar Republic, were forced into exile after Hitler came to power and later deprived of their German citizenship and stripped of their private property. Breitscheid was an expert on international affairs and a champion of the League of Nations, in whose assembly he sat as German delegate from 1926 to 1930. Hilferding was his party's leading financial authority. As Minister of Finance in 1923 he laid the foundations for the stabilization of the mark, although he was forced out of office before the consummation of the program and the credit for his work was filched by Dr. Schacht. These men are the bitter and irreconcilable enemies of Nazism and it is not hard to imagine the fate that awaits them in Germany. The action of the French government in surrendering them bodes ill for the hundreds of other anti-Nazis still trapped in unoccupied France. The Vichy authorities have protested that under the terms of the armistice they have no choice but to deliver such political refugees as Hitler may demand. At best this excuse only shifts the crime. The very fact that the armistice contains a specific clause providing that enemies of the Nazi regime should be handed over on demand shows how unprecedented a violation of customary usage was this brutal condition. To have agreed to such a condition was more than a sign of helplessness; it was proof of the degradation of the officials who engineered France's surrender. Oswald Garrison Villard has urged in the New York Times that telegrams of protest should be sent immediately to the French Ambassador in Washington, Gaston Henry-Haye. We heartily endorse this suggestion. The Vichy government must be made aware that such acts of subservience to Hitler can only alienate American sympathy for France.

✱

MR. WENDELL WILLKIE'S SPEECH AT THE Lincoln Day dinner was in effect a reply to the Republican Old Guard who have been itching to disown him ever since the Philadelphia convention and saw an opportunity in his support of the Lease-Lend bill. Hitting back, he warned his listeners to beware the fate of the Whig party and avoid becoming "merely the party of negation, merely the party of opposition, merely those who find fault and who in one of the critical moments of history find nothing nobler to do than compromise." This sounds to us like an almost perfect description of the present state of the G. O. P., but it is one thing to recognize that an organization is sick and something else again to perceive the causes of that sickness and to know how to eradicate them. Mr. Willkie called on his party to preach a "positive doctrine" but he did no more than hint at his ideas for the substance of such a doctrine. Clearly he believes that isolation is as sterile as it is dangerous, and at one point it seemed to us, as we listened in on his speech, that he was heading toward advocacy of Union Now, of a federation composed of the United States and the British Commonwealth. That is a large and fertile idea which would connect the Republican Party with its almost forgotten roots and might start the sap rising again in its aged limbs. But such a revivification would require the lopping off of parasitic clusters of vested interests and vested prejudices, and we question whether Wendell Willkie, or any other outstanding Republican, is capable of such drastic surgery.

✱

THE PRESS AND THE RADIO APPEAR TO BE vying with each other to give the impression that the national defense program is being hamstrung by an unprecedented wave of strikes. Day after day the roll of strikes is called, none being too small or too short in duration to escape mention. And in each instance the total of defense contracts held by the firm is set forth, irrespective of whether or not these are affected by the stoppage. Rarely are the legitimate grievances of the workers mentioned. Never, so far as we have been able to discover, have the firm's swollen profits from war orders been referred to in connection with labor's demand for increased wages. Yet the reports on 1940 profits now coming in show increases that far outstrip any wage gains that have been achieved. Reports from nine of the largest steel companies, for example, show aggregate net profits in 1940 of $229,800,000, or more than double 1939's already large net profits of $114,367,000. Contrary to what must be the popular impression, interference with production because of labor disputes has been slight. There were 160 fewer strikes in 1940 than in 1939, and these involved only half as many workers and caused only about one-third as much loss in man-days as the 1939 disputes. The number of men involved has been only half as large as in a similar period in 1918 when we were at war. As Sidney Hillman has pointed out, the time lost in strikes in 1940 was less than one-fourth that lost from industrial accidents. And as conditions stand in mid-February, not a single major strike has yet developed in 1941. Newspapers and radio commentators please note!

★

THE PLIGHT OF THE HUNGRY MILLIONS IN Nazi-occupied countries presents a horrible dilemma to humane people who recognize that unless Hitler is defeated all Europe is condemned to slavery. Is it possible to send help to these victims of aggression without at the same time helping to strengthen German resistance to the British blockade? Mr. Hoover believes that it is, and in his radio address on Sunday he outlined a plan for an initial experiment in Belgium which his Committee on Food for the Small Democracies has put before the British and German governments. This scheme follows a visit of inspection to the occupied areas by an American commission of three which found that Belgium was very close to famine. Mr. Hoover made a number of references to the report of this commission but it has not been published. It seems to us that, before the American public is asked to give further moral support to this cause, this report should be made available in full. We need to know whether these American investigators were able to find out to what extent shortages in the occupied countries are due to requisitions and forced exports to Germany. A report from Berlin in the New York Times of February 2 stated: "German troops occupying Belgium are approaching the point where they will be provided entirely from the Reich." This means that during the last eight months, while conditions in Belgium were steadily growing worse, the German army there was at least partly living off the land. Mr. Hoover says that his original stipulations stand: Germany must cooperate in providing part of the necessary food and must end the drain on native supplies by the Nazi armies. The American commission has been in touch with the German authorities. What assurances has it received on these points?

★

THE UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT HAS rejected the appeal of Earl Browder and there is little legal possibility left that the Communist leader will escape a four-year prison term for using a passport obtained by fraud. There has never seemed to us to be much doubt about the validity of the evidence in this case but at the same time the offense appears to be picayune and in no sense commensurate with so harsh a sentence. The government was out to "get" Browder and it resorted to precisely the tactics employed to "get" Al Capone, who after committing practically every crime on the calendar was finally imprisoned for cheating on his income tax returns. We heartily dislike this any-stick-to-beat-a-dog strategy and prefer the more direct approach adopted in the case of Harry Bridges. Here the charge is membership in the Communist Party, pure and simple. Under a recently enacted law, aliens are subject to deportation for membership in "subversive organizations" either at the time the accusation is made or at any time in the past. That law seems to us dangerous and altogether unjust, but the trial of Bridges will serve a highly useful purpose if it clears the air—air, we might add, that has been clouded no little by the Communists themselves. They have consistently refused to face in open court the issue of whether or not they believe in force and violence. A fair trial for Bridges should decide first whether he is a Communist second, whether the Communist Party is subversive as charged. If both counts are established we would still wish to have the Supreme Court's opinion whether or not the theoretical position of an organization legally compromises all its members. Finally, the Supreme Court should pass on the retroactive aspect of the law.

★

WE ARE NOT AS SURE AS THE WASHINGTON police seem to be that General Krivitsky committed suicide. Suicide has been made to look like murder before this, and by less trained killers than the GPU. There is no question that the GPU had compelling reasons for wanting Krivitsky out of the way. Aside from the fact that a bureaucracy of terror, like any other, is most vindictive toward one of its apostates, Krivitsky's past revelations and possible future exposures of the identity and activities of GPU agents in this country would provide more than sufficient motivation. His death would be useful too as an example to other, potential deserters. If Krivitsky did kill himself, his act may well have been forced. Those average spy-free Americans who scoff at the idea that he could be induced to kill himself, do not take account of the hysterical psychology of the political underworld in which Krivitsky spent the greater part of his life. Whatever the true facts may be—and they will probably never be known—the career and death of General Krivitsky furnish one more terrible example of the fruits of totalitarianism, whether of the left or of the right.

Ben Stolberg's Revenge

IF hell has no fury like a woman scorned it certainly has nothing to match the wrath of a slighted radical. To this dismal conclusion we are moved by Benjamin Stolberg's most recent contribution to the Saturday Evening Post, called "Muddled Millions" (February 15). Here we have the unhappy sight of a man who used to speak glowingly of Leon Trotsky as "the revolutionary conscience of the European proletarian vanguard," a man who hailed the C. I. O. in the day of its greatest militancy as "the most progressive and vital force in American life today"—advising moonstruck millionaires to keep their money in their pockets or the Communists will get it if they don't watch out.

We are more than willing to leave it to the psychoanalysts to explain why Stolbergs behave as they do and we don't care if we never see their report. Our mild interest in "Muddled Millions" is twofold: we feel in duty bound to point it out to our readers as a beautiful example of the technique commonly known as the smear; and we feel warranted in clearing up a few inferences with regard to ourselves.

In his warning to capitalist angels against using their wealth "to undermine the system which produced it," Stolberg pretty thoroughly goes over the ground covered by the genuine Communist product—from the Daily Worker through Science and Society. But lumped in with these citations, and apparently held up to Stolberg's "revolutionary millionaire playboys" as equally horrible examples of what not to do with their money, we find the Partisan Review, the Freeman and the New Freeman, the Socialist Leader, the New Republic, and The Nation. These journals are socialist, liberal, or dead. Mr. Stolberg does not say all of them are or ever were under Stalinist control, but why does he include them at all in a discussion of this sort? Is he deliberately trying to lump together in the minds of his unsophisticated readers everything to the left of Wendell Willkie, to whom incidentally he gave his support in the presidential campaign?

Other organs and groups unfairly attacked by Mr. Stolberg should have no difficulty in defending themselves if his comments concerning them are as inaccurate as those about The Nation. In the first place no millionaire playboys have chosen to subsidize The Nation.

When Oswald Garrison Villard put money into this journal it was his own journal and not even Stolberg argues that it was "fellow traveler" under his editorship. Mr. Stolberg tells his readers, without any apparent pertinence, since The Nation is not among the recipients of capitalist largesse, that when Freda Kirchwey bought the magazine she was "confused and timid, and she could not buck the Stalinist fashion in the liberal world." Proof? She made a former editor of the New Masses managing editor and put "fellow-travelers" on the staff. The "pro-Stalinist" foreign correspondents Mr. Stolberg cites as examples of the Kirchwey susceptibility to Communist pressure were contributors to the magazine years before she took over control, and Mr. Stolberg knows well that the managing editor to whom he refers was not taken directly from the staff of the New Masses but had left that publication six months earlier in thorough disagreement with its policies and those of the Communist Party. The other "fellow-travelers" mentioned in his article were similarly disposed when they were appointed.

If The Nation had been a genuinely fellow-traveler organ it would have gone along with the party "line" and would today be supporting the Soviet-German pact and the isolationist position of the Daily Worker—and the Saturday Evening Post.

We strongly suspect that lurking somewhere in the Stolberg subconscious is the memory of The Nation's refusal to print his series of articles on the C. I. O., which we felt attacked that organization unfairly, and which he subsequently sold to the Scripps-Howard press.

The Far East

LAST week's Far Eastern war scare seems to have been the result of war-of-nerves tactics by the democratic powers aimed partly at opinion in Japan but also intended to promote greater unity in Australia which has been disturbed by political dissension. Simultaneous moves by Britain, Australia, and the United States served to warn Japan that its push towards the south would not be facilitated by further appeasement. The result was a flood of pacific protestations from Tokyo and a lessened bellicosity in the Nipponese press.

This of course does not mean that there has been any radical revision in Japanese objectives. The preparations for an attempt on the Dutch East Indies are going forward. Taking advantage of the Thailand-Indo-China armistice, the Japanese appear to have established the nucleus of a military air base at Saigon—which is only four hours' flight in a modern bomber from Singapore. There are reports, so far unconfirmed, that Japanese battleships are patrolling the waters south of Saigon. And the Japanese are said to have concentrated 150,000 men at Hainan Island and Formosa, ready for a southward adventure. At the same time negotiations for a pact with the Soviets are being pushed and reports from Moscow suggest that there are good auguries for their successful conclusion.

Thus though Tokyo may be anxious to lull the Western powers into a sense of security, the danger of war remains. The mining of the waters around Singapore, though precautionary, would hardly be undertaken without cause. Equally ominous is the evacuation of Japanese civilians from the East Indies and occupied China, and the withdrawal of Britons from Thailand. Washington is similarly hastening the evacuation of Americans from the Far East. The Japanese Diet is rushing bills to place the country on a war footing by the end of the current week. Netherlands East Indies has announced its intention of resisting attack, and the Australian War Council has issued a special warning which was echoed by the Prime Minister of New Zealand.

It is evident that Japan is poised to launch its long-expected southward drive at the first favorable opportunity. Doubtless it is the intention that this drive should be coordinated with a major Axis offensive in Europe, presumably the invasion of England. When this drive will come, it is impossible, of course, to say. But if we are to judge by Japanese behavior during the last six or even months, it seems safe to assume that Japan is not going to launch a major offensive against either British or Dutch possessions unless it feels reasonably certain that the United States is not going to intervene, or that British defeat is assured. Since it can hardly feel safe on either of these points at the present moment, we may assume that Japan's immediate steps will be restricted to strengthening its position in the southern part of Indo-China and Thailand as a pointed threat to Singapore and Burma.

In its drive to the South, Japan has one considerable advantage which did not exist in its attack on China. It is dealing with subject colonial peoples for whom the Japanese yoke may seem hardly more onerous than the one they have been wearing. Observers of the Japanese penetration into northern Indo-China report that the natives, in many instances, actually welcomed the Japanese as deliverers. In no case was there mass opposition such as the Japanese have encountered in China. A somewhat similar situation is likely to prevail in the event of a Japanese attack on the British colonies, including India, Burma, and Singapore, and on the Dutch East Indies.

Offsetting the lack of opposition by the colonial peoples is the danger, for Japan, of war with the United States. The Japanese leaders are fully aware of the catastrophe that such a conflict would involve. No attack on Singapore or the East Indies could possibly succeed with the Philippines in the hands of a hostile power. Such an attack would be doubly hazardous if the American battle fleet were in the Pacific. And an effective shutting off of American supplies would soon seriously impair Japanese military efficiency. The chief threat of war, then, would seem to lie in a miscalculation on the part of the Japanese militarists of the point at which America will fight. It is here that the activities of our isolationists are most dangerous. For they tend to give the Japanese militarists a false impression of the temper of the American people. A firm uncompromising policy is the best security against further Japanese adventures and, for that reason, the best insurance against our being drawn into war.

Hitler Moves East

BY FRED KIRCHWEY

IN Eastern Europe events are moving too fast for the mind and too slowly for the emotions. Only a week ago Bulgaria was still denying newspaper reports of the infiltration of Germans; less than a week ago Yugoslavia dismissed as "not probable" the rumor that Premier Dragisha Cvetkovitch and Foreign Minister Alexander Cincar-Markovitch would go to Germany to "confer" with Hitler. Today Nazi forces in Bulgaria have reached such proportions that their presence is admitted in semi-official quarters and their distribution and activities have been fully reported by the correspondents, while the Yugoslav ministers have traveled the long road to Berchtesgaden and returned, saying nothing and looking "tired." These are only two samples. The world has been fed on a full menu of confusion and nerve-wracking rumors.

But the events of the past week are deceptively complicated. The realities behind them are fairly clear. Hitler's procedure in the Balkans, as in southwestern Europe, is systematic and according to precedent—and it includes the dissemination of disturbing rumors. He is methodically clearing the road to the East by conquering Bulgaria and Yugoslavia, as he recently conquered Rumania. He is not engaging in a campaign—à la Mussolini—in bitter weather on mountainous and hostile terrain. He is using his other, preliminary weapons—weapons which are denied to the weak. Promises, threats, internal demoralization, "peaceful" penetration, the encouragement of national antagonisms—with a powerful military machine on the border ready to move if the strategy of terror should fail: such is the well-tested technique applied in turn to each small nation that blocks his way. Why attack when one can filter through to victory?

The two important obstacles that remain are British armed force and the magnificent resistance of the Greeks. The victories of Britain's armies in North Africa have undoubtedly slowed up the progress of Hitler's cold war in Europe; the reluctance of his predestined victims to lay themselves under the wheels of his war-machine, which has been manifest in Vichy and Madrid as well as in the Balkans, is the direct product of British success. But that success has also provided the final reason why Hitler could not accept delay. He must accomplish his major purposes quickly before British victories in North Africa release large numbers of troops and ships and planes for use in the Greek campaign or in Turkey. He must threaten the Greeks on the Thracian frontier, and try to turn Fascist defeat into Nazi victory. He must protect the Rumanian oil fields against bombing raids. The signing of a Bulgarian-Turkish "non-aggression pact" is a clear announcement that German occupation of Bulgaria has been accepted as an accomplished fact; that Greece has been abandoned by both Turkey and Bulgaria; that Russia will neither resist nor encourage resistance to Nazi domination of the Balkan peninsula. The big brother of all the Slavic nations is sunk in silence and immobility while Hitler moves his forces to the borders of Turkey. As long as Greece holds out Britain will control important bases on the European continent. But it is difficult to see how even Greek courage and tenacity will be able to withstand the pressures that today threaten the country.

I am not suggesting that Hitler will be able to proceed indefinitely without being forced to fight. He most certainly expects to fight. But he is jockeying himself into position for an armed struggle under the best circumstances: against the fewest enemies, at the most favorable season, and after snatching as much as possible without cost. He may even complete the conquest of Eastern Europe without extending the area of struggle. He will not be able to dislodge the British from Italy's African empire but if he controls the European shores of the Mediterranean he can force Britain to maintain great concentrations of men and ships in that sea, thus hampering the defense of England and of the Atlantic sea lanes and diminishing the value of the victories in Africa.

But even the collapse of Greek resistance and Nazi domination of the whole Balkan area would not spell the end of this phase of the war. Hitler is fighting England, and his chief objectives in the Eastern Mediterranean are the Dardanelles and Suez. Turkey, it may still be assumed, will fight rather than accept Nazi control of the Dardanelles (even if Russia is willing to see this treasured gateway to the West fall into Nazi hands), while the far longer road to Suez, by land or by sea, would be defended every league of the way by the British. In this campaign, Britain's present mastery of the Mediterranean gives it a mighty superiority, and it is evident that Hitler's inescapable task is to challenge that mastery before he attempts any such hazardous major operation.

Franco Pays a Call

BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

THOUGH General Franco's interview with Mussolini and his subsequent talk with General Pétain were quickly pushed from the front pages by more ominous developments in the Balkans and the Far East, the three protagonists of the Latin bloc and their absent chief, Adolf Hitler, undoubtedly laid the groundwork for important future action. In the Giornale d'Italia, Virginio Gayda expressed confidence that the "absolute similarity in the viewpoints of the two dictators" would soon be apparent. His prediction will doubtless turn out to be correct. The fact that no startling action has followed the Franco-Mussolini interview does not mean that the danger of Spanish participation in the next assault against Britain has been eliminated. First visits of neutral premiers and foreign ministers to Berlin or Rome or Berchtesgaden are seldom followed by immediate sensational developments; but the final outcome is the acceptance of Hitler's orders without even a show of resistance. These state visits are merely planned prologues to a climax clearly foreseen and prepared by Hitler, whose strategy of "appeasement" consists, not of wheat loans and bribes, but of skilfully deployed motorized divisions or contingents of German "tourist" soldiers. (Eighty thousand are reliably reported to be in Spain today.)

Franco has undoubtedly and in sufficient time been informed by Hitler, through Mussolini, what will be expected of him when the decisive moment comes. So far, secrecy conceals the exact form that Franco's collaboration is to take. The best indications are that, instead of the expected German attack on Gibraltar, the next Nazi move will be toward the Balearic Islands. In the transfer of the war to the Western Mediterranean, a German-Italian lease of the Balearics for the use of their submarines and airplanes would prove far more attractive to the Nazis than an attempt to capture Gibraltar. The conquest of the Rock will not be easy, despite the powerful guns mounted on Sierra Carbonera and at Ceuta during the war in Spain—mounted there with the permission of the British government, against the warnings of the Spanish Republicans. Those guns will enable Germany to place under fire all traffic through the Straits even if Gibraltar remains in British hands.

Some influential people in England and the United States assume that Franco cannot go into the war with a discontented and hungry people behind him. Seldom, it is true, has modern Europe witnessed such a shambles as the Franco regime. The famine which grips the country today is the result of two policies: shipments to Germany of goods needed in Spain, and the imprisonment, and the withdrawal from production, of more than a million workers, many of them peasants. These prisoners form the nucleus of the opposition to Franco, but that opposition is slowly embracing the whole population.

The government has failed in its demagogic attempts to entice workers into the "vertical unions"—formed by workers and owners, but with a voice only for the latter. Minimum wages and hours exist now only on paper. The worker is forced to labor ten to twelve hours a day and his pay falls as the costs of living rise—costs increased by the tremendous speculation in foodstuffs and the lack of staple foods. The middle class suffers with the workers; the little merchant has been all but wiped out. Industry is weak from lack of raw materials, the bulk of which are being sent to Germany.

The government is eternally issuing decrees for the reconstruction of the country and for the repair of property damaged during the war. But American travelers who have recently passed through Spain assure me that all along the route from Figueras to the Portuguese border, the ruined towns remain much as they were on the day the war ended. Aside from mass executions, little or no "reconstruction" has been accomplished. The inefficiency of the government surpasses its cruelty. Of the Franco slogan, "Spain, United, Great, and Free," only the words "Spain United" correspond to the truth. Franco has united Spain—against him and his government.

Corruption is widespread; there have been frequent scandals in the administration of Auxilio Social—that division of the fascist Falange which the American Red Cross has selected to distribute America's food gift to Spain!—and some of its leaders have had to be imprisoned. Three times since the end of the war internal dissensions have forced a change of leadership in the all-important Madrid Falange.

This dismal picture may encourage the delusion in England as well as in this country that Franco can be persuaded or bribed into real neutrality. Clearly it would be to his immediate interest to resist the pressure of Berlin even though he well knows that a Hitler defeat means the downfall of his own regime. But the one essential fact to be remembered is that Franco is not a free agent. The day that Hitler asks Franco to act, Franco will act. Should Hitler need him for his plans, he will, after some simulated resistance, allow a Nazi march through Spain, or lease the Balearics to the Axis. The appeasers may argue that the immediate necessity is to gain time, to postpone the hour when Franco is forced to move. But the only time that really can be gained is the time Hitler is willing to grant.

During the first European war, King Alfonso used to say to his French friends: "In Spain only the canaille and I are for the Allies." This statement was correct, except with reference to the King. In Spain today, as yesterday, only the "canaille," the common people, are on the side of democracy. This is a distressing fact for the diehards of the democratic countries who would prefer to have as allies the other diehards everywhere. But without the final aid of the canaille of all Europe, Hitler cannot be beaten. Now is the time to choose sides.

The Frankfurter Injunction

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, February 15

YOUR correspondent knows little of labor injunctions beyond what he once read in a book about them. Though written by Felix Frankfurter and Nathan Greene, it turns out to have been poor preparation for an understanding of Justice Frankfurter's decision in the Chicago Milk Vendors' case. The book protests "the vague inclusiveness of the blanket injunction." The decision upholds an injunction so sweeping as to cover not only lawless activities but peaceful picketing.

It is every man's right to puzzle his friends. Justice Frankfurter did it once before when he held, with only Justice Stone dissenting, that nothing in the Bill of Rights protects school children whose religious scruples will not permit them to salute the flag. Both decisions purport to embody a special deference to democratic processes. "If the people of Illinois," Justice Frankfurter wrote in the Milk Vendors' case, "desire to withdraw the use of the injunction in labor controversies, the democratic process for legislative reform is at their disposal."

This is a rhetorical flourish, not a realistic appraisal. The people of Illinois have expressed their desire to withdraw the use of the injunction in labor controversies. In 1925 the Illinois legislature passed an anti-injunction law for which Illinois labor had been campaigning since 1899. It was carefully written to avoid the loopholes that judicial interpretation had already opened in the anti-injunction provisions of the Clayton Act. It forbade the issuance of injunctions against peaceful picketing and it was designed to cover the secondary boycott as well as the strike. Unfortunately this statute, as Earl R. Beckner reports in his "History of Labor Legislation in Illinois," "has caused very little change in the practice of issuing injunctions against picketing." If the reader wants higher authority, I refer him to page 181 of Frankfurter and Greene's "The Labor Injunction."

What are the people of Illinois supposed to do now? Reenacting the law won't solve the problem of getting the courts to obey it. One way for the United States Supreme Court to show its concern for democratic processes is to do what it can to make the lower courts comport themselves in accordance with the law. It is doing so in the case of peaceful picketing. It has already held that peaceful picketing is a form of free speech, and as such is protected by the Constitution. The Bill of Rights may not be repealed by any count of heads, and

Justice Frankfurter

"democratic processes" have their limitations. When a majority of the legislators of Alabama passed a law against peaceful picketing, the United States Supreme Court held it unconstitutional. Why should a majority of the judges on the Supreme Court of Illinois now be permitted to do by injunction what a majority of the legislators of Alabama are not permitted to do by law?

Deference to democratic processes is one of those general considerations which Justice Holmes said do not decide concrete cases. The day that Justice Frankfurter handed down the decision in the Milk Vendors' case, he also ruled upon another Illinois labor injunction. Both were issued in secondary boycotts and both involved violence, but the majority chose to consider them as involving two distinct questions. The former was regarded as raising the question of whether an injunction might be issued against peaceful picketing because there had been considerable violence in the dispute. The latter was regarded as raising the question of whether peaceful picketing might be enjoined because it occurred in a secondary boycott. Both questions seem to call for the same answer, whether under the federal Constitution or under the anti-injunction law of Illinois. The Illinois law says peaceful picketing may not be enjoined. Period. It does not say that peaceful picketing may be enjoined in a secondary boycott or that it may be enjoined if violence has occurred.

By giving a different answer to each question, with a different majority in support of him each time, Justice Frankfurter makes it hard to believe that his impelling motive was to teach the people to rely on their ballots rather than on their judges. With the Chief Justice and Justice Roberts dissenting, he held that peaceful picketing may not be enjoined in secondary boycotts. With Justices Black, Douglas, and Reed dissenting, he held that peaceful picketing might be enjoined when it is "set in a background of violence." This, as Beckner shows in his history of labor legislation in the state, is not far distant from an old Illinois custom. "Drastic injunctions," he writes, were issued despite the anti-injunction law on the excuse that "some more or less inconsequential unlawful act was committed by the union or its members." The violence in the case of the Milk Vendors was not inconsequential; their $15-a-week average earnings were taking jobs from $45-a-week union milk-wagon drivers. But the answer is twofold. First, as shown by Justice Black's analysis of the facts, most of the violence occurred months before the picketing began. Union members were prosecuted and sent to jail for participation in violence. But both sides agreed on appeal that the pickets themselves were peaceful, that they had made no threats, tried to stop no customers. The second answer is that to let judges decide how much violence permits an injunction against non-violent union methods, is to give the anti-labor judge a free hand and pray that on appeal the Supreme Court will reverse him. We are left more dependent on judges than ever.

Democratic processes, i. e., legislative processes, resort to which is suggested by Justice Frankfurter, can work in only one direction in this particular situation. The people of Illinois have already demonstrated their desire "to withdraw the use of the injunction in labor controversies." The United States Supreme Court has now created a generous loophole in the case of violence. This loophole can hardly be closed short of abolishing the injunction altogether, a move so drastic as to be of doubtful constitutionality. For though the injunction may be abused in labor cases, it serves a vital purpose in others and it should be possible to use it against labor lawlessness without interfering with legitimate labor activities.

Democratic processes are given new leeway, however, in the other direction. In an attempt to distinguish between the Milk Vendors' decision and last year's decisions against anti-picketing laws, Justice Frankfurter throws out a suggestion. The anti-picketing laws were held unconstitutional as "an unlimited ban on free communication. . . . We would not strike down a statute which authorized the courts of Illinois to prohibit picketing when they should find that violence had given to the picketing a coercive effect whereby it would operate destructively as force and intimidation." Though this dictum be the fruit of a desperate attempt at consistency, it may haunt Justice Frankfurter and the labor movement for some time. "Judges need not be so innocent of the actualities of . . . industrial conflict," to quote Justice Frankfurter, as not to know that this invites employers to qualify for an injunction by hiring a few provocateurs.

De Gaulle at Dakar

BY JUAN S. VIDARTE

SINCE my arrival in the United States a few weeks ago, I have repeatedly been asked about the events which I witnessed in Dakar last September. Most of my questioners want to know why General De Gaulle chose to attack when he had no one in Dakar to help him, and they usually imply that he must have been either mad or drunk to handle the expedition as he did. Neither supposition is true, nor was De Gaulle without friends; but he was unbelievably ill-informed about the whole situation in Dakar.

The De Gaulle campaign against the capital of French West Africa is a chronicle of errors: during the weeks when Dakar would have fallen to a launchful of brave Frenchmen armed with rifles, no move was made against the town; when De Gaulle decided to attack, the indecisiveness of his aides there betrayed all his supporters; and finally when the Vichy men in Dakar were at the point of surrender, the British squadron sailed away.

De Gaulle was right in assuming that his stand against the Men of Vichy would find warm support in the French colonies. When I arrived in Dakar early in July, after an overland trip from French Morocco, I at once noticed there the atmosphere I had observed in Gao, Niamey, Bamako, and other French colonial cities south of the Sahara. All French officers were convinced that at any moment the colonies would rise. News had already reached Dakar about the arrival in North Africa of the ship Massilia with Daladier, Mandel, Campinchi, Delbos, and other war-time French officials, and everybody expected to hear soon of the establishment of a government of Free France in North Africa. Later, when news came of the betrayals, of the differences between Daladier and Mandel, of the Meknes plot, of Mandel's desperate play, ended by his imprisonment, those who believed in fighting to the finish were not discouraged. They merely transferred their hopes to the movement begun by De Gaulle. Already England had recognized him as the leader of Free France.

At that time Dakar's defenses, besides the coast batteries, were only a few aviation squadrons and the great 35,000-ton battleship Richelieu, the best and most modern unit in the French navy. Though Dakar is the largest city in Senegal, few Senegalese troops were there, most of them having been sent to Casablanca or to France. On July 8 the British navy gave to the authorities of Dakar the same ultimatum it had given to the French at Alexandria and Mers-el-Kebir just a few days before. Receiving no satisfactory answer, the British caused a series of explosions near the stern of the Richelieu that damaged the giant's propellers. The British then departed, leaving the Richelieu still watchman over the port, but condemned to inaction as well as immobility, because, as we were later informed, it had no shells for its long-range guns.

A few weeks later an Italo-German armistice sub-commission arrived at the town. Its avowed purpose was to investigate a concentration camp for Italian and German prisoners caught in Senegal at the outbreak of the fighting. In reality, these sub-commissioners were Himmler agents and acted accordingly. In airplanes loaded with the ex-prisoners and the propellers of all military airplanes in Dakar, they soon returned to Germany.

With the departure of the Germans, Dakar was left with a ship that could not move or shoot and several squadrons of planes without propellers. Moreover, as the fascist pattern of Pétain's decrees was daily strengthening the Free French cause, supporters of De Gaulle were probably a majority in the armed forces and certainly were in the civilian population of some three thousand Europeans. If anyone wanted to take the port without noise or bloodshed, now was the time to do so.

Late in August, Colonel Larminat, Governor of Chad, declared himself for De Gaulle, as did most of the rest of French Equatorial Africa, except Libreville, the capital of Gabon. Though Boisson, Governor-General of French West Africa, came out against De Gaulle and began to organize an army unit to attack British Gambia, an enclave in the French possessions, he soon abandoned the project because of its poor reception in Dakar. Unfortunately his attitude caused many pro-De Gaulle Frenchmen in Senegal, the Ivory Coast, and elsewhere to join the British in Gambia, the Gold Coast, etc. This cut down the number of De Gaulle sympathizers remaining in Dakar.

In September De Gaulle's friends in Dakar were unpleasantly surprised when three French battleships arrived at the port from Toulon. They had passed Gibraltar without challenge from the British. One of the ships, the Georges Leygues, was bringing not only shells for herself, but also a good supply of shells (380) for the batteries of the Richelieu, and it also brought back the airplane propellers which the Germans had taken away a month before. The naval arm was further strengthened by the arrival of several torpedo boats and submarines from Casablanca. De Gaulle's friends, still numerous in both land and air forces, were far from discouraged, but Dakar was again fortified and the odds were against its capture.

Yet De Gaulle decided to move. On Sunday, September 22, the news spread through Dakar that his agents, headed by a Lieutenant Boislambert, were already in town. Rumor said that Boislambert would personally lead the rebellion, that even the coastal batteries were De Gaulliste now. The De Gaulle men in Dakar spent that night sleeplessly making plans; tracing strategy on maps; capturing, if not airports, air castles; waiting. The optimists were certain that within twenty-four hours all of French West Africa would be in their leader's hands. The revolt would spread north. Free Frenchmen would attack the Italians and make them pay for their treachery in stabbing France in the back. Italy would find her defeat in Africa.

General De Gaulle

The first sound next morning was the firing of anti-aircraft guns at De Gaulle's planes which were flying low to drop leaflets inviting land, air, and naval forces to join Free France and its powerful allies. In the office of a friend, a supporter of De Gaulle, I waited for news. We knew that two planes carrying seven French officers had landed at the large airport of Ouakan, imprisoned the commandant, and now held the landing field. Communication with Thiel airport was cut off and a squadron flying both the tricolor and the white flag of truce was cruising off Dakar. De Gaulle, who was on one of the ships, had requested the Governor's consent to the landing of Free French troops.

While everyone was asking: "Will Frenchmen fire on Frenchmen?" the coastal batteries opened fire on the Sarvognan de Brazza as it approached with De Gaulle's official emissaries. Then deafening detonations from the long-range guns of the Richelieu shook the town's poorly constructed buildings. De Gaulle did not answer this fire, but continued to give ultimatums for surrender of the post. By eleven o'clock that morning his patience was at end; he ordered his men to return the fire. For two hours they bombarded the town, the shells whistling over our heads. Then De Gaulle gave the order to cease firing, and at three o'clock that afternoon addressed the people by radio:

"Frenchmen of Dakar, a fellow-countryman, a French officer, addresses you. How long are you going to allow this tragic situation to continue? We bring you freedom, food, and arms for your defense. We come to you as brothers, with open arms, but those people who wish to impose on you their own dishonor receive us as enemies. Frenchmen of Dakar, be not deceived. Do you know where the enemies of France are? They are in Paris, in Brest, in Lille, and in Strasbourg. Their accomplices wait for the time to invade Corsica and Tunis. Will you allow them to come to Dakar? There is still time. We can free you from these chiefs who are leading you to ruin and dishonor. With our aid you can choose the path of honor and victory. Have courage! Join with the forces of General De Gaulle."

De Gaulle, who had two 30,000-ton warships, two cruisers of 10,000 tons, and two destroyers, was maneuvering to land his troops, but the powerful guns of the Richelieu blocked the way. Attempts to disembark at Rufisque Beach, some twenty miles from Dakar, were repulsed, though De Gaulle was able to sink the submarine Persée and the destroyer Audacieux, and to damage a cruiser.

Not until nightfall did I learn what had happened earlier that day to contribute further to the disaster. At five in the morning Lieutenant Boislambert had drawn his revolver on the colonel in command of the coast batteries and taken charge, to await De Gaulle; then reinforcements sent by the Governor forced him to flee. The assault on the Ouakan airport had failed because of the willingness of De Gaulle's friends to talk instead of act, which gave time for reinforcements to arrive and take them prisoners. One of the captured had a list of the De Gaulle sympathizers in Dakar and of the objectives of the attack. The Governor thereupon at once arrested the mayor, the members of the city council, the president of the chamber of commerce, the secretary of the Socialist Party, and many soldiers. There was now no chance that De Gaulle's friends in Dakar could give him any effective aid.

On the next morning (September 24,) I learned of the note which the admiral in command of the British fleet had addressed to Governor Boisson on the previous evening. It stated that De Gaulle was retiring in order to prevent Frenchmen from fighting Frenchmen and that he was leaving the battle in the hands of the British. Boisson replied: "France has entrusted Dakar to my care and I shall defend it to the end!" In expectation of a renewal of the British attack, orders were given to evacuate the civilian population.

At eight o'clock that morning firing began again. English planes were dropping bombs on the ships anchored in the port. Some of them struck the Richelieu and the merchant ships Tamara and Takoma. The English squadron sent shells flying all over the harbor.

About eleven o'clock a truce was declared and people left the city in an exodus of biblical proportions. At noon British air and naval forces renewed the attack. The Richelieu was struck again, as was the French warship Porthos. That night the Takoma, a floating bonfire, lighted up the port and the town.

The British had lost two airplanes in the attack on the port and I learned the next morning that three more had been lost in the attack on Thiel airport, inland from Dakar.

On the third day of the bombardment the British ships opened up early, setting fire to several buildings in the port area. In a daring rally, the French submarine Bevesiers torpedoed the British battleship Resolution. At eleven De Gaulle, in words of anger and disappointment, broadcast his last appeal. To this the Richelieu replied with steady firing, and the British ships drew away.

Colonel Boisson's forces, completely demoralized, were amazed at this retreat. Had the British pressed the attack a few hours longer, increasing the use of the air force, Dakar's resistance would have ended.

It is, of course, possible that London-Vichy relations would have been strained to the breaking point, even to the fighting point, if the British had pressed their advantage. But if Dakar was not worth that risk, the expedition should never have sailed. Its net result was a number of killed and wounded and a complete victory of the Vichy forces over the De Gaullistes in the Senegalese capital of Dakar. I myself, a known Spanish Republican, was forced to flee, within twenty-four hours, overland through the African jungle to Liberia.

Britain's Citizen Defenders

BY PATRICIA STRAUSS

THE British are once again discussing the possibility of invasion. The subject creeps into conversation, flits across men's minds as they work. The small flame of fear evoked last summer has changed to a cold confidence based on the unpaid, unprofessional 1,750,000 men of the Home Guard. During the day they are ordinary civilians earning their living. In their leisure hours they are home guards preparing to meet an invasion. Their text is Churchill's now famous phrase, "We shall fight in the fields and streets and in the hills." They plan seriously the best technique for defense of their own village. Every possibility is considered. If cut off from outside help with a force of mechanized troops coming from the west, would it be better to hold them at the bridge, or fall back on the crossroads? By their determination they have found their own unofficial way to answer such a question.

On Tuesday, May 14, 1940, at nine p.m., when all conversation in Britain had ceased by common consent because it was time for the news broadcast, and even farm laborers were staying up to hear it, Anthony Eden's smooth voice came over the radio asking for men between the ages of seventeen and sixty-five to form an organization to be known as the Local Defense Volunteers. They would not be paid, but would receive uniform and arms. They would be asked to give their spare time to learning how to defend their homes. The period of service would be for the duration of the war. It was preferably, but not essential, that they should know how to handle guns. The scheme was to apply particularly to villages, small towns, and remote districts where the danger of invasion by parachute troops was greatest.

While Eden was still speaking police stations in country areas were swamped with telephone calls. The first recruit signed on in Newcastle exactly four minutes after Eden had finished his appeal. Next day, all over Britain, men left home earlier than usual to sign on before going to work. Country men tramped into the nearest town to register. In the first twenty-four hours a quarter of a million men volunteered. All that day and the following days, the lines outside the recruiting depots were like cinema crowds waiting to see a smash-hit film. From now on these men would have no free evenings. The only reason there are not more than 1,750,000 men in the Home Guard is that the government decided that was enough and closed the lists.

The volunteers are of all classes and professions— butchers, farmers, bank clerks, railwaymen, scientists, engineers. The House of Commons has its own unit of members of Parliament, waiters, peers, and officials. It was surprising how many of the volunteers knew how to handle guns, until one remembered the men who had been in the last war, the middle class who had had rudimentary military training at school, the farmers and agricultural workers for whom shooting is part of their daily lives, the wealthier classes who shoot for sport.

Soon the volunteers were to be seen drilling in civilian clothes on the village green, instructed either by a regular army sergeant or by a local ex-officer of the last war. In the cities the drilling was done in parks. They learned to form fours and shoulder arms, and spent their nights watching the moorlands and downs for an enemy attempt to land parachute troops. The public dubbed them parashots. They were an enthusiastic and serious group of civilians. But they soon began to realize that something was wrong. They argued among themselves that while they recognized the need for discipline, forming fours and shouldering arms in front of an oncoming tank would not help—unless the tank crew died of shock at the sight—and they wanted to do more than simply report plane-landings of enemy troops. They wanted to learn how to deal with the situation between the time of making the report and the arrival of reinforcements. Remembering the Nazi sweep through the Lowlands they realized that transport and communication were likely to be disrupted, and that, unless they had the knowledge to deal with the situation, their village might be captured before the regular army could get there. Being civilians, their critical faculties had not been drilled out of them, so they began to ask questions. They continued to guard bridges, railway lines, and crossroads, but their demand for real training grew.

It was too critical a time to wait for the War Office to develop an understanding of contemporary military tactics. After the fall of France the public was skeptical of the high command's "expert" knowledge. A few men with no official status came to the people's rescue. As a result of their work the government now has in the Home Guard not a body of men who watch and report but a military organization of civilian soldiers. The demand for this came from the people. They found unofficial means to satisfy it, and authority is finally recognizing and accepting their work. It is one of the many examples of democracy working in a country at war.

While the government was changing the name from Local Defense Volunteers to Home Guard, and uniforms and equipment were slowly dribbling to the units, Tom Wintringham, who fought in France from 1916 to 1918 and was the first commander of the British battalion of the International Brigade in the Spanish War, began to devise means of passing on to his fellow-countrymen the lessons he had learned in Spain. Picture Post, the English equivalent of Life, published a series of articles in which he explained in simple language, with diagrams, charts, and photographs, how the population of an ordinary village can impede the progress of tanks, break up formations of motorcycle corps, and use beer bottles filled with gasoline as deadly weapons. There was much laughter among certain people at the idea of a blacksmith engaging a tank with a pick-axe, but the men of the Home Guard recognized this as the kind of instruction they wanted. In Home Guard units from the highlands of Scotland to the Welsh valleys those articles were studied, pasted on walls, the tactics practiced and earnestly discussed. The Home Guard was having a correspondence course. In the East End of London and the Slums of Glasgow men practiced making and throwing hand grenades. Men who had never seen a tank knew exactly within how many yards of it they could safely come. The old soldiers scratched their heads in bewilderment, the War Office remained coldly aloof, the Home Guard carried on.

Meanwhile Wintringham, determined that the Home Guard should have personal instruction, accepted from Lord Jersey his large house and grounds at Osterley Park, near London. Edward Hulton, owner of Picture Post, gave the money; Tom Wintringham and the finest faculty of experts you could hope to find under one roof gave their services; and Osterley was opened as a school where home guards could learn the technique worked out in the horror of Spain. Home guards came from all over Britain for two days' training, many voluntarily losing two days' pay from work, and went back to teach to the rest of their unit the things they had learned. But the school was unofficial. A request came from "very high up" that the school be closed. It was considered unnecessary that home guards should do "any of this crawling round; all they have to do is to sit in a pill-box and shoot straight." A circular was sent to units of the Home Guard pointing out that Osterley had not been approved. But it only served to make Osterley better known, and the applications to attend it increased.

Men at Osterley are not taught the drilling, signaling, or musketry which they can learn from their regular army instructors but methods of warfare not yet incorporated into military textbooks. Roland Penrose, the surrealist painter, is the Osterley camouflage expert. He teaches the Home Guard the principles of breaking sunlight with shadow, decorating a man with branches of trees, even dyeing his face, so that he will be invisible to a low-flying plane. Hugh Slater, the painter and journalist, who learned street-fighting with the International Brigade in Spain, shows on large-scale models how civilians with a minimum of equipment can defend a typical village. Anti-tank experts from the International Brigade teach the Home Guard how to blow up tanks with simple land mines. Wilfred Vernon, who was a technical officer and an aircraft designer in the last war, teaches the vulnerability of the dive-bomber and how to tackle it from the ground. There are also lessons in the great art of quickly and silently moving upon a man under cover of darkness; the use of smoke screens when there is no natural cover for attack; snapshooting with a revolver that fires through the holster; guerrilla warfare in territory occupied by the enemy; defense against troop-carrying aircraft, parachutists, and motorcycle corps; improvisation and use of hand grenades. Improvisation is stressed at Osterley because invasion does not take place under peacetime conditions, and the aim of the enemy is to disrupt transport and communications. In case supplies are cut off, it is essential for men to know that many household tools can be effective weapons.

The aim of the instructors at Osterley is to have the Home Guards so well trained in defense that the army may be freed for offensive operations, and the Home Guard be truly what its name implies. If every man in a village knows the position in which an armchair in a second floor window best affords cover and best enables him to command the street with a machine-gun, the Home Guard can deal with sporadic landings of airborne troops, while the army repels coastal attacks. It is psychologically better that a village should be defended by its own people. A retreat in someone else's village is just a retreat. But in your own village a retreat of 150 yards is a retreat from the sweetshop where you bought peppermints as a child to the baker's shop where your brother works. It is literally defending your own home.

The War Office also benefited from the experiment. In September, 1940, Osterley at last received official approval. The Army Council thanked the school and the War Office decided to take it over. Now the Home Guard is to have military status. Lord Gort, Inspector General, is responsible for its training. Officers of the Home Guard will assume the King's Commission and bear the usual titles of military rank.

In the morning they are civilians—the bank manager at his desk, the laborer in the field, the worker in the factory. In the evening social position gives place to the common determination to become skilled defenders. The men not scheduled to guard strategic points practice at the rifle range or discuss the practical application of the lessons of Osterley.

The churchbells of Britain have been silent since the fall of France. They will ring only to warn of invasion. All over Britain civilians will respond to the bells, not by leaving their villages in panic streams of refugees, but with well-ordered, well-disciplined, well-informed resistance. No town in Britain could be taken by a few motorcyclists, as was Abbeville in France. The vanguards of mechanized troops will not be able to sweep through villages impeded only by the limitations of their engines. Each village will be defended by its villagers with stubbornness and skill.

A commonly heard remark in Britain today is, "I wish Hitler would try to invade us. We'd show him!"

America's Food Problem

BY T. SWANN HARDING

AMERICAN agriculture is in serious difficulties, and not all of them caused by the war. Most, in fact, are of pre-war and domestic origin. For forty years the trend of American agricultural exports has been downward and the trend of agricultural production elsewhere in the world has been upward. The war of 1914-18 temporarily interrupted this movement. After Versailles we made loans to Europe to enable it to buy our produce and later found that these loans were gifts. We thereupon decided to give no more products away. So we bought Europe's gold and Europeans used some of their dollar exchange here to purchase agricultural products. The second World War ended that, and it could not have continued indefinitely anyway. Our tariffs being what they were and our exchange being built upon gold, we could not indefinitely continue that sort of thing, nor could we engage in barter, like Germany.

There are enormous agricultural surpluses all over the world today. While it would be mechanically possible for us to meet all normal domestic and foreign demands upon our agriculture with 1,600,000 fewer farm laborers than we had in 1930, we have many more on farms than we had in 1930. There are also two bales of cotton in the world today for every bale that will probably be used in the current marketing year, and there are two billion bushels of wheat for which no market exists, not to mention fresh fruits, lard, and tobacco.

In short, since the use of modern technology results in glutted markets and unemployment, we must stop overproducing staple commercial crops, and use the same ingenuity and foresight in putting technological developments to work that we used to discover them. A basic essential in national preparedness is a well-fed, well-clothed, well-housed rural population and, as Secretary of Agriculture Wickard has said, "With twenty million people living on an average of five cents per meal, we can hardly say that the American people are free from want now."

Although Great Britain at war manages to feed her people scientifically, we in America have largely prostituted the newer techniques of nutrition. We have permitted all sorts of commercial quacks and charlatans to exploit them and have been reluctant to safeguard the public for fear of diminishing profits. A few years ago certain communities congratulated themselves on having perfected diets that made it possible to feed relievers for the incredibly small sum of six or seven cents a day.

More recently we have done better. We now permit our twenty million underprivileged the huge sum of five cents per meal. Not only that; the food-stamp plan enables a certain proportion of them—not enough by any means—to increase this sum by two and one-half cents. This aristocracy among those on relief can spend seven and one-half cents per person per meal on food.

The application of the newer knowledge of nutrition has been restricted to the upper classes in the United States. In 1934 a survey made in New York City disclosed that 70 per cent of the children in East Side schools were backward in their studies because they were undernourished. The Bureau of Home Economics in 1939 cited deficient diet in low-salary city families not on relief and earning between $500 and $2,000 a year. Only about a third of these people, for instance, got enough vitamin A for good vision in semi-darkness, and bad vision in semi-darkness causes many an automobile accident attributed to carelessness. These people had only about two-thirds the vegetables and fruits and from one-half to one-third the milk they needed.

Surveys of various workers shortly prior to 1939 showed widespread undernourishment among the low-income classes in general. Here 21 per cent had diets with average energy values one-fourth below accepted standards; there only 29 per cent of a group had grade A diets; 45 per cent had grade B; and 26 per cent grade C, which failed even to meet average minimum dietetic requirements. At least ten studies in the five years before 1939 demonstrated the beneficial effects of supplementing children's ordinary diets.

One expert estimated that an average of 22.3 per cent of school children throughout the country suffered from malnutrition. Studies in New York City indicated that one-third of them there were poorly nourished. Four thousand people died annually of pellagra, a disease easily prevented by dietetic means, and thousands upon thousands more suffered disability and economic loss from the disease in milder, non-fatal forms—a 35-per-cent loss in work efficiency being the average.

In December, 1940, a survey by the American Institute of Public Opinion indicated that President Roosevelt was well within the mark when, in his second inaugural address, he said one-third of the nation was ill-fed. For the survey indicated that foods retarding health were eaten by 40 per cent of American families. Only 20 per cent of the families earning $20 a week or more found their diets deficient, but 70 per cent of those earning less than that were conscious of dietary lacks.

These representatives of twenty million underprivileged were asked what they would buy to eat if they had more money to buy with. They replied they would buy more meat, vegetables, fruits, and dairy products. Confirmation of this came in January, 1941, when it was found that selling milk at a cent a bottle to children in New York City schools increased sales by 477 per cent!

Our market for agricultural commodities is right here at home. Science and technology have taught us how to produce foods and fabrics in such abundance that we always threaten to glut the market. We know how men, women, and children should be fed to maintain health. Yet we have among us twenty million people trying to make five cents per person per meal do them for food.

Here is a problem in social engineering, a purely functional problem of putting knowledge to work. We must link knowledge and power. We must implement science and technology. The food-stamp, school-lunch, and cotton-mattress plans dimly show the way, but far, far more must be done. The food-stamp plan enables a few hundred thousand people who spend but a dollar a week for food to spend $1.50 a week. By May 1, 1940, a little more than ten million dollars' worth of butter, eggs, flour, cornmeal, rice, vegetables, fruits, pork, lard, and a few other foods had been distributed by this plan. Only 1,300,000 people had benefited.

If all people now eligible for relief could participate in this plan, it would cost about $400,000,000 a year. An additional $200,000,000 or $240,000,000 would take care of all employed people who make less than $1,000 per family annually. Even if all eligible for relief were included, the farmers would gain from $240,000,000 to $440,000,000 per year.

Underconsumption of food by low-income families is so common that if all our families had nutritionally good diets, consumers would require from 15 to 20 per cent more dairy products, about 35 per cent more eggs, and from 70 to 100 per cent more of certain fresh fruits and vegetables. Indeed, farmers themselves, to be properly nourished, should consume a half a billion gallons more milk, nearly a billion pounds more tomatoes and citrus fruits, and two and one-half billion pounds more vegetables. There is our potential market for diversified crops.

Communal kitchens could be introduced to feed those who need to have full meals at regular hours. Here the food would be better selected, better prepared, and more economical than at home. There could also be cook-houses to supply not only mobile canteens but people who brought dishes in which to take cooked food to their homes. Canteens could function as communal kitchens for those who needed light meals irregularly. Mobile canteens supplied from central cookhouses could service scattered populations and those unable to leave their posts. The British found that excellent meals could be prepared for fifty people at eightpence each, a sum that dropped to sixpence when the number was larger.

If all American families now on relief and all with incomes of less than $1,000 a year could be given incomes of $1,250 a year the results would be stupendous. They would buy $1,247,000,000 worth more food, adding over half a billion dollars to the farm income. They would also purchase more non-food farm commodities.

The first step is to regard our entire production and distribution of basic farm commodities as requiring intensive application of scientific knowledge to every phase of the problem from preparing the soil and sowing the seed to the serving of food and the distribution and consumption of farm commodities by those who need them.

Bulgaria on the Eve

BY PETER STEVENS

Sofia, Bulgaria, January 15

I HAVE been spending the early winter in Sofia, the toyland capital of Bulgaria, the last of the capitals of Europe in the gay operetta tradition of "The Merry Widow," with its brilliant uniforms and a real czar living in a miniature, gingerbread palace. In happier days it was a grand place to relax in, eat caviar at a microscopic price, and attend the earnest little state opera.

During the Christmas season just passed the sleighs and fur hats, singing in the cafés, gaiety and champagne were all missing. The little city is still as lovely in its way; the opera and the caviar remain. But over all hangs a desperate shadow of fear. Fear today in Europe means fear of Hitler's army and Goering's Luftwaffe, but even more of the dreaded Blackshirts and the Gestapo. The Gestapo is already in Sofia, and every day rumors fly about that this is the day—the day that the Gestapo cease masquerading as tourists and that the hordes fly and walk in to take possession. "Will they come tonight?" "I have on good authority that two hundred and fifty members of the Luftwaffe will take over the Plovdiv Airport tomorrow morning." "The Turks will attack us then." "What can we do?"

My hotel, and others as well, are full of German "tourists," men of military age who say little and mix with the Bulgarians not at all. In the café and dining room of the Grand Hotel Bulgaria, next to the little palace, they sit in small groups, stiff and self-conscious, sipping their bitter black Bulgarian beer. They converse in low tones and read the latest issues of the German papers. The Bulgarians eye them with much the same awe that a Mississippi Negro must have eyed his prospective buyer in a slave market.

Twice a week the Bulgarians learn who is boss in the New Europe. They have two meatless days in a country which used to be an exporter of surplus meat. Three times every day the inferior quality of the dry, dusty bread reminds them their government is already doing as it is told. In return, the Germans send manufactured goods in small quantities at high prices, but not enough to pay for the foodstuffs taken; the rest is paid in promises.

Of course the Bulgarians are bitter and hopeless. The pictures of Warsaw and Rotterdam are constantly before them in the German and Italian propaganda magazines. They remember all the other states. "If the French could not resist, how can we?" ". . . and the Germans say that four divisions will break the Greeks' back in the spring."

Even the gift of Dobrudja, forced from Rumania, has not made the Bulgarians love the Germans. No gift can make the Bulgarians forget that they were for five hundred years the economic, social, and political slaves of the Turkish "New Order" in the Balkans. Most of them know that as Slavs they are considered an "inferior race," doomed to become serfs of the Nordic overlords when a German order is established. Bulgarians are proud of being Slavs but do not cherish another half-thousand years of being slaves. "But what can we do?"

As Slavs, Bulgarians until recently had faith that Russia would protect them from all comers. That faith has gone. Russia, too, they believe is afraid of Germany. The great equestrian statue of the czar who sent Russian help in the war of independence against the Turks was formerly a symbol of the Big Brother up there who would shelter and protect. Now he is just another statue.

"Our choice," said a prosperous workman in a café one evening, "is to resist, be destroyed, and made slaves, or to be made slaves willingly." So thorough is the Axis propaganda of invincibility that no third possibility occurred to him. Under his hat was a toy horse, a present for his son. "I had to come back, but I wish I'd left the wife and kid in Detroit." He looked rather sadly at the horse. "We'll never get out now. I didn't take out no papers."

REOPENING OF GERMAN TOURIST SEASON IN THE BALKANS

I left the café and walked back to the hotel. Tomorrow, like every other day, would bring its crop of rumors, high strategy in the war of terror, to frighten these poor people further. The King would be called to Germany again; more troops would pour into Rumania across the Danube; more "tourists" would arrive quietly from Berlin and Munich. Someone would say in a whisper, "There are 250,000 in Rumania and they say that up on the Danube they are preparing to cross." "They report that the Greeks cannot keep it up any longer." "What will be the end?"

In the hotel the elevator man said, "Do they say in Stamboul that the Turks will attack us if we let the Germans in?" I told them that I thought so. "My family live in Thrace," he said. "Good night, sir."

Early one morning I found myself standing beside my bed, wide awake and listening. Martial music! The Germans had come! I rushed to my window, threw it open, stepped out on the balcony. It was only the guards changing at the palace across the street. The sentries in their high astrakan hats stood at attention outside their little peppermint-striped sentry boxes. The snow fell gently on the gold turnip-like towers of the Russian Church. Nothing could have looked more peaceful! But rumor had gathered so much strength with repetition that a little martial music could awaken me from a sound sleep. Peace and the Goebbels rumor-terror cannot exist side by side.

In the Wind

AMBASSADOR DODD'S diary has been used by both sides on the war question. The President used it against Senator Wheeler, and the isolationists have been using it to get at William Bullitt, whom Dodd disliked, and others in the diplomatic corps. Now, Jay Franklin, former State Department man and Administration confidant, has written to PM that Dodd's memoirs are unreliable so far as American officials are concerned. The diary, he said, makes "entertaining reading, but can scarcely be considered the final authority in judging men or institutions."

THE NAZI "Workers Challenge" radio station sent out a broadcast before the recent People's Convention in London, saying that the Reich officials were "keenly interested" in the isolationist, anti-British affair. A week later the Free Trade Hall in Manchester, where the convention was to have been held, was bombed.

THE GOVERNMENT is putting a stop to some of the superlatives in advertising. A brand of canned peas now carries on its label a boxed statement saying "Below Standard in Quality: Artificially Colored." Below that appear the words, "Above Legend Mandatory: Peas Actually Very High Quality."

RECENTLY Mrs. Roosevelt spoke against the poll tax at a meeting of Southern liberals in Richmond. The next day a local newspaper referred to the First Lady's "strange faith in universal suffrage."

THE MUNICIPAL government of Grand Rapids, Mich., recently announced that it was developing a special arm of the police force to protect strikebreakers.

SEVERAL DISTINGUISHED AMERICAN women wrote to the Spanish Embassy in Washington to inquire about and ask justice for Victoria Kent, the famous woman lawyer who was sent back to Spain from her refuge in France and is now in a Spanish prison. They specifically requested that their letter be forwarded to Franco. In reply they received a highly courteous note which had nothing to say of their request but which included the following passage: "... there is really little we can say except to give you the assurance that the courts of justice in Spain act with perfect regularity and justice for everyone. So, if, as you assert, Victoria Kent is not guilty of any transgression of the law, there is nothing to fear for her."

HARVARD LIBERALS now refer to the Communists as the Russia First Committee.

AT THE RECENT Youth Congress meeting Joseph P. Lash, formerly one of its top leaders but now in active disagreement with the Congress line, asked for a point of order. Lash stood for fifteen minutes waiting to be heard. Two minutes after he began speaking, Congress enthusiasts tried to knock him off his feet. No sooner had he stopped speaking than some high-school students appeared with a great banner inscribed: "Lash: $4,000 a year man"—referring to the salary he receives as one of the officers of the International Student Service.

A RESIDENT OF HAMBURG wrote to an American friend about the friend's brother: "I set out yesterday to call on your brother, and just imagine how forgetful and absent-minded I am becoming! I walked up and down the whole length of the street twice without finding the house." The American thereby knew that his brother's house had been destroyed by a British bomb.

AT A MASSACHUSETTS town meeting a candidate for selectman was asked if he had ever been a Communist. He admitted that he had. "Well, I can't hold that against you," said the questioner. "I used to be a Kluxer myself."

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

A Native at Large

BY JONATHAN DANIELS

Dictators and Poll Taxes

LYNN M. RANGER, of Lynn, Massachusetts, sells anthracite and bituminous stokers (110 different models) throughout New England. Like the rest of us he is interested not only in coal-burning comfort at home but in what is going to happen to us in the world. He sent me a question. He had been watching the figures in various polls which showed that among the American regions the South was readiest to risk aid to England even with the chance of war.

"Why?" he asked me.

With a portable typewriter on my knees in a Texas and Pacific railway station in Alexandria, Louisiana—a station full of lonely, dirty, sleepy army-camp construction-workers, I tried to tell him. I do not think I was entirely successful. As a Southerner I wanted to take pride in the statistical evidence of the South's special militancy against totalitarianism. But in that railway station, among tired men, I kept coming back to the fact that the region which is the most anxious to risk the most aid in this battle for democracy over Britain is also the one in which eight states have poll-tax laws effectively denying the right of thousands of poor men, white and black, to any part in government by the people.

Like so many other American questions, the poll tax seems a good deal less important than it did before Hitler marched through the low countries to the coast opposite England. But if democracy is as much more important in the world as the increased use of the word indicates, it should still be important in America—certainly important in the region of America where sentiment is greatest for aid in a war in which democracy is supposed to be the leading issue that binds the cause of England to our hearts.

I want to know, even more than Mr. Ranger does, what is the meaning of the South's strong sentiment for aid. Democracy is loudly loved out of some strange mouths in the United States today, and not only in the South. But in the South as well as in the Senate, sometimes Senator Carter Glass of Virginia has seemed almost the most insistent of all democracy's rescuers and redeemers. Out of the side of his famous twisted mouth, he has spoken his meaning as clearly as a man can speak. He is not afraid of the risk of war, or, his manner suggests, of high water, hell fire, Hitler, or damnation. He is for kicking at this Hitler, immediately and directly.

And the diminutive, fragile-looking, rough-talking old man seems dramatic in his righteous anger. He is dramatic. And also at least a little depressing.

He is the man who, when he was younger, shouted, to the echoing cheers of Virginians, in support of the adoption of the poll tax he still upholds at home. It would keep the "darkies" out of politics, he told them, and would "not necessarily deprive a single white man of the ballot." Not necessarily! Actually, it not only disfranchised practically all of the Negroes in Virginia; it also denied—and still denies—the ballot to thousands of white Virginians who do not have a dollar and a half extra in their pockets six months before election day. In one year Virginia's representatives in Congress were elected by only 17.9 per cent of the potential voting strength, but in West Virginia, which has no such poll tax, the representatives were chosen by 76.9 per cent of the possible electorate. In the Presidential election of 1936, the average vote of the nation as a whole was 62 per cent of those of voting age, but in Virginia only 31 per cent of that group cast ballots. In 1940 Virginia ranked sixteenth among the states in population but twenty-ninth in the number of votes cast in the general election.

Thomas Jefferson's old Virginia is not alone in having poll taxes which effectually deny poor men, white and black, the right to vote. Seven other states in the South have such laws, and in them only one out of four persons normally casts a ballot; in other states almost three out of four of the adult population vote. It may be only coincidence that in the region where poor men are prevented by poll taxes from voting there are 11,000,000 people who are members of families with gross cash incomes of $250 a year or less. For people with such incomes a poll tax is not a tax but a barrier to the ballot. It is still a sad coincidence that the South, which leads the whole land in the wish to aid in the war of democracy against totalitarianism, is alone in the use of such devices to prevent democracy at home.

I couldn't explain that to Mr. Ranger. I cannot satisfactorily explain it even to myself. But I do have the feeling, which I wish I could make convincing, that if we cannot trust democracy below the Potomac River, we are fools to hope to save it along the English Channel. And that is a truth, I think, Mr. Ranger, which applies to more things than poll taxes and to more places than the South.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Idea-Ida

I READ anything. I also read anywhere. My wife says. You read anything. Isabel, that is her name, also says, you read anywhere. But I do not read anything anywhere. Mostly at home I read novels. And oh yes poems. Many poems and some novels.

Of course that is what I do, in my office I read letters and reports and, I am a teacher, theses and dissertations. There is a difference. But you just are not a teacher.

Sometimes very often I forget where I am. Always it is not my fault.

My wife says.

What are you reading.

I say. Something I have to read.

In the subway and in elevators I read too. Not elevators there are no more. Going vertical I gradually read faster then.

Sometimes people read over my shoulder. It does not often matter. Pretty soon mostly they get a shock.

I just do not read aloud.

Inside and outside I read to myself. Very gradually I earn a living reading to myself. Yes.

I met Ida on the subway. It looked as if it was sudden. Not really Ida, I met just Idea-Ida.

Other people met her also. They did not always recognize her. I could not help it. I said nothing.

That was in New York. I was married then but I would not go to live in Texas. Maybe in Idaho. Ida has lived in almost every state and only once I think in the state of sin.

Once upon a time Ida was a mountain in Asia Minor. Regularly from its top the Gods watched the Trojan War. This was not, was not altogether a bad idea. Only Gods can be isolationists. Gracefully. At the same once upon a time another Ida was a mountain in Crete. Idea-Ida.

Ida did not only not come from Asia Minor but she was always resting. Pretty soon she thought of the mountains of Montana. But she did not ever think of the mountains of Nebraska. And they were mostly twins.

Everybody was reading the same words. Not their words. Not always Ida's words. Sometimes they were Ida's words, sometimes they were Winnie's words. But always they were Gertrude's words.

Little words and easy words. Ten-year-old words like Helen Button used to use. Before she became Lady Helen Button. Nickel words was what the officer said. He was not wearing his uniform but he was an officer. Mostly very often the sentences were a different matter. They were easy at first like your first champagne. Later you pick up other sentences and the first ones hit you on the back of the head. My wife said once. You must not mix sentences. You know what happened the last time.

There we were reading all three of us. There were there I and two more. One got off, he was not an officer I do not think. At least it would be a funny army. We two rested and read.

And then it happened, quite by accident, she did sit down next to me. I did not see her but I knew we were three again. That is the way my wife met Ida.

She got on at forty-second street.

Dear Ida.

Never again will I not be with Ida. Of course that is not what happened, I did not meet my wife through Ida. I knew her already. Well she did not know she was meeting me, neither did I. It is easy to make everybody see this. Only Ida knew. She always knew. Ida only smiled.

When I got home, she walks faster than I do, my wife was there already. Not then but later.

We were having tea and Isabel was telling me about Ida. She had met her on the subway. Already she felt better.

She asked, I always know about such things, when did Ida come out. I said, she is not old enough to come out yet.

Once upon a time in Matthew Mark Luke and John four was a woman of Samaria who had had five husbands and the one she had then was not her husband, Maybe she was dear Ida. Only Ida had more. Ida is a book and a book well a book is well it is a book. Ida was one. Ida is at her best.

When she does not rest.

It got to be kind of a song. And when she talks about dogs. That is best of all.

Ida is the funniest girl I know. Ida is much funnier than my wife.

Thank you.

JUSTIN O'BRIEN

Mystery of War Morale

REPORT ON ENGLAND. By Ralph Ingersoll. Simon and Schuster. $1.50.

WAR LETTERS FROM BRITAIN. Edited by Diana Forbes-Robertson and Roger W. Straus, Jr. Putnam. $2.

ENGLAND'S HOUR. By Vera Brittain. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

OF the three books listed above the most important as news, as information likely to help Americans make decisions about policy, is Ralph Ingersoll's "Report on England." The publisher tells us that Mr. Ingersoll gathered the material and wrote the book in less than five weeks, and that it was printed and published in less than three. Such reporting does not allow much time for philosophizing and drawing conclusions, but is none the less indispensable in the kind of world we live in. The material is all useful, all interesting, and much of it extremely important.

As Mr. Sheean in his foreword points out, "War Letters from Britain" is a collection of letters representative of many types and classes, and written at all stages of the war, including its early inactive phase. Most, as he says, are the unfeigned and unvarnished expressions of what their writers felt as the bombs fell around them. Though most are anonymous, names of many are given. The writers include Lady Diana Cooper, Alec Waugh, the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Archbishop of York, Edith Lytton, Helen Kirkpatrick, Leslie Banks, Sir Barry Jackson, Constance Spry, Leslie Stokes, John Carter, Ivor Brown, Anthony Guthrie, Joyce Reynolds, Rebecca West, John Gielgud, Stanley Lupino, to say nothing of commanders of cruisers, R. A. F. officers, women teachers, R. A. F. pilots, housekeepers, schoolboys, vicars, rectors, hotel managers, a clergyman's wife, business men, A. R. P. wardens, doctors . . .

Vera Brittain's book, "England's Hour," is much more ambitious than the other two and is described by the author herself as an attempt at a wartime variation of Priestley's "English Journey." The Blitz, however, compelled her to confine her observations for the most part to London. Into the observation of the external world about her is interjected the reflections of the pacifist, or mainly pacifist, author of "Testament of Youth."

Those whose nerves register even in the tiniest degree the rumbling of the earthquake which may transform the life of man upon the earth, read a book these days with one question at the back of their heads. How will it help to stir men to do the right thing; how far clear up the confusions of contrary counsel, help us to see the right path and, having chosen it, to stick to it?

None of these books leaves any doubt as to the dogged courage of the common people of Britain in this, their great ordeal. The testimony is so unanimous as to have become almost hackneyed. It is not for an English reviewer to enlarge upon it.

But certain questions arise. These books reveal an incredibly courageous people facing the risk of death and, what is much worse, of pain and mutilation; enduring long drawn-out discomfort, helplessness, and illness nightly in horrible surroundings, in caves and cellars and shelters; enduring all this not merely with patience, but with humor and good nature. In his foreword to "War Letters," Vincent Sheean tells how every day men and women go to their work at the accustomed hour, although they can be sure neither of arriving at their destination nor of finding it intact when they get there. "It is difficult to believe that any other people in Europe could endure what they are enduring," he says.

What conviction has sustained them through these fires of purgatory? In the years which preceded the war and even in the first months of the war, they did not seem to have any very passionate convictions for which they would be prepared to suffer martyrdom. Yet from the evidence of these books (confirmed recently by Mr. Willkie's testimony after his visit to Britain), and from the order of the events which brought Britain into the war, it is quite clear that this is a people's war. The impulse to end appeasement and resist Hitler's aggression came from below. Large conservative elements in the country were willing enough to continue making deals with Hitler. It is indeed this fact which renders the charge that this is an imperialist war absurd. It was the imperialist elements that for years avoided all risk of war, and the popular elements that forced resistance, that would have accepted the risks earlier, and by so doing might have prevented actual war. In the past few years much literature of the Left has given the impression that the British people feel themselves oppressed and downtrodden. But the behavior described in these books belies this. We have been told that sound morale depends upon a revolutionary mood, upon giving the people a vision of a "new order." Yet the most revolutionary elements in England—the Communists—are precisely those who would join hands with the imperialists and make a peace of surrender.

It is curious in this connection to compare the British morale with the French and the German. In France a revolutionary attitude had been in some quarters assiduously cultivated for many years. (When the House of Commons had one Communist, the Chamber of Deputies had seventy-five.) But its effect was to deepen the rifts which split the country from top to bottom and make it impossible for a trade unionist to collaborate with a Conservative aristocrat, as in England, where a Churchill joins hands with a Bevin. As to morale in Germany—in no other country have promises of a new order been so lavishly made to the people; pushed with the cunning of an all-pervading propaganda machine; served up with the strong wine of conquests and victories without end. Yet, by the testimony of many good witnesses (Sebastian Haffner, among others, has recently analyzed the evidence most carefully), the Germans are gloomy while the British are cheerful, and, outside the Nazi party, seem not only unimpressed by the victories their leaders announce but burdened, despite the appearances of the moment, by a sense of ultimate defeat and disaster.

Most of the explanations offered for these contrasts seem inadequate; and this aspect of the war situation is worth more study than it seems to be getting. NORMAN ANGELL

China in Travail

THE BATTLE FOR ASIA. By Edgar Snow. Random House. $3.75.

THIS book of Edgar Snow's is in many respects more notable than his "Red Star Over China." It presents not only the birth of a dynamic, new political movement but also the rebirth of a great and ancient people. Though it deals at length and in great detail with China's resistance to Japanese aggression and explains the nature of this resistance better, perhaps, than any other volume on China, it is concerned primarily with the struggle within China, with the birth-pangs of an emerging democracy, and is the first of the war volumes to give insight into the accentuated political strife that has continued despite the necessity for unity.

The book's revelations regarding internal conditions in China are of special interest in view of the recent conflict between Kuomintang troops and the New Fourth Route Army which ended in the destruction of the latter. Mr. Snow has two chapters on the New Fourth, and a great deal of his material on the political divisions within the Kuomintang provides background for the conflict.

The story of the finding of the "lost" Red Army—the one that had stayed behind in Kiangsi to cover the retreat of the main units at the beginning of the long march to the Northwest—is a dramatic one. The book goes on to describe how this remnant of not more than five thousand hardened and experienced warriors became the nucleus of a "peoples' army" of forty thousand that was a constant trial to the Japanese. The phenomenal success of the New Fourth, like that of the Eighth Route Army, was the result of the effective organization of the entire population for resistance. Lacking supplies or an industrial base for the creation of supplies, the New Fourth had to organize mobile industry throughout the area—an industry that could be quickly picked up and moved in case of a Japanese attack. Although possessing no medical service at all and receiving no aid from the Central Government, it developed "what was probably the best army medical organization in China," used alike by the army and civilians in the area. This helped in enlisting the sympathy and support of the local population, a task that proved particularly difficult for the New Fourth because, in contrast to the Eighth, it could not disturb the political organization of the countryside and was thus precluded from winning the peasants by political and agrarian reforms.

The achievement of the New Fourth in mobilizing the masses and achieving the beginnings of democracy, in face of great obstacles, is contrasted sharply with the backwardness, lack of military efficiency, and political backbiting that characterized the areas under Kuomintang control. The government, Snow declares, "wavered between wanting to be known as a democracy and wanting to be a dictatorship." Little or nothing was done to train or mobilize the tens of millions of farmers in the heart of the nation. Workers were denied the right to organize. Relations between the soldiers and the village population were often bad. As a result of the failure to enlist the masses, an appalling amount of machinery and raw materials was allowed to fall into the hands of the Japanese when the coastal areas were evacuated. And in the political area traitors were permitted to "maneuver quite openly for the betrayal of a whole nation" while Chinese Communists, the backbone of resistance to Japan, were denied all except the most nominal political influence.

Not content with throttling the Communist armies by failure to provide arms, medical supplies, or material support, right-wing Kuomintang leaders formed a War Areas Party and Political Affairs Commission to eradicate the anti-Japanese movement led by the Communists behind the enemy lines. Long before the recent outbreaks, factions in the Central Army and the Kuomintang sabotaged the Eighth Route and New Fourth Route Armies in ways which, according to Snow, would be called fifth columnism elsewhere. Incidents multiplied so rapidly during 1940 "that progressive people everywhere half feared that the Kuomintang might abandon the effort against Japan and concentrate on what appeared to be its main interest: a renewed civil war against 'the Reds.'" In all this Chiang Kai-shek seemed powerless. For contrary to the common impression, Chiang's dictatorship is shown to be of a different type from Hitler's or Il Duce's. He does not have as much authority as the American President but holds power "by focusing in himself a combination of loyalties from disparate political groups."

Further evidence of the fear of democracy among the ruling clique is shown in the history of the Chinese industrial cooperatives with which Mr. and Mrs. Snow have been closely identified from the beginning. At first, proposals for the formation of cooperatives to utilize refugee labor and provide mobile industry in the interior sections of the country met with almost universal skepticism or opposition. And had it not been for the active sponsorship of the British Ambassador, Sir Archibald Kerr Clark-Kerr, who introduced the idea to Chiang Kai-shek, it is probable that the government never would have taken up what has proved one of the really great constructive ideas of recent history.

Yet with all its blunders China has managed to stave off the powerful Japanese war machine. That this has been done in spite of the ruling bureaucracy is shown in scores of illustrations scattered through the book. The Japanese attack has forged unity against the will of the warlords and politicians who thrive on disunity. But as yet, Snow estimates, not a third of the human and material resources of China have been mobilized. He asserts that with full democratic mobilization it would be possible to release at least another million rifles for use on the front line that are now being used to enforce property and money rights. And he fears that the slowness with which China has adopted necessary basic reforms may still, even now, permit a Japanese victory.

Fortunately Japan is rent with its own internal weaknesses, and it has committed even greater blunders of strategy and tactics. And with the signing of the tripartite alliance the struggle ceased to be confined, even chiefly, to China and Japan. The primary attention of the Japanese has already been turned against the outposts of the West in the Pacific. America may be drawn in. The chief question is whether it will be involved in the defense of the undemocratic concepts

At Last

A MODERN APPRAISAL OF THE VERSAILLES TREATY

... its real bearing on this war and on any future plan to keep peace!

"I RECOMMEND a careful reading . . . we may spare ourselves another disillusionment if we re-examine now the record of 1919."

—Lewis Gannett, N. Y. Herald Tribune

"ABSOLUTELY FIRST RATE . . . far more than a historical examination of a peace treaty."

—N. Y. Times Book Review

"READABLE, CONCISE, complete and unbiased. Carefully documented."

—N. Y. Sun

VERSAILLES 20 YEARS AFTER

By PAUL BIRDSALL

Professor of History, Williams College

$3.00 ■ REYNAL & HITCHCOCK • NEW YORK

of empire, or whether it will take its stand with those who, in China and elsewhere, are seeking to build a truer democracy than any which now exists. If this book receives half the attention it deserves, it should help us greatly in recognizing our true interests in Asia. MAXWELL S. STEWART

Religious Humorist

THE CASTLE. By Franz Kafka. Translated by Edwin and Willa Muir. Preface by Thomas Mann. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

A FRANZ KAFKA MISCELLANY. Twice a Year Press. $2.

FEW reviewers were able to gauge the true worth of "The Castle"—the novel that ranks highest in the Kafka canon—when it was first brought out in this country some ten years ago. At the time, and even as late as 1937, when "The Trial" was published, it was primarily Kafka's mystifications rather than his pattern of meaning and basic motives that aroused interest. Readers were astonished by him but not quite convinced. Since then his has become a name to conjure with; a number of closely reasoned and elaborate studies of his work have appeared both here and abroad; and everywhere the more sensitive younger writers, conscious of the static condition of the prevailing naturalistic techniques and seeking a creative renewal through mythic and symbolic conceptions, have taken his example to heart. There seems no longer any doubt of Kafka's importance as a metaphysical novelist or, from the standpoint of method, of his originality as an innovator. It can be said that he succeeded in demonstrating the power of reality precisely by exposing its unreality. By combining within one framework a conscientiously empirical reproduction of the recognizable world and a dreamlike and magical dissolution of it, he achieved a new mutation in the art of prose fiction.

In its lucidity and uncommon penetration into the Kafka problem, Thomas Mann's preface to the new edition of "The Castle" more than meets the occasion. Characterizing its author as a religious humorist, he writes of this novel that "never has the divine, the superhuman, been observed and experienced with stranger, more daring, more comic expedients, with more inexhaustible psychological riches, both sacrilegious and devout, than in this story of an incorrigible believer, so needing grace . . . that he even tries to encompass it by stratagems and wiles." He rightly notes that like his own Tonio Kröger, K., Kafka's hero, yearns for the "blisses of the commonplace." Yet it should be remarked that K.'s estrangement from humanity is of a nature radically different from the artist-loneliness of Mann's patrician character, whom the high cultural differentiation of modern society has raised to a plane so remote from the normal and the average that he cannot but fear the peculiar dangers and temptations of his isolated state. This is alienation from above, whereas the alienation of K. is from below. K.'s extremity is absolute; he belongs nowhere; he is recognized neither by the human community nor by the divine law. The protagonists of Mann's fictions still move within the world of assured place and privilege; they are people who have the capacity to grow and change, and their behavior can still be accounted for in terms of their individual traits and par-

BARGAINS in BOOKS

UP TO 75% OFF FORMER PRICES

Offered by America's Oldest Mail-Order Book House

ORIGINAL EDITIONS—NOT REPRINTS

1. GEORGE WASHINGTON: Commander in Chief. By T. G. Frothingham. 1st edition. Illustrated throughout. 405 pages. The thrilling military record of George Washington. $1.11 ($5.00)

2. THE GRAPES OF WRATH. By John Steinbeck. 619 pages. "As great a book as has yet come out of America."—Alexander Woolcott. Our special price $1.29

3. THE WONDERS OF THE ANCIENT WORLD. By A. S. Riggs. 1st edition. Profusely illustrated. The brilliant, fascinating story of the progress of Man from the Dawn Man to the Christian era. ($5.00) $1.98

4. HARDY CALIFORNIANS. By L. Rowntree. 1st edition. Profusely illustrated. "To the gardener or nature lover, the book is as thrilling as any Western Romance."—Nature. ($3.50) 98c

5. PATHFINDERS OF MEDICINE. By V. Robinson, M.D. Illustrated with 150 full-page plates, many from rare, old engravings. A history of medicine in biographies of its most outstanding figures, by the leading authority in the field. ($10.00) $3.48

6. THE OUTLINE OF ART. Edited by Sir Wm. Orpen. With 800 beautiful illus. 677 pages. "One of the great authorities covers concisely the entire subject of art." ($5.00) $1.89

7. WRITE IT RIGHT. By Ambrose Bierce. America's foremost master of literary style shows you what to say and what not to say, or write. Witty—Authoritative—Indispensable. 98c

8. ROMANTIC CZECHOSLOVAKIA. By R. M. McBride. Illustrated with over 100 drawings. A fascinating story of the Czechoslovakia, scarcely unchanged for centuries (until the recent German occupation.) ($5.00) $1.69

9. THE ENCYCLOPEDIA OF OCCULT SCIENCES. Introduction by M. C. Poinset. Illustrated. 496 pages. Within the pages of this remarkable book, you can read your character, fate and fortune and those of your friends. Simple to read, easy to consult. Our special price $1.98

10. THE WORKS OF PLATO. 4 vols. complete in 1. Famous Jowett trans. with Analyses. 1738 pages. "Emerson awards to Plato's The Republic the words of Omar about the Koran: 'Burn the libraries for their value is in this book.'" (Printed from the same large type plates as the 4 vol. edition published at $16.00 and now out of print.) Only $1.95

11. TWELVE THRILLING DETECTIVE STORIES. By Emile Gaboriau. Attractively and uniformly bound. Includes: File No. 113, Monsieur Lecoq, and ten other thrillers by one of the World's greatest Detective Story Writers. ($24) $6.95
The 12 vol. set, only

12. THE SAGA OF COFFEE. By H. E. Jacob. Profusely illustrated. "Even a non-coffee drinker will be fascinated by the book."—N. Y. Times. ($6.00) $1.98

13. THE MAGIC OF THE BOOK. By W. D. Orcutt. 1st edition. Profusely illustrated. 314 pages. A thrilling work for all lovers of books. ($5.00) $1.98

14. JOSEPH HODGES CHOATE. The Life of. By E. S. Martin. 2 vols. in 1. 910 pages. The fascinating story of the famous Ambassador to England. ($5) Our special price, 98c

THE UNION LIBRARY ASSOCIATION N-37

Established 1884

121-123 East 24th Street, New York, N. Y.

Gentlemen: I enclose $..... for which please send me the items I have encircled below, delivery charges prepaid.

1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12 13 14
(Mark circle around items desired)

☐ Please send me FREE Catalog No. 818-N, containing hundreds of equally unusual Book Bargains—just off the press!

Name

Address

City State

ticular social background. In K., on the other hand, one can already see the end of the long development of the hero in the European novel. He personifies the transformation of the idea of the hero into the idea of the victim, whose fate no longer issues from his own self-assertive acts but from the abstract, enigmatic relations that bend him to their impersonal will.

Precisely because the Hegelian-Marxist concept of alienation illuminates so much that is puzzling in one's initial encounter with Kafka, it is a pity that Harry Slochower should have seen fit to turn it into small change—in the usual manner of the mechanical and vulgar Marxists—by introducing all kinds of political references and associations, topical and otherwise, into his essay in the "Franz Kafka Miscellany." He describes the author of "The Castle" as a "pre-fascist exile," and the editors of this collection of writings by and on Kafka have obviously thought so much of Mr. Slochower's meaningless phrase that they have reproduced it as a secondary title on the cover of the book, where it passes as a statement of fact instead of as the mere notion that it really is. Mr. Slochower is so intent on a class analysis that he reads into K.'s conduct non-existent revolutionary motives and into Kafka's work as a whole a variety of responses to the political situation of his time. To my mind, this interpretation is as fatuous as it is blind to the actual qualities of Kafka's temper and vision.

As for the rest, this volume makes available excerpts from Kafka's diaries and letters, as well as the last three chapters of "The Castle," which are not included in either the first or the second English edition. Unfortunately, the translations from the German by Miss Sophie Prombaum are far from adequate. She lacks the sure touch of the Muirs, who have rendered an invaluable service to letters by their impeccable versions of Kafka's subtle, judicious, and ironically conservative style.

PHILIP RAHV

African Cocktail

BEHIND GOD'S BACK. By Negley Farson. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.50.

NEGLEY FARSON has shaken a bumper cocktail which ought to stimulate his numerous admirers without causing them mental indigestion. Its well-blended ingredients include almost everything you might expect to find in a book about Africa. There are descriptions of scenery—the dessicated lands of South West Africa, the lakes of the Great Rift Valley and their attendant mountains, the Congo jungle. The trials and triumphs of a journey in a Ford along the line of the equator are interspersed with a modest amount of big-game hunting. Mr. Farson shows a commendable restraint in tipping the Darkest Africa bottle but he does include a few pages on native sex customs and a brief account of the gruesome activities of the Leopard Men.

All these things add to the color and flavor of the book, but its real kick, for one reviewer at any rate, comes from the political reporting that is the basis of the mixture. To be sure, it is reporting of an impressionistic kind, omitting much significant detail and lacking documentation. Nevertheless, it does throw light on many of the problems which any scheme of post-war reconstruction must attempt to solve. And it should serve the useful purpose of discouraging glib generalizations about Africa both by those who sum up the whole continent in the phrase "imperialist exploitation" and by those who think in terms of "the white man's burden."

In the course of his extensive wanderings in Africa shortly before the war broke out, Mr. Farson covered four of the former German colonies now under mandates. In all he found evidence of a good deal of effort by the governing authorities to meet the terms of their trusts. In South West Africa and Tanganyika he saw few signs of discrimination against the German settlers even though they were completely organized by the Nazis and barely concealed the fact that they were working for a return to the Fatherland. He reports a number of illuminating conversations with German officials and planters and gives an interesting account of the way in which Berlin controlled the export sales of its nationals.

In Tanganyika the chief complaints against the rule of the British mandatory authorities came from British settlers who asserted that practically nothing had been done to open up the country. Everywhere Mr. Farson met criticism of the official native policy. "Every man jack in this government is a Negrophile," one disgruntled British settler told him. "They love the natives; they resent the white man. They want to keep us away."

This seems to me good evidence that the Colonial Office is not dispensing pious eyewash when it talks of the paramountcy of native interests in Tanganyika. It refuses to permit alienation of the land by Europeans. It seeks to preserve tribal organization, leaving local administration largely in the hands of the chiefs. This is the method of "indirect rule" which Mr. Farson found in a still more highly developed form in Uganda. As a way of government it does not consort with rapid progress—in the western sense—or with efficient exploitation of resources. But from the native point of view there is much to be said for British "lack of initiative." Any attempt to modernize Africa in a hurry must lead to a proletarianization of the Negroes such as can be witnessed in its bitterest form in the Union of South Africa. Hitler might bring efficiency to Africa but the Africans know that they would be the victims and not the beneficiaries. They have not forgotten the wholesale massacres of the Herreros in South West Africa and of the coastal tribes in Tanganyika. Everywhere, Mr. Farson reports, "the educated African is frightened of Germany. Hitler's constant ranting about racial superiority has chilled the Africans with the fear . . . of what he would do to them."

In the Belgian Congo, Mr. Farson found big business and government cooperating in a kind of totalitarian colonial rule mitigated only by absence of strong racial feelings and by an enlightened selfishness in matters of health and housing. The ugly head of monopoly also appears in his account of the Gold Coast where the natives left in possession of the land have industriously built up a great cocoa export industry. Control of their market, however, is in the hands of a European combine of buyers whose attempt to beat down prices led to a prolonged strike by native planters shortly before Mr. Farson arrived on the scene.

This is a long book and it is only possible in the course of a review to touch on a few of the topics with which it deals. But I should like to mention some of Mr. Farson's gallery of African portraits: Major Hahn, who guides 117,000 Ovamboes under "indirect rule" without the aid or need of one policeman or soldier; Kennedy, the taciturn Scotch fighter of the tsetse fly; Commandant Hubert, the intolerably fearless Belgian who threw mud at a hippo to make him move out of the way; Sir Arnold Hodson, Governor of the Gold Coast, who represents the British colonial service at its best. They are among the highlights of a piece of reporting which can be recommended as both entertaining and informative.

KEITH HUTCHISON

Search for the Past

RANDOM HARVEST. By James Hilton. Little, Brown and Company. $2.50.

MR. HILTON makes his bid for the winter trade with another bang-up story, headed straight for the public's heart and doubtless for the movies. Though it boasts no glittering Shangri-La or ivied preparatory school, it placates the scenery men with a palatial old English country seat, for which the producers might well use the set they so short-sightedly burned down in the last scene of "Rebecca."

Charles Rainier, whom we first see as a distinguished and graying member of Parliament, lost his memory in the first World War and regains it at the beginning of the present conflict—or rather, he suffers two separate lapses: first, his recovery from shell shock leaves him with complete amnesia and, since his identification has been lost, no clue as to who he is; then, a year later, a minor street accident restores his memory of everything that led up to a certain disastrous moment in a shell-crater in France but blots out all the happenings of the year immediately preceding. In other words, Rainier, who except for this unfortunate inability to account for all of his life is something of an admirable Crichton, finds his recollections divided into three airtight compartments, only two of which are open to him at any given time; and the chief burden of the novel is his attempt, with the assistance of his secretary, who is the narrator, to break down the walls between these compartments. A fascinating problem with infinite possibilities for complications, it is worked out ingeniously, if a little too facilely, and to the accompaniment of England's 1939 declaration of war (the directors will love that!) all the pieces of the puzzle fall into their proper places in a happy and not altogether unexpected denouement.

LOUIS B. SALOMON

Aesthetics as Science

THE STRUCTURE OF ART. By Carl Thurston. The University of Chicago Press. $2.50.

THIS book might serve as a text on the typical biases of the American mind: its positivism, its unwillingness to speculate, its eagerness for quick results, and its optimism. Mr. Thurston proposes that aesthetics be treated as a science rather than as a branch of philosophy, and its theories as working hypotheses of which the most that can be hoped is a high degree of probability instead of final certainty. Re-

"GIVE SANCTUARY TO THESE"

Eric G. Muggeridge, Director, is given a warm welcome as he returns with two children who lost their homes due to bombardments.

Dear Friends:

The following is a cable received from J. B. Priestley, Chairman of the Foster Parents' Plan for War Children, in England.

London, England

"WILL YOU PLEASE DO ALL YOU CAN TO FIND SUPPORT FOR 70 TINY TOTS WHO WERE RESCUED FROM EAST LONDON AND OTHER HARD HIT AREAS AND ARE BEING CARED FOR IN OUR CONVERTED COUNTRY HOUSE IN SAFE REGION IN HEREFORDSHIRE STOP MY WIFE IN CHARGE AND EAGER TO CARE FOR MANY MORE TODDLERS WHO ARE WAITING EVACUATION TO US ONCE WE CAN TAKE THEM PLEASE DO NOT DELAY HELP."

(Signed) J. B. Priestley

The Foster Parents' Plan for War Children maintains and operates "Sanctuaries" in safe pastoral regions all over England, for children of all nationalities made homeless by bombardments. Funds are needed to carry on the "Sanctuaries." Funds are needed for food, clothing and the many other requirements to make life comfortable for children separated from their parents as a result of the war.

The Foster Parents' Plan for War Children does not do mass relief. The aim of the Plan is to give to children beside shelter, food and clothing, a homelike atmosphere and loving care. All monies are cabled through the Chase National Bank of New York to our account in London and pass through the hands of no other committee. No amount is too small. Will you help, please?

Edna Blue—Executive Chairman, American Committee.

The following is an extract from a letter from Eric G. Muggeridge, Director of our work in England:

"We would like to send this message to friends in America. Whether or not we have an air-raid shelter or a gas mask or anything man has made to combat the death that is being rained upon us—we do have a REAL shelter. The guns may go on firing, shrapnel falling and bombs bursting—but the house of our children has a door of a fabric which can be crushed—it is a door made of human thoughts—human ideals, and each child that passes in passes to the warm shelter and protection of the realities of an ideal where it may dwell in the loving care that is extended to the children. You, our friends in America, have helped to create this atmosphere for the children."

CO-OPERATING ORGANIZATIONS AND SPONSORS

Eleanor Roosevelt	London International Commission	BoothTarkington
Clifton Fadiman	Hampstead Borough Council	Russell Maguire
Thomas Mann	London County Council	Lady Allen
	British Women's Volunteers

FOSTER PARENTS' PLAN FOR WAR CHILDREN, Inc.
55 West 42nd Street, New York City — Longacre 5-1097

I wish to contribute to the upkeep of the Sanctuaries.

NAME

ADDRESS

AMOUNT $.....

CITY..... STATE..... DATE.....

Registered with U. S. State Dept. No. 57. Contributions are deductible from income tax stricting himself to the investigation of the "spatial" arts which do not involve actual movement, he illustrates a possible scientific method for the use of æsthetics in general. He begins by assuming that the basic "ingredients" of the spatial arts are visual units, empty space, and the human being who perceives them. These "generate" four sets of relationships, which in turn form the "elements" of the spatial arts: "(1) . . . between visible shapes, (2) between such shapes and the space within and around them, (3) between such shapes and whatever space falls within their spheres of influence and the human observer and (4) relationships developed within the personality of this observer by contact with a work of art." Using these relationships as his working hypothesis and as far as possible analyzing his material in their terms, the author attempts to extract the norms of successful practice and appreciation in the arts of decoration, architecture, sculpture, and painting. He animadverts constantly upon the philosophizers of æsthetics who try to explain everything by deduction from a single theory, and is quite willing, when he comes upon something which resists analysis in his terms, to resort to a plurality of hypotheses. This confuses the reader at times and seriously weakens the coherence of Mr. Thurston's arguments. On the other hand, the author's attention to the concrete contexts in which the artist and the observer work, his respect for the minutiae of art, are refreshing and illuminating. His statement of the "variables" and "invariables" with which the artist must operate points out a path for much rewarding inquiry in the future. And he resolves with far more success than I have seen elsewhere the problem of balance in the graphic arts, restating it as a matter of spheres of attraction emanating from visual points governed by the two "variables" of distance and inherent interest.

But even in an elementary way, Mr. Thurston does not clear up as much as he promises. It is not only that his treatment of theoretical questions is sketchy: some of his unobtrusive generalizations are rash without being imaginative. In fact, they are rashly academic; for example, that "fuzziness of outline" in woodcuts is as a "general style of treatment . . . fatal." Mr. Thurston is practical above all else, and he is interested in results. That which has worked in the past, he implies, must work always. But art can get away with anything. Lord help it if it is ever deterred by statistical norms of success such as those Mr. Thurston comes dangerously close at times to establishing. His book would have been much more valuable if he had shown himself more aware of what a ticklish question norms in art is.

Nor does the application of Mr. Thurston's hypothetical method serve greatly to resolve the focal problem with which the philosophizers of æsthetics have occupied themselves so far: Why does art affect us as it does? In his conclusion, where he faces the question formally and more frankly, his answers are borrowed from philosophers.

CLEMENT GREENBERG

Coming Soon in The Nation

Lars Moën's "Under the Iron Heel"

Reviewed by Pierre Van Paassen

Common Sense

Edited by ALFRED BINGHAM & SELDEN RODMAN

A. A. Berle, Jr., says: "I have always welcomed the efforts of Common Sense because it has not only given a forum to ideas but has done so with an absence of prejudice and a quality of kindly justice at various times lacking in other magazines with a 'class angle' or 'I told you so' approach."

These Features Coming:

THE FUTURE OF U. S. AIR POWER

Cushman Reynolds and Fleming MacLeish, authors of a forthcoming book on American defense, will give all but the blueprints of air plans and their relation to the international picture.

THE VOICE OF SOUTH AMERICA • By Mario Pedrosa

This is the first interview, so far as we know, with Haya de la Torre, leader of Peru's (underground) majority party. It is addressed to you.

SOCIAL GAINS & DEFENSE • By Eleanor Roosevelt

The First Lady establishes some principles looking beyond the War.

JAMES JOYCE & RICHARD WAGNER • By W. H. Auden

An inquiry into the great reputation of the late Irish novelist and his failure to achieve a tragic art of the great tradition.

OTHER ARTICLES COMING: Frank Lloyd Wright and Clarence Stem on new styles in architecture. . . . "Can We Be Invaded?" by John Chamberlain. . . Ralph Bates on the New Writing. . . Richard H. Rovere identifies the "Fronts." . . Profiles by Otis Ferguson. . . Frank C. Hunighan's blistering monthly column from Washington. . . Etc.

This Issue Free

• with your half-year introductory subscription to Common Sense.

• The February number is a typical issue of COMMON SENSE. Partial contents:

FULL PRODUCTION WITHOUT INFLATION

■ A New Dealer's plan for defense- and post-war spending. By Mordecai Ezekiel

LONDON UNDER FIRE

Monthly instalment of Mr. MacNeice's brilliant comments on England at War. By Louis MacNeice

GERMAN JOURNAL

An uncondemned tour by the author of "Love in the Western World." By Denis de Rougemont

TO THINK OR TO DIE

An indictment of the "black-white" thinking popular with some liberals. By Quincy Howe

THE LADIES WHO WANT HELL

If we enter the War three ladies will claim exclusive credit. . . . By Burton Rascoe

SPECIAL OFFER

to Readers of The Nation

$1.00 FOR SIX MONTHS

Plus a free copy of the February issue

(Usually $2.50 per year)

COMMON SENSE 815 Fourth Avenue New York
Gentlemen: Here's my dollar. Please send me Common Sense for six months at your special introductory rate. I understand that a free copy of the February issue will be included.

NAME.....

ADDRESS.....

.....N2

THE BROKEN SPAN. By William Carlos Williams. New Directions. Norfolk, Conn. $1.

A poem of great length which has been highly praised by some critics who have been, I think, taken in by its pretentiousness. It has good lines, which seem better than they are when detached from the poems in which they appear. To make his text the author has unfortunately combined the emotional disorder of dithyrambic prophecy with the logical disorder of free association. There is a structure of sorts; a not-too-close analogy is maintained between the author's contemporary thoughts and the contents of some of the books of the

If you are sleeping too well these nights in spite of the war and all, try this novel about what happened to a young servant girl in a Scottish insane asylum, whither she had been driven by the self-righteous nagging of her Calvinist grandfather. Told in the first person by the naive, not-too-bright girl, it is a highbrow horror story convincing enough to turn your blood to butter-milk. In fact, it sounds like any one of a dozen recent stories about Nazi concentration camps, simply transferred to a new setting.

The author will be remembered as responsible for "Another Language," one of the big hits of the season nine years ago, and her manner has not essentially changed. Though her action moves rather slowly and rather carefully after the fashion of the conventionally well-made play it is managed skilfully, and the dialogue—indisputably Miss Franken's strong point—is easy, graceful, and genuinely amusing. Probably there is no reason why she could not, if she really tried, write drawing-room comedy of the usual sort. But she seems definitely to prefer a story and a theme which will involve a pathetic situation to be solved by everybody's being

It seems, however, quite unnecessary to bring any big critical guns into action against so pleasant and unpretentious a little play as "Claudia" turns out to be. I enjoyed it myself and I suspect that it will be given a substantial run by others who will enjoy it even more. This effect will be produced, I imagine, by three almost equally significant fac-

Original Viking Press, 2.50 to 3.50 editions. See previous issues for more titles. Post-free on $1 min. order.
Education Before Verdun: Arnold Zweig	$.50
The Chute: Albert Halper	1.00
Joy of Man's Desiring: Jean Glone	.50
The Fishman: H. H. Kahan	.50
Under the Sign: Siegfried Sassoon	1.00
Primitive Religion: Paul Radin	1.00
The Old Bunch: Meyer Levin	1.00
Under the Age of Fascism: Gaetano Salvemini	1.00
Under the Sign: Siegfried Sassoon	1.00
Danger of Being a Gentleman (essays): H. J. Lasker	1.00
The Storm Breaks: Frederick Birchall	1.00
Benjamin Franklin: Carl Van Doren (3.75 list)	1.98

Following are Modern Age Books, 50c to 95c list.
All The Brave: Drawings by Louis Quintanilla	.35
Blood and Ink: Maury Maverick	.19
Health in Handcuffs: J. A. Kingsbury	.19
The Future Is Ours: Jay Franklin	.19
How In America: George Seides	.19
One-Fifth of Mankind: Anna L. Strong	.19
You Can't Do That: George Seides	.19
Hitler Is No Fool: Karl Billinger	.19
I Like America: Granville Hicks	.19
Secret Armies: Ron L. Spink	.19
Odyssey: Rouse Thomas, Lynd, illus.	.19
U. S. I: Muriel Ruker (2.00, Covell-Friede)	.50
The Soviet Power: Dean of Canterbury (paper ed.)	.35
Modern Interiors: Emily Genauer (2.50 list)	1.50
DOWNTOWN BOOK BAZAAR, 199 B'way, N. Y. C.

tors: (1) the play's virtues; (2) its defects; (3) an excellently directed performance by a uniformly good cast which includes Frances Starr as the mother and, as the child-wife, Dorothy McGuire, a very young ingenue not well known to Broadway but of unmistakable charm.

"Out of the Frying Pan" (Windsor Theater) is described as "a new comedy" but is actually a wild and woolly farce about a group of young would-be actors living together (but not in sin) while rehearsing a play. Part of the intention is evidently to achieve something of the speed and recklessness of a George Abbott farce but there are moments which, on the contrary, suggest merely the class-day comedy. The very guilelessness of the writing and the youthful enthusiasm of the action are somehow ingratiating and the whole thing is amusing enough if one is willing to take it in the right spirit.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

MUSIC

THE artistic resources of voice, of personal emotion, of specifically musical feeling that Lotte Lehmann brought to the singing of Schubert's "Winterreise" cycle for the New Friends of Music were, as always, deeply affecting—and this, as always, whether what she did with a song seemed right or wrong. Right and wrong, in this matter, have to do with scale—the scale on which emotion is embodied in form in a sonnet of Shakespeare as compared with his dramatic blank verse, in a song of Schubert as compared with an operatic aria. It is wrong to speak the sonnet as though it were the blank verse; and Lehmann often loads emotion on the song to the point where its physical shape is distorted. One is, then, moved by the intensity that communicates itself through her singing of the last phrases of "Die Krähe"; but at the same time one is aware that this intensity is distorting the phrases almost grotesquely; and one is aware also that the voice is being forced into unlovely sounds. It is to quiet songs like "Das Wirtshaus" and "Die Nebensonnen" that her emotion gives forms which are unforgettable musical experiences.

There was a similar but better controlled intensity of feeling and expression, utilizing a voice that is still powerful and rich, in Kipnis's singing of Schumann's "Dichterliebe" cycle at his recent recital. And a little of this intensity was something one wished for in Marian Anderson's singing of Gluck, Handel, and Schubert, to liven up phrasing that was in placid good taste (what little life there was in the music was put there by Franz Rupp at the piano). The voice, one noted, was lovely in soft high notes and superb in powerful low notes, but threadbare and afflicted with tremolo in between.

To get back to the New Friends concerts: Roger Sessions's String Quartet conveyed to me nothing beyond command of the medium. The work was played by the reconstituted Gordon Quartet with better tone and phrasing than I ever heard from the old group. The Primrose Quartet and Benar Heifetz gave a polished performance of Schubert's Quintet Op. 163 that stayed pretty much on the surface of the work; and I arrived in time for only the last of the Schubert songs sung by Mack Harrell, whose fine voice sounded constricted. Pinza's voice and phrasing were not such as to make Brahms's Four Serious Songs appear more impressive than they are; and the Metropolitan Trio did not measure up to Schubert's Trio Op. 99.

A seat on the extreme side behind the drums and brass and chorus did not permit me to get an extensive notion of the Metropolitan's production of Gluck's "Alceste" beyond the fact that Rose Bampton, who sang the title role on this occasion, sang it with beauty of voice and phrasing. The music is beautiful, expressive, noble, but even-paced to a degree that must make it monotonous and boring to many hearers. Of Donizetti's "Don Pasquale," however, I can report that the production is one huge romp by Salvatore Baccaloni, the company's new basso buffo. This is hardly a way of doing justice to the work; but it is a way of covering up the fact that justice is not being done to it; and in a situation where the music is given with none of the lightness and sharpness that would make it count for something one is glad to have even Signor Baccaloni romping hugely throughout the evening. On the other hand the Metropolitan's production of Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" is something put together out of less than perfect elements, but with care; something achieved, moreover, with precision and finish; something that gives a large measure of effect to the unending wonders of the greatest work in the Metropolitan's repertory.

Having heard Mitropoulos with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony I am inclined to believe that in the newly issued Columbia set of Franck's Symphony which he made with the Minneapolis Orchestra (Set 436, $5.50) the excessive loudness of the English horn in the second-movement solo is due to the same poor recording-technique that gives us things like the marked step-up in volume and brilliance from the second side of the set to the third. On the other hand the introductory passage for plucked strings and harp, in the second movement, is marked p with a swell in the fifth measure; and it is Mitropoulos who converts this into pp with an explosion to f that is excessive for the degree of emotional intensification implied in the upward curve of the theme in the fifth measure. And it is Mitropoulos who pauses for an extra quarter at the end of the first measure of the first movement, and again at the end of the second measure, chopping off from each other the parts of what is, when allowed to take its course, a continuous sequence. But to allow music to take its course is precisely the thing Mitropoulos cannot do: there is in his performance a constant interference with the course of the music, a constant manipulation; and not only is there no sense for anything in the music beyond physical sound to be manipulated, but there is no sense for plastic proportion and continuity—in sonority and pace—in the mere sound.

What Mitropoulos does is an exaggeration to the point of caricature of what Furtwängler does, with the further differences that come from the fact that Furtwängler is a far more gifted conductor and musician. In his performances the plastic disproportions and discontinuities are mainly those of pace: for example, in the new Victor set of Tchaikovsky's "Pathétique" Symphony that he made with the Berlin Philharmonic (Set 553, $6.50) one hears in the first movement characteristically over-deliberate tempos followed characteristically by disproportionate accelerations; and in that respect the more straightforward Ormandy version is preferable. But in that respect, I must add, this Furtwängler performance offends only a little; and it offers examples of sensitive phrasing and beautiful finish that are the measure of his superiority to Ormandy: in the third movement, for example, one hears a clarity and refinement of texture that one does not hear on the Ormandy record. And this, I think, is one of the instances where Furtwängler benefits by superior recording

B. H. HAGGIN

Letters to the Editors

Bergson and Vichy

Dear Sirs: A belated Paris dispatch to the New York Times mentions that at the funeral of the French philosopher Henri Bergson (he died January 4), Ambassador de Brinon represented the Vichy government, Paul Valéry the French Academy, and adds that the Vichy Ministry of Education was also represented. Previous dispatches reported a tribute paid to the late Henri Bergson by his pupil Jacques Chevalier, professor of philosophy of the Grenoble University, who was recently appointed General Secretary of the French Ministry of Education in Vichy.

Whatever grudge one may bear against Vichy for its endeavors gradually to direct French thought toward the orbit of the "new order" expounded in Berlin, fairness to France demands unbiased comment on these dispatches.

Bergson was unquestionably the greatest French philosopher of the last fifty years. A Jew, he was in principle affected by the new anti-Jewish laws of the Vichy government. Nevertheless, Jacques Chevalier, a member of the Administration, stressed at the time of Bergson's death, Bergson's wide contribution to the renaissance of French thought. The presence, at the funeral, of François de Brinon, who as Vichy ambassador to occupied France has the sad duty of being agreeable to the invader, is even more encouraging. And the sending, by the French Education Ministry, of a representative to the ceremony further indicates Vichy's intention to continue honoring Bergson as one of France's spiritual leaders.

Edmund Husserl's position in Germany was analogous to that of Bergson in France. They were of the same age. Their teaching covered the same period, and Husserl's influence on German philosophy was as great as that of Bergson on French. Husserl was the father of phenomenological philosophy, on which all contemporary German philosophers, including the Nazis, have been reared. Like Henri Bergson, he was a Jew. But post-1933 Germans did not treat him as the Vichy authorities are now treating Bergson.

At the Congrès Descartes (International Congress of Philosophy held in Paris in 1937), of which Henry Bergson was honorary president, the German delegation of Nazi philosophers demanding the exclusion of Husserl (who was not present) from the Committee of International Congresses of Philosophy, of which he had been a member for many years. The demand aroused such scorn that it was not even considered.

Husserl, who fled to Czechoslovakia after Hitler came into power, died there obscurely in 1938. Though his death was mourned outside Germany, within the Reich not a voice was raised to pay tribute to his philosophy. And a few weeks before the German invasion of Belgium, his eighty-year-old widow arrived in Brussels bringing, as her only earthly belongings, her late husband's treasured papers and manuscripts.

All this makes one thoughtful, illustrating as it does the gulf which divides, and always will divide, Latin civilization and German Kultur. France may be crushed materially, politically, and even morally. But the love of the spirit for the spirit's sake, will live there forever—a love of the spirit still shown by the very French government that is at the same time ousting Jews from places of learning.

Two more recent dispatches from Vichy give further weight to my claim that German pressure is in no way affecting French culture. The first, dated January 19, states that in both occupied and unoccupied France newspapers continue to publish long articles on Bergson, hailing him as "a great Frenchman." The dispatch adds that even anti-Semitic papers, such as Candide, are joining in the chorus of praise. The second, dated January 23, relates that the first January meeting of the Académie Française was held in honor of Bergson's memory. Paul Valéry delivered a eulogy.

BETTY BARZIN

New York, February 17

'76 and H.R. 1776

Dear Sirs: The undersigned members of the Descendants of the American Revolution have resigned from the organization, because of the undemocratic procedure of its National Executive Committee. This body has passed a resolution calling for the defeat of the Lease-Lend bill (H.R. 1776) in the name of the organization, without polling the members to learn their attitude toward this important measure, which directly affects our foreign as well as our domestic policy. The signers of this letter have varying opinions on the Lease-Lend bill, but are at one in regarding the action of the National Executive Committee as an infringement on the rights of the entire membership.

HELENA I. T. BAILIE, National Treasurer; HELEN TUFTS BAILIE, member, National Council, Samuel Adams Chapter, Boston; MRS. J. ANTON DE HAAS, Samuel Adams Chapter, Boston; REV. E. TALLMADGE ROOT, Samuel Adams Chapter, Boston; ELIZABETH HULING, member National Council, Nathan Hale Chapter, New York; MRS. SHERWOOD ANDERSON, BRUCE BLIVEN, BRUCE BLIVEN, JR., JOHN CHAMBERLAIN, MARY WARE DENNETT, FRED A. KIRCHWEY, HARRY A. OVERSTREET, ELIOT D. PRATT.

New York, February 18

Is Waller Guilty?

Dear Sirs: Mr. Virginus Dabney, writing on the Odell Waller case in your issue of February 8, says "there is nothing anywhere therein (in the defense literature) to inform the public that Waller shot Davis twice in the back, when Davis, according to uncontradicted witnesses, was unarmed."

It is true the medical testimony shows that Davis had two wounds in the back. It also shows that he had one wound on the right side of the head and one in the arm. The only reasonable deduction from other testimony and the physical facts is that Waller first shot Davis while Davis was facing him, hitting him in the right side of the head and in the arm; that either the shock of these bullets whirled Davis around, or Davis turned in attempting to escape, and was then shot twice in the back. The only testimony that Waller first fired at Oscar Davis when Davis's back was turned is the testimony of an eighteen-year-old colored boy, Henry Davis, then employed by Oscar Davis and still employed by his family, and who, prior to the trial, refused to talk to the defense at all. His entire testimony is incredible and gives every appearance of being coached.

Likewise, the testimony of "uncontradicted witnesses" that Oscar Davis was unarmed, is open to suspicion. This testimony is that of the same Henry Davis, and of Oscar Davis's wife and two sons. These obviously were not impartial witnesses, and even the judge expressed his doubts as to the testimony of the two sons in other respects. Furthermore, the question is not whether Oscar Davis was actually armed, but whether Waller had reasonable grounds for believing him to be armed. Waller's testimony shows that he had every reason so to believe.

No one can read the record in the Waller case, unsatisfactory as it is, without coming to the conclusion that the same poll tax jury which sentenced Waller, a Negro sharecropper, to the electric chair, would, on the same evidence, have either found a white landowner not guilty on the ground he shot in self-defense, or would, at most, have found him guilty of manslaughter.

JOHN F. FINERTY

New York, February 10

Workers in White

Dear Sirs: The problems of the white-collar class of workers have received considerable attention but somehow the particular grievances of hospital laboratory workers have been overlooked. My position is that of a laboratory technician. I have always been fortunate in securing work and in retaining my job. However, the wage-and-hour scale in this kind of work is unsatisfactory.

The requirements for members of our profession are high. Generally, it is necessary to have a degree, or at least three years of college education, plus a year of specialized hospital training. Yet our wage scale, as a rule, begins at $50 a month with partial maintenance, and goes up to a maximum of $125 a month, which is rarely exceeded.

Dismissing the wage grievance for a moment, let us consider the question of the number of hours employees are required to work. In many cases the laboratory worker has a minimum-maximum hour scale of fifty-two to sixty hours per week. This may include a "split shift" or may require Sunday work. Often both the split shift and the Sunday work are required. Twenty-four-hour service in this field may well be necessary, but a sufficient number of employees should be engaged so that the burden is distributed.

When men and women who accept responsibility for human lives are pushed around and broken in spirit, the efficiency of a hospital is reduced. How can there be maximum cooperation when the employees work with the knowledge that their maximum efforts will not give them sufficient security to maintain a home and family? Why should so important a sector of our modern scheme be stripped of the right to a normal existence?

The Wagner Act does not extend to our group, and but few states have a "Baby Wagner Act" which protects workers not engaged in interstate commerce. Since we are therefore unable to organize effectively, our sole hope is to acquaint the public with the actual salaries and living conditions of hospital employees.

F. LOUIS

Chicago, February 15

Catholic Laborites

Dear Sirs: While the members of the Association of Catholic Trade Unionists who read Richard H. Rovere's article (Labor's Catholic Bloc) in The Nation for January 4 were naturally pleased by your contributor's commendation of work done by the A. C. T. U., they were surprised at his sinister implications.

Mr. Rovere implied that information from Protestant and Jewish unionists led him to believe that non-Catholic unionists were planning to organize their own religious groups as a defense against a "Catholic bloc" in unionism. Never in our four years' activity in New York and sixteen other cities have we heard of any such development. On the contrary, both Jewish and Protestant unionists, after being aided by us, or working with us in reforming some union, expressed the wish that they had a similar association for unionists of their own religion. Their attitude was one of admiration, not suspicion.

Secondly, Mr. Rovere makes it appear that A. C. T. U. members in the Newspaper Guild played both ends against the middle in the battle over "party-line" following. A. C. T. U. members in the Guild have consistently supported organization drives, and just as consistently, as soon as the Communist issue was brought into the open, opposed Communist maneuvers. There were Catholics in the Guild administration camp, but these were not active A. C. T. U. members and did not join active A. C. T. U. members in the fight to check Communist operations.

NORMAN MCKENNA,

Publicity Director, Association of Catholic Trade Unionists

New York, February 14

Dear Sirs: Although I wrote that certain aspects of the A. C. T. U. worried many labor leaders, I did not say their fears were necessarily justified. That they are worried is a simple fact. It is also a fact that an organization for Protestant unionists is being seriously considered.

As for the Newspaper Guild, there have been several members of the A. C. T. U. who supported, and were supported by, the Guild administration. I understand that a movement is under way to expel them from the A. C. T. U.; but at the time my article appeared their names were still to be found in the A. C. T. U. publications.

RICHARD H. ROVERE

New York, February 18

CONTRIBUTORS

ALVAREZ DEL VAYO, before he became Spain's war-time Foreign Minister, was one of Europe's outstanding newspapermen.

JUAN S. VIDARTE was consul general at Tangier before the fall of Republican Spain. He made a spectacular flight from Dakar to Libya, where he was granted a visa to this country.

PATRICIA STRAUSS, wife of G. R. Strauss, Labor member of Parliament, has contributed articles to Harper's and The Nation since her arrival in New York some months ago.

T. SWANN HARDING is the author of "The Popular Practice of Fraud" and other books.

PETER STEVENS is the pseudonym of an American writer now residing in Istanbul.

JUSTIN O'BRIEN is assistant professor of French at Columbia University.

NORMAN ANGELL won the Nobel peace prize in 1933. He is the author of "The Great Illusion," "Why Freedom Matters," and many other books.

LOUIS B. SALOMON, a member of the English Department of Brooklyn College, reviews fiction regularly for The Nation.

CLEMENT GREENBERG contributes critical articles on literature and art to Partisan Review.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 55 Fifth Ave., New York. Price 16 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 152

NEW YORK · SATURDAY · MARCH 1, 1941

NUMBER 9

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

EDITORIALS

Communists and Unions

What Russia Wants

Luce Thinking by Freda Kirchwey

ARTICLES

Oil Is Still Neutral by I. F. Stone

The Nazi Plan for Negroes by Hans Habe

Chile Will Decide by Samuel Guy Inman

The New Order by Arthur Guiterman

Sports and Defense by Curt Riess

Everybody's Business by Keith Hutchison

In the Wind

A Native at Large by Jonathan Daniels

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Thou Tellest Me, Comrade by Gilbert Highet

A Passage to India by Margaret Marshall

Masterpiece by Justin O'Brien

In Brief

Records by B. H. Haggin

Films by Anthony Bower

Art: Out of the French Revolution by Paul Rosenfeld

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

Editor and Publisher

FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor

ROBERT BENDINER

Washington Editor

I. F. STONE

Literary Editor

MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors

KEITH HUTCHISON MAXWELL S. STEWART

Dramatic Critic

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager and Director of Circulation

HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager

MARY HOWARD ELLISON

The Shape of Things

225

ANOTHER WEEK HAS PASSED WITHOUT THE opening of the long-heralded Axis spring campaign but from Munich, Rome, and Tokyo an oratorical barrage has been let loose upon the world. At the same time, the diplomatic miners and sappers have increased their activities in the Balkans, in Spain, in Vichy, in Saigon, and in Bangkok. All signs point to a new attempt to knock Britain out but we have yet to learn the direction of the main blow. In his latest speech Hitler declared that the war was entering its final phase and dwelt lovingly on the greatly intensified submarine campaign that he was about to launch. If this is indeed his intention it may mean that he hopes to soften up Britain by an all-out attack on its supply lines before he attempts the risky expedient of invasion. Again, he may be aiming at a reduction of British naval strength in the Mediterranean in order to give his Italian partner a much-needed breathing spell and to smooth the way for the completion of his plans for a bloodless conquest of the Balkans. If Japan could be induced simultaneously to move against Singapore, Hitler might feel he had the British cornered, but Tokyo, not anxious to take undue risks for the benefit of its allies, has apparently decided on a policy of watchful waiting. It is perfectly clear that the reinforcement of Singapore, and the very unappealing nature of both American and British reactions to the latest Japanese threats, has had a sobering effect on Foreign Minister Matsuoka and his colleagues. They have tried to cover their confusion with a diverting exhibition of double-talk, one day protesting their complete innocence of aggressive designs and the next calling on "the white race" to surrender a large area of the South Pacific vaguely termed "Oceania."

★

MUSSOLINI'S CONTRIBUTION TO THE AXIS chorus was almost pathetic in its defensiveness. Making a virtue of brave candor, Il Duce admitted that the Italian army in Libya had suffered a terrific defeat. But he was less frank about the drubbing administered by the Greeks, presumably because he hopes that in Albania Hitler will still save his hide if not his honor. Replying to Graziani's complaint that his forces had been insufficiently supplied, Mussolini gave detailed figures of the men and material sent to North Africa which, if true, make the British victory still more notable since they placed Italian strength far above previous estimates. Seeking to boost the morale of his people he assured them that Italy was playing a notable part in the war by pinning down a large proportion of Britain's land, sea, and air forces. But perhaps he sensed the inadequacy of this consolation for he went on to glorify Nazi might, indicating that, no matter how low Italy's fortunes might fall, it could count on final rescue by Germany. Thus once again an upstart Caesar calls in the barbarians to save his throne. To those versed in Mussolini's circumlocutions, the speech offered several hints of his concern about the state of Italian morale. For instance, he repudiated "the libel" that there was lack of solidarity between Germans and Italians, asserting that the behavior of the Nazis in Sicily and Libya was "perfect." This suggests that these honored guests have made themselves thoroughly unpopular. Again Il Duce gave special praise to the Italian workers for their patriotism and skill, declaring they would be rewarded for their sacrifices after the war was over, and differentiating them from "the minority of well-known poltroons." To our suspicious mind this confirms rumors of unrest in the industrial cities.

✱

HITLER'S STRANGLEHOLD ON THE BALKANS appears to have tightened during the past week, yet Berlin's rejoicings over the Turkish-Bulgarian pact may prove a trifle premature. Taking it simply at face value this treaty is a mutual undertaking against aggression, which has no bearing on Turkish action in the event of German occupation of Bulgaria and subsequent invasion of Greece. But in this country, as well as in the Axis states, it was interpreted as a guarantee of Turkish neutrality under all circumstances, except actual invasion of Turkish soil, and a resounding defeat for British diplomacy. The Turks themselves did little to clarify the situation when they insisted that their policy remained unchanged and that they would resist all threats to their security zone. London gave out nothing officially, but various "spokesmen" were allowed to express conflicting opinions. Meanwhile Greece declared vehemently that it had no intention of capitulating to the German ultimatum which, it was said, would quickly follow the occupation of Bulgaria. The total effect of these reactions was to produce a mental fog about the Balkan situation. Is it possible that the British have been taking another leaf out of Hitler's book, and that all this mystification is connected with the next move of Wavell's seasoned and triumphant army, which has suddenly faded out of the news? Meanwhile, it may be noted that the Germans have exhibited one of their "Blitz" films to a distinguished Bulgarian audience. This suggests that the march may begin any day. But it will be some weeks yet before the weather becomes really propitious for Balkan campaigning. There is only one moderately good road connecting Bulgaria and Greece and the terrain is far from ideal for mechanized troops. Thus, while Greece is no doubt being subjected to the usual war of nerves, an interval is likely before threats give way to actions.

✱

EXTENSION OF THE THAILAND-INDO-CHINA armistice for ten days has delayed a showdown on the Japanese demands against the French colony. But the situation remains acute. Last week's rejection of Japan's terms by Vichy was undoubtedly a by-product of the stiffening of British and American policy as shown by the reinforcement of Singapore and the House passage of the bill authorizing the fortification of Guam. Barring British, American, or Chinese aid, the French are obviously in no position to resist Japan by force of arms. Although the Japanese may hesitate to attack either Singapore or the East Indies because of the risk of American intervention, they might proceed on the assumption that such aid would not be forthcoming for the protection of Indo-China or Thailand. If this tactic proved successful, they might, on the same theory, make Burma their next objective, thus avoiding a frontal attack on Singapore. The democratic world has become so accustomed to thinking in terms of Blitzkriegs that it has neglected the nibbling tactics responsible for most Axis victories.

✱

THE REMOVAL OF MAXIM LITVINOV FROM the Bolshevik Party's Central Committee is a matter of routine. By tradition, the Commissar of Foreign Affairs is automatically a member of the Central Committee. Litvinov is no longer Commissar. Therefore the first party conference that met after his dismissal from government office also ousted him from the Central Committee. The reason given is somewhat mysterious—"inability to discharge obligations." Since Molotov, the present Foreign Commissar, is already on the Central Committee of the party, the membership relinquished by Litvinov goes to V. G. Dekanozov, Soviet Ambassador in Berlin and one of the chief negotiators of the Nazi-Soviet pact. Dekanozov is thus unofficially designated as second to Molotov in the Soviet foreign service. This has political significance and suggests that Moscow has no intention of marring its present "good-neighborly" and subservient relationship to the Nazis. In the same shake-up, Molotov's wife, Paulina Zhemchuzhina, was demoted. She has been ousted as alternate member of the Central Committee. Either she is no longer Madame Molotov or this is a faint hint to Molotov that the purge may get him too. The turnover of Soviet bureaucrats continues at top speed. The party conference expelled several high government officials and reprimanded others for inefficiency in economic posts of supreme importance. Apparently, commissars go on doing a bad job even though Trotsky is dead and Hitler and Hess are friends of the Soviet Union.

✱

THE RATHER LUDICROUS ATTEMPT OF THE National Association of Manufacturers to dissociate itself from Ralph Robey's broadside against "subversive" textbooks should fool no one. The N. A. M. does not deny that it requested and paid for the examination of 536 textbooks on which Mr. Robey's report was based. But apparently the N. A. M. would like to dodge the violent criticism which the Robey report has brought forth not only from educators but from manufacturers—of textbooks. Mr. Robey, a conservative economist, declared in his "personal" report that a substantial proportion of the textbooks now used in the high schools criticize our form of government and hold in derision or contempt the system of private enterprise. In support of this charge, passages are listed from the abstracts of seven books which are cited as being derogatory to the American form of government and critical of free business enterprise. A careful reading of these passages, which are torn from their context, reveals nothing that could even be called derogatory to our form of government, but a great deal that might be taken as criticism of our system of "free" enterprise. The textbooks written by Harold Rugg of Teachers' College, which have been under special fire from reactionary groups in recent months, emerged from the survey with significantly few demerits. The worst that Mr. Robey was able to find in Rugg's writings was a section indicating that there was a difference of opinion among the framers of the Constitution as to the amount of democracy it would be safe to give the common people. The N. A. M. has a right to investigate textbooks; but it can't expect to escape the public consequences of its red-baiting excursion.

✱

THE ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH WHICH HAS been fighting enactment of what it terms the new model state "anti-criminal-syndicalism and sabotage law" has elicited a remarkable disavowal from the Department of Justice. Its Washington correspondent, Richard L. Stokes, obtained an interview in which an unnamed but high spokesman for the department disclaimed all responsibility for the bill and suggested that "revisions should be made if it is found that the rights of labor are inadequately safeguarded." The Post-Dispatch, opposing the bill in Missouri, feels that the job of combatting sabotage on defense had best be left in the hands of Washington. We already have a federal anti-sabotage law that covers all work done on defense. State laws against the destruction of property supply additional protection. In the last war most injustices were traceable to local and state authorities who inflamed local juries and used local prosecutions in a way which the Federal authorities would never have dared use them. The Post-Dispatch says: "The energy and good sense of the American people are severely taxed these days by the double job of keeping their government safe from overt attacks and themselves, as individuals, safe from the impact of war-borne violence and hysteria. We must never forget that in Washington we have agencies best equipped to deal with this delicate equation." The supporters of this dangerously worded model bill have yet to prove that it is necessary in the interests of defense.

✱

THERE ARE ALSO EARMARKS OF HYSTERIA about current attempts in Congress to legalize wire-tapping, although Congress forbade the practice during the last war and again in 1934. An effort to railroad bills through the House Judiciary Committee with "shotgun" hearings was blocked at the last moment by labor pressure but the fight is still on to keep them open long enough to consider available evidence on the dangers involved. The committee has so far heard but little of the relevant evidence. Alexander Holtzoff, attorney for the F. B. I., has been doing his best to bulldoze opposition witnesses at the hearings, and his strategy seems to lie in a readiness to accept any kind of a bill as an entering wedge restoring a practice now forbidden by law. J. Edgar Hoover, on record many times in the past as being opposed to wire-tapping, has so far declined the request of committee members that he appear personally to explain why he has changed his mind. The C. I. O., the A. F. of L., and the railroad brotherhoods have all gone on record as strongly opposing the legalization of the "dirty business," Justice Holmes's term for wire-tapping. Joseph A. Padway, general counsel of the A. F. of L., has submitted an opinion on the "vast possibilities of abuse" in wire-tapping. "Those who advance the argument that wire-tapping is necessary for national defense," A. F. Whitney of the Railroad Trainmen wrote Chairman Hatton W. Summers of the House Judiciary Committee, "are merely using the national defense as an excuse to forge another weapon against labor. The saboteur or spy or criminal will know how to overcome the proposed method of surveillance, but the innocent man or woman who desires to communicate with a labor organizer will feel restrained from doing so."

✱

WILLIAM S. KNUDSEN DESERVES CREDIT FOR his forthright testimony before the House Judiciary Committee against legislation designed to curb strikes in the defense industries. Mr. Knudsen is as interested as anyone in the country in seeing the defense industries swing quickly into maximum production. But he declared quite unequivocally that he did not consider the strike situation serious and suggested that the amount of industrial strife would decline when union leaders gain more experience and "management decides to accept the laws on the statute books." In testifying before the same committee on the following day, Sidney Hillman, Associate Director of OPM, went even further. He declared that strikes were a rare exception in defense industries, and that anything which undermined the present spirit of voluntary cooperation would be a basic threat to production. In face of this uncompromising stand by the two men directly responsible for defense production, we trust that the demand for anti-strike laws will be quietly shelved.

Communists and Unions

THERE was a time when trade unionism seemed a fairly simple proposition. Fair wages and decent working conditions were the objectives; what deep strategies were planned and what bitterness arose were directed against bull-headed employers. Then, early in the 1930's, the Communists, abandoning their own backyard, dissolved their exclusively Communist unions and plunged into the organizations they had long been fighting. In those unions where they made a dent the simple pattern of other years has been buried beneath sticky layers of caucuses, lines, progressive wings, committees to preserve the union from disrupters, committees to preserve the union from the preservers, and in general such a compound of maneuvering, scheming, and parliamentary tricks that a simple trade unionist is glad to pay his dues and leave the field of operations to the politicians. That means to the Communists, because they are the Tammany Hall of the labor movement. They have the discipline, the zeal, the central boards of strategy, and above all the political axes to grind. They do whatever hard work of the organization they can lay their hands on and by the time their fellow-unionists discover that these willing and efficient brothers have been working through the union rather than for it, it is usually too late. The union is in their hands and has become one more organism for carrying out the policies of the Communist Party.

Until two weeks ago this blight was treated pretty much in the spirit of Mark Twain's remark on the weather. Everybody talked about it but nobody did anything. And for good reasons. Aside from the effective work they do, the Communists' chief source of strength in the unions has been their contention that opposition to Communist policy, known in the trade as "red-baiting," is a divisive force in the union and hence a boon to the union's enemies. Though that contention is true, by and large, it obviously passes a point of diminishing returns when unity can be had only at the price of Communist domination. Nevertheless, red-baiting has been a major "don't" in the labor movement and few have relished violating the taboo. Even more important, there seemed no effective way of doing so that would not be as full of danger to the union as the activities of the Communists themselves.

On February 17 the executive council of the American Federation of Teachers took the bull by the horns: it recommended to its membership the expulsion of three Communist-controlled locals on the charge that their activities are "detrimental to the development of democracy in education." If a majority of the members of the union sustain the council, the A. F. of L. will with one sweeping gesture have rid itself of a growth that has been sapping it internally and exposing it to attack from without. It will also have suggested to other unions that the problem created by the Communists is by no means insoluble.

The method chosen by the A. F. of L. council, however, is far from definitive for the labor movement as a whole. A sharp distinction must be made between those unions, like the teachers' and the various civil-service unions, for which the closed shop is a relatively meaningless phrase, and those that either enjoy or actively strive for closed or preferential shop arrangements. We do not believe in setting up political qualifications of any sort in unions which are in a position to make it impossible for a man to earn his living unless he holds a union card. For such organizations, the A. F. of L.'s approach to the Communist problem is not a just solution. Frankly, we don't know what would be. But we see no reason at all why Communist mischief should be tolerated in unions which are purely voluntary.

The course chosen by the Federation's council admittedly involves dangers and painful precedents. Presumably new locals will be formed to replace the ousted groups. How will the union determine the eligibility of applicants? If no qualifications are set up there is nothing to prevent the Communists from rushing right back into control. And what kind of qualifications can be imposed? Certainly membership in the Communist Party would be a futile prohibition since the comrades are more than reticent about admitting membership, and the fellow-traveler, moreover, is often more orthodox than the holder of a party card. Perhaps the union will create a membership committee to pass arbitrarily on applications on the principle that a voluntary association is free to judge the qualifications of its members. A committee of political sophisticates would know from experience how to spot the party-liners. It is perfectly clear that this precedent might lead to abuse should the committee fall under the control of the wrong people, but machinery could be set up to provide for appeal to the executive council or even to the convention. Rejected applicants would not be barred from working, since no closed shop is involved, and they would be free to form another union if they so desired. The only liberty to be infringed would be the liberty they now enjoy to use other workers for their own purposes.

The number of unions in a position to take action of this sort is not great but their housecleaning would have a wholesome effect and might serve as a check to Communist arrogance throughout the labor movement.

What Russia Wants

The author of the statement which appears below is an important official of a Balkan country whose name must be withheld for obvious reasons. We have, however, every reason to believe that he is a competent and truthful observer who in the course of many visits to Russia, the latest only a few months ago, has had exceptional opportunities for contact with leading members of the Soviet government. His remarks seem to us to throw a good deal of light on the negative attitude of Moscow with regard to Nazi expansion in the Balkans. It is also noteworthy that his report on the internal situation in Russia is borne out by the sweeping attacks on industrial waste and inefficiency made by official speakers at the Communist Party conference in Moscow.—EDITORS THE NATION.

I AM convinced that Russia will do everything to avoid being drawn into conflict with Germany. Generals and Foreign Office officials with whom I talked obviously held the German army and Luftwaffe in tremendous awe. Furthermore, the internal position is such that Stalin would not dare enter into a war. The economic situation in the big cities has become worse since my previous visit in 1937. Everything is concentrated on rearmament, but I was told it would be at least three years before this work was completed. Russia is building up gigantic reserves of raw materials and foodstuffs for military purposes. On the other hand, there is still a shortage of food for civilian consumption, partly due to the fact that distribution and freight problems remain unsolved. Hundreds of people stand day and night in front of the stores. The pace in the factories is just as slow as in 1937, but I found some progress in agriculture. Many farms have been modernized and new schools and better clothing provided for village children.

In spite of all denials, Russia wants a pact with Japan. Voroshilov, whom I have known for twenty years and whose importance is often underestimated abroad, was very frank on this point. In his opinion an agreement with Japan would balance the Soviet-German pact. Japan would guarantee Russia's influence in north China, after making peace with Chungking, thus freeing the Soviet Far Eastern army. Voroshilov was certain that Japan and China would sign a peace treaty this spring and that Japan would then turn toward the South Pacific where Russia has no interests. He was also certain that the United States would be drawn into war against Japan.

S . . . [of the Foreign Office] told me that Soviet policy was to keep Turkey neutral as long as it was not directly attacked. He and other officials in the same department confirmed the report that Hitler and Von Ribbentrop had assured Molotov that Germany would not attack Turkey.

At a dinner given by the Commissar for Foreign Trade, Anastas Mikoyan, I heard the following:

(1) This war does not concern Russia. It does not want a German victory and has no illusions about what such a victory would mean. But it is believed that Britain and the United States will be able to balance Nazi strength. The war is expected to last at least till 1945, and by that date the Red Army will be reorganized.

(2) The continued independence of Finland is not regarded favorably. Russia would like to control the rest of Finland and particularly the Aaland Islands. Although plans for an offensive against Finland are officially denied, a military move in the spring seems likely.

Views of Russian government officials do not always agree with those of Comintern spokesmen. Dimitrov is sure that the people of Europe will chase Hitler away. He thinks it would be harmful to help Britain, for doing so would strengthen another enemy of the workers. Despite the presence of Sir Stafford Cripps, mistrust of Britain is still great. The fact that Halifax was retained by Churchill was unfavorably received. Dimitrov believes that should Russia become involved in the war Britain and Germany might make peace in order to pursue a common policy against the Soviets. For this reason he is one of the chief supporters of Stalin's foreign policy. Russia, he said, must be very cautious and make economic concessions in order to keep Hitler at a distance.

Luce Thinking

BY FRED A. KIRCHWEY

A NEW brand of imperialism is fast gaining favor in this country. It sells readily. The market is pretty well cleaned out of the old, stock brands and those that are left carry trade names like "New Order" and "Lebensraum." Neither one attracts fastidious American buyers who long to get their teeth into something that is guaranteed pure and has a nice sweet flavor. The new brand is put out under a variety of labels. Mr. Luce in a very large advertisement in his magazine Life calls it the "American Century." Dorothy Thompson describes it as a "Call to Destiny" and uses other language that might have come straight out of a spring seed catalog. But the new American imperialism, under whatever trademark it is sold, is dangerous food for democrats.

Let's look at the claims made for this product. They are persuasive and alluring. Boiled down to their essence they amount to this: the United States has set its hand to the task of helping Britain defeat Hitler. But "helping Britain" is a euphemism. What we are really doing is to help win a war which will establish the United States as the dominant power in the world. In 1918 we missed the opportunity to reconstruct the world according to our own ideas. This time we cannot afford to hesitate; we must seize the leadership of the world, lay down our own peace terms, and create an American "new order" in which democratic ideals shall rule. Sounds nice, doesn't it? But at the same time doesn't it also sound faintly reminiscent? Echoes ring in the ears. Ghosts wander the corridors of the brain. "Manifest destiny." "Anglo-Saxon justice." "The white man's burden." Is this new imperialism nothing more than Kipling in modern dress? We'd better study the prospectus a little more closely.

Henry Luce lays out a fairly comprehensive program for the American century. We are, first, to insure the freedom of the seas and become "the dynamic leader of world trade." (Asia alone, he says, will be worth "four, five, ten billions of dollars a year" to us if we have the guts to think in those terms.) We are also to provide the planet with technical and artistic skills, distributing "throughout the world" our "engineers, scientists, doctors, movie men, makers of entertainment, developers of airlines, builders of roads, teachers, educators." Third, we are to feed the world, sending our food surpluses "to the four corners of the globe as a free gift . . . to every man, woman, and child . . . who is really hungry." And, fourth, we are to be the "powerhouse of the ideals of Freedom and Justice," shipping these, too, to nations which at best have only a nodding acquaintance with a set of values "especially American."

Dorothy Thompson, in a column devoted to Mr. Luce, approves letter by letter his formula for "internationalism." "This will either be an American century," she says, "or it will be the beginning of the decline and fall of the American dream." "To Americanize enough of the world so that we shall have a climate and environment favorable to our growth is indeed a call to destiny." And she, too, wants the United States to spread reforms which will "bring about a reconstruction of a larger part of the world in harmony with freedom and with an honest promise of prosperity for all." But Miss Thompson is more explicit than Mr. Luce in her idea of what the call to destiny should mean. At last week's Town Hall meeting in Washington she frankly committed the future to the "English-speaking world." The Anglo-Saxon tradition, she said, had given mankind the words "freedom," "parliament," "congress," "suffrage," and "rule of the people." It also had produced the word "gentleman." And she developed the curious theory that whereas the "Germanic world of Hitler thinks that man is determined by his blood," the English-speaking world "holds the idea that man is determined by his speech, by his mind, and by his soul . . . and the English language instead of being the great separator of men has been the great uniter of men." If on first reading this sentence seems to mean simply nothing, on second reading it quite clearly implies that people who speak English develop into a higher order of being than the poor devils who have been deprived of the master tongue. And this interpretation seems to be borne out by the three sentences which follow:

The triumph of the English-speaking world does not lie in its racial supremacy, or in its power to subject other races to it. It lies in its incomparable power to assimilate other nations and races to itself. The United States of America . . . is composed of millions who once spoke Italian, or German, or Magyar, or almost any other language.

In other words, the potency of the Anglo-Saxon tradition and the English language is sufficient to elevate to equality even those lesser breeds without the lingo—if only they come within range.

And so a super-race is being created which will rule the world-to-be. It's being created by a simple process of verbal osmosis; and no one can possibly say that this is not a nicer way to glory than Hitlers. Nicer, but still thoroughly dangerous and misleading.

The Luce-Thompson brand of imperialism should be investigated by the Federal Trade Commission and a cease-and-desist order issued before the public mind is poisoned. This program is magnanimous and benevolent, it is large and awe-inspiring. It is also smug, self-righteous, superior, and fatuously lacking in a decent regard for the susceptibilities of the rest of mankind. These particular qualities are the typical stigmata of the Anglo-Saxon in his role as imperialist. Miss Thompson and Mr. Luce are undoubtedly moved by the noblest aspirations, but so was Cecil Rhodes.

The whole idea of a future order dominated by an English-speaking union dominated by the United States is deceptive as well as dangerous. It creates a new myth of superiority to justify a national role which would be morally intolerable on any other score. But the myth is equally intolerable. Are nations relegated to a lower stratum likely to be better pleased because they are demoted on grounds of language and tradition rather than of blood? The fact is, no democratic basis for national dominance can be found in any formula, no matter how you slice it. It cannot be found because it does not exist. And a new order rooted in such a concept will blow over at the first breeze of revolution or else it will grow up into a greedy imperialism like those that preceded it. You don't nourish an honest internationalism with nonsense about "destiny" and "Anglo-Saxon traditions" and an "American century."

Oil Is Still Neutral

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, February 22

ONE need possess no inside information to see that war with Japan is a possibility. Gossip in circles on the Hill which are close to the army and navy say "within sixty days." Yet the same patriotic oil companies whose dollar-a-year men dominate the Defense Commission continue to send Japan the oil it needs. During the week ended February 15 we sent Japan 147,044 barrels of crude oil and 137,657 barrels of lubricating oils. We sent Britain 60,000 barrels of crude and 168,986 barrels of fuel oil the same week. Oil is still neutral.

When foreign countries, like domestic consumers, become annoyed with Standard Oil, the marines are called for. Otherwise business is business and a yen is as good as a dollar. For all the headlines about oil embargoes, American oil companies are enjoying a boom in exports to Japan. Here is the total value of our petroleum exports to Japan during the past four years:

1937	$43,733,000
1938	51,191,000
1939	45,285,000
1940	53,133,000

Lest the reader think these exports have been slowing down I give the figures for 1940 by quarters:

1st quarter	$ 8,584,000
2d quarter	7,717,000
3rd quarter	14,160,000
4th quarter	22,675,000

Oil exports to Japan are running at a rate almost double any year since the "China incident" began.

The figures for gasoline alone show that we sent Japan three times as much gasoline in 1940 as in any of the three preceding years. Aviation gas is a story in itself. The Commerce Department, at the request of the State Department, changed the name of aviation gas last September to "high-grade motor fuel in bulk or containers." This was done, I was told, "so the State Department wouldn't be embarrassed by writers and newspapermen." In 1939 Japan took 628,560 barrels of aviation gas. In 1940 it took 556,703 barrels of "high-grade motor fuel in bulk or containers." The Export Control division says no aviation gas of higher than 87.5 octane content is going to Japan and that this other gas is inferior gas, not suitable for modern planes. Some authorities say flatly that it is good enough to be used in planes combatting an inferior air force like China's.

It is unfortunate that public attention has been centered on aviation gas, for war with Japan would be a naval war, and fuel oil runs battleships. Japan is being kept well supplied with fuel oil by American companies. Japan and Kwantung together (the State Department insists on separating them, although Japan's possession of Kwantung—the old Port Arthur region in South Manchuria—goes back to 1905) obtained almost 7,500,000 barrels of fuel oil from this country last year. Of basic importance, too, are Japan's heavy imports of crude oil, which amounted to more than 12,000,000 barrels in 1940. In December we exported 2,000,000 barrels of crude, of which half went to Canada, a fourth to Japan. Fuel oil and aviation gas are, of course, manufactured from crude oil. Japan has considerable facilities for refining and cracking, despite oil-company apologies to the contrary. Latest published figures, which are several years behind, show Japan's refining capacity to be 52,600 barrels a day, as compared with Greater Germany's 68,770. Her cracking capacity is 16,250 barrels a day, as compared with Greater Germany's 7,920 barrels a day.

Exports to Japan are not the only contributions of American oil companies to the Axis. There are two sources through which Germany and Italy might obtain American oil—Soviet Russia and Spain. The attention paid to these two loopholes is in inverse ratio to the amount of oil going to them. The dollar value of all petroleum products shipped from this country to the U.S.S.R. last year was $1,850,000, as compared with the total of $53,135,000 sent to Japan.

Joseph Curran, of the National Maritime Union, testifying before the Senate Foreign Relations committee on February 10 against the Lease-Lend bill, provided a glimpse of Spanish possibilities. He told of the recent trip of a Standard Oil tanker, the W. H. Libby. "Not long ago," he said, "she went to Cartagena, Colombia, and loaded up with oil she took to Freetown, West Africa, for British use. Then she hurried back to Carapito, Venezuela, for another load of oil which she took, this time, to Teneriffe in the Canary Islands, where the cargo was transferred to a German and Italian tanker. . . . The crew [of the W. H. Libby] found Teneriffe a busy port, with a steady stream of Standard Oil tankers pulling in and out. In the harbor when the W. H. Libby left, were three German and five Italian tankers, the crew reported.

This part of Curran's testimony was given scant attention in the press, whether it was for or against the Lease-Lend bill. It would have been easy to refute it from Standard Oil and official records. I am told in the Commerce Department that oil exports from this country to Spain are now running about 300,000 barrels a month. But no one knows how much oil is going to the Spanish islands for transshipment to the Axis from American oil companies and refineries in Venezuela and the Dutch West Indies. Japan is obtaining large quantities from American and British oil companies in the Dutch East Indies.

The press has played up every story of Mexican oil going to Japan or the Axis powers but pays little attention to American oil bound for Japan and makes no attempt to investigate how much oil may be reaching Germany and Italy through Spain, although that would be a great story. Mexico has some excuse for her shipments. Standard, Dutch Shell, and the State Department have been doing their best to enforce an unofficial embargo on Mexican oil, as I disclosed in The Nation last fall. The navy on instructions from the State Department chose to pay Standard Oil ten cents a barrel more for fuel oil rather than buy it from a small American company which manufactured the oil from Mexican crude. The only exception since made is for fuel oil manufactured by Harry Sinclair from crude given him by the Mexican government in settlement of his claim under expropriation.

Behind the scenes Mexico is now being blackjacked into an agreement whereby Standard and Shell will get back operating control of their properties. The American taxpayer will be asked to foot the bill in the shape of a loan or an appropriation paying off the exaggerated estimates the American oil companies place on the value of their Mexican properties. The excuse will be that we must keep Mexican oil out of Japanese hands. Why not start by keeping American oil out of Japanese hands?

The Nazi Plan for Negroes

BY HANS HABE

THE Illustrierte Beobachter, German illustrated weekly, has recently published a special issue devoted to the question of France's war guilt. This journal, known as the I. B., is an official German weekly and an offshoot of the Voelkische Beobachter, in which Adolf Hitler has the controlling interest. Published by order of Propaganda Minister Goebbels, this special issue was the opening gun for an anti-Negro campaign which may surpass in violence even the Nazi persecution of the Jews. In recent weeks, the German press has devoted more and more attention to American Negroes; the three or four latest issues of the Stürmer, Hitler's anti-Semitic sheet, have been directed entirely against the Negroes. Julius Streicher, its editor, is the Fuehrer's only intimate friend, an "old militant," and the only party leader who may "thou" Hitler. For the last few weeks the Stürmer has maintained that the misfortunes befalling the Aryan nations were not caused by the Jews alone: both Jews and Negroes are guilty. In a speech delivered by Streicher before a gathering of some party friends in Nuremberg a few weeks ago, he solemnly declared: "The emancipation of the Jews and the liberation of the black slaves are the two crimes of civilization committed by the plutocrats in the last few centuries."

In June, 1940, a large part of the French army was surrounded, and entire Negro and Arab regiments fell into German hands. In previous battles, in Belgium and Luxembourg, at Dunkerque, Sedan, Rethel, and Laon, black regiments had fought in the first lines; later, the retreat from the Maginot Line was covered mainly by Foreign Legion regiments and colonial troops. On June 22, when the army of the East—the last to make a stand—capitulated, the Germans captured entire units of the Spahis (colonial cavalry), the Tirailleurs Africains (African Sharpshooters), and innumerable groups of I. C. (Infanterie Coloniale). My own regiment, the "21-ème Régiment de Marche des Volontaires Etrangers" (21st Infantry of Foreign Volunteers), fought for weeks side by side with colonial regiments, and on June 21, when I was taken prisoner at the village of Charmes, many Negro troops were captured. In Bayon, the first village to which we were taken, we noticed that the Negroes were "expected." They were immediately separated from us and confined in a special fenced enclosure in the nearby camp of Villacourt. A few hours after our arrival, there was a rumor that all the Negroes had been executed by firing squads. We did not believe it. In our sector of the front alone several thousand Negroes were captured: of the two million French war prisoners, approximately 400,000 are colored. Not even the most sadistic imagination could picture such a blood bath. Yet numerous executions of Negroes did take place. These were "justified"—in so far as anyone bothered to justify them—by the Negroes' sniping activities. To the Germans, every soldier who continued to fight after the military formation to which he belonged had surrendered, was a sniper. After the occupation of Bayon, they charged that Negroes, concealed in houses, had fired at "peaceful" German soldiers. Such individual fighters were treated not as soldiers but as "ordinary murderers."

We spent a few days in a state of paralyzed suspense. Our German guards told us that their officers were waiting for Berlin to instruct them what to do with the Negroes. I do not know whether or when such instructions came. I do know that on the morning of June 25, eighty Negroes and Arabs were selected among the 8,000 captured with us, taken to a wood near Villacourt, and shot. The Germans calmly told us that more would have been executed, but the authorities wanted to show special moderation. The eighty victims had been chosen at random. No one accused them of any specific crime: we were told that their execution was intended as an example for French snipers.

The Negroes were mistreated even during their removal—on foot, of course—to their places of internment. We marched, under German supervision, from forty to fifty kilometers daily, en route to our camps in Lunéville, Morhange, Dieuze, or Sarrebourg. The French civilian population of Lorraine helped us as much as they could. Our food supplies were soon exhausted; but at the roadside stood women and old men with large buckets of fresh water, comforting the marching thousands with cold drinks. The heat was unbearable, and we would have collapsed with fatigue without water. The German guards had apparently received instructions to bar the Negroes from this solace. Though we were allowed to drink in every village we passed, the Negroes were prodded on with bared bayonets.

This march through the villages was like running a ganlet. In every locality the Negroes were photographed dozens of times by the garrisons; in the larger towns, moving pictures were taken. As a rule, Negroes and whites marched in separate groups; but for the films they were forced to pose together. Again and again we heard German soldiers calling to our guards: "Haven't you shot them yet? What are you waiting for?"

We arrived at the camp in Dieuze. Here, as in all German prison camps, the Negroes were immediately isolated. Barbed wire was strung around their barracks. No white man was allowed to converse with a black. Our own shelters were miserable enough: those of the Negroes, crowded into a narrow space, were much worse. Our food, though insufficient, was princely in comparison with that given to the Negroes, who practically starved. Hundreds of them fell sick, but were not cared for. The Germans explained that the French would surely object to sharing their hospitals with them. Only much later were special infirmaries created for Negroes.

Cover: Negro issue of the Illustrierte Beobachter

German soldiers regarded the "camp within a camp" as a kind of zoo: they were constantly standing around it and taking pictures, usually through the barbed wire. To give the Negroes pieces of bread or to shake hands with them was strictly forbidden; a German corporal who became friendly with a Negro and was seen shaking hands with him was given fourteen days' house arrest.

Such breaches of discipline were the exception; for, curiously enough, the Germans' hatred of the colored people seemed deeply rooted. I was soon to understand why. Dozens of current German periodicals, pamphlets, and newspapers portrayed the Negroes as cannibals, and fed German soldiers with false statistics and pseudo-scientific data. One special issue of the Racial-political Institute explained that more than 21 per cent—that is, almost a quarter—of the French population was "tainted" with Negro blood. (In reality, not even one per cent of the French people are even partly Negro.) But the purpose of the propaganda was clear. As the Germans knew that the French army would send the well-trained and relatively well-equipped colonial troops to the front lines, they tried to convince the German soldiers that if they did not kill the Negroes they risked having their throats cut. Unfortunate black prisoners told me that the German soldiers fought them much more bitterly than they did us.

For some time it was possible to interpret these incidents as isolated phenomena. But it soon became evident that this treatment of the Negroes was part of a diabolical plan. By order of the high command courses were organized to acquaint German soldiers and non-commissioned officers with the "tasks of Germany as a colonial empire." The whole curriculum was based on racial theories; Negroes from our camp were often taken to the lecture hall and exhibited as "specimens." As camp interpreter I had to accompany them, and this enabled me to attend the lectures and learn the German attitude toward the Negro problem. These courses, organized throughout German-held territory by the General Staff, stressed that intermixture with Negroes was one of the chief factors in the French defeat. Consequently, German policy toward the colonial peoples was to be inspired by the following principles:

(1) The colored people are an inferior race whose place must be fixed by the white "master race."

(2) The free choice of trades and professions by the Negroes leads to social assimilation, which in turn produces racial assimilation. The occupations of the black colonial peoples and their function in the labor process of the "new order" will therefore be entirely determined by the Germans.

(3) Intermarriage between whites and blacks or half-breeds and whites is forbidden. According to the Nuremberg racial laws, sexual intercourse between members of the two races is subject to sanctions including the death penalty.

(4) Persons belonging to a race other than the white Aryan race will have no active or passive electoral rights in the German colonial empire.

(5) Negroes are forbidden access to railways, street-cars, restaurants, motion pictures, and all public establishments. Special conveyances and public establishments will be created for them both in Germany and in occupied territories.

(6) Members of inferior races are not allowed to join the National Socialist Party or its subsidiary organizations. Nor can they serve in the army. They must, however, serve in labor battalions.

It is easy to imagine the fate of the colored people in a German colonial empire, if the General Staff of the German army is already disseminating these six commandments. Equal rights for Negroes are always described as a "democratic cancer." It goes without saying that the German lecturers always consider the Negroes of "all continents" as belonging to the same race.

There is one essential difference between Hitler's Negro policy and his Jewish policy. Whereas he makes no attempt to "win over" the Jews, whom he drives out of Germany or tortures in Germany, with regard to the Negroes he pursues a double objective: he wants both to enslave them and to win them over. This double attitude leads to contradictions which are more apparent than real. One day a Senegalese Negro of the 14th Infantry Regiment, the bulk of which was interned in the camp of Dieuze (Department of Moselle), succeeded in slipping away from his barracks and entering the infirmary. The infirmary was the only real building in the camp. The Negro soldier climbed up to the fourth floor and threw himself out of the window. To my great surprise, Captain Brühl, the commander of our camp, ordered a solemn funeral to be held on the following day. On a rainy, August evening, the suicide was carried to his grave by twenty-five of his black comrades, accompanied by a German guard of honor of eleven men. A German lieutenant made a speech over the grave; the German soldiers fired a salute. The next day, the barbed wire around the Negro barracks was removed. It became clear that a new policy had been decreed. The Negroes were given one cake of soap for four men for six weeks, a privilege that was never to be granted to other prisoners. Their food was improved and they were permitted to attend the reading of the daily reports, from which they had been previously excluded. They were also permitted, for the first time, to read L'Echo, the daily French-language propaganda newspaper.

A few days later the explanation of this curious change was disclosed to me by German officers. With the shameless candor characteristic of contemporary Germans, Captain von Brühl, the commander of our camp, told me:

"Yesterday we received new instructions. From now on Germany will pursue a colonial policy!"

Overnight the whole racial principle appeared to have been thrown overboard. Flogging was replaced by pampering. And when a cold wave swept Germany, many thousands of Negroes interned in the great camp of Kassel, in the extreme north of Germany, were brought back to occupied France because they could not bear the cold and were dying by the hundreds.

But the policy of kindness was as short-lived as it was surprising. From August to October the Negroes were pampered, but after mid-October they were again deprived of all privileges and relegated to an infernal ghetto within the camp. During the "fat weeks" they alone among the prisoners were permitted a weekly walk in the village. After the new orders came through, they were not even allowed to use the yard in the daytime: between six and seven in the evening they were marched around, and that was their only outing. It goes without saying that the new severities were "justified" by the usual fairy-tales: we were told that "somewhere in Germany" a Negro prisoner had raped a German girl.

This wavering between mild treatment and extremes of cruelty had definite psychological causes. On the one hand, the German people had to be propagandized with regard to the Negro question. It had to be made clear to the Germans of the twentieth century that the age of slavery had returned; that they, the master race, had the power of life and death over the Negroes. At the same time the Germans had to understand that the Negro—in contrast to the Jew—was not his enemy, but only his slave. And the Negro was made to realize—through constant reminders—that the German, whenever he pleases, can deprive him of all right to live, but does not necessarily hate him; that the German is not his enemy, but only his master.

If Hitler is to turn the Negroes into loyal, devoted, and even grateful servants of their Prussian masters, it is necessary not only to preserve their physical strength, but also to weaken their psychological resistance. Otherwise their efficiency as laborers would be impaired. They must be convinced that the Germans are good masters, who do not abuse their "rights," and can make their slaves happy.

The weaknesses of this policy are evident at once. Ideologically, Hitler is forced to replace his clear-cut distinction between the white Aryans and all other races by a whole hierarchy of races. This creates complications for his propaganda. How can the Germans be convinced that the Jewish race is white but inferior, the Negro race inferior but colored, and the yellow race colored but equal? Similarly, the attempt to reduce the Negroes to slavery is utterly incompatible with the attempt to win their good will. Hitler's hopes in this respect are based on an oversimplified psychology. He thinks that the Negroes will be grateful for not being made to serve in the army, as in France, where they had to take eighteen months of regular military training and in addition were always used for the most dangerous wartime duties. But the Negroes distrust Hitler's pacifism and they prefer military training to forced labor without wages.

Hitler has had no luck so far with the Negroes interned in his camps—the camps that he has called "the laboratories of his future policy." It is true that French colonial policy during the war was a sad failure, and that the black soldiers were often treated like cannon fodder; but, compared to Hitler's, France's colonial policy was understanding and humane.

Chile Will Decide

BY SAMUEL GUY INMAN

ON March 2 the Republic of Chile will hold a national election which will determine the future of the New Deal that was launched in that country at the end of 1938. The Chilean liberals, under President Pedro Aguirre Cerda, will try to continue their bloodless revolution in the face of bitter and perhaps violent opposition from the near-fascists on the right, who have threatened to boycott the coming election, and from the Communists on the left. The task of keeping a balance between hostile forces while pushing ahead with social reform is always difficult, and especially so when a country has other and equally pressing problems to solve. Chile not only must find its way out of an internal economic crisis but make the adjustments necessary to cooperate with the United States and other American republics for hemisphere defense.

When Aguirre became the reform candidate for President in 1938, the Communists were among the small radical groups that offered him active support. Anti-fascist and full of praise for democracy, and insisting they wanted none of the spoils of office, the Communists were accepted almost without question by Chilean progressives. Together with the largest party, the Radicals (representing middle-class liberals), the Socialist Party (including small farmers and workers), the Democrats, and the Popular Party, the Communists formed the Popular Front, and, though only 50,000 strong, became its most aggressive backers. Their loyalty lasted until the fall of 1939 and the signing of the Russo-German pact. Then, like Communists all over the world, they turned on their liberal collaborators and refused cooperation on any but their own terms. Since that time the friction in Chile has increased to such an extent that a bill to outlaw the Communist Party recently passed the Chamber of Deputies. Despite some Popular Front support, it was vetoed by the President.

Aguirre's opponent was Gustavo Ross, a conservative who frankly represented the great landowning class, which is opposed to any real social reform. The Popular Front won the presidency by only about one thousand votes. The rightists, however, retained, and still retain, a majority in the legislature. With this power they have persistently opposed every reform the new administration has sought to accomplish. They have also fought the government through the landholders' Sociedad Nacional de Agricultores, the political equivalent of America's National Association of Manufacturers and the economic and industrial opponent of labor's Confederación de Trabajadores.

Aguirre's more conservative supporters have constantly urged him to go slowly with his reform program and to break away from the extreme left. To force the President's hand, the head of the Radical Party (actually the least radical in the government) made a private arrangement to align his party with the rightists. It was then pointed out to Aguirre that without the Radicals' support, and with only the Communists and the Socialists backing him, he could not hope to govern. When that argument failed to influence him, an artificial break with Franco Spain was created as a sign of what might happen if the other European dictators showed displeasure with Chile. None of these tricks worked, and the Radical Party chief, Pedro Castelblanco, was compelled to break off his alliance with the Right. To placate both sides, the President eased out of his cabinet the leftist Minister of the Interior, Humberto Alvarez, who had banned two conservative newspapers because they criticized the administration, and the conservative Minister of Finance Cristobal Saenz, a close friend of the large landholders.

When the Communists were giving support to the Popular Front, one of their chief enthusiasms was President Roosevelt's Latin-American policy. Now, however, when the Good Neighbor policy in action means defense against Hitler, they have decided that it is just another form of Yankee imperialism. Their most forthright attack on hemisphere defense took the form of an accusation against Minister of Trade Oscar Schnake, a brilliant young socialist who represented Chile at the Havana conference, and who recently has been acting as a special economic emissary to Washington. They accused him of bartering away his country's sovereignty for commercial advantages. Actually, although Schnake has accomplished nothing that promises completely to solve Chile's economic difficulties, he has arranged for the purchase by the United States of large amounts of Chile's copper, nitrate, and other defense materials. He has also obtained a loan of $5,000,000 to cover the deficit of the Exchange Control Commission. These deals were the basis of the Communist charges. Incensed by their unfairness, Schnake, in a two-hour speech before the Socialist Party on December 14, declared it was no longer possible for Socialists and Communists to work together. His attitude no doubt played a considerable part in the recent Socialist declaration of non-cooperation with the Communists and in the vote of the Chamber of Deputies to outlaw the Communist Party.

Although Chile is heading toward a political crisis, the masses of the people constitute a deep reservoir of internal strength. Unlike an O. Henry Latin-American republic, the country is not a land of frequent revolutions. During its first century of independence, it had only one major political disturbance—a civil war in 1891 over the respective constitutional powers of the executive and the legislature. A large group of socially minded leaders, statesmen, and educators has given Chile the most progressive legislation of any country in this hemisphere. There are more foreign students in its universities, and more liberals seeking asylum from other countries than anywhere else in South America. Women have more rights there than elsewhere in Latin America. Señora Schnake, wife of the Minister of Trade, was for a time the mayor of a district in Santiago and Señora Amanda Labarca headed the national university's Commission on Intellectual Exchange.

Although fundamental change is long overdue in Chile, the present government has done a great deal within the framework of the present social order to rout the "hundred families." Reform had to wait until the victims of the earthquake that came a month after Aguirre's inauguration, were rehabilitated. That task completed, the President went to work on the most urgent economic problems. By decree he lowered the price of bread from nine cents to five. To compensate the farmers he lowered freight rates on wheat, bought large quantities of it with government funds, and extended credit to buyers of fertilizers. Pawn-shops were forced to return some 6,000 sewing-machines and other items that the poor had pledged for food. Schools were enlarged. The number of students rose from the 510,167

The New Order

BY ARTHUR GUITERMAN

"Our German heroes rushed to save you,
Then don't forget the aid we gave you,
Since if you do you're bound to know remorse;
So let our boys feel quite at home
Just as their forebears did in Rome—
I mean the Goths and Visigoths, of course."
"Yes, Adolf," said Benito.

"Your Verdi's far too sweet and mellow;
Our Wagner is the only fellow
Whose operas in future may be played.
And though your art is not as fine
As that produced above the Rhine,
We'll give you Prussian masterworks in trade."
"Nice, Adolf," chirped Benito.

"The German, not the Roman eagle,
Henceforward shall alone be legal,
The swastika must sanctify your flag.
As for your king, perhaps we'll plan
To send him somewhere, say, Japan;
His title, there, might prove a useful tag."
"Fine, Adolf!" cried Benito.

"You'll have to change your mode of dining;
Spaghetti is—well, unrefining,
Chianti gives less nourishment than beer.
Last, 'Duce' is a sloppy word,
So 'Fuehrer' is the term preferred.
I trust I make my meaning fairly clear?"
"Quite, Adolf," groaned Benito.

registered in 1936 to 674,529. Laws providing minimum-wage standards, preventive medicine for workers, and housing projects passed the Chamber of Deputies. By now every wage-earner has social insurance guaranteeing medical care, old-age pensions, and other services which probably place Chile ahead of any other country in the world, so far as legislation of this sort is concerned. It has one of the few municipally-owned pasteurization plants in existence, and this is largely responsible for the government's order to sell milk to the poor at less than three cents a quart, which is extraordinarily little compared with prices elsewhere.

The industrial development of the last two years has brought a small revival of Chile's merchant marine. Modern boats now connect Valparaiso and New York. The railroads, government-owned, have been modernized by electrification and new rolling stock, and running times reduced considerably. Many native enterprises have been promoted to take the place of the nitrate business, once the chief industry but now moribund.

But there is still plenty to be done in Chile, and the March elections will have a profound effect on the country's future. If the right is defeated a new alignment will come, probably in the form of a center coalition leaning to the left. The Communists have been retained by the President's veto, an action probably taken because of their extraordinary energy as campaigners, but chances are good that after the election they will be almost completely shorn of influence within the Popular Front. If the right wins, Chile's New Deal is over and fascism scores a victory in this hemisphere. But Chile's liberals regard that as a highly unlikely outcome.

Sports and Defense

BY CURT RIESS

THIS war is a war of machines; or so, at least, the experts insist. And for once events seem to confirm their opinion. It was doubtless the superiority of the German war machine that made possible all the German victories, both the bloody ones and the earlier, bloodless ones. The Poles, the Dutch, the Belgians, and the French were defeated because they didn't have weapons equal to those of the Germans. So we have been saying all along. And from the time it was generally conceded that we too had to be prepared, there has been talk of nothing but machines of war—the building of which seemed to be preparedness enough.

It isn't enough, of course.

The English say, "Waterloo was won on the playing fields of Eton." The sentiment is valid in this war too—and in any war. Wars are always waged with men as well as weapons. Men must have a certain minimum fitness, or the finest bombing planes and tanks won't help.

It is strange that the United States of all countries should have forgotten this. For in the first World War the American troops demonstrated the importance of their athletic training for practical warfare. Half of the men in the famous 69th Regiment were New York public-school athletes. Nearly a hundred thousand—98,785 to be exact—of the volunteers from New York had participated in the activities of the Public School Athletic League. During the war itself, American Y. M. C. A. instructors helped direct the athletic training of soldiers here and in France. These instructors fostered sports that would improve the alertness, skill, initiative, and efficiency of their men. It was soon discovered that sports did more than stimulate fitness and morale; they improved the technique of the troops. It was found, for instance, that boxers could handle bayonets skilfully and that baseball players could throw hand grenades with deadly aim.

Only after the draft act of 1940 was passed was it recalled that human fitness is a decisive factor in building a defense machine, and that sports are a decisive factor in acquiring fitness. Ironically enough, promoters of professional sports were the first who publicly connected sports and defense. They didn't begin propaganda for sports as an integral part of the defense program. They simply voiced their fears. They were afraid that their highly paid and highly profitable boxers, baseball players, and football players might be drafted.

However, things began to happen. The War Department ordered a million dollars' worth of sports equipment and set aside $2,800,000 for sports activities in general. Gene Tunney was called upon by the navy to coordinate physical education. Dr. W. M. Lewis, president of Lafayette College, made a speech urging colleges and universities to make their sports facilities available to men of draft age. There were other speeches and suggestions. D. Benedetto, president of the Amateur Athletic Union, advocated doubling the sports activities organized and controlled by the A. A. U. as "the democratic answer to the dictators' athletic program." While Mr. Benedetto's recommendation is by no means the whole answer, he is undoubtedly on safe ground in asserting that the dictators have a program that calls for counteractivity.

Let us look for a moment at the athletic programs of the dictators.

It wasn't Hitler who started using sports as a preparation for war in Germany. It was most probably General Ludendorff. In October, 1914, a proclamation was read in all German public schools, ordering that five minutes of each recess period be devoted to running practice. The General Staff had decided that one of the reasons for the defeat on the Marne had been the inability of the German soldier to retreat fast enough. German schoolboys now had seven hours of gymnastics weekly, instead of two, as before. In 1915 the Jugendkompagnien, or youth squads, were founded, with compulsory participation for every boy over sixteen. The boys received military training camouflaged under the terms of a secret decree that said, "Care must be taken that these exercises appear athletic in character."

After the war of 1914-18, when the Weimar Republic attempted to purge gymnastics of militarism, the embittered former army officers organized youth leagues for Gelaendesport (open air athletics) with "political enlightenment" thrown in for good measure. Their Nationale Kampfspiele were not games but military exercises. The secret Free Corps, which went in for political assassination, developed logically out of them. Another of their products was the SA of the National Socialist Party. The SA (Sport-Abteilung) was founded in 1921 and proclaimed as "A special party section for gymnastics and sports." It grew into the notorious Sturm-Abteilung, or Storm troops, thus completing a cycle; sports, introduced to win the war, became a screen behind which Hitler prepared for the next war.

When the Nazis came to power, one of their first acts was to coordinate sports. A Sportsführer was appointed. Every German must be fit to fight and must keep in shape. The Hitler Youth began playing rather curious games. They practiced marching, digging trenches, and crawling under barbed wire, and using bayonets. The students and the numerous workers' organizations, as well as the SA and the SS (Schutz Staffel), had to practice shooting, marching, and gliding.

When Hitler made sport a training school for his army, he borrowed his ideas partly from the old German General Staff and partly from Stalin. Since 1930 there have been no private sports at all in Russia. Sport is a state function, directed by the Council for Physical Education, and a tremendous advance has been made. In 1920 the very word "sports" was almost unknown in Russia. In 1934—no figures have been published since—there were more than 4,000 sports grounds and stadiums, more than 2,000 indoor arenas; there were more than 8,000,000 active, organized athletes. And 100,000,000 roubles a year was spent on their activities. But of course it wasn't sport for sport's sake. Some of the "sports" practiced were: hand-grenade throwing, swimming fifty meters with a rifle, shooting, reading maps.

The German use of sports as a preparation for war was even more thorough than the Russian and on a greater scale. The Nazis admitted it openly. Shortly before the 1936 Olympic Games, Hermann Teske, sports instructor at the Zossen military school near Berlin, published a pamphlet in which he said: "All German sport must have a purpose. The goal of physical training is readiness for defense."

In the United States sports are taken seriously, probably too seriously. We know how to train our athletes. Our colleges and even our public schools are sometimes regular training camps. We want victories, and we get them. But what do these victories mean in the light of our defense preparations?

We like to think of ourselves as the leading sports nation in the world. But are we? We hold most of the records, but records aren't everything. When it comes to sports facilities, the Germans appear to be at least our equals, in proportion to their population.

It is almost impossible to get anywhere by comparing the sports activities of different nations. Most nations, including ours, have never collected definite figures on active sports participants. And almost every nation stresses different sports. As for sports facilities, it is difficult to coordinate the various statistics. Playing fields and swimming pools can be of varying sizes and capacities. For purposes of reaching an approximate index, however, comparative sports facilities may be expressed in terms of the number of athletes using a hypothetical field of a given size. Such a playing field would be used:

In the United States by.....	100	athletes
In Germany by.....	100	"
In England by.....	160	"
In Russia by.....	230	"
In France by	410	"

While these figures show that American sports facilities are sufficient to train the same percentage of the athletic population as was trained in Germany before the war, Germany completely outclasses us when it comes to sports that are a direct preparation for war. For example, affiliated with the National Rifle Association of America are some 3,300 rifle clubs with a membership of about 300,000. The greater part of them, moreover, use the small-bore non-military rifle. In Germany, with half our population, there are 13,942 clubs with a membership of 419,569. There are 732 practice fields for gliding in Germany, and thousands of German youths participated in this sport which, until a short time ago, was not even considered a sport in the United States. And in such splendid activities as crawling under barbed wire and digging trenches, we have no competition to offer at all.

There are, of course, other important points. In the first place, with twice the population our potential sports activity is much greater than Germany's, and in the end, it is always a question of potential rather than of actual power. If we consider men up to twenty-four years of age as active athletes, and examine the population according to age groups, we find that in the United States 18 per cent of the population could be mobilized as athletes while in Germany before the war only 10 per cent were available.

Of even more decisive importance are the conflicting basic ideas on which the sports of the two countries are founded. Something essential to fitness may be acquired through sports only if they are devoted to the development of the individual character, rather than to the perfection of strength; to the creation of initiative rather than to the creation of blind and unreasoning obedience. The Finns have the idea. They call it sisu—an untranslatable word expressing will and tenacious endurance until victory. The French had it; they called it morale. The English have it, of course, but they have no word for it. We have it too—we call it guts.

Everybody's Business

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

Steel Capacity

WHAT has happened to the report on the steel industry by Mr. Gano Dunn? Well-known industrial expert and president of the J. G. White Engineering Company, Mr. Dunn was asked to survey the national capacity for steel production in the light of demands created by the defense program. The intent was to clear up the dispute between the leaders of the steel industry, who declared that the existing plant could fill all needs, and independent economists, who urged that large and immediate expansion was essential if a steel shortage was to be avoided.

Six weeks ago Mr. Roosevelt told reporters that he was expecting this report immediately. A week or two later Mr. Dunn fell ill. The result was that his report is still "on order" and will probably not reach the White House before the end of this month. It is doubtful if this delay has disturbed the steel industry, for it has had a chance to forestall Mr. Dunn's expected recommendations for expansion with a revised construction program of its own. According to the Wall Street Journal of February 20, plans are now being submitted to defense officials for additions to plant which, together with schemes already announced, would mean an enlargement in ingot capacity of some 5,000,000 tons. This is far below estimates of likely requirements made by good authorities but the steel industry evidently hopes it will prove sufficient to ward off further demands.

For many months now, leading steel executives have been fighting a rearguard action against the advocates of greater production. They have insisted that the industry is able to meet all likely demands on it and have argued that temporary shortages which may occur during the emergency should be overcome by rationing civilian consumption. This would be far better, they imply, than the construction of new plants which would become redundant once the defense program was completed. For they are convinced that a post-war depression is inevitable and they fear that, as demand recedes, the availability of new and efficient productive capacity may break down the gentlemanly abstention from price competition which has long been characteristic of their industry.

The heavy guns of steel really went into action after the National Resources Planning Board published a report, summarized in this column last December 21, suggesting a minimum increase in ingot capacity of 15.4 million tons. Mr. Ernest T. Weir, chairman of the National Steel Corporation declared: "Everyone's getting all the steel they want and will continue to do so," and he estimated defense and war export orders in the current year at not more than 13,000,000 tons, leaving a potential 72,000,000 tons for normal domestic consumption. Mr. Girdler of Republic Steel and Mr. Olds of United States Steel have also deprecated talk of shortages, although they both estimated defense and export requirements at a rather higher figure than did Mr. Weir.

Such protestations led to the shelving of a report by Dr.

Melvin de Chazeau, Defense Commission economist, who is believed to have recommended an expansion of between eight and ten million tons in ingot capacity, and the appointment of Mr. Dunn to undertake a new investigation. Meanwhile, however, the steel industry began to have some doubts about its own claim that facilities were ample, for one company after another announced development schemes. National Steel proposed to add 240,000 tons to its ingot capacity and to increase its output of pig-iron and coke. Columbia Steel, Pacific Coast subsidiary of United States Steel, scheduled expenditure of $5,000,000 on additional steel-making and finishing mills. Then the American Rolling Mill Company, whose president Charles R. Hook had stated in December that the industry could meet all demands for the next three years with its existing capacity, obtained a $12,000,000 loan from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for the construction of an entirely new plant in Texas. Not long after, the same concern announced it was starting work on a giant blast furnace at Ashland, Kentucky, with a daily output of 1,000 tons of pig-iron.

These and other schemes will boost annual steel-making capacity by around 2,500,000, or about 3 per cent. This is a long way behind the estimates of needs which I have quoted but it seems at least an acknowledgment that the industry must expand in order to meet potential demands. Unfortunately, this acknowledgment comes nearly six months after "outsiders" began to agitate for increased production; and the congestion of orders then foretold has become a fact.

For the whole of 1940 the rate of steel production averaged slightly over 80 per cent of capacity but in the fourth quarter it was more than 90 per cent. In each of the first six weeks of this year an average of more than 96 per cent was maintained while in the seventh there was a fall to 94.6, partly attributed to strikes, but also resulting from the withdrawal of some furnaces for repairs. Probably the average will be quickly restored but it is doubtful if much better than 96 per cent can be maintained over a long period.

Yet with the steel industry working almost at capacity it is unable to keep pace with demand. Consumers are placing orders for delivery in the third and even in the fourth quarter and, according to the Iron Age, some inquiries show an astonishing gain over normal takings. In such cases, it is said, steel companies are insisting that the amounts be scaled down and it may be that some users of steel are inflating inventories in order not to be caught short of material if priorities are enforced later. Nevertheless, the tremendous stimulus given to industries of all kinds by the increased purchasing power which the defense program has released has clearly swollen legitimate demands for steel. The railroads, the utilities, the construction industry, and the automobile industry are now consuming steel in far greater quantities than a year ago and so are a host of lesser industries. At the same time defense needs continue to grow while British orders, which have slackened a little, are expected to expand rapidly once the Lease-Lend bill has passed.

In short, there is every sign that the steel industry is already tottering under the strain of the defense program. Yet its leaders, slowly awakening to the situation, have only begun to tinker with the problem of expansion. We have the right to ask them for less complacency and more foresight.

In the Wind

WHEN GREEK TROOPS took Koritza, it was widely reported in the American press that captured Fascist soldiers sang Bandiera Rossa, the Italian revolutionary anthem. That story did not make the British press for some weeks after. A labor paper picked it up from the American Socialist Call. Left, a magazine to which members of many liberal and radical groups in Britain contribute, commented: "If the report is true, this is one of the biggest events the war has yet produced."

SUBURBIA. A Negro state senator from Chicago has introduced a bill in the Illinois legislature to prohibit racial discrimination in the renting and selling of property. It is being fought by Chicago realtors and suburbanites as an infringement of the Bill of Rights. . . . In Chatham, New Jersey, a fight over the high rate of garbage removal is being waged. A citizen who stands for high garbage-removal rates wrote to the Chatham Press: "Let's keep our costs to live high enough so that people from Jersey City cannot afford to live here."

SCANDINAVIAN ENTERTAINMENT: Norwegian moviegoers are so tired of Nazi propaganda films that they frequently break up the shows with hissing and hooting. To stop these demonstrations the Quisling authorities have issued orders for conduct in movie houses. Now forbidden are: "laughter, meaningless applause, stamping with the feet, whistling, coughing, and clearing the throat." . . . A show in a Copenhagen theater included a sketch about a visiting "mother-in-law from Tyrol Street," who was a nagging, domineering old lady. Toward the close of the act she has so unnerved the family that they wish to see "the aunt from England Street."

THE FORD Sunday Evening Hour recently closed with a hymn to the tune of Onward Christian Soldiers, which contained the words "Hail to the hero workers, hail to the noble workers."

A NEWARK newspaper listed a broadcast in which Mayor LaGuardia and Mrs. J. Borden Harriman took part as sponsored by the Committee to Defeat America by Aiding the Allies.

A YEAR AGO seventy-two men were killed in a mine disaster at Willow Grove, Ohio. An inquiry into the causes of the disaster was ordered by state officials. A report was made, but the United Mine Workers has not been able to obtain a copy. The Hanna Coal Company, operators of the mine in which the accident occurred, secured a restraining order from the court expressly forbidding the stenographers taking testimony to furnish the union with a copy.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

A Native at Large

BY JONATHAN DANIELS

The New Dispossessed

THE defense program, we hear it said, does not move fast enough. Maybe not. But some comparison of the rate of defense with the pace of social progress may be gained from the fact that defense has already dispossessed, in less than a year, more than half as many farmers as have been helped to the acquisition of land by the Bankhead-Jones Tenant Purchase program in three years of operation.

The crowding in cities where arms factories and camps for armies are growing is dramatic. But what defense means in the country is the emptying of whole areas, the uprooting of thousands of families, to make room for camp sites, for safety belts around TNT plants, for bombing and artillery ranges. Of course, the farmers are paid for the land. Sometimes they get fancy prices. But by no means all farmers are landowners. Indeed, a very large proportion of those displaced will be tenants, farm laborers, and "owners" whose equities in their properties are so small that they will not receive enough money from the sale to buy adequate farms elsewhere.

The situation is not restricted to any one area. At the army's new anti-aircraft training base near Hinesville, Georgia, between 1,200 and 1,500 families are being forced to find other homes. Their displacement is immediate and permanent. There is no employment boom in the area. They are turned out in a South where there are already more farm people than the land can support. Where will they find farms? At Camp Robinson, near Little Rock, Arkansas, the army is not buying but leasing the land, and even at generous leases the sums paid for the first years of occupancy have been insufficient to satisfy the owners of the many small farms of from three to twenty acres, who must now find new places to live.

Most of the families in the rich trucking country around Milan, Tennessee, who will be moved off the farms near the new shell-loading plant operated by Procter and Gamble, the soapmakers, are tenants. And tenants turned loose in the South today, when world markets are shut against cotton, are turned completely loose—and homeless. The farmers have been grumbling loudly in Des Moines County, Iowa, near Burlington, over prices paid, and fees, to real estate men, but there are a good many among them, tenants and laborers, who have little concern with the prices paid. About all they get is the disruption of their lives by the need for an empty area around a TNT plant. The safety that belt insures does not create security for them.

Moving from the land is a more complicated business than moving from a house. One farmer, affected by the TNT plant and the bag-loading plant in Will County, Illinois, is a dairyman in the Chicago milkshed. He has to stay in the area to keep his business. Corn land would not serve his set-up for farming. Other men, even with government checks for their farms in their pockets, are not finding it easy to locate good family-size farms in the Middle West. Some, of course, are lucky; one small farmer in Iowa turned his check into groceries and is making a small fortune selling to construction workers building the explosives plant. Others dump their equipment and stock on the market. And sometimes the displacement is progressive as men seeking farms push out those already on them and put them on the roads too.

Fortunately, the government is not unaware of the situation it is creating. The army in some cases was slow to use the facilities of existing government agencies equipped to help deal with the situation. Real-estate dealers got into the business before the army more wisely turned to the Soil Conservation Service which had trained appraisers for help in acquiring land. The Farm Security Administration—in some cases also tardily—has come into the picture to try to minimize the human havoc caused by the imperative necessities of defense. In a few areas construction work has made help seem for the time being unnecessary as displaced farmers, forgetting farming, have begun, at defense wages, to hammer and saw. In other places, however, such work merely serves to postpone the evil day of farmer landlessness.

Nobody yet seems to know the number of farm families defense will dispossess. But it has become apparent that a large proportion are members of the great army of the country poor. Already the Farm Security Administration is estimating that it will need to assist from 5,000 to 8,000 families in finding new locations on the American land. That does not seem many people in a country talking of armed forces in terms of billions of dollars and millions of men. It does not seem large as WPA and other agencies count the needy. But in the past three years (since July 1, 1937), the Farm Security Administration, working in terms of the farmer's American dream, has lent money to help only 12,000 tenants on the way to ownership. Measured by that gain, the present swift dispossession is dramatic and disturbing.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Thou Tellest Me, Comrade

I HAVE seldom objected to any of Ernest Hemingway's literary affections, purely literary, you understand me—that is the plane the discussion is being conducted on—but often I have felt I had a grievance and have done nothing about it except to have remorse and a bad feeling generally for my Ernesto, my camarado, and myself. Now however is one time that I must put in a few words, perhaps a dying few words if they reach me first with the little maquina, anyhow a few bold hot words, those that well up hot like stomach sickness in the throat of the matador de los toros as he pushes back the body of the bull and stands up satisfied.

This is it, my little camarero. This is it, see thee, and lie still till one has finished talking, of a politeness. Qué va.

When one writes a book about Spain, one puts away grandfather's saber and one just writes what one has in one's guts, supposing one has any or anything in them anyhow. Then the trouble begins. There are those Spaniards. They cannot talk like us. They cannot even talk like Big Two-Syllabled Nick, he of the river. They cannot say "Hi, Pedro," or even "Hi, Pete."

"Hi, Joao," or even "Hi, Joe."

"How do you feel, boy? Ready to fight? You look pretty good to me."

"Sure thing, Joe. Christ, I never felt better; I'll kill him."

No, that is how they cannot say, because they are Spaniards and Spaniards are not Americans and some would say they are not even ordinary people as you and I would think of ordinary people, because they are made of iron inside mixed up with their flesh and it is not straight iron or even a No. 2 iron but twisted by the fires that have burned in them for so long. So, you understand, little rabbit, you must make a queer language for them. You must make a language that they have never spoken, that they would not even recognize if it was translated straight back to them. It must be queer. It must be strong. It must be much horse.

So then.

So then you must make them talk broken English. Qué va. Remember the Count de Ha Ha in the old Chaplin funnies? Well, they have to talk as queer as he looked, so you can be sure they are foreign, so you will understand it is Spain and Spanish men and women and the Spanish language. When they know you well or when they are the simple, straight workers and peasants, the good folks, the Spaniards say Thou and Thee. In Spanish it sounds straight and simple, and usually when they are polite they say Your Honor which is Usted. But when they do say Thou and Thee, it doesn't sound so unprintably queer as it does in English so that a man cannot breathe for the pronouns splashing in his face and perhaps knocking his teeth out. It is a kind of Spanish. It is a bloody awful kind of unspeakable Spanish. But it sounds strange and kind of noble and better than the monosyllabic fishermen in Florida and the unsatisfactory wives in Kenya and the moronic unprintables in other stories. Better than them, sangre de cabrón. Maybe poetic and sagalike. Qué va. Qué va in the beer of thy brother.

So that is decided. We got to turn the whole unspeakable Spanish colloquial speech into a far more unspeakable American language. We got to write pidgin Spanish and pidgin American so the customers will understand every minute it is Spanish. We got to write "You have to stand it. Hay que aguantarse," even when your throat swells so you can't get both clichés over at once, and the same simplicity doubled and redoubled. We got to say "Thank thee very much," as if we were Quakers, or maybe kids in Sunday school acting the life of Joshua. We got to call an ordinary officer first a lieutenant-colonel, as we will all of us maybe be calling him soon enough, and then because the right music is playing and the right fists are clenched we got to call him the teniente-coronel, as if he were a steam yacht off Cuba or a rare tropical butterfly. Or even a precious little dream rabbit, as Wodehouse, the obscenity son of an unnameable Inglés, writes in his books.

But one thing I will say. There isn't much time. They are coming, dost thou hear, friend? They are getting nearer, the ineffables of indescribables. There is maybe time to say this, rabbit. Only this, before the earth moves and the whole damn thing gets too much for us. Come on. It is already page 499.

Thank God, my little cabbage, that this war was in Spain only, in the simple land of the good tough people, and was not a world war like nowadays. Or else we would have to have a hundred per cent foreign-language novel about international resistance to the fascist obscenities unprintables. Like this, he thought with the rabbit suddenly cold in his stomach. Like this, what thinkest thou. Like this, then, this this this.

"Bon soir, mon petit canard. Good evening, my little duck," said the caporal. He had cheekbones as wide as a bull's buttocks. "Wouldst thou that one might save oneself out of this obscenity ineffable, is it not?"

"Guten Abend, mein Köppli," said the new private. "Can They hear them making a big crash-make tonight, not true?"

The third one spat. "One jolly well has to grin and bear it, old top, don't you know, 'pon my word?" He was English, that one. The others smelt of death. He smelt of beer.

A shell swung past them and missed. Dope.

"Did They hear that, then?" said the new private. "Thunderweather, that was close, not true?"

The next one didn't miss.

Spike thought he would try to get back. Something he heard translated itself into "Vámonos, tovarischichi." It was time to be going. He picked up his cojones. But it was already too late, for he felt a short hard shock, and then came another stream of language, more difficult this time, and more far away, hung wee ti lo and then tê kivi teraré teraró, and after that the lovely horrible labyrinth and soon the short sharp shock again and at last finis but finis and fin and fine and fino and Ende and end by leaning heavy and heavier on the pine needles and the nuts.

GILBERT HIGHET

Ambassador Dodd's Diary

edited by Martha Dodd and William E. Dodd, Jr.
With an Introduction by Charles A. Beard

This private diary of a man who watched Europe go to war — and knew what he was watching — is a front-page story for Americans today, an off-the-record account of Dodd's five years in Germany. Dodd's reports to the State Department have never been published. This book is the story behind them. It gives an off-the-record account of the State Department and U. S. foreign policy. It reveals the workings of appeasement groups, both American and European. It is unreticent, factual, fascinating narrative, not by a career diplomat, but by a trained historian and a superb reporter.

464 pages, $3.50

"A fascinating and invaluable record of five years in our embassy in Berlin — crucial years in which he kept his eyes and ears open, and never once compromised on his essential ideas as an American and liberal." —Vincent Sheean

"This is one of the great revelations of our time, one of the few really great 'inside stories' of American history. No one has ever told the truth about an American embassy before; no one has ever before spoken up so bravely about leaders and misleaders of men. It should prove a bombshell today, a historical document of the first rank for the future."

—George Seldes

Republished in response to popular demand
Ewald Banse's
GERMANY PREPARES FOR WAR

"While the world has been distracted in the jungle of Hitler's Mein Kampf, the actual textbook of the German brain trust which built the German military machine apparently has been Germany Prepares for War." —N. Y. Herald Tribune. The amazing truth of this statement can be proven by reading this book. Two-thirds of it has already come true. And Americans will be interested in the chapter on themselves.

Price, $3.00

THE book on modern Africa NEGLEY FARSON'S BEHIND GOD'S BACK

"Writing even better and more to the point than he did in THE WAY OF A TRANSGRESSOR."

—N. Y. Times front page review by R. L. Duffus

"It is a far better book . . . It romps twice across the great Dark Continent, once in the South and again in the middle, but this is more than personal history; it is full of color, of stories . . . It is a rich, packed book — nothing I have read since Julian Huxley's 'African View' ten years ago, has given me clearer or more enchanted pictures of that strange land and its swarming peoples."

—Lewis Gannett, New York Herald Tribune

NINE PRINTINGS IN ENGLAND
TWO PRINTINGS BEFORE PUBLICATION HERE

Just out, $3.50

HARCOURT, BRACE AND COMPANY, 383 Madison Ave., New York

A Passage to India

TOWARD FREEDOM: THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF JAWAHARLAL NEHRU. John Day. $4.

JAWAHARLAL NEHRU is the inalienable son of Mother India. But he was educated in England and conditioned by the culture and history of the nation that holds Mother India in thrall. It is the impact of this double play of forces upon an intelligent, sensitive, and genuinely noble human being which makes his remarkable autobiography one of the most absorbing personal histories of modern times. But Nehru happens also to be one of those men, like Trotsky or Lenin, for whom political and social ideas and actions are the very substance of their private lives; his personal story is therefore an intimate history of the Indian national movement for the past twenty-five years. But I should not like to give the impression that his book is either impersonal or cold. On the contrary, he writes simply, with humor and deep feeling, of his immediate family life; and so strong is his identification with the masses of India that he writes in the same direct way of their activities, their hopes and failures, their demonstrations and persecutions; with the result that they become imperceptibly an extension of his own family. And since their interlocutor speaks our language those vast white-robed Eastern multitudes, whose reality has been hidden by the mists of imperial condescension and Occidental ignorance, are for once human, differentiated; Lahore becomes as palpable as Detroit.

"Toward Freedom" touches upon every issue of Indian life and politics. Nehru has spent most of his adult life in British Indian jails; he has experienced the lath blows of the British police and the legal persecutions of British Indian courts. He has seen the deliberate stirring up of communal feeling for imperial purposes. Yet for all his personal and often painful involvement in the sorrows and trials of his people the total effect of his book is one of serenity and objectivity. His passion is crystallized in irony, not dissolved in malice; and he describes the mentality of the Indian Civil Service, for instance, with the scrupulous care and understanding of a good novelist.

His characterizations of individuals are marked by the same meticulous and penetrating analysis. And the most interesting is that of Gandhi, of whom he provides the best portrait and the shrewdest estimate I have seen. Nehru the Western socialist is unsparing in his criticism of Gandhi the Eastern mystic who resists the advance of science and thinks that landlords must merely be induced to undergo a "change of heart" toward the peasants they exploit; but Nehru's almost filial affection and admiration for the man who has done so much to awaken the political consciousness and to bolster, by means of the strict discipline of Satyagraha, the stamina and self-respect of India's millions, preclude any trace of bitterness. By observing the play of opposition here revealed between the old leader and the new, the reader also gains a thorough understanding of the Indian National Congress and of its gradually changing character and aims. It began as an upper-middle-class organization; today it draws its main membership and strength from the rural masses. Its present slogan is independence but Nehru himself, though he thinks that must be the first step, is not infected with what he calls the "disease of nationalism." "If we claim independence today," he writes, "it is with no desire for isolation. On the contrary, we are perfectly willing to surrender part of that independence, in common with other countries, to a real international order."

At the moment Nehru is again in jail for taking part in individual disobedience as a protest against the British refusal to promise freedom to India in return for what would then be its voluntary help in defeating Nazi Germany. (This fact accounts for that slightly hollow sound in Churchill's eloquent appeals to democracy.) Yet Nehru, like Gandhi, stopped short of ordering a mass civil disobedience campaign which would make trouble for Britain at war with Germany. Why? "We had no desire," he says, "to encourage the Nazi rulers in any way; . . . we who had suffered as a subject people knew well what this would mean for others. We of all people could not tolerate their racial views and racial oppression. . . . Though England's ruling classes may have treated us badly and her imperialism may have crushed us we had no ill will for her people, who were bravely facing peril and extreme danger." He makes it clear, however, that though the Indian struggle for independence has been deferred, it will be resumed and pushed to a final conclusion.

That Nehru should "prefer" the frying pan of British imperialism to the fire of totalitarian domination is understandable (especially to those who have never rotted in Indian jails); the distinction he makes again and again between England's people and England's imperial system seems overmagnanimous, coming from Nehru. But it has authentic roots in his own double background. He is the prisoner of England's imperial system; but the language in which he speaks for the freedom of India and the principles on which he bases his case are the language and principles of the other England, of Pater and the poets, of Milton and Burke. His hope is that the other England will gather the strength not only to defeat Nazism but to liquidate the imperialist system which holds the British people as well as Mother India in thrall.

MARGARET MARSHALL

Masterpiece

THE WORLD OF THE THIBAUTS. By Roger Martin du Gard. The Viking Press. Two Volumes. $6.

IT is one thing to call a book a masterpiece of irony or its author's masterpiece and quite another to call it a masterpiece. The qualifying phrase reduces the value of that fearful and magic word by at least one-half. A scrupulous reviewer is inclined to sterilize the word thus every time he uses it, but twice or thrice in a lifetime he meets a book about which he feels no hesitation. This is such a case: "The World of the Thibaults" is a masterpiece.

The eight parts of this work—the earliest and best of the many cyclic novels France has produced since the first World War—appeared in Paris from 1922 to 1940. In 1939 Stuart Gilbert gave an admirable rendering of the first six parts, and this, under the title of "The Thibaults," forms the first of the present volumes. The second, somewhat ambiguously called "Summer 1914," completes the novel by giving parts seven and eight in the same translator's faithful version. For the first time one can read the whole work, which counts nearly 1,900 pages, in English.

In French the entire novel is simply called Les Thibault. But the English title is quite justified since, around old Oscar Thibault and his sons Jacques and Antoine, there move other characters and there exists a palpable world made up of objects and places that are as real to us as their analogues in our own lives. Often they are so real as to usurp a place in the reader's life: for whoever has been enthralled by the novel—and I doubt if anyone who has begun it has not been—certain squares and corners of Paris and Geneva belong now to Jacques or Antoine. This fact bears witness to the great impression of life that Martin du Gard has achieved, not so much in his physical descriptions, as in his creation of characters. Limiting himself to an extraordinarily small number of figures for a work of this extent, he returns constantly to the same ones, digging ever deeper beneath the surfaces, until we come to know them as well as we know our best friends. Jacques and Antoine occupy the center of the stage while beside and behind them, receiving a more or less direct light depending on their importance to those two protagonists, stand Jenny and Daniel and Rachel, Jerome de Fontanin and Meynestrel, and the others.

From the very first pages, which describe the Thibault and Fontanin families' impressions of the two boys' flight from home, the reader establishes direct contact with the characters. As their lives unfold, he sees them in a variety of situations and experiencing all types of emotions. Antoine's improvised operation on a little girl crushed in an accident and his passionate love affair with the exotic Rachel; Daniel's philanderings in the manner of his father and his encounter with one of his father's former mistresses; Jacques's sufferings in the reformatory and later his tender love for Jenny; Antoine's daring injection administered to shorten his father's death agony are passages in the first volume which show the author's technique for creating flesh-and-blood characters. It is the technique that life itself uses.

In the second volume the canvas broadens perceptibly and the Thibault microcosm reflects more faithfully the European macrocosm of 1914 and its headlong rush toward war. Jacques, by then a militant socialist, does his part in Geneva, Paris, and Brussels to warn of the impending catastrophe and to organize resistance to a passive acceptance of it. Before the summer of 1939 those chapters might have seemed to some readers too faithful a reproduction of the anguish felt only by the most alert in 1914; today they have an added poignancy and truth because we have all lived through such emotions. Actually, the approach of war, seen from the vantage point of the Second International and contrasted in its last stage with the successful outcome of Jacques's and Jenny's love, forms a stirring narrative. Here more than anywhere else one wishes that the American edition had preserved the chapter headings of the original, since the dates given there help in following the rapid succession of events.

Until his tragic and futile, yet wholly appropriate, death soon after the outbreak of hostilities, Jacques holds the reader's attention most insistently. In a sense the whole novel could have ended there, for its most obvious subject is the story of an adolescent who never grew up, who refused in-

Your home deserves a Custom-built Radio Installation

Everything you have wanted in a radio or radio-phonograph combination, can be yours with a Lafayette Custom-built Installation. In close collaboration with you and your decorator or architect, we will give you a truly individualized installation in complete harmony with any decorative scheme, and meeting all requirements of performance. The moderate cost of a Lafayette Custom-built Installation will be a pleasant surprise.

We invite your inquiry.

Lafayette Radio

100 SIXTH AVENUE • NEW YORK, N. Y.

311 W. JACKSON BLVD., CHICAGO • 714 PEACHTREE ST., ATLANTA
110 FEDERAL ST., BOSTON • 24 CENTRAL AVE., NEWARK
642 E. FORDHAM RD., BRONX • 90-08 166th ST., JAMAICA, L. I.

NIETZSCHE

By CRANE BRINTON

A brilliantly written account of the life and work of The Prophet of Nazism. The analysis of Nietzsche's philosophy avoids abstract terminology and fine-spun distinctions, and considers Nietzsche as an element in the intellectual history of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. A most important work for everyone interested in the forces behind the current scene.

276 pages. $2.50

HARVARD UNIVERSITY PRESS

Cambridge, Massachusetts

FREE TO YOU....

THIS 116 page special number of Survey Graphic, fourth in the smash-hit CALLING AMERICA series, explores the most searching questions confronting the people of the Western Hemisphere today. Half a year has gone into recruiting statesmen, educators, business men, discoverers, military experts, scholars and others to give us clues to the answers. Text, graphs, photographs, maps and drawings throw further light on such questions as—

How can the New World defend itself? What contrary leadership beats on it from Berlin, Tokyo and Rome? How can labor, business and the rest of us share in shaping developments? Is there room for refugees from wartorn Europe? What can we do to break down language barriers? What surprises are in store in the Amazon Valley, the St. Lawrence and the Caribbean? How can the people of the whole Western Hemisphere cooperate for their common welfare?

The contributors include A. A. Berle, Jr.—Major General Frank R. McCoy—Hubert Herring—Nelson A. Rockefeller—Juan T. Trippe—Lewis Hanke—Samuel Guy Inman—Carleton Beals—Moises Saenz—Ernesto Galarza—Charles W. Taussig—Duncan Aikman—John I. B. McCulloch—Ana Rosa S. de M. Guerrero—John G. Winant.

In 1939, our first CALLING AMERICA number edited by Raymond Gram Swing carried through THREE EDITIONS its message to strengthen democracy at home. Survey Graphic, America's magazine of social interpretation without counterpart in the world, is not generally available on newsstands.

SEND $1 for six months of Survey Graphic (regularly $3 a year), and we will add your free copy of the March special. Mail the coupon below today.

SURVEY GRAPHIC • 112 East 19 Street • New York N-41

I enclose $1. Send me a free copy of THE AMERICAS and the next six issues of Survey Graphic (seven issues in all).

Name _____

Address _____

City _____ State _____

deed to grow up. A youth marked by "an innate revulsion from injustice" finds himself at fourteen in a world full of injustice. Quite naturally he revolts, first by fleeing home and school, a second time by fleeing his recent past and a brilliant future career, and finally by spurning the whole wartorn world and dying for an ideal. The Epilogue, however, is essential not only to round out the world of the Thibaults, but also to provide a very human and very real apotheosis of Jacques. For by 1918, when his and Jenny's son is four years old and Antoine, fatally gassed, is slowly dying in a hospital, Jacques's spirit has communicated itself to all the other principal characters. Not only Jenny, who now idolizes his memory, but also Antoine and Daniel and even the diplomat Rumelles have seen the futility of the war and come to share the ideas with which Jacques shocked them in 1914. Antoine's diary, at the end of the whole novel, shows him resembling his brother more and more as he approaches death; in him a maturer Jacques dies a second time. More acutely than ever the reader recognizes that these characters, with whom he has lived in close communion, remain faithful to themselves through all the changes brought by time, accidents, disease, and world catastrophe.

While the action of the novel covers the period from about 1905 to the end of 1918, it also reflects very strongly the last twenty years during which Martin du Gard composed it. As a result it brings out by implication more clearly than any other novel the close affinity between what we called until lately the pre-war and the post-war. Chronicling an era that died during the first World War, the author constantly has a thought for death—despite the general robustness and health of his work. Part six deals with the father's agony, part seven ends with Jacques's death, and part eight with Antoine's. Even making allowances for the technical utility and brilliance of some of the death scenes, one must admit that this is a pessimistic novel written by an idealist who nevertheless sees life as it is and deliberately remains objective. Upon receiving the Nobel Prize in 1937—one of the very few times that he has consented to speak of himself publicly—Roger Martin du Gard defined himself as "an independent writer who has escaped the fascination of partisan ideologies, an investigator as objective as is humanly possible, as well as a novelist striving to express the tragic quality of human lives." That quality is here in abundance. Yet the disappearance of Jacques and Antoine is also symbolic. And as he wrote the last lines of his novel the author already knew that he was witnessing the death of another epoch. But he has wisely left these implications for the reader to make.

Though he is anything but reactionary in politics and his general view of life, Roger Martin du Gard remains a conservative in his literary method and habits of mind. His patient system of documentation that filled his house at Bellême with reference cards for his great work; his love of the exact sciences that caused him to give medicine such an important role; and his general distrust of religion and metaphysics came to him doubtless during his early studies as a paleographer and archaeologist. But they also belong to the nineteenth century. In addition to his faithful and whole reproduction of life, this is another reason why one is so often led to compare him with the giants of the immediate past—Flaubert, Zola, and Tolstoi.

JUSTIN O'BRIEN

IN BRIEF

REFLECTIONS IN A GOLDEN EYE.

By Carson McCullers. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.

A remarkable novelette by the young woman who wrote "The Heart Is a Lonely Hunter." An army post in the South forms the setting for a story that echoes D. H. Lawrence's "Sun" and "The Prussian Officer" and yet retains a haunting originality in its probing into the hearts of a half-dozen thwarted, soul-stunted men and women.

HOLD AUTUMN IN YOUR HAND.

By George Sessions Perry. Viking Press. $2.

A "Growth of the Soil" in a Texas setting, this invigorating novel tells how Sam Tucker wrestled with sixty-eight acres of black bottom-land to make a crop of corn and cotton, and how he made out all right in spite of rains and undernourishment and the machinations of a pesky neighbor with the soul of a varmint. Sam and his family are mighty likable folks, with no education but with plenty of gumption and good sense, and you'll be happy to leave them at the end of the long southern autumn with plenty of canned vegetables on hand to protect them against pellagra for the winter.

EAST BY DAY. By Blair Niles. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.50.

This novel resurrects a little-known historical episode of the 1840's: the strange case of the slave schooner Amistad, whose human cargo rebelled and thus became the vortex of an international legal scramble. The interest of the book lies not so much in its conventional characters as in the untangling of the moral and legal issues of the case before the Supreme Court, and in the author's picture of the experimental colony of Liberia, where part of the action takes place.

JOURNEY TO THE WORLD'S END.

By Hakon Mielche. Doubleday Doran. $2.50.

Apparently the author of this volume is a professional traveler who goes to strange places for the purpose of writing about them. Here, however, his resemblance to the late Richard Halliburton stops short. He is realistic, genially tough-minded, and as entertaining a companion as one could wish. The particular world's end referred to is Tierra del Fuego, and the climax of the journey is a voyage around the Horn in a remodeled lifeboat. Readers of Darwin's "Voyage of a Naturalist" will remember the latter's account of some of the country visited by Mielche and be interested to see what has happened to it in a little more than one hundred years. Most of the primitive people Darwin saw are dead of pneumonia or tuberculosis traceable to new ways of life introduced by the missionaries. Thousands of sheep now grow thick wool where nothing lived before and there are quite a few sheep-raising millionaires. The most southerly town in the world is also one of the world's most dismal and most depraved. All in all a very superior book of its kind.

RECORDS

IN Stravinsky's Violin Concerto there was no "lyrical substructure of concepts" to provide Balanchine with genuine "motor impulses" for the choreography of "Balustrade" (the phrases are those I quoted a while ago from Lincoln Kirstein's discussion of the relation of Balanchine's work to music). For Stravinsky's piece is nothing more than ink on paper; and the motor impulses that worked out into Balanchine's choreography were those of Balanchine's own emotions, which in turn could be inferred from the richness of his idiom, the complexity of his forms—from the rich lyricism of his first movement, the occasionally excessive intricacy of his second and fourth, the powerful concentration of the third. For this third-movement pas de trois Tchelitchev's costumes were perfect; but most of the others were, I thought, a lot of nonsense to cover up essential pointlessness—and nonsense that contributed, I think, to what happened at the second and third performances. In the audiences were people who had read John Martin's dismissal of "Balustrade" as something not to be taken seriously, who had come prepared to find what they saw funny, and who saw things like Petroff in black with a huge pink ribbon tied in a bow on his chest; and at certain intricate details—done, it is true, with disturbing awkwardness by dancers substituted for the original principals who had become ill—these people laughed.

In contrast to Stravinsky's horrid piece there was, the first evening, the wonderful music of Chabrier that had, not surprisingly, led Balanchine to create "Cotillon," one of the loveliest and most fascinating of all ballets. Among other

De Basil productions Lichine's "Graduation Ball" was delightful; Fokine's "Sylphides" was superbly done; his "Carnaval" was good with Riabouchinska and Lazowsky in the cast; and though his "Petrouchka" was handicapped by the wretched performance of the music, enough of the astounding originality and undiminished power of the choreography was evident to make one wonder that the same mind should have produced the rubbish of "Paganini," which Mr. Martin took seriously.

Columbia gives us two fine piano sonatas of Mozart—K. 332, with its exquisite first movement, and K. 576, with Mozart's most developed, most complex writing for the keyboard—played by Casadesu in the fluent, polished, anaemic style in which French pianists think it proper to play Mozart (Set 433, $3.50). The sound of the piano is well recorded; but there is an occasional indistinctness in high notes, and with a light pickup there is an occasional rattle. And Mozart's superb String Quartet K. 458 ("Hunting") is recorded not, as one would wish, by the Budapest Quartet, but by the Roth (Set 438, $3.50). The performance is sensitive, but is recorded with a lacerating sharpness of sound.

Columbia's best recording so far of Stokowski and his Youth Orchestra is to be heard on their disc (11481-D, $1) of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance." That is, it gives us the normal sound of an orchestra, though not the splendors of his Victor recordings with the Philadelphia Orchestra. The orchestral version of the piece is Stokowski's own, and includes the inevitable lily-gilding touches; the performance is quite unaffected. And one of Columbia's better recording-jobs with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony under Barbirolli—if one excepts the nasal cello tone—was done with the performance of Rimsky-Korsakov's "Capriccio Espagnol" (Set X-185, $2.50); but the performance itself does not make the music exciting. Beethoven's Twelve Contra-Dances, published by Music Press, are a minor Beethoven product, adequately performed by the Columbia Broadcasting Symphony under Barlow, and well recorded (Set X-184, $2.50).

Also published by Music Press are the American Psalms and Fuguing Tunes of the American composer of the Revolutionary period, William Billings, which are well recorded for Columbia by the Madrigalists (Set 434, $2.75). They have individuality and spirit; "Judea" (17250-D) has charm; and

Coming in early issues of THE Nation

FILM FACTS and FOIBLES

Turn to page 249 of this issue for the second regular dispatch from The Nation's new correspondent in Hollywood

ANTHONY BOWER

Hollywood is the capital of unreality, the heart of our most fabulous industry. It deals in glamor girls and gangsters; it practices its own peculiar and often ludicrous brands of censorship. But it furnishes the entertainment of a nation and it is one of the few remaining "lots" on earth still free of direct political control.

Having gathered to itself every important European director, writer, and actor in the field, Hollywood has become more than ever the film center of the world.

Mr. Bower, who was formerly film critic of the New Statesman and Nation in England where he lived for several years, will send a fortnightly letter on the latest developments—amusing or serious, æsthetic, political or social—in Hollywood. He will cover the latest films and uncover the newest foibles in our most fabulous industry.

Read The News
From Hollywood
FORTNIGHTLY IN
THE Nation

Pétain - Laval - Weygand

The only American correspondent to obtain interviews with Marshal Pétain and General Weygand, JAY ALLEN will write three articles for The Nation, revealing the inside story of intrigue and counter-intrigue that link Paris, Vichy, and French North Africa.

Inside the State Department

Who are the men who administer our foreign policy? Who speak for the United States in foreign lands? What are their social and political backgrounds—and their business connections? These questions and others will be answered in a series of three articles by FRED KIRCHWEY, editor of The Nation, who will probe the most important, most secretive of all our government bureaus.

A New World of Literature

Four critical essays on the literary men and movements of Latin America are planned for early publication in The Nation. The series, intended to acquaint the people of the United States with the rich and varied culture of the world to the south of them, will include: Spanish-American Fiction, by LUIS ALBERTO SANCHEZ, brilliant Peruvian critic now exiled in Chile; Spanish-American Poetry, by ALFONSO REYES, Mexican poet, diplomat, and eminent man of letters in Latin America; Work of the Younger Writers, by EDUARDO MALLEA of La Nación, Argentina's most important newspaper; and a commentary by WALDO FRANK, whose knowledge of this field has earned the respect and admiration of all South America.

FILL OUT AND MAIL THIS CONVENIENT ORDER FORM TODAY

THE NATION, 55 5th AVE., N. Y.

Please enter my Nation subscription for the term checked below for which I inclose $.....

☐ 1 YEAR $5 ☐ 2 YEARS $8
☐ 3 YEARS $11

INTRODUCTORY OFFER
For New Subscribers Only

☐ 13 WEEKS $1

NAME

STREET

CITY

STATE

Canadian and Foreign postage—$1 a year extra.

8-1-40

"When Jesus Wept" (same disc) is quite moving. In the volume of South American Chamber Music (Set 437, $4.50) I find only the few pieces and songs by Fernandez and Uribe-Holguin mildly interesting or enjoyable. They are well performed by Olga Averino, soprano, Alfredo St. Malo, violinist, Fritz Magg, 'cellist, and Nicolas Slonimsky, pianist; and the recording is good except for an occasional rattle on a high-fidelity machine with a light pick-up. Victor Chenkin is a delightful artist in his own way; but without his gestures and facial expressions his recorded recital (Set 435, $3.50) will interest and amuse only those who understand Hebrew and Yiddish. "Der Rebbe Elimelech" (17260-D) wavers badly in pitch. Robert Russell Bennett's "Hexapoda" (Five Studies in Jitteroptera), recorded by Louis Kaufman, violinist, and the composer at the piano, are a mildly diverting parodistic use of jazz idioms (70727-D, $1). B. H. HAGGIN

FILMS

Hollywood, February 19

THE white-collar workers in all branches of industry, curbed possibly by a certain gentility and by a fear of the word union, have not been conspicuously quick or efficient at organization, and in the motion-picture industry, where there is the added fear of racketeering in local unions, have only recently begun to organize on an industry-wide basis. Their working conditions are considerably more insecure than in any comparable industry and apparently they have been induced by two factors to put up with them quite patiently: first, the standard of wages in Los Angeles is, in general, very low and therefore workers gravitate to the studios where pay, if not high, is at least above the local average; secondly, there is a glamor value attached to working in a business which may be considered artistic. A studio office worker is today employed on an hourly basis, works six days a week, has no seniority rights, no job security, and is, in fact, subject to dismissal without notice. True, some employers arrange for a week's notice or perhaps two weeks pay in lieu of it, but not long ago a stenographer was dismissed for no reason and at twenty minutes' notice from a major studio where she had been employed for sixteen years.

Until 1939 each studio had its office workers' guild organized on a company basis. These office guilds were powerless; their bargaining committees, consisting of employees, were by their very nature helpless, and the workers were entirely dependent on the degree of generosity their employers deemed politic. Naturally some studios were more forthcoming than others, and as time went on employees realized that they must attempt to organize on a wider basis and create some bargaining leverage to obtain more uniformly satisfactory conditions. For instance, the employees at Twentieth Century-Fox receive high minimum wages, and have good vacation and sick-leave arrangements and a fixed scale of salary increases, while at Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer they are allowed only one week's vacation a year, five days' sick leave, and have no guarantee of a salary increase.

Twentieth Century-Fox, Paramount, and Warner Brothers were astute enough to treat their employees with generosity, a policy which, as it now turns out, has stood them in very good stead. General dissatisfaction in the other studios and the fear of being taken over by the A. F. of L., where the office workers' problems were consigned to oblivion, brought the Screen Office Employees Guild into existence in December, 1939. It had a stormy career at first, but by now it represents all the studios with three notable omissions—those cited as the most generous to their employees.

The natural result of this defection is to cripple the effectiveness of S. O. E. G. The guild at the end of last year settled its classifications and wage scale; its contract is prepared; and it has been certified by the National Labor Relations Board to bargain for its members; it is, in fact, an organization as complete as any of the other independent guilds (the Writers', Publicists', etc.) which are empowered to bargain as a unit with producers. However, owing to the gap in S. O. E. G.'s ranks, the producers are able to stall in opening negotiations. The guild is determined to deal with the producers as a body and not with each studio separately, but so far it has not obtained the producers' consent.

Of course, it is understandable why employees of the three major studios mentioned have seen fit to stand aloof. They are frightened of losing privileges which might outweigh the security offered by the guild, and moreover pro-guild employees in these studios who have been too outspoken are likely to find themselves doing the more unpleasant jobs and not being promoted as fast as they might be. It is probably hard to realize, in this period of defense prosperity, that to join the S. O. E. G. would be a wise insurance for the future, and that to facilitate the negotiation of a uniform industry-wide agreement—the aim of S. O. E. G.—would be to improve the status and security of all the office workers.

Having been hounded over the continent of Europe, refugees who finally find sanctuary in this country may be partially immune to the yapping and snarling at their ankles which is beginning in Hollywood. But to the observer, the crescendo of attacks on aliens in the industry has a slightly sinister sound. True, the majority of people in the film world are both tolerant and even actively generous to alien fugitives from the Nazis, but there is a vociferous minority, consisting largely of superannuated actors, certain columnists, and others, ready to cash in on the present patriotic atmosphere by venting their spleen and accusing the industry of un-Americanism for allowing these unfortunates to make a living. Mr. Hearst's threat of a newspaper campaign along these lines, as a reprisal if "Citizen Kane" is released in its present form, is an ominous portent of things to come.

As a matter of cold fact, the aliens employed here account for less than one per cent of the total payroll of the studios, and most of these have already taken out their first papers. There are, of course, quite a number of aliens in prominent positions, but few will deny that they have made contributions to an industry which supposedly has something to do with art and should therefore know no frontiers. Moreover, the more fortunate of the aliens are making considerable sacrifices of money and time to help jobless refugees, saving the country or the state the necessity of looking after them.

The European Film Fund, which has as its president Ernst Lubitsch, was founded two years ago and now looks after some 250 people—artists, actors, directors, who cannot find employment and probably never will. The funds for this purpose are raised among Europeans who are employed and who donate a fixed percentage of their salaries. The society tactfully gives its support in the form of loans, and tries hard as well to find jobs for its dependents, jobs which as far as possible will not interfere with the employment of citizens. An attempt is made to create new jobs and if a dependent of the society has an idea in the least degree original and practical it is financed. However, jobs and practical ideas are hard to come by. Only the most talented among the refugees are likely to act or direct again; and they must find new ways of making a living, in many cases as domestic servants. This is an adjustment terribly hard to accomplish, and it is to be hoped that their unpleasant lot will not be made any more difficult by the rising tide of nationalist feeling.

Warner Brothers made a charming attempt to anesthetize the press at what was described as a local-color preview of "The Strawberry Blonde." The entertainment included a buffet supper on a sound stage decorated to represent a beer garden of the nineties, and music-hall turns of or representing the same decade. The audience, which included many distinguished stars, sang period songs. The film was likewise quaint—for the first few minutes; but when it is mentioned that the dentist's chair and a solitary-confinement cell provide the biggest laughs it will be seen that the humor is a little macabre. James Cagney and Olivia de Havilland are both delightful, thanks to no one but themselves.

M-G-M has remade "The Trial of Mary Dugan" with Laraine Day and Robert Young. At least half the picture is spent in whitewashing Mary Dugan, which makes the character not very colorful and the story nonsensical. Later we find ourselves in the familiar courtroom and things are a bit brighter, but since the story has almost acquired folklore status by this time, it is not easy to get excited over that thrilling denouement.

ANTHONY BOWER

ART

Out of the French Revolution

IN connection with its brilliant exhibition of French paintings, prints, and drawings of the nineteenth century, the Metropolitan Museum is holding a charming show of the fashions of the epoch; and amusingly enough an unchanging feature of the fashion-prints recurs to the mind of the spectator as he moves among the works of fine art. The unchanging feature of the fashion-plates happens to be that badge of liberty and characteristic element of nineteenth-century masculine attire—the pair of trousers! Pantaloon, the attire of those "free Frenchmen," the ancient Gauls, were donned by the French revolutionaries as the token of a society which in principle at least granted its members the right of action in accordance with their own will. Their sons also relegated knee-breeches to courtiers and lackeys; continued to wear pants as the badge of liberty and individualism.

What calls them to mind among the marvelous paintings by Ingres, Delacroix, Degas, Manet, Seurat, Toulouse-Lautrec, and others on the museum walls is the circumstance that in all their comparative magnificence these nineteenth-century works (and indeed the body of art from which they were drawn) also represent the spirit of individualism—but not merely emblematically.

The output of each of the galaxy that produced this art not only has its particular, unmistakable character. That hallmark of the individualist, consciousness of an unconfoundable self and of a special destiny to fulfill, greets us from all of it: indeed, one of the exhibits, Gros's portrait of "the man of destiny," Napoleon at Arcola, might serve as the banner of the show, so succinctly does it project the type and common consciousness of the painters. Simultaneously, action in the field of art in accordance with the will of the artist and for his proper ends also reveals itself. It is not necessary that we be told the author of these boldly experimental canvases permitted no church, no state, not even a school to prescribe their techniques and subjects; that the schools hurled curses after them all, Ingres included, in the form of allegations that they "didn't know how to draw"; that many of them painted totally without reference to patrons or public and paid for their independence in the coin of poverty and starvation. The epoch-making developments of technique, the immensely widened range of subjects and of paths, the new spiritual perspectives and horizons in these unique, accomplished paintings constitute a cloud of witnesses to freedom of action.

The arts exhibit as a whole furthermore represents individualism by giving an idea of the spiritual increase possible to and characteristic of the superior individual, and a sign of his means to the creation of a milieu favoring the survival of his sort. This is to say that in the real sense, these painters "wore the pants." This spiritual enlargement—which takes shape as the individual's steadily growing consciousness of a self not only opposed but related to and homogeneous with other beings and things, indeed with universal life—is freshly brought to mind by evidences of the century-long progress of two discoveries among these post-Revolutionary artists. One of their discoveries was the fact of the organic life of the pictorial medium: they became aware not only of the inward revelation of line and color, but of that element in them which makes the artist desire to draw and paint. We perceive the onset of this awareness through the breath-like line of Ingres, the deep glow of Delacroix's tragic color; its climax in Manet's electric sense of the sufficiency of sheer paint and brush-stroke; its culmination in Cézanne's absolute painting. The parallel discovery was that of the ubiquity of the whole of life. Weak at the start—the subjects of many of the earlier paintings are drawn from remote times and spots, or from historical events—this awareness became powerful in Courbet. Feeling the omnipresent breath of earth, he symbolized it with everyday subjects. In Van Gogh and Cézanne it became an intuition of cosmic ecstasy and architecture through the most commonplace objects. Only the stupid Gauguin had to run to Tahiti for his symbols. The sign of the individual's method of social adjustment—itsself the result of this growing consciousness—in the meantime is given by the very paintings. That method is active representation of the feeling of the life and interrelation of all things. Essentially these works are charts to a free society.

Thus, again we come face to face with the force of the French Revolution: one of the kinds of men it set free; and the aim it had in liberating them. From the purely æsthetic standpoint the show of post-Revolutionary art may be defective: too popular; withheld by its overnumerous Gauguins, Millets, Vuillards, and other minor paintings from the high level where its jewel-like examples of the art of Géricault, Ingres, Delacroix, Manet, Degas, Lautrec offer to set it. Still our thanks go to the double exhibition: it is no small boon, at the moment when the cry is loud against the Revolution's miscarriages, and colossal attempts are afoot to overturn its heritage, to be shown the pit from which so many of us were dug, the spirit of the sires, and some of the possibilities for beauty borne within him by the free-man.

PAUL ROSENFELD

Next Week in The Nation

Edgar Ansel Mowrer

reviews

"Ambassador Dodd's Diary"

Letters to the Editors

The British Communists

Dear Sirs: Harold Laski does not mention the following considerations in his attack on the British Communists in The Nation of February 15. Presumably he forgot them:

1. At the People's Convention, the immediate cause of his tirade, it was stressed that should Hitler win, the people to suffer most would be those attending the convention and their kind. This scarcely suggests a desire to help Hitler to victory.

2. The recent British Cabinet changes have brought two more Men of Munich into the Cabinet. Margesson, now Secretary of War, was the Chamberlain whip which never failed to crack over the head of any member of Parliament who showed the slightest desire to criticize his leader. It is impossible, I believe, to find Margesson on record against the Nazis. Margesson was not brought in because of his qualifications. He has held no administrative post. Ernest Brown, now made Minister of Health, was for many years Chamberlain's Secretary of Labor. Never once did he protest against the policy of appeasement. Ernest Brown was appointed after Laski wrote his article. But Margesson was already appointed and Laski has not protested.

3. That national unity, which Laski says the Communists are attacking, is daily destroyed by the Conservatives and their government. The failure to provide adequate shelters (some have been built with street gutters running through them—see the New Statesman and Nation); the refusal to recognize the need for a nationally subsidized plan of evacuation which will provide decent accommodation for the evacuees and to rescue the public education system, now utterly destroyed; the tardiness with which assistance has been given to bombed-out people and with which decisions have been reached on such questions as paying rent for bombed homes; the refusal of the employers to sign an agreement offered by the Trades Union Council guaranteeing reasonable profits, but stipulating for reasonable wage increases to meet the rise in prices (in the case of some foods amounting to 250 per cent)—all these are day-to-day indications of the effective war the Tories are waging against their own people.

Yet for Laski the Communists alone stand out as disrupters of "national unity."

4. When Laski rests his prosecution of the Communists where do we find him? Openly and happily in the arms of the Conservatives! If this charge seems harsh, remember he is content to leave post-war problems with "the strong team, under Mr. Greenwood [which] has just been appointed by the War Cabinet, to lay down the general principles of post-war construction." Mr. Greenwood, who so far has been the shining failure of the present government, mediocre bunch that they are! Apart from its personnel, does Laski seriously contend that this committee is any more than political whitewash, destined for oblivion as soon as convenient? He is old enough to remember the fate of similar committees appointed by the British during the last war.

5. The British government has consistently refused to state its war or peace aims. To beat the Nazis is about all the light so far vouchsafed; no promises of internal reform, no promises concerning the colonies or India, no promises about the fate of Continental Europe, have been given. The sole indication of the mind of the government has been Prime Minister Churchill's appeal to the Italians to dispossess Mussolini. Are the British people being called upon to suffer their enormous sacrifices simply to change the fasces of Mussolini into the crown of Victor Emmanuel? Laski does not raise any of these points; is he then, by implication, willing that we in this country should also be victims of this swindle?

KENNETH J. LOWELL

Philadelphia, February 24

The Radical Tories

Dear Sirs: Criticism by The Nation, and liberal groups, of the appointment of Lord Halifax as Ambassador to the United States seems to me somewhat misleading, and injurious to Britain's fight against Hitlerism, because it fails to state all facts.

Of course, progressives in America would prefer an ambassador representative of the more progressive forces in England to one representative of the Tory group. But in order to give a complete picture of the situation you should point out that the Tories in England are not of the same type as Girdler, Willkie, or Ford.

The Tory group to which Lord Halifax belongs has for many years accepted the principle of full, adequate, compulsory social insurance, not merely for old age and unemployment, which we recently achieved in the United States, but for sickness as well. Neither in the federal government nor in the states has compulsory health insurance been actively pushed, so that the Tory group and Lord Halifax are somewhat to the left of the New Deal in this matter.

In Great Britain there is unified public ownership of the entire transportation system in Greater London. The law which established that was actually passed, in its final form, by a Parliament with a large Tory majority. So far as achievement is concerned, Lord Halifax and the British Tories are, in this matter, to the left of LaGuardia, who has yet to obtain unified public ownership of New York's traffic system.

Great Britain, with the support and consent of the Tory group, publicly controls and, in substantial part, publicly owns, a grid system for electric power and light. Though the New Deal Administration favors like action, it hasn't provided definite legislation for it. The Tory group thus is far left of the New Deal on the question of public ownership and control of electric power.

There is no law in England similar to the National Labor Relations Law, the chief reason being lack of need: the Tory group in England, with very few exceptions, has long accepted the principle of collective bargaining. It is thus advanced as the New Deal in this respect.

All branches of the armed services of Great Britain are open to Hindus and Negroes. One young Negro college student in this country, who was refused enlistment in the United States Army Air Corps, crossed over to Canada and was promptly accepted by the R.A.F. This matter is entirely in Roosevelt's power, since he is commander-in-chief of the armed forces. In its race-relations policy the Tory group which Lord Halifax represents is therefore far to the left of Roosevelt.

The Tory group today has an overwhelming majority in Parliament. It has not abolished by law labor's right to strike in war-time. Thus, Lord Halifax and the Tories are to the left of almost every political group in America having representation in Congress, except—so far—the New Dealers.

Lord Halifax and the Tory government have accepted freedom for Ireland in accordance with the wishes of the Irish people, without even insisting on retaining naval bases within Eire. In our dealings with the Philippines we have granted freedom to the islands but retained a naval base at Manila that has far less strategic justification than would a British demand for a naval base in Eire. Here, also, Lord Halifax and his Tory group are more completely and genuinely democratic than Congress, as expressed by its acts relating to the Philippines.

Failure to make all these facts clear, it seems to me, helps to retard the growth of public opinion in favor of all necessary aid to Great Britain.

ALFRED BAKER LEWIS

New York, February 21

Strikes in Defense

Dear Sirs: The Associated Press dispatch from Washington showing that strikes in the United States during the last six months of 1940 were fewer than during the same six months of 1939 and far less than during 1917, when we were actually at war, is a complete and sufficient answer to the outcry of reactionary labor baiters in Congress and elsewhere for legislation to outlaw strikes, chloroform the unions, and curb the immensely valuable work being done by the National Labor Relations Board.

There are, to be sure, danger spots of industrial conflict in such important defense industries as the Ford Motor Company and the Bethlehem Steel Corporation. But this danger exists solely because these concerns and others like them have stubbornly refused to accept the principle of collective bargaining with genuine labor unions.

If the principle of collective bargaining is accepted by the employer in good faith, and if the companies in defense industries do not insist on keeping all their considerable profits for themselves, but pass on some of them to their employees in increased wages, there is no danger that the organized workers of this country will interfere with our defense efforts. Alert and experienced trade-unionists are aware of the vast difference between the United States and Great Britain, where labor has important rights and is growing in influence, and the Hitler and Mussolini dictatorships, where the unions have been completely suppressed. They will therefore not interfere needlessly with the program for getting the armaments needed to defeat totalitarian tyranny.

Actually the defense program is far more endangered by the great reluctance of some defense industries, notably aluminum and steel manufacturing, to expand their facilities, than it is by strikes. These concerns have become so injured to a policy of restricted output to keep up prices that they cannot wholeheartedly rise to the occasion and expand their capital facilities now that expansion is needed. They fear there will be excess capacity when the war against Hitler and his Allies is over and that this excess capacity may be used to drive prices down and curtail their profits. Unfortunately, some important manufacturers in this country appear to dislike reduced profits far more than they dislike Hitlerism, and in consequence are justifiably earning the name of appeasers.

FRANK R. CROSSWAITH

Chairman, Negro Labor Committee
New York, February 16

Public Whipping

Dear Sirs: What influence has the enfranchisement of women had upon our democratic society? Students of this subject have a lesson worthy of study in Maryland, where the women are united in defense of that venerable symbol of man's inhumanity to man—the whipping post. The perennial bill to end public whipping met the same swift fate in the current Maryland legislature that has been its lot in preceding sessions, and it is said no Maryland politician dares support it for fear of reprisals by women voters. It is worth pointing out, incidentally, that under the law only wife-beaters are whipped, and possibly the broad social view of many women is obscured by personal feelings.

Proponents of whipping do not claim that it corrects or tends to rehabilitate the offender. Indeed, any punishment that humiliates him and destroys his self-respect could not embody such objectives. The advantage, it is contended, is that by persecuting and making an example of one offender, the publicity serves as a deterrent to other, potential offenders. If this line of reasoning were carried to its logical conclusion, we would be right back where we were when man began his ascent from the abysmal pit of the dark ages.

It is to be expected that in organizations composed of conservative and reactionary elements—the Junior League and the D. A. R., for example—the members should cherish the traditions and customs of a bygone era with nostalgic fervor. However, when the members of bridge clubs, sewing circles, civic clubs, and other social organizations—the good women who constitute the backbone of our society—unite in defense of a degrading institution, it is indeed discouraging.

FRANK T. HOWELL

Chattanooga, Tenn., February 20

CONTRIBUTORS

HANS HABE, a Hungarian journalist now in this country, was formerly foreign editor of the Viennese Morgen and foreign correspondent of the Prager Tageblatt. He is the author of two novels, and will shortly publish a book of his experiences abroad.

SAMUEL GUY INMAN, authority on Latin American affairs, served this past summer as leader of the South American Seminar of the Committee on Cultural Relations with Latin America.

ARTHUR GUITERMAN is the author of many popular volumes of light verse, including "The Laughing Muse," and "Ballads of Old New York."

CURT RIESS was a widely syndicated European sports correspondent and feature writer before the advent of Hitler. Since his arrival in this country he has contributed to Esquire, Collier's, the Saturday Evening Post, and other periodicals.

GILBERT HIGHET is professor of Greek and Latin at Columbia University.

JUSTIN O'BRIEN, assistant professor of French at Columbia University, is the author of "The Novel of Adolescence in France."

ANTHONY BOWER, formerly film critic for the New Statesman and Nation, will contribute a regular fortnightly column from Hollywood to The Nation.

PAUL ROSENFELD, author of "By Way of Art," is a well-known critic of literature and painting.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 55 Fifth Ave., New York. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 152

NEW YORK · SATURDAY · MARCH 8, 1941

NUMBER 10

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

253

EDITORIALS

Half Aid to Britain

256

The Balkan Squeeze

256

Why Tap Wires?

257

The Bill for the Coup by J. Alvarez del Vayo

258

ARTICLES

Division in the OPM by I. F. Stone

259

"Big Boss" Bevin by A. Hardy

260

The Decision Is Simple by Brooks Atkinson

262

From Cárdenas to Camacho by Harry Block

266

Bethlehem Bends by James A. Wechsler

269

In the Wind

270

A Native at Large by Jonathan Daniels

271

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Notes by the Way by Margaret Marshall

272

Education of a Democrat by Edgar Ansel Mowrer

272

The Court Then and Now by Thomas Reed Powell

273

Meditations of Rauschnig by Franz Hoellering

274

Mr. Russell on Empiricism by Eliseo Vivas

275

As Though to Breathe Were Life by Louis B. Salomon

276

In Brief

277

Drama: "The Talley Method"

by Joseph Wood Krutch

277

Records by B. H. Haggin

278

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

279

Editor and Publisher

FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor

ROBERT BENDINER

Washington Editor

I. F. STONE

Literary Editor

MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors

KEITH HUTCHISON

MAXWELL S. STEWART

Dramatic Critic

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager and Director of Circulation

HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager

MARY HOWARD ELLISON

The Shape of Things

WHEN SENATOR WHEELER HATES HE HATES thoroughly, destructively, and with just a touch of paranoia. The special target of the Senator's spleen is the President of the United States, and in recent weeks he has allowed his passions to carry him a bit beyond what is rational and more than a bit beyond what is decent. One of a tight little group of men who are ready to filibuster away Britain's desperate chance for survival, Wheeler brands his vast opposition "a little group of warmongers who want unity for our boys to be slaughtered to save Europe or democracy in China." His talk runs increasingly these days to "international bankers," whom he accuses of "coming over here and living on Long Island." They want us to go over there and fight for democracy, he tells his audience; "Why in the name of God didn't they stay there to fight?" He addresses a meeting from which a pro-British heckler is ejected to the cries of "British pig!" while professional anti-Semites denounce the Jews from the audience and Nazi Joe McWilliams passes out leaflets at the door. To those who charge him with these things, the Senator replies that when he cannot talk to any group he wishes, democracy will be dead. The Senator is certainly within his rights. He can say what he likes and say it to whom he likes. But let him not imagine he will escape responsibility. Those who once trusted Burton K. Wheeler as an honest liberal, whatever his differences with the Roosevelt Administration, will not soon forget the shameless demagoguery that marks his effort to defeat a measure clearly demanded by a majority in Congress and in the country.

★

MUSSOLINI'S EAST AFRICAN EMPIRE NOW IS crumbling rapidly under attacks from all sides. The invading armies are almost international for, in addition to troops from half a dozen sections of the British Empire—Indians, Sudanese, West African Haussas, and South African whites—there are Ethiopians battling to regain their homeland and a force of Free French including Senegalese regiments. Two drives now in progress are of outstanding importance. From the north one army is bearing down on Asmara and the adjacent port of Massawa while from the south another has forced its way up the coast of Italian Somaliland in a lightning campaign and seized Mogadiscio, the capital of that colony. This stroke seems to have demoralized the Italians, thousands of whom have surrendered, and little further resistance in this sector is expected. In the north, where the battlefield is tangled mountain country, progress has been slower and one British column has been checked for some weeks before the strong Italian position on the Cheren plateau. Now, however, reinforcements are working their way around the flanks of the defending army, which seems destined to be trapped in the near future. The capture of northern Eritrea in conjunction with that of Mogadiscio will force the Italians back into the interior of Ethiopia and the arms of Haile Selassie's warriors. The East African campaign may seem to have little direct bearing on the outcome of the war, but the fruits of British success are not to be despised. There must be around 250,000 Italian soldiers and colonists in East Africa. Their fate and the loss of an empire achieved at enormous cost will be a further and severe blow to Italian morale. Equally important is the removal of a threat to the British base in Egypt. Should Hitler attempt a grand flanking movement through Asia Minor, Wavell can meet him without anxiety about the position in the rear.

★

NORWEGIANS, HOLLANDERS, AND DANES ARE behaving quite inexplicably in the view of the Nazis. As racial cousins of the master nation they could certainly count on a reserved place at the table of the "New Order" if they would only submit themselves to Gleichschaltung and acknowledge the divine omnipotence of Adolf Hitler. But these peoples have long known freedom; and conquest and occupation, so far from making them blaspheme their inheritance, have steeled them to take increasing risks to regain it. Frequent rumors of trouble in Holland were confirmed last week by an official German spokesman who admitted that the Low Countries were "a fertile ground for agitators" because occupation by a foreign power whether "by God or Devil" must arouse resentment in some quarters. The Dutch have no doubt which of these forces the Nazis represent and have set out to make things as hot for them as possible. There have been strikes, riots, sabotage, and communication with the British. With singularly poor judgment, the Nazis have blamed disturbances on the Jews and have ordered the creation of a ghetto in Amsterdam. This seems an excellent way to increase good relations between the Dutch and the Jews and to encourage them to cooperate in further efforts to thwart the enemy. The Dutch are also likely to be cheered by the German admission that it is impossible to prevent British agents landing from parachutes or small boats. There seems indeed to be a steady improvement in underground communications between Britain and the occupied countries, with very helpful consequences for the R. A. F. In Norway there are many short-wave radio stations hidden in the mountains and the Germans are resorting to brutal punishment to prevent their use. But even the recent death sentence on ten Norwegians, alleged to have sent radio information to England, will not, we are sure, discourage this and other forms of resistance.

★

MEDIATION ACCORDING TO OUR IDEAS IS A disinterested attempt by a third party to bring two disputants together. The Japanese definition, however, is a direct translation from the Nazi political dictionary which gives the word the meaning of dictation in the interests of the dictator. This is illustrated by the "settlement" imposed in Tokyo on Indo-China and Thailand—an almost perfect imitation of the Vienna diktat which gave Transylvania to Hungary. The sequel to that astute piece of "mediation" was the occupation of Rumania by the Nazis and the complete domination of Hungary. There is every reason to suppose that the Japanese will follow this pattern exactly. They are already strongly entrenched in Indo-Chinese bases conveniently near Singapore. The same forces will now provide the necessary pressure on Thailand to induce that country to accept "protection" when Tokyo is ready to move against British Malaya. At one moment last week it appeared as if the French government might resist the Japanese ultimatum to accept its award in toto and immediately. Vichy delayed its answer and published a statement to the effect that "the terms of our armistice with Germany make the defense of our Empire obligatory on our part." Was this an undercover hint from Berlin that more cooperation was expected from Japan in the war against Britain and that if Tokyo hung back, France would be encouraged to resist its terms. We do not know if Germany obtained reassurances over the week-end but Vichy's stiffened backbone quickly relaxed. Reports from Saigon suggest that the surrender of the home government has aroused bitter resentment among the French troops and colonists. There are hints of revolt, but even if no revolt materializes, General de Gaulle seems in line for a lot of new recruits.

★

THE FIFTH ANNUAL REPORT OF THE LABOR Board demonstrates anew that the best way to prevent strikes is to make it unnecessary for labor to resort to this final weapon to win its rights. The report shows that, thanks to the support given to the board by the courts, workers are more and more resorting to its peaceful processes for settlement of labor disputes. There are now three times as many disputes brought before the board as there are strikes. The figures pertaining to strikes and board cases involving only the right to organize are even more sensational. During the fifth year of the board's existence, there were seven times as many organizational cases as organizational strikes. In 1936 board cases exceeded organizational strikes by 34 per cent; in the last fiscal year, by 700 per cent. The board takes pride not merely in preventing strife by enforcing labor's right to organize but also in reducing friction between capital and labor by bringing about written agreements, many of which provide for arbitration of disputes. Before the Supreme Court upheld the Wagner Act, there were almost no union contracts in the iron and steel industry. Today, the board's report points out, there are more than 500, covering three-fourths of the industry. In 1932, only 100 rubber workers were protected by contract; now the number exceeds 40,000. Last year Labor Board cases resulted in 880 agreements to bargain and 600 written contracts. As industry's acceptance of the Wagner Act widens, the number of strikes dwindles.

★

NOT IN CURTAILMENT OF LABOR'S BASIC rights, but in their enforcement, lies the road to industrial peace. Unfortunately, the proposal for compulsory mediation now put forward by William Knudsen, director of the OPM, takes the former course. We have no clue to Mr. Knudsen's extraordinary reversal, but his latest proposal runs directly counter to his own recommendations a week before to the House Judiciary Committee. Although the newspapers are trying as hard as they can to whip up public hysteria about a supposed wave of "defense strikes," the figures belie the headlines. Recent figures released by the Bureau of Labor Statistics, and given as little attention as possible by the press, show that there were only a third as many workers on strike last year as in the year before we entered the first World War and less than half as many as in each of the war years. Illness and industrial accidents caused 130 times as much time lost last year as strikes, which averaged but two hours per year per worker. In eleven basic defense industries, less than one-fourth of one per cent of working time was lost through strikes. In the machine-tool industry there was but one day of strike for each 1,800 man-days of production. On the positive side, labor can point with pride to such achievements as the current work on the training station at Corpus Christi, Texas, which will be completed six weeks ahead of time, and the completion of the first airplane defense contract at Vultee forty days ahead of time. These are facts that you will not be able to find in your local newspaper.

★

A SHORTAGE IN STRATEGIC METALS IS TODAY hampering the defense program far more than any of the widely heralded labor disputes. The most serious deficiency at the moment is in nickel where demand is running at least a third ahead of supply, despite the fact that the International Nickel Company of Canada is operating at full capacity. Exploration is being made of the possibility of substituting molybdenum for nickel in steel alloys used in the automobile industry, although molybdenum itself is listed by the Army and Navy Munitions Board as one of the materials which must be safeguarded in the event of a war emergency. Tin prices have risen substantially in recent weeks, as a result of concern over supplies should the United States get involved in difficulties in the Far East. Despite two large purchases of copper from Chile in recent weeks, it is estimated that there will be a shortage of 100,000 tons in the next two months unless further purchases are made. There have been temporary suspensions in defense production because of inadequate supplies of zinc. And airplane production has been materially hampered by shortages in aluminum and magnesium, the output of which is under the monopoly control of the Aluminum Company of America. In the case of all these strategic metals, the shortages seem to have found the business executives responsible for production completely napping. As recently as January 2 the Wall Street Journal carried a feature article which asserted that the supplies of the important steel alloys on hand "are ample for nearly a year ahead . . . and no serious bottleneck . . . should develop."

★

THE LONG AWAITED REPORT BY MR. GANO Dunn, which Keith Hutchison mentioned in his article on Steel Capacity last week, has now been published. It supports the contention of the steel industry that defense and civilian demands can be met during the next two years without great additional expansion in plant. Less pleasing to the steel magnates is its advocacy of an even spread of orders among the producers, if necessary, by compulsion. This is in line with Mr. Philip Murray's argument that capacity is being wasted owing to the concentration of orders among the large concerns. Mr. Dunn's findings deserve more analysis than we have space for at this time. We can only point out that his estimate of civilian demands in the current year are based on the supposition that national income will not exceed $80,000,000,000. This is below other authoritative estimates but of course events may justify Mr. Dunn, particularly if production, and hence national income, is restricted by the inability of civilian industry to obtain adequate supplies of steel and other key materials.

★

CORRECTION: The editorial on Communists and Unions which appeared in our last issue discussed the action taken by the executive council of the American Federation of Teachers. In subsequent references to the Federation the initials "A. F. of L." were used, through a typographical error, instead of "A. F. of T."—EDITORS THE NATION.

Half Aid to Britain

THE Senate's delay in passing the aid-to-Britain bill provides a dramatic but tragic illustration of the inability of our legislators to sense either the magnitude or the imminence of the threat to England and the United States from the coming Nazi offensive. It is almost as if there were some fatalistic force which has decreed that our action in this crisis, as in others, shall be too little and too late. The full force of the Nazi fury is destined to fall in not more than sixty days; every hour counts. There would not be time under the best of circumstances to send Britain anything like all the aid it needs, but every plane, gun, or destroyer that can be rushed to the other side will be vital to Britain's defense. And if Britain succeeds in beating off the initial attack, the struggle will have just begun. For it may be assumed that Germany will stake everything on obtaining a decision before the year's end.

Few Americans seem as yet to be aware of the amount of aid that must be given if Britain is to survive the year. Germany not only has an immense head start in military and economic preparations, but its armament production is still far and away above that of the British. With the addition of the resources of the conquered territories, Germany has achieved a capacity for steel production that is approximately double that of Britain. America's resources are infinitely greater than those of Germany and the rest of Europe combined, but our shipments to Great Britain, though well above the peacetime level, are infinitesimal when compared with Germany's advantage. And they have been declining in recent months. The peak in American exports to Britain was in August when they reached approximately $125,000,000. September recorded a decline to $103,000,000; in October they were $107,000,000; in November $102,000,000; and December was the worst month of all, with but $101,250,000. Even at the August rate, the volume of American deliveries to the British Empire was less than the economic gain which Germany is deriving, month by month, from the conquest of France. If the advantages gained from the occupation of Czechoslovakia, Poland, Norway, Holland, and Belgium are taken into account, it is clear that Hitler is drawing twice as much from the conquered territories as England and the Empire are obtaining from the United States.

The plain fact is that the United States must deliver, as Fritz Sternberg has pointed out in his "Fivefold Aid to Britain," some $1,000,000,000 worth of supplies to the Empire each month. This is from four to five times what we are now sending. And this is not a need to be fulfilled in 1942 or 1943 when the arms program gets fully under way. The need will be greatest during the next few months; after that we can perhaps afford to slacken up a bit. But we cannot possibly attain the $1,000,000,000 a month figure unless we are prepared to make drastic sacrifices in domestic consumption. Our preparations for defense so far have proceeded on the assumption that a country like America can have both guns and butter. Any contrary opinion is treated in some circles as a betrayal of liberalism. It is true that if our national income were raised to $100,000,000,000 a year, we could well afford to devote a quarter of it to national defense and aid to Britain and still have sufficient to meet all our normal consumer demands. Such a goal is within our reach, but it cannot be attained in 1941. And we cannot afford to wait. Barring inflation, the maximum national income likely for this year is $85,000,000,000. If we are to get $12,000,000,000 out of this for Britain and another $10,000,000,000 or $12,000,000,000 for our own defense, it is obvious that we shall have to sacrifice some of the luxury goods we otherwise would consume. Germany stopped the production of private motor cars the day that war started. England took similar action last fall. But the United States, supposedly in the midst of a gigantic effort to build up its defenses, turned out more cars in January and February than in the corresponding months of any of the past few years. The priorities established last week in the aluminum industry are expected to reduce materially the use of the metal in cooking utensils. This is the first and only sacrifice American consumers have been asked to make for defense. It is, of course, wholly incommensurate with what is required. It is time we realized that unless we are willing to deprive ourselves of luxuries now we may be forced to make infinitely greater sacrifices following a British defeat.

The Balkan Squeeze

THAT well-known pacifist, Adolf Hitler, has prevailed on Bulgaria to resist not evil and is now in a position to present his most persuasive arguments to another small nation. His bloodless conquest of the Bulgars was based on the equally bloodless—so far as Germans were concerned—victory over Rumania. That enabled him to range his divisions along the Danube and, while they waited for the ice to melt, to employ all the weapons of the war of nerves in softening Sofia's backbone. The whole operation was carried through with perfect efficiency and now the Nazis are established along its frontiers, ready to use Bulgaria as a vaulting-horse into Greece or Yugoslavia or both.

Probably the second of these countries is the next on the timetable and there are clear signs that its government is getting ready to sign on the dotted line. Adhesion to the Axis will not be popular in Yugoslavia, where sentiment is definitely anti-German, but the country is almost surrounded by Nazi contingents; it is economically dependent on the Reich; and its army, while well-trained, lacks modern weapons. An army revolt is just possible but the odds indicate acceptance by Yugoslavia of "protection" and the opening to Germany of the direct Vardar river route to Salonika.

This will mean the concentration of hostile forces along practically every yard of the Greek land frontier. Squeezed in this manner, will the Greeks decide that honor has been satisfied by their valorous defense against Italy and that discretion now necessitates acceptance of a peace made in Berlin? From the German point of view it is of the utmost importance to obtain the surrender of Greece without battle. However much confidence Hitler may have about the outcome of an invasion of Greece, the necessity of fighting would be contrary to his plans. He is sincerely anxious to keep the war out of the Balkans because he does not want his chief granary disturbed and because the opening of a second front might interfere with his campaign against Britain. It is therefore worth his while to exercise patience in the hope of pulling off another bloodless victory. Mussolini, on the other hand, is evidently egging him on to attack Greece, since this might enable Italy to regain some of the prestige it has sacrificed in Albania. Moreover, a peaceful settlement with Greece might necessitate terms which would interfere with Italian aspirations.

It will need all Hitler's diplomatic skill to persuade the Greeks to quit. They are a fighting people whose rugged self-confidence has been raised to a new pitch by their success against Italy. They have little to gain from surrender and almost everything to lose, especially as Germany is believed to have promised bits of their territory to Bulgaria and Yugoslavia. Their mountainous land favors defense and they can count on some British aid.

But can Britain spare sufficient forces and material to enable the Greeks to withstand a Nazi onslaught with any hope of success? The first care of the British must be the defense of their own island for if that falls everything goes. Their next most vital base is Suez, since while they could lose Greece and hold Egypt, the reverse is not true. Nevertheless they cannot afford to withdraw from their last toehold on the continent and we can be sure that Mr. Churchill will do his utmost to give the Greeks support. The question is whether that utmost will seem sufficient to the Athens government, which is reported to have shown some hesitation about accepting offers of land forces lest they prove only effective in attracting the Nazi lightning.

The unknown but probably decisive factor in the strategic equation is Turkey. As we write, reports from Istanbul state that the Turkish government is mobilizing and concentrating troops in Thrace and that the recent pact with Bulgaria is considered nullified in view of Sofia's submission to Germany. The British government is said to be well satisfied with the results of Mr. Eden's visit to Ankara. Did he obtain an undertaking that a German attack on either Greece or Turkey would be resisted as a threat to Turkey's security zone? One of the chief reasons for the cloudiness of Turkey's policy is the still greater cloudiness of the Soviet position. Now Stalin has cautiously tangled one leg over the fence and by rebuking Bulgaria has made a protest, even if a rather feeble one, against Hitler's aggression in an area of vital interest to Russia. If this is to be construed as a green light to Ankara, there are good prospects of a joint Anglo-Greek-Turkish defense of the Aegean region and the Straits that could provide a serious stumbling-block to Hitler's ambition.

Why Tap Wires?

MR. ROOSEVELT'S letter to Representative Eliot of Massachusetts on wire-tapping places the Administration squarely on record against the Hobbs bill, to which The Nation objected last week. "As an instrument for oppression of free citizens," the President wrote Congressman Eliot, himself an opponent of wire-tapping, "I can think of none worse than indiscriminate wire-tapping." Mr. Roosevelt none the less believes that wire-tapping is justified in cases of espionage, sabotage, and perhaps kidnaping, but would make it subject to the approval of the Attorney General and confine the power to the Department of Justice. But to say that wire-tapping is justified in cases of espionage, sabotage, and kidnaping is to beg the question.

The Administration has yet to explain why there is greater need to tap wires now than there was in the previous war when the Wilson administration specifically forbade wire-tapping in taking over telephone and telegraphs. Spies and saboteurs were as much a danger then as now. It was felt then that the dangers from official snooping into private lives, with all the possibilities of blackmail it opens up, dictated a provision against wire-tapping. It was felt, on the other hand, that the spies and saboteurs would not discuss their plans by telephone or telegraph anyway, and that the power to tap wires was more likely to become an instrument of petty tyranny than a means of protecting national security. Is the situation any different today?

The second question which Mr. Roosevelt's letter fails to answer is whether under existing circumstances the Department of Justice can be trusted with this power. Under his proposal no wire-tapping would be allowed without the permission of the Attorney General, and the Attorney General is certainly a man of liberal views and good intentions. But the whole incident of the Hobbs bill throws a good deal of doubt on whether the Attorney General really runs his department. The bill was written by Alexander Holtzoff, a special assistant attorney general who is legal adviser of the FBI. Mr.

Holtzoff said it was an official bill, approved by both the director of the FBI, J. Edgar Hoover, and by Mr. Jackson. Yet Hoover opposed the bill in its present form and Jackson is silent. If the department is so loosely organized that a bill of so important a character can emerge from it in so irresponsible a way, what hope is there of greater surveillance over routine orders permitting wire-tapping? Given the generally anti-labor and reactionary personnel of the FBI, have we any real guarantee that this power would not be used against labor and against persons of suspect views? One need not be very radical to be suspect to the FBI.

The truth is that the FBI is a stronghold of anti-New Deal elements which may yet play a sinister role in American history, that the Attorney General has no real control over it, that it runs true to the familiar rightist pattern of secret police agencies everywhere, that it has tapped wires despite the 1934 law forbidding the practice. No matter what Congress does, wire-tapping, like prostitution, is an evil which cannot be eradicated; but it should not be encouraged.

The Bill for the Coup

BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

IN HIS last speech Mussolini gave as one of the reasons for the delay in entering the war on Germany's side, Italy's contribution to the victory of Franco; the effort put forth by Italy in establishing in Spain a regime which today is cursed by 90 per cent of the Spanish people, had weakened considerably the military power of the Italians. On this point nobody will question Il Duce's sincerity. It is a fact abundantly proved in Albania and in Africa. But it was rather surprising to hear such a crude reference to Franco's obligations so short a time after the meeting on the Riviera. It sounded a little like an attempt at blackmail designed to overcome possible hesitations on the part of Spain to participate in an Axis drive on the Mediterranean.

A week later Stefani, the official Italian news agency, disclosed that Italy's claims on Spain for aid given the insurgents during the civil war amounted to 7,500,000,000 lire—about 379 million dollars at the present rate of exchange—though for some reason Mussolini has billed Franco for only 5,500,000,000 lire, to be paid in twenty-four annual instalments. Italy, according to the "balance sheet" issued by Stefani and published on the front page of the New York Times of February 28, sent Franco 763 planes, along with 1,414 motors, 1,672 tons of bombs, and 9,250,000 rounds of ammunition. For land forces Italy sent 1,930 cannon, 10,135 automatic guns, 240,747 small arms, 7,514,537 rounds of artillery ammunition, 324,900,000 rounds of small arms ammunition, and 7,668 motor vehicles.

In themselves these figures are the best and most authoritative corroboration of what most people already knew—that the war in Spain was not decided by Franco but by his Axis partners. The meaning of these figures can nevertheless be appreciated only when compared to the war material at the disposal of the Loyalists. In the decisive battle of Catalonia, at the end of the war, the Negrín government felt that it could escape defeat if it could be assured of 100,000 rifles, 3,000 machine guns, and 150 anti-tank guns—a trifle compared with the Italian figures. Negrín asked Daladier for these supplies only as a loan against war material that Loyalist Spain expected to receive within two months. But the French government, faithful to the policy of non-intervention, preferred to reserve the order. Sixteen months later Hitler took it, along with France itself.

The bill now presented by Mussolini to Franco will come as a shock to those people in this country who, during the Spanish war, discounted as red propaganda the allegations that German and Italian intervention was decisive in Spain. It may be that Hitler, instead of presenting his bill, prefers to have Franco pay it by opening Spain to the Nazi armies on their march against Gibraltar. But if Hitler did present his bill, it would not be much smaller than Il Duce's.

The facts concerning Italy's part in the Spanish civil war, now confirmed by Mussolini's bill, were long ago revealed in prolix documented statements by the Spanish Republican government. In the White Book submitted to the League of Nations as early as 1937 Italian participation in the war was described in full. Nevertheless, every question raised by Labor and Liberal members in the British House of Commons, from the moment of the publication of the White Book to the end of the war, invariably brought the reply: "His Majesty's Government lacks information."

Stefani now reveals that Italian submarines sank 72,800 tons of "hostile shipping"—it is designated as "hostile shipping" though Italy was not in a formal state of war with the Spanish Republic—and that "ninety-one Italian warships were engaged in Spanish war actions." At least for the historians of tomorrow, the Stefani communiqués furnish the information which Lord Plymouth and his Non-Intervention Committee found so much difficulty in obtaining—since every ship that was lost on its way to Spain was officially referred to by the committee as having been sunk by action of "unknown" submarines.

There is, by the way, one bit of information which Stefani withholds—the present whereabouts of those ninety-one Italian warships.

Freda Kirchwey, Editor of The Nation, has left for a month's vacation in Mexico and Central America. Her regular commentary will be resumed in the issue of April 5.

Division in the OPM

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, March 1

A CERTAIN fatuity does not seem to be the monopoly of the British Tories. "England," says the annual review number of Iron Age, "is suffering from the past sins of her Tory party. The watchword for too many years was high profits, no disrupting technological changes, and a beautiful belief that after-dinner speeches could overawe those Germans who were grinding out steel as fast as it would grind." The breastpockets of our own steel magnates are bursting with the most interesting statistical analyses showing that we will still have world steel predominance even should Germany defeat England and add British steel capacity to the factories under its control in Austria, Czechoslovakia, Belgium, France, and Luxembourg. This is comforting.

In past weeks, we have had similar assurances on aluminum, zinc, copper, nickel, and steel scrap, and we now have shortages in all of them. The echo of Mr. Stettinius's optimism on aluminum had hardly died away, before we found ourselves forced to cut civilian consumption on the Mellon metal by 75 per cent. It is true that if Hitler doesn't unleash a triple-barreled Axis attack upon the world within the next few weeks, and if we don't have to increase our defense appropriations, and if the national income isn't boosted too much by defense expenditures, and if we aren't drawn into war, and if it remains a long-distance naval war, and if no effort is made to land troops in China, Africa, or Europe, we will have plenty of steel. We need only make sure that Hitler pays as much deference to the wishes of the steel trust as we do.

New Dealers, searching for a rationalization, suspect deep Machiavellian purposes in the President's hearty acceptance of the Dunn report. They think that perhaps he is letting the steel crowd put itself on the spot. They visualize his saying, a year hence or eighteen months hence, "You people said we had plenty of steel. Now we have a shortage. You have shown your incapacity for leadership, your inability to subordinate your own vested interest in scarcity to your country's security." I hope it does not turn out that we have won an argument but lost a war.

If steel plants could be erected at the press of an executive's button, there would be no harm in accepting the Dunn report and forgetting about steel until we needed more of it. But it takes about eighteen months to construct a steel plant, and in about eighteen months we may find ourselves in the greatest war of all time.

Why not put up a few additional steel plants just in case we need them? It is true that if we build these plants, they may endanger the price of steel in peacetime. This is the catastrophe from which the industry and the dollar-a-year-men turn away with a shudder.

Steel is a symbol of the problem that recurs over and over again in the machinery of our defense organization, and the constant reshufflings have failed to meet the issue. NDAC was transformed into OPM. Over the OPM there is soon to be an OEM, an Office of Emergency Management, but so far these spelling bee changes have yet to subordinate U. S. Steel to U. S. A. Nowhere in these alphabetical labyrinths has there yet appeared a man with enough strength to make the magnates realize that this war was not staged for their benefit.

It was hoped that when the President gave Sidney Hillman co-equal powers with Knudsen, Hillman would use them to bring labor's voice to bear on the problems of production. The hope is still unfulfilled. The corridors of the OPM and the dinner tables of the New Dealers are full of complaint that Hillman is too timid to assume these responsibilities, and his own explanations are feeble. His division still doesn't get to see contracts. The real power in the OPM machine is John D. Biggers, the Toledo glass-manufacturer, and the clique of Wall Street lawyers who penetrate every cranny of the defense setup as idealistic young lawyers from Harvard, Yale, and Columbia Law Schools once penetrated the New Deal. Biggers is head of the production division under Knudsen and Hillman, but there are more strings in his hands than in theirs.

Hillman's comfort in recent days was Knudsen's testimony before the House Judiciary Committee that no new legislation was needed to deal with much-exaggerated strikes in defense industries. He felt that Knudsen's maintenance of a united front with Hillman on this question justified the belief that the best policy toward the new powers given him by the President was to use them as sparingly as possible. Hillman was determined "to be a good boy." His reward is a public visit to the woodshed, for Knudsen, without consulting Hillman, has sent a letter to the Judiciary Committee suggesting a three-point program of legislation to curb strikes.

Knudsen is an able man and an honorable man but in spirit he's still a Du Pont hired man, and as long as he is at the top of the defense machinery it will never operate contrary to the wishes of big business.

This was demonstrated again in the meeting held here yesterday—the long-awaited meeting—on the Reuther plan. Everyone who took part was pledged to secrecy—the less publicity about the Reuther plan the better the automobile industry likes it. It took seven months before Reuther finally got a chance to sit down and tell his story to Knudsen, and though another meeting is scheduled for two weeks hence and the young United Automobile Workers leader is determined to keep hammering away, Knudsen will continue to stall as long as he can. Seven months have passed since Reuther first spoke to Hillman and Knudsen about his idea, the very simple idea that idle automobile equipment could be used for quantity production of plane parts. If Knudsen meant business, he would have ordered an independent investigation months ago. If Hillman had the drive, he would have forced Knudsen to act months ago. There has been no investigation because the automobile industry is afraid to let the public see just how much of its machine-tool capacity and of its production capacity is now idle and could be turned to defense purposes.

If there were a real sense of the crisis that may soon be upon us, the President would be freer to act than he is. An American aviation chief, with power to draw as he liked on steel, machine tools, aircraft, automotives, and aluminum, and a readiness to tread on toes, would have the planes rolling off the assembly lines before you could say excess profits tax. What we have is an ex-publisher from Chicago, until recently employed by, and trained under, that well-known anti-fascist, William Randolph Hearst. His qualification for the job of head man of OPM's plane-production division is that he is an amateur pilot. A labor leader who ought to know better assured me "off the record" that they had to have a man like M. C. Meigs because he "knew the aircraft people" and "we had to have someone who was persona grata with them." The idea seems to be that the aircraft people would not accept defense contracts, the fattest that have ever come their way, except from someone to whom they had been formally introduced. So we find ourselves back at fatuity.

"Big Boss" Bevin

BY A. HARDY

London, February 13

ERNEST BEVIN, a trade union leader who devoted himself almost exclusively to industrial affairs, has been picked up by the political situation in Britain and has fired the imagination of the country. Although Bevin was the man responsible for the coup that ousted George Lansbury from the leadership of the Labor Party, he has never sought the political limelight for himself. He has emerged as a figure of world importance not because he is an agile politician, but because he is an intelligent and courageous leader. It was politics that sought out Ernest Bevin.

When France fell last spring, it was to Bevin that Churchill turned to secure the strongest Minister of Labor England has ever known. Bevin sought the views of his colleagues in the trade unions, and made arrangements, after accepting the Ministry, to address a special conference of the trade union executives affiliated to the Trades Union Congress on how to win the war. For he believes that organized labor must be fully consulted on all matters affecting industrial changes. A small section of the old ruling class is much more concerned about this than it dares confess in public as yet. It knows his power and ability, but would prefer as Minister of Labor someone a little more tractable. Perhaps someone with a little more "Parliamentary polish," who would play the game more in accordance with the traditional rules. Any bias that Bevin has shown has been toward the workers, and his criticism of the Tories is fearless.

In a recent speech Sir Neville Henderson, British Ambassador in Berlin at the outbreak of war, maintained that Britain and Germany would have to get together at the end of the war and form a bloc that would rule all Europe. Bevin publicly rebuked him, suggesting that in view of the part Sir Neville played in bringing the nation to its present state, "he should have the decency to keep his mouth shut." Nor was Lord Stamp any too pleased when he was told to learn to run his railways before he started trying to run the country.

Sometimes the resentment of the aristocracy, the landowners, and the Tories shows itself plainly. Lord Winterton, criticizing the government, and particularly Bevin, in the House of Commons during the recent manpower debates, exclaimed that some of them were getting a little tired of hearing Bevin talk about his approach as a trade unionist to similar problems; and hoary Parliamentary traditionalists look down their noses when Bevin answers a question by saying "I have decided" rather than "It has been decided," which usage prefers.

Bevin would no doubt be more popular with the Tories and the employers if he would use his compulsory powers against the workers. But the Minister has his own views. It therefore seems surprising, on the face of it, that he should be criticized by even a small section of what are generally called the "progressive" M. P.'s. The leader of the Opposition in the House of Commons is Mr. Emanuel Shinwell, M. P. for Seaham Harbor, who scored a great victory for Labor over Ramsay Macdonald after Macdonald had left the Labor Party. Shinwell, a master of invective and debate, is extremely critical of Bevin because he will not introduce general industrial conscription. Clement Davies is lined up with Shinwell on this issue, and Lord Winterton, anti-fascist Tory landowner, has added his voice.

The Select Committee on National Expenditures, composed of thirty-two back-bench M. P.'s drawn equally from the three political parties and appointed by the House, has power to examine any books, papers, contracts, and persons, or any evidence relating to government expenditure on national defense. Their most recent observations, issued in December, 1940, are that Mr. Bevin is not using the powers vested in him to order any man or woman to undertake any work at any time, and that while they understand it is preferable to transfer workers with agreement and consent, "undue delicacy" should be thrown to the winds and the authority of the Minister "fearlessly used." But Bevin feels that Britain is waging a war for democracy and against dictatorship. He cannot agree to totalitarian methods. And if any political theory is advanced to prove him out of date, he disconcertingly points to the results achieved and says, in effect, "Theory or no theory, that's the way it works."

The Minister of Labor is already laying the foundation of a different system of society. The primary consideration in every change is that trade unions shall be allowed the same representation as employers' organizations. He has gone to the unions to get members for the new civil service he is building up at the Ministry so that, instead of a panel of bureaucrats, industry may have, on its legislative side, people with practical knowledge.

Under the Bevin regime, it has become obligatory for all employers at factories with more than 250 workers, to provide canteens at which a hot meal can be obtained. Dockers, too, who formerly worked on a casual basis, and whose practice was to line up at the docks and wait without pay for ships to berth, are to have canteens provided by the port authorities; but more valuable than that is the new arrangement which gives them a regular weekly wage with five and a half eight-hour shifts a week.

It was Bevin, too, who gave agricultural workers the best break they have had for years. Their wages have been lifted to a regular weekly rate of 48 shillings, an increase in most cases of 6 shillings a week. Thanks also to Bevin, the black-coated office worker has now been drawn into the State Unemployment Insurance Scheme if his wage comes under £420 a year. Formerly he was excluded if his wage was more than £250 a year.

An impetus has been given to collective bargaining and the recognition of trade unions by the institution of the National Arbitration Order. This was introduced as the result of negotiations between the British Employers' Confederation and the T. U. C. under Bevin's chairmanship. The order prohibits strikes and lockouts during the period of its operation, and it is likely to be extended to the end of the war. Even without it, it is doubtful whether any large-scale strikes or lockouts would be undertaken at the present time, for there would be no support for either from public opinion. There have been minor disputes over local grievances, involving, at the most, a couple of hundred men, but these have been settled in the course of a day or so. Broadly speaking, the fact that an employer can now be hauled up before a national tribunal established by the Minister, but operated independently, has strengthened the unions' claims.

Ernest Bevin

One of the finest achievements of the Ministry has been to sift the unemployed, and secure their willing service in jobs which, in the majority of cases, involve moving to different parts of the country. Panels were established at every employment exchange, charged with the task of interviewing every unemployed man on or off the register, to determine from their industrial backgrounds the possibility of training them for some occupations other than those for which they had qualified. The results were amazing. Unemployed distributive workers were found to have had engineering experience; unemployed miners had formerly been shipyard workers; and many thousands were found to have intimate knowledge of some form of mechanical work, which training could adapt for use in the production of munitions.

Today, with less than three-quarters of a million unemployed, there is no longer a vast reservoir from which to draw manpower for munitions. And more than half of the unemployed are women. With husbands or homes and children to care for, they are not available for work except in the district in which they live; and hardship and discontent would be created if it was attempted, by compulsion, to transfer them to other areas to live in lodgings. Among the men registered are many totally incapable of any but casual or light jobs. Every man capable of receiving training has accepted it, with few exceptions. Most of the "hard core" have now taken on a new lease of life at fifty, fifty-five, or sixty years of age, and mean to justify the confidence which has been placed in their capability to accept new training. The "worthless scrap" are rehabilitating themselves with the assistance of the government.

One of the early major problems which Bevin had to tackle was the loss of time from air raids. It was the practice to take shelter on hearing the air-raid warning. As some warning periods lasted two or three hours during the day, and at times more than twelve hours during the night, the number of man-hours lost was enormous. The adoption of the present system of going to shelter only when danger is imminent was made possible largely because of machinery for consultation which Bevin established. On his recommendation each factory speedily worked out its own plans for protection.

A few weeks ago another of Bevin's achievements was announced. It is the abolition of the "household means test," a formal inquisition applied to the household of every man who had been unemployed for twenty-six weeks or more. When assessing the need of an unemployed man, any of the family income, whether it was paid to the unemployed householder or not, was taken into account. An unemployed adult who lived with parents or relatives had to disclose the amount of their earnings, and if the combined household income was over a certain limit, no relief was allowed. A father was made dependent on his son or daughter, a son on the father. For the household means test the "personal" means test, to which neither the trade unions nor the Labor Party has any objection, has been substituted.

The problem which Bevin now faces is to get more manpower into the newly-constructed factories which are expected to be on full production by the end of May. His reservoir of unemployed men and women is gone. He cannot go to the agricultural projects and rob the land of labor for munitions production. The Limitation of Supplies Order, which cuts down production for the home market, will afford him some measure of surplus labor. Of this he can make full use. But it will be insufficient. Machine tools will be adjusted to carry full capacity, and skilled labor will be allocated to factories where it can be utilized to the utmost. A plan of working hours, scientifically calculated to reach a maximum of fifty-six, is the aim for every worker, although by shift and Sunday working, the factory will be going at full capacity for twenty-four hours a day, seven days a week. Where factory owners do not fall into line with that plan, or where their production is not at full capacity, and shortage of raw materials cannot be given as an explanation, their factories will be taken over and run by the government, as many in fact already have been.

From this war, Bevin is confident, will come not only victory for Britain and democracy, but a new economic order based on social security for the workers. Nor will this be confined to Britain. Bevin, you see, has never forgotten his wider scheme of international control of the resources of the world, with a United States of Europe cooperating freely with the United States of America in a parliament of free men.

The Decision Is Simple

BY BROOKS ATKINSON

TO BE confused is to be weak. To be weak is to be lost. Yet many people profess to be confused by the shrieking world that is erupting all around them. "I don't know what to believe," they say, or "I can't make head or tail of anything." Perhaps some of the confusion derives from an unwillingness to face the stark facts, and their appalling consequences to us as well as to other nations in the world. But no one except a vain or superficial man would imagine that his mind is perfectly clear about peace, war, and the other great issues of the day. For the simple fact is that no one is master of a world that has plunged out of control, least of all the neurotic despot who symbolizes for most of us the grim and gruesome drive for world conquest. No one now can control the evil that has broken out of the charnel houses and is spreading across Europe and Asia and leaping across the oceans to our hemisphere.

But it seems to me that the confusion is superficial, a matter of policy—rather than fundamental, a matter of morals. It derives chiefly from politics, which is subtle and mischievous, and economics, which is intricate and open to dispute. Neither politics nor economics is an integral part of the world of God and nature in which we move and have our being. We must not be guided by them. Politics is a game of wits played on or just under the surface, dealing in half truths and deliberate misrepresentations and maneuvering for advantages. It is a game of barter and deception. Strictly speaking, there are no honest politicians. Our happiness, our lives, are largely affected by politics, particularly by political blunders like the long series of evasions and intrigues that concluded with the declarations of war in September of 1939. But the cynical, beady-eyed world of politics is not the one you and I inhabit in our relations with our neighbors and friends. The political world is not a complete expression of human nature.

Nor is the economic world a complete one. It is not a part of human life. It is the technique of the production and distribution of wealth, and the busy, smoky, clattering little area it occupies is hedged around with property. It does not represent anything fundamental in human nature. If we were condemned to live all our lives in the economic world we should have to get on without drama, music, literature, and dancing, without love and friends, without birds and trees, without the grandeur of the sea. The freedom of spirit, which is the vital part of human creation, has finer-spun spheres of influence to occupy than the economic world. Although the ordeal of the world now is at least in part a clash of opposing economies, that is not the reason our hearts stand still when we read the news from Britain, China, and the Near East. Politics and economics clutter our minds a good deal more than we wish they did, but they do not come out of our souls and they are only casually related to the fullness of life we have an instinct for living.

A TIME FOR SIMPLE DECISIONS

When evidence appears to be confusing it is wise to make simple decisions that represent the integrity of our characters. Wise decisions harmonize with the fundamental truths of human nature. Now, the basic questions that people are asking themselves today are moral ones. In the last analysis, we are concerned with what is right and wrong. I am not talking of personal morals, which involve matters of taste, local custom, and religious creed; I am referring to social morals. They are the standards of behavior that men, living together in social groups, have evolved out of their consciousness and unconsciousness as the working truths of mankind. Social morals have an ancient lineage that goes back further than the laws of Moses. Social morals derive from the belief that men have unlimited capacities for growth out of barbarism into consciousness, out of the appetites of animalism into nobility. By certain fundamental agreements, involving justice, mercy, freedom of thought and expression, social groups nurture and cultivate the growth of mankind. The moral nation is the one that guarantees the freedom of the people, safeguards the health of the population, educates and cherishes the children, fosters art, spreads knowledge, endeavors to promote honest dealings between individuals and groups, lives as a good neighbor with other nations, tries constantly to widen and deepen its understanding with faith in the destiny of mankind.

In the superficial worlds of politics and economics nearly all the current questions can be argued. We can easily confuse each other over a great many plausible questions—whether economic necessity forces Japan to dominate the East, whether Germany has an ethnographic right to draw boundaries according to racial strength in adjoining countries, whether it would be shrewd for the United States to give all possible aid to Great Britain now, or whether it would be smart to walk softly and appease Hitler's temper. These questions and questions like these can be argued until everyone loses his convictions.

But the moral test is not open to argument. Even in a headlong world we can find a solid place on which to stand if we ask ourselves what is right and wrong in human conduct; and I think the basic factors in the current world situation are beyond questioning. To put everything in the simplest moral terms—it was wrong for Japan to grab Manchukuo in 1931 and to spread like a scourge through China, contemptuously bombing civilians in the cities that have resisted; wrong for Italy to ravage Ethiopia, wrong for Germany and Italy to conspire against the legitimate government of Spain, wrong for Germany to roll tyrannically with a clatter of guns and rifles into Austria, Czechoslovakia, Poland, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Holland, Belgium, Rumania, Bulgaria; wrong for Russia to engulf the small Baltic states and to crush the national independence of the Finns. These things are wrong, not because they violate international law, but because they have struck at the spirit of man, which is the creative force of the world. They have stained civilization red by the inhumanity of their motives and methods.

It will be noticed that the sequence of evil has constantly increased in horror and contempt: that the Japanese defended the larceny of Manchukuo as law-enforcement against bandits in 1931, but that Germany did not feel required to defend her treacherous conquests of Denmark, Norway, Holland, and Belgium in 1940. For evil feeds on evil and the cunning hand acquires skill in murder. The course of events from 1931 to 1940 points the way that the coming years will follow if thieves, murderers, and despots are not curbed. These things are wrong: there are blunt words for them with moral overtones—pillage, rapine, slaughter, treason, savagery. The blood has spattered around the world; the air aches from suffering; the patient earth is scorched and blistered and has meekly opened to receive her dead. This is the moral indictment.

Granted that these are perversions of the moral code of social living, what is the next step? Many people feel especially confused here. The politics and the strategy can be argued interminably. Some people feel that we, as Americans, can wriggle out of moral responsibility by politely averting our eyes from the ashes of the homes where innocent people have been living blameless lives, and by stopping our ears against the roar of battle. But in the sphere of morals a man does not bargain with thugs and murderers for his personal safety. (Incidentally, it does him no good.) For the man of moral integrity lives day by day according to a code of honor without regard for his personal advantage. He stands for what is honorable and tries to promote honorable actions; he opposes with his full strength actions that are dishonorable. When his brothers are viciously assaulted, driven from home and herded in bleak barracks, robbed, starved, tortured, and killed, he does not consider the consequences of what he says and does. Whatever violates the code by which he lives with his fellows is his business and he dedicates himself to correcting it. For the moral code is not a system of etiquette for polite social usage. It composes the fundamental truths of humanity and justice, wrung out of the painful experience of mankind since civilization began, and founded on the faith that men can flourish on love and enlightenment.

THE DOUBTERS AT HOME

All this comes painfully close to home. We are confused internally as well as externally. But the moral attitude toward the fundamentals of living also applies at home. If the democratic way of life were not a moral concept of human relations it would not be worth preserving. If freedom were not creative, and the vital source of the present and future, it would not be worth the staggering price we must pay to retain and strengthen it. To look on democracy simply as a form of government is to underestimate the fulness of the life it nourishes. It does not merely preserve our liberties; it enriches our spirit. It is part of the moral wisdom of the ages—men living together with mutual respect in the tradition of a common destiny. Far from being one stage in the development of civilization or a lucky set of laws, it is a fundamental idea, and it cannot be regarded as moribund or inefficient because it has not yet been achieved.

I am surprised now and then to see people shaking their heads ruefully over matters of principle that should make them hold their heads high. For a century and a half we have been establishing in this country a working democracy without the curb or impediment of a ruling class. We were lucky in the beginning. Class distinctions and feudal ideas had not had time to become embedded in our soil. If the slate was not entirely clean when the Constitution was written, it was cleaner of privilege than any other slate of that time, and wiping it clean in 1787 was a fairly painless process. In a century and a half there has never been a time when any considerable body of the country looked back longingly at the old ways of Europe.

Although we have never achieved full democracy we have progressed steadily in that direction with a robustness that at times has seemed comic to sophisticated worldlings. The tone has often been grandiloquent, for the free American loves to sound off. But the progress has been astonishing. See how the wealth of the country has been developed. See how widely education has been spread. Contrast the confident tone of labor today with the meekness of factory workers a century ago. Contrast working conditions today with those that existed early in your own lifetime. I remember the early morning whistle and the servility of factory workers in my home town when I was a boy. The progress toward the "dignity of man," as it is somewhat fatuously described today, has been swift and far-reaching and is still running in the progressive direction.

Everyone ought to feel encouraged by something that is right from the moral point of view and that also happens to work. Everyone ought to be proud. But I occasionally encounter the faint-hearted. After all these decades some people have missed the main point. Some weeks ago a financier said to me, half in reverie, I hope: "Perhaps democracy has fulfilled its function. Other forms of government have collapsed in the past, and there is no reason to believe that democracy is any exception. Perhaps we are too prejudiced to see what fascism has to offer in an industrial civilization." Well, it is discouraging to encounter that much obtuseness at this late hour in the day. If democracy has fulfilled its function, the financier is through. But why should we take the low view? Why not take the high view, which is this: If democracy has outlived its usefulness, Christ was the most calamitous of false prophets, Lincoln was an eloquent nit-wit, and we have been tragically misguided as a nation. If democracy has outlived its usefulness, slavery is the highest state to which man can aspire.

Most of us understand that the ordeal of the world today is not only a war but a revolution. The violence that explodes and blazes in strange places is not the wilful invention of one fiend in military dress but an agonizing readjustment in the lives of nations. The same readjustment, incidentally, has been going on here amid considerable screaming. But let us not helplessly regard violence as the way civilized nations normally put their house in order. The violence of the past nine years in Asia and Europe has not emanated from any nation that has been founded on the democratic tradition of seeking and obeying the accumulated common sense of a well-informed populace. Violence is barbaric; it represents either a collapse or a lack of mind and moral integrity. In spite of the fact that violence wears a look of injured righteousness, it is purely and desperately destructive. It is not a philosophy of community living, but a brutally real force in the current world, and an attitude of benign laissez-faire cannot stand up against it. To meet it we must strengthen ourselves with more of the muscle and fiber that already have given us the widely-recognized strength of today. What the idealists of the eighteenth century created out of faith in man's infinite capacities must be more abundantly fulfilled. Our system of government needs profound and radical development in the direction of total democracy.

In a general way, what we have now is political and religious democracy—wonders a century ago but commonplace rights of the individual man in the United States of today. People speak freely in public and in the press. People assemble openly to discuss public policy, criticizing the chief executive sometimes with unnatural passion. All men—not merely men of property, as it used to be—vote on election day with moving solemnity and they instinctively accept the common verdict. Moreover, people worship in churches of their own choosing without fear of persecution, and there is no official church. Although occasional abuses break out against these forms of liberty, the people as a whole loathe intolerance. Throwing eggs and fruit at the opposing candidate shocks people deeply and arouses a storm of protest. Disfiguring synagogues, forming secret anti-Catholic organizations, are flagrant violations of the democratic faith, and they are commonly hated. On the whole, we have achieved political and religious democracy because they are morally right. They also work, which, as it happens, is no part of the moral question, although it is conspicuously encouraging.

TWO-THIRDS OF A DEMOCRACY

But no democracy can be regarded as fulfilled until everyone participates equally. No freedom is absolute unless it is extended to all people, and until everyone has equal freedom of action. I assume that no one believes we have developed democracy that far in this country. The Negro race, with a population of 12,000,000, was established here by our ancestors under conditions we have since repudiated, but it is still held in economic and social bondage through the ancient evil of race prejudice. The free action of the Jews in our society is curtailed by race prejudice. Race prejudice is fomented by vicious journals sold in the public streets. Moreover, many white Americans are living mean and meager lives. Thousands of tenant farmers are caught between the grindstones of an industrial economy, and are existing in wretched conditions without hope. Thousands are scratching land that has been worn out for decades. Thousands have been dispossessed from dead land by the baking sun and the blistering winds and have crawled out of the inferno of dust storms toward land that looks green. More than four million families are subsisting below the minimum standards of safe diet on a food expenditure of $1.06 per person a week. Even in these abnormal times of rearmament, 6,500,000 out of an estimated working population of 55,000,000 are unemployed and sustained by makeshift programs that are commonly held in disfavor. England's economy has not supported its entire working population for more than two decades. Ours has failed in its primary function—that of supporting the entire population—for one decade. To millions of Americans, therefore, democracy is a hypocritical word; it tastes sour on the tongue. To have such a large portion of the population cut off from the basic principle of the country is a dangerous practical weakness. From the moral point of view it is wrong.

These festers on the body of the country are not all of a kind and cannot be cured by the same therapy. Like an old canker that sleeps in the system, breaking out at recurrent intervals, race prejudice is a virulent form of ignorance. It can be fought only with knowledge and moral teaching. Although it cannot be cured in any man's lifetime it can be steadily alleviated. Teaching, which is the active form of faith, digs deeper and deeper into the consciousness of every generation.

But the spread of economic democracy among people able to work is capable of quicker fulfilment. For this is a matter of economics, which is not a part of human vitality, but a technique of the production and distribution of wealth, and it has no relation to human life apart from what we choose to give it. Fortunately, it can be changed any time it does not meet the democratic needs of the country, and it can be changed by lawful process if the people will it that way. Geoffrey Crowther, editor of The Economist of London, estimates that a half of the national income in normal times would guarantee adequate living conditions to every person in that country, and probably the same proportion of income would do the same job here. The price would be cheap in comparison with the good it would create. People are more frightened by economic changes than by any other. They accept without protest the principle of drafting an army in peacetime, although it infringes remarkably upon personal liberty. But the prevailing system of economics involves property, which in turn represents to most people at least the illusion of security; and people hang on to property rights with a kind of ominous desperation.

From the moral point of view, which is the foundation of the democratic way of life, we have first to ask ourselves what is right and wrong. Is economic freedom as essential to democracy as political and religious freedom? Is it right from the moral point of view to keep millions of people ill-fed when the granaries are choked with unsold surpluses, or to have millions of people living in primitive conditions when in normal times the production capacities of industry are only partly used? Are human needs more vital than property rights?

For all this is an essential part of the warfare that has been raging with increasing cruelty all over the world for about eight years, driving millions of people into forlorn exile, sentencing whole populations to slavery at the point of a rifle, defiling the wonders of the deep with the broken hulls of ships and the cold bodies of sailors; murdering men, women, and children in convulsions of terror; crushing the truth that we have labored for centuries to lift out of the darkness. Are these things right or wrong? We cannot foresee the result of the steps we take to resist and stop them. But people who are not degenerate know what direction those steps must take.

From Cárdenas to Camacho

BY HARRY BLOCK

Mexico City, February 27

NEARLY three months after the inauguration of Avila Camacho, the major political fact in Mexico is still the strength of his government. For the moment, at least, it finds support all the way from the labor movement to the bankers' association. How long this almost unanimous approval can be retained will depend on a number of factors to be discussed presently, but it is a curious commentary on the 90 per cent electoral majority claimed by Almazán that except for a tiny remnant of die-hards even his followers are applauding Avila Camacho. This has been explained in the United States by saying that Camacho appropriated his opponent's platform. Despite the superficial evidence giving grounds to this theory, I suspect it may have been rather prematurely advanced. A change there has certainly been, but the ultimate nature of the present administration is obscured by imponderables of an inner political struggle that has not yet fairly begun.

General Manuel Avila Camacho has an honorable, if unspectacular, record in the Mexican Revolution. The political quip of the Almazánistas, dubbing him the "unknown soldier," is hardly borne out by the facts, which show that he fought in all the major campaigns from 1913 to 1929 and received his military promotions in active service rather than, like many of his more celebrated contemporaries, out of political expediency. Until 1933, when he entered the War Department as Official Mayor, he had never held political office; Cárdenas, a close friend and in many of his former posts his direct military superior, appointed him Under-Secretary, and later Minister, of Defense. Nevertheless, Camacho made no political commitments and was never identified with the "ideology" of the Cárdenas regime, a circumstance contributing to his selection as candidate of the PRM (Party of the Mexican Revolution), which found him an ideal compromise between its right and left wings.

It should be recalled that the radicals of the party were the first to indorse him, since they recognized that Mexico would not be able to maintain the Cárdenas pace through another six years. Avila Camacho was considered a political moderate and an able administrator, an executive capable of consolidating the Cárdenas heritage and of bringing order out of the transitional chaos—which was exactly what the radicals wanted. The conservatives were equally satisfied with the choice, seeing in it a guarantee against further experimentation and adventure. But the fact that the probable character of the new government was implicit from the beginning did not mean that inner-party differences had been liquidated; it simply meant they were temporarily postponed in order to defeat the threat represented by Almazán and would be resumed over the question of whether the "pause" the radicals were offering would be turned by the conservatives into headlong retreat.

All the emphasis of the closing weeks of Avila Camacho's campaign was on national unity; his promise of "a government for all" and his offer to form his administration with representatives of all factions were clearly intended to woo followers from the opposition and to erase the bitterness which, under Cárdenas, had split Mexico into two warring camps. This in itself was a wide departure from tradition, as Mexican presidents, like good soldiers, usually march into office with the left foot forward. But as Camacho was assured of popular backing, his strategy was to win over the strongly conservative middle class and to hold out sufficient inducement to finance and business to lift the economic siege by which these had paralyzed the Cárdenas government.

Under these conditions, it was no secret that the new Cabinet would include members of the PRM's anti-Cárdenas faction, although the decisive influence ascribed to the leaders of the party's right wing, General Abelardo L. Rodríguez and Emilio Portes Gil (both ex-Presidents of Mexico), has been considerably exaggerated. The Cabinet, in fact, with a few exceptions, is made up of personal friends and political allies of the President. It seeks to face both ways at once, in a balance of conservative and progressive elements which to a certain extent is a reflection of the government's heterogeneous support. And although popular opinion is inclined to predict Cabinet changes in the near future, it is obviously to the President's advantage to postpone such family crises as long as possible.

The economic basis of the new political trend can be summed up briefly. The United States now controls over 85 per cent of Mexico's foreign trade. The country has always, of course, been economically dependent on our own, but the former 60-65 per cent American share in Mexico's exports and imports left a certain margin on which to build an illusion of national autonomy. Other markets have now been shut off by the war. Mexico can neither sell its raw materials to, nor import manufactured goods from, Europe. Trade with South America has always been insignificant, and the potential South American market for the only big export industry in Mexican hands is virtually closed by the boycott of the British and American oil companies. Improvement of this condition must wait on the termination of the war or on a planned organization of inter-American economy, neither of which is an immediate prospect. Meanwhile, Mexico must so obviously cut its cloth to the American pattern that it is unnecessary to look for signs of additional pressure.

The great problem with which the new government must deal, however, is the continued rise of internal prices. Mexican manufactures are currently in the doldrums because the mass of the population is unable to buy anything but food, and can buy very little of that. Driven up by middlemen and speculators, retail food prices in Mexico City have risen more than 90 per cent since 1934, and the average increase for the whole country is nearly 60 per cent. Wages, of course, have by no means kept pace with this rise, so that the much-advertised labor offensive of recent years has thus far resulted in lower real wages. The Cárdenas government, for all its good intentions, did nothing but shadowbox with this problem, its own inflationary tendencies aggravating it and encouraging the speculative frenzy. The one agency it set up to "regulate" the market for essential foodstuffs was so handicapped by its own poverty and by official indecision that it was able to make only the smallest impression on the price level, and even then it provoked violent attack from the press. With the food dealers taking over 80 per cent of the income of wage-earners, there is very little left for other purposes.

To judge by its initial measures, the new regime hopes to turn present depression into prosperity by restoring the business confidence supposed to have been killed by Cárdenas, and so induce private capital to embark again on productive enterprise. But even if the influx of foreign capital on which the government is said to be heavily counting, materializes it is hard to see what real improvement will be secured. Though industrial expansion will mean wider employment and a larger gross income, it will also mean greatly increased demand. Food prices will not be brought down, and the cost of other consumers' goods will rise to join them. The rock on which all these optimistic plans for swift industrialization come to grief is the uncomfortable fact that the Mexican people don't get enough to eat, and little progress will be made until some stable relation is established between earnings and prices.

This can be put another way by pointing out that the Mexican agrarian revolution, in spite of the great momentum it received under Cárdenas, is still far from complete and that the industrial structure will necessarily be lopsided and distorted until the land problem is satisfactorily settled. It is no longer a question of mere distribution of lands, for although much still remains to be done in that direction, enough has already been accomplished to provide a solid basis for a reorganization of rural economy. The problem is now one of technique and capital resources. The real place for capital investment is primarily in the new structure of Mexico's agriculture, which should be based on an integral program of collectively worked ejidos and large-scale mechanized methods wherever local conditions will permit, combined with scientific cultivation, ample credit, a network of local roads, electrification, and marketing facilities that will eliminate profiteering middlemen. The considerable resources now lying idle in the banks or devoted to parasitic or speculative ends, could, if made available for agricultural development under government supervision, measurably reduce the appalling poverty that impedes general industrial expansion.

To allay conservative fears and to appease the critics of Cárdenas's "agrarian bolshevism," the President has issued since December 11 a series of rulings on land matters. In deference to the demand that the ejidos be divided into individual holdings, the new rulings order the immediate parcelization, with property titles, of all ejidos already constituted and of future grants. The sanctity of "small property" immune to agrarian reform is once more affirmed, the goal apparently being to lay down a definition of rural property rights that will end the uncertainties and agitation of the past. Whether or not in response to sharp criticism from the left it is still impossible to say, but a later ruling has made clear that in such collectivized regions as the Laguna cotton and wheat ejidos, literal parcelization will be replaced with certificates guaranteeing the membership rights of peasants within the ejido, so that what at first looked like a death blow to Cárdenas's contribution to the agrarian reform may actually help to consolidate it. But until agricultural production has been greatly increased over present levels, other government measures to underwrite the security and profitability of new industrial capital are a way of putting the cart before the horse; they reach only a small segment of the national economy and while they may produce a temporary counterfeit of prosperity, they seem destined to result in new industrial conflict when the spread between wages and prices becomes intolerable.

That conflict, should it develop, will put a severe strain on the middle-of-the-road position which the new government has tried to take and in which certain ominous cracks are already becoming visible. On February 12, General Rodríguez delivered an oratorical blast against "labor demagogues" and the "experiments based on exotic theories" of the Cárdenas regime. Inevitably, his speech has been compared with the famous Calles statement of June, 1935, which provoked the rupture with Cárdenas and laid the basis for the subsequent events of the Cárdenas period. Rodríguez, reputed to be one of Mexico's wealthiest bankers and industrialists, has replaced Calles as the most authoritative spokesman of the group of native capitalists which has grown up under the aegis of the Revolution; his address has been given wide publicity by press and radio and has drawn a bitter reply from the labor movement, which charges him with assuming leadership of the reactionary opposition to the President. This is a rather optimistic view of the situation, for the faction Rodríguez represents is a part of the government and is more actively engaged than labor itself in the task of depriving its enemies of political importance.

At bottom, of course, these periodical squalls involve nothing less than the two antagonistic trends observable in the Mexican Revolution since 1910 and responsible for the zigzag course of the movement's development. Every President has had to face this dilemma, but has yet found the compromise that would satisfy the aspiration and demands of both groups and so preserve the unity, even within the so-called "revolutionary family," for which all have striven. If the labor and agrarian drive for higher real wages and continued land distribution is officially encouraged, the regime will lose many of its present supporters among employers, while if it curbs the popular movement in the interests of "social peace" and high profits, it will gradually deprive itself of the mass support with which it came into power. Sooner or later, this decision will have to be made.

President Avila Camacho

This analysis is dependent, naturally, on how persistently labor will stick to its own guns in the face of what promises soon to become an employer counter-offensive.

Overshadowing everything else in the public mind, however, is the war and the question whether Mexicans will be called upon to fight in it. The Pan-American agreements of Lima, Panama, and Havana have committed Mexico to aid the other American republics to defend the western hemisphere. People are increasingly asking if the government's commitments go beyond that and are demanding clear definitions of what is meant by defense and aggression. In brief, they fear the United States is about to be drawn into a war with Germany and they want to know if in that case Mexico will be expected to fight.

It has been instructive to watch the change in general sentiment during the past year. As they see the conflict drawing closer to American shores, the newspapers that used to be filled with panegyrics on Hitler and Mussolini when the victims were Austria, Czechoslovakia, and Spain, have become ardent champions of democracy—perhaps with the idea of qualifying for the shower of American defense money they hope will soon begin to flow south of the Rio Grande. The deflation of Mussolini and the Nazi methods of total war have likewise helped dissipate enthusiasm for the Axis, and there is general admiration for the courage displayed by the British people since last September. Pro-Nazis are confined almost entirely to the German colony and to those native fascists who are wholly unregenerate; the lurid tales of dangerous fifth-column conspiracies published by the more sensational American press, are wholly imaginary. Official neutrality, never very hardy, has been virtually abandoned since June of last year; in spite of the absence of diplomatic relations with England, government sympathies are clearly not for Germany.

But while the number of those who would welcome a German victory is strictly limited, there is no corresponding enthusiasm for the Anglo-American cause. Mexicans resent the peculiarly British attitude of arrogant aloofness in dealing with "natives" and also have a tendency to recall that in the 120 years of their country's independent life, they have been invaded once by France and three times by the United States. It would be a grave error to believe that the loss of Texas and California, the bombardment of Vera Cruz, and the Pershing expedition left no wound in national susceptibilities. There is plenty of historical justification, of course, for the Mexican War, but it is harder to find moral excuses for what General Grant called "one of the most unjust wars ever waged by a stronger against a weaker nation."

The present emergency is reawakening fears of military as well as of economic penetration which the good-neighbor policy had done much to dispel. Public uneasiness has already obliged the government to make repeated denials that it will give military bases to the United States or that foreigners will directly participate in Mexico's military preparations. The theme of Yankee ambitions is a sore point in Latin America, and General Franco's apologists, who have taken over from the clumsier Nazi strong-arm men the task of representing Axis interests, are posing with some success as the patriotic defenders of national sovereignty. It is precisely this circumstance which is puzzling the labor movement, whose skepticism of British war aims is heightened by the paradoxical flirtation with Franco.

At the same time, most Mexicans realize that no country—and certainly not a defenseless one—can isolate itself in the present world and that, for obvious geographical and economic reasons, Mexico's future is inevitably bound up with that of the United States. Cooperation thus becomes an almost elementary necessity.

But there are kinds and degrees of cooperation, and the kind the United States is likely to get will be determined by the kind it gives. Even the goal of military strength will scarcely be achieved unless government agreements are reinforced with popular approval; the rejoicing with which the coming general agreement to settle all outstanding differences between the two countries will be received, since it is expected to end the three-years' boycott that has crippled foreign trade and the currency, will doubtless be tempered with disappointment over the fact that the old Chamizal dispute (involving a tract of land on which a part of the city of El Paso is built, awarded to Mexico by arbitration in 1911) has not been included in the negotiations. The war and the exigencies of defense are encouraging a tendency that has always existed in both countries to retard Mexico's social and economic progress, but this shortsighted policy can be followed only at the risk of allowing the prophets of Franco's Neo-Hispanicism to gain adherents in wider circles than they have thus far been able to penetrate. In exchange for full cooperation, the Mexican people want freedom to solve their own problems without alien interference; in the long run, the democratic and peaceful Mexico that may be expected to result would be a greater asset to inter-American solidarity than a country suffering from a frustration neurosis.

Bethlehem Bends

BY JAMES A. WECHSLER

Lackawanna, N. Y., March 1

FOR thirty-nine hours this dreary steeltown on the edge of Lake Erie was American labor's most dramatic front. The local Bethlehem Steel plant, one of the largest in Bethlehem's empire and loaded with $250,000 in defense orders, was almost smokeless and silent. Though clusters of non-strikers stayed inside the plant overnight because the picket lines were too formidable, the great bulk of the 14,000 employees were out. They mugged for newsreel cameras, built campfires on the picket lines, piled into union headquarters to sign up with the C. I. O.'s Steel Workers Organizing Committee. The bars did big business too, because this hadn't happened in Lackawanna since 1919.

It all seemed pretty simple to the pickets, some of them ageing, work-worn men who remembered 1919, others young kids who went from school to steel mill the way their fathers had and the way their children will. The corporation had the best year of its life in 1940 with $48,677,524 in profits, but no substantial wage boosts had been granted. Pay envelopes were 10 to 20 per cent fatter in organized plants. When the S. W. O. C. started to win new support in the Lackawanna plant and to clamor for increases, the corporation suspended a thousand men, including a high quota of active unionists. So the S. W. O. C., half in desperation, half in defiance, called a strike—"and the damn thing is shut down, just look at it." The night the strike began some heads were conked and the Buffalo police (one plant gate leads into Buffalo) weren't too gentle at first; but the strikers kept saying they wouldn't go back until Eugene Grace welcomed them as union men.

The issues were simple because Bethlehem Steel's anti-unionism in the first war and in this one is a matter of public record; but this strike wasn't a simple affair or a narrow test of strength. It was a national battle from the moment it began; and throughout the thirty-nine hours it lasted there was abundant evidence that the S. W. O. C. was racing against time, fearing a propaganda barrage. The truth is that the strikers gleefully returned to work without waiting for any redistribution of Bethlehem's wealth. Yet the S. W. O. C. leaders publicly hailed the outcome as "a great labor victory" and privately considered it at least a major strategic advance, although the terms of the settlement weren't gaudy. The agreement reached in Washington provided reinstatement of the suspended workers, conferences with the management to "discuss" wage adjustments, and "exploration" by the OPM and the Labor Board of the possibility of an election at the plant. Outwardly these are moderate terms. In the present national setting, it was a happy ending for the S. W. O. C.

The S. W. O. C. undertook the walkout with genuine reluctance, partly because its leaders were not heedless of production needs, partly because they knew that they would have to win fast or risk a disastrous defeat. There were too many Congressmen ready to yell treason and too many publishers anxious to thump the C. I. O. and too many muddled citizens who get their lowdown on labor from Westbrook Pegler. The S. W. O. C. called the strike because there wasn't any alternative except surrender; because Bethlehem was apparently risking condemnation by the Labor Board at some remote date in order to cripple the C. I. O. drive now.

Whatever Bethlehem's strategy, the S. W. O. C. couldn't afford to submit without a fight. So the strike summons was issued and the response was even more favorable than the leaders had anticipated. If it hadn't been impressive, it is doubtful that Bethlehem Steel would have signed any truce at all, for this would have been the time to settle "the C. I. O. problem" once and forever. Instead, the strike proved the reverse: that the corporation which has held out more fiercely than any other steel plant was vulnerable.

There were three chief gains for the S. W. O. C. in the settlement hammered out in Washington and ratified unanimously by the strikers. The first was the demonstration that the S. W. O. C. could protect its members in this anti-union citadel. After the strike was called off several thousand workers paraded gaily along the highway that runs parallel with the plant. They plastered their coats and hats with union buttons and they went back to work without hiding the decorations. Secondly, the strike's outcome vindicated the strategy of fighting on one Bethlehem front at a time, rather than striving for a general strike throughout Bethlehem's far-flung set-up; the threat of further tie-ups undoubtedly hastened Bethlehem's ratification of the agreement here. Finally, if the wage-conferences now provided by the OPM agreement turn out to be merely make-believe, with Bethlehem refusing to grant any wage changes, the S. W. O. C. will be able to appeal again for federal help; the assumption now is that Bethlehem has agreed to genuine bargaining.

The swift end of the Lackawanna strike is no sign of permanent peace in Bethlehem Steel. This was a skirmish, although so far the most important one. But the true causes of unrest inside this and other Bethlehem plants won't be dissolved until decent wage increases are granted and genuine collective bargaining established. There is no doubt that the S. W. O. C. would win an election now at Lackawanna and that its strength is mounting fast in other Bethlehem strongholds. There will be other flare-ups soon.

The Administration's role in the Lackawanna clash was a sympathetic one, largely through Sidney Hillman's efforts; and S. W. O. C. chieftains, who haven't always seen eye to eye with Hillman on matters of strategy, are outspoken in praising his handling of the affair. They are also relieved that the President spurned efforts to get a "plague-on-both-your-houses" statement from him. The only dismal Washington note was Secretary of Labor Perkins's statement that the strike was called "too suddenly." In actual fact, the crisis had been plainly coming for a good many weeks, and the Capitol was officially warned more than a week before the strike call.

Several months ago Philip Murray informally told reporters that "Bethlehem is the touchstone of where labor stands under the defense program. If they can get away with the same labor policy they used in the last war—no collective bargaining and no decent wage increases—we haven't made any progress."

The Lackawanna strike was progress.

In the Wind

A BUSINESS newsletter from Washington advises its clients that in the section served by TVA power a good market for electrical equipment has come into being. In December the area gained 78 per cent in electric refrigerator sales over 1939, which was 53 per cent greater than the gain throughout the nation. In the preceding twelve months Tennessee, with 3,000,000 population, bought 16,000 new electric ranges; Massachusetts, with 4,500,000 population and a far higher standard of living, bought only 10,000 new ranges.

THE PUBLIC LIBRARY of St. Joseph, Missouri, has banned "For Whom the Bell Tolls."

A YOUNG NEGRO and a young Mexican, convicted of rape and murder respectively, were scheduled to be executed in the state prison at Austin, Texas, on February 17. At the request of the prison officials they were granted a 24-hour reprieve. The authorities explained that the execution would interfere with a radio program being broadcast from the prison that night.

A PROMINENT AMERICAN is suggesting to newspapers that Colonel Lindbergh be urged to go to Germany, as Wendell Willkie went to England, to report on the Wave of the Future.

AN ARTICLE in the New York Times recently told how hunting clubs in Great Britain have closed for the duration and their lodges been made over into homes for evacuees. "Some Americans," said the Times, "feel that the entire burden of an ancient tradition devolves on hunt clubs in this country."

OF ALL the conquered countries in Europe, Norway seems the most rebellious against Nazi rule. After the Germans had forcibly stopped all overt disapproval, the people found other, apparently innocuous, ways of expressing themselves. Ordinary paper clips were worn in lapels to symbolize the "sticking together" of the Norwegian people. Paper clips in lapels were outlawed. Then they wore safety pins to show the same thing. Safety pins were outlawed. Now they wear matches in their buttonholes—to show their burning hatred; and carry small packages—to show that the Nazis should be wrapped up and sent away.

CLARENCE HATHAWAY, the Daily Worker editor who was expelled from the Communist Party and who then publicly apologized for his misdeeds, is still missing. Nobody has been able to locate him for more than two months. Reporters looking for him have been told by his wife that she "thinks he's out of town."

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

A Native at Large

BY JONATHAN DANIELS

Appeasing Fear

THERE is nothing anemic about the increasing hundreds of thousands of boys marching in the new army camps which crowd old cornfields and pine forests with quickly grown quarters. The swarms of young Americans look at least as strong as any armed elders they ever had. Their haemoglobin ratings are high. There is blood in them which is no less precious and no more precious than the blood of young men all over the world. And in a time of much angry talk of appeasement neither they nor their parents ought to be appeased with any thin hopes or transparent pretenses. That blood may be shed. It should be, if necessary to preserve democracy and Christian civilization on earth.

But a strange process of appeasing not Hitler but home fears seems to be at work. Winston Churchill voiced it from Europe when he told us that if we would furnish the tools, the British would do the job. Secretary of the Interior Harold Ickes expressed it at home more recently when he declared: "Although this is the time of the world's greatest travail, there is no need of our sending troops abroad." When he announced his belief that Christian civilization was at stake, the Secretary announced also the view that we could do our part in its defense by furnishing the instruments of war to other men who would do the fighting and the dying.

I hope to God both Mr. Churchill and Mr. Ickes misjudge us. I don't believe that it is necessary to convince us that we can be safe as a corollary of convincing us that the world burns. If we are convinced that all our liberties are at stake, I do not believe we also must be appeased with promises of security. If we are grown so fat, so timid, so cowardly that we must be appeased in those characteristics, we are already appeased in a condition which, though home grown, is worse than any Hitler could impose upon us. We should already be queasy, if not Quisling, and in a world which still honors ancient virtues, one can be as bad as the other. Any appeasement of fear would be a part of propaganda for the world's contempt. We would be the people grown both rich and spent, soft among our gadgets, weakened by our machines, who to all intents and purposes hired the courage and the physical strength of other men to guard the jewels of our freedom.

I don't believe it. I do not believe that an America, convinced of the threat to civilization, would want other people to do all the fighting for it. I do not believe that we are a people who would be content in dependence on other people's courage. I do not believe that the American democracy is a rich Park Avenue apartment house with a hired British guard at the door against Hitler's thugs, who may come from the totalitarian slums of the world looking for the loot of civilization. If anybody is after the precious things we possess, we will not be content to pay Britain's wages as our policemen. The Americans in the army camps and throughout the country do not look to me like fat men to be defended only by the king's cops.

The question before America is not whether it is scared to go to war but whether it wishes to go to war, whether it believes that the hour has arrived—and the issue—upon which no other course is possible in good sense and honor. When that time comes, it would not be a question whether Britain needed men but where Americans, as courageous as they ever were in defense of their liberties, could take the battle line with greatest effectiveness. Where they could die most effectively. If I know Americans, if I have any understanding of the growing number of the khaki-clad Americans in the camps and of their parents behind them at home, they will not be content as providers of the materials of war while there is fighting over something that they feel in their hearts is important to them.

I never saw a soldier yet, nor a civilian nor a statesman, who wanted to die. But the Americans I have seen did not seem to me men unwilling to take their chances with any other fighting men on the earth, if matters important to America were involved in the fighting. They are men, and they are not such men as need to be appeased (by the people who speak most vigorously against the "appeasers"), with any promises of safety behind other men in any war. Of course Britain needs our supplies. But it needs them no more than we, as men, would need a place in actual fighting when, as a democracy, we reach the decision that the time has come when democracy needs our defense.

We are not women, nor children. We are not rich, fat, soft, fearful men. We do not need to be appeased by any promises that we can take part even in the battle for the preservation of civilization itself and still be safe. We can't, and despite the promises, we know it. As a people we are not afraid and nobody ought to suggest to the world that we are.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Notes by the Way

THE second issue of Decision, the monthly "review of free culture" edited by Klaus Mann, contains a number of interesting essays though on the whole its direction seems to me a little uncertain, in contrast to its downright name. In an article on War and the Future, Thomas Mann makes what seems to me an excellent reply to those who insist on regarding Hitler as a revolutionary. "He is not a revolutionary but a free-booting exploiter of the revolution; not a lion but a hyena. He reduces the social revolution, which, it is true, is about to change the face of the earth, to his out-of-date Alexandric expedition for the conquest of the world. The history which Hitler makes is imitation history, nonsense, a froth of blood. He is not a revolutionary, he is a swindler of history and his bankruptcy is only a question of time. . . ."

Somerset Maugham contributes an engaging essay, On Style, to the same issue. It revolves around the style of Edmund Burke, but that is as much a pretext as a text. Mr. Maugham discusses, among other things, the problem of the novelist, whose style must change with his matter. "But perhaps it is enough," he goes on, "if the novelist contents himself with avoiding the grosser errors of grammar, for no one can have considered this matter without being struck by the significant and surprising fact that the four greatest novelists the world has seen, Tolstoi, Balzac, Dostoevski, and Dickens, wrote their respective languages very carelessly; and Dickens, as we know, did not even take the trouble to write tolerable grammar. It is for the historian, the divine and the essayist to acquire and maintain a settled style. . . ." These provocative sentences make me wonder how a novelist like Flaubert, for instance, fits into Mr. Maugham's hierarchy, both of novelists and of style. I suspect he would be consigned to the same inferior circle as his admirer, Henry James, whom Maugham discussed in a tone approaching scorn in the introduction to his anthology of short stories—though to be sure he included one of James's stories. James, of course, would be scornful of Maugham's admiration of Tolstoi. Once or twice in the course of Mr. Maugham's essay I had the impression that he was confounding style with Style. What, for instance, would he think of The Zoo, a story in the same issue of Decision, by William Carlos Williams? It certainly doesn't parade a Style that Samuel Johnson would tolerate; instead, the language is a kind of invisible cloak, so closely fitted to the content that one actually spends an hour in the zoo, not with a Stylist, but with the animals and the Finnish servant girl Elsa. I happen to like Tolstoi and James, Samuel Johnson and The Zoo. And though I might quarrel with Mr. Maugham—who has written one good novel himself—there is so little discussion these days of writing as writing that I found his essay absorbing.

THIS IS in the nature of an aside to those who read and liked "The Late George Apley" by John P. Marquand. His new book, "H. M. Pulham, Esquire" (Little, Brown and Company, $2.50), which exploits the same New England post-world of dullness and stability, is a deftly written but rather long-winded demonstration of the fact that even a clever writer can't do the same thing twice.

THE PARTISAN REVIEW, in its current issue, prints a useful and extremely interesting compendium of information as to the whereabouts of European artists, writers, and musicians. The data have been compiled by William Petersen from newspapers, publishers' releases, personal interviews, and letters. It is the who's where of a civilization in exile, as tragic a document, with its matter-of-fact entries of names and places of refuge, as the times can show.

MARGARET MARSHALL

Education of a Democrat

AMBASSADOR DODD'S DIARY, 1933-1938. Edited by William E. Dodd, Jr. and Martha Dodd, New York. Harcourt Brace and Company. 1941.

SOMETIME in the evening of July 13, 1933, a new American ambassador reached his first diplomatic post, in Berlin, Germany. Unlike the average American diplomat, he was an intellectual—a distinguished professor of history. Unlike the average American diplomat, he was a true democrat. He objected to pomp and waste and ceremony. He insisted on living on the altogether inadequate salary the American Republic pays its major representatives abroad. Unlike the average American diplomat, he spoke the language of the country to which he was accredited and knew its history.

His task in Berlin, as he conceived it, was "to work for peace and better relations" between Germany and the United States. He was asked to do what he could "to prevent the Germans defaulting openly" (on their loans to the United States) and so "upset American financial interests." Admirable notions—in normal times. In fact, in normal times, the historian might have made a great ambassador. But the times were not normal. Mr. Dodd loved Germany—the Germany in which he had studied around the turn of the last century. And under Hitler, Germany had ceased to be lovable. Moreover, as an "orthodox" American liberal, a pacifist and a former Y.M.C.A. student, he brought to his task a number of preconceived notions: The Treaty of Versailles was the root of nearly all the world's ills; the French had "driven" the poor Germans back into Prussianism; the Hoover moratorium was a fine thing; the Germans had "honestly" made an effort to pay reparations and could "really" pay no more; the Germans "are by nature more democratic than any other great race in Europe," a quaint conceit from which he never recovered. True or false—and the reviewer thinks them false—these ideas made it difficult for their holder quickly to get at the facts of the Germany of 1933—the Germany of the Reichstag fire, the torture of adversaries, and cold-blooded preparation for the new war of aggression.

Mr. Dodd strove manfully to love the Germans and "understand" the Nazis. He did his best to seek out the "moderate elements"—the ruthless, clever Schacht, the weak Von Neurath, cynical Von Bülow, two-tongued Hans Dieckhoff, who at least were not Nazis. One can almost say he did his best not to see the truth. But he was an honest man and an intelligent one, and the truth which, at the beginning, he flatly refused to believe when expressed to him (at his request) by this reviewer rather quickly opened his eyes.

In less than a year from the time of his arrival in Germany he is refusing to shake hands with Hitler, Goering, and Goebbels, the three chief personages of the government to which he is accredited. And almost tearfully he asks himself: "Should I resign?"—a cry that is repeated regularly during the thirty more months he remained in Berlin. Once he understands that the Nazis have completely submerged everything he loved in the old Germany and realizes that his only duty is to warn a deaf Washington that Hitler is hell-bent on a new war and can be stopped only by an American-British-French-Russian combination, he is right more often than not.

He learns from Fritz Thyssen that "we [the German industrialists] compelled the German government to withdraw from the League." He watches the gradual transformation of the French and British ambassadors from intelligent critics of the Nazi regime into dumb appeasers. He records the pro-Nazi feelings of Jewish bank directors (and is, unfortunately, impressed by their fears lest Germany collapse: a German collapse back in the thirties might have saved the world). He is appalled at the spectacle of American and British and French firms selling to Germany "for gold" (of course Germany was "unable" to pay previously contracted debts) war material that he foresaw would be used against them. He early informs the State Department of the French promise to let Mussolini have Ethiopia (though sharing their illusion that they can thereby purchase Italy's friendship). He follows German encouragement of Japan. He understands the real meaning of the Hoare-Laval plan and notes the pressure brought by the great oil companies against making sanctions against Italy effective. The spectacle of Standard Oil helping to provide Germany with oil reserves it was storing against war, depressed him. On August 15, 1936, he records that the League failure to stop Mussolini "dooms democracy in Europe." He sees the insanity of Dollfuss's attack upon the Austrian socialists. He warns about Nazi seizures of Austria and Czechoslovakia with the consent of Britain (and the passivity of France). Lord Lothian, then a rabid appeaser, admits his efforts to set Germany against the Soviets. In fact, nine times out of ten, once he got over his original blindness, Ambassador Dodd was right.

His tragedy—and a tragedy it was to him—was double: first to see his dear Germany go wrong; and then to find it encouraged in unrighteousness by so many people in democratic countries. His book might have been subtitled: An intelligent democrat among the appeasers.

A huge section of the American business community rooting for Hitler and Mussolini (read the names and remember them); British conservatives setting out deliberately to give Europe to the Nazis in order, as they dumbly thought, to save it from Stalin; American Senators, called liberal, concurring in the British idea; Ambassador Bullitt, in his distrust of the Bolsheviks, working for Franco-Nazi cooperation; the German nationalist, Paul Scheffer, friend of American liberals, discovered on November 15, 1936, to be "now a good Nazi" (was he ever anything else?); what an experience for a man of insight and feeling! What wonder that he writes—on October 29, 1937—"In Berlin once more. What can I do?"

A few months before—February first of the same year—this pacifist had received something like a revelation which to this reader remains the diary's climax:

The French and English peoples have become overwhelmingly pacifist and the Germans know this. Pacifism is the attitude of the United States also, but pacifism will mean a great war and the subordination of all Europe to Germany if the pacifist peoples do not act courageously at this critical moment of their history.

After this but one more sort of bitterness was left for him to taste: lack of sympathy and rough handling on the part of a State Department that was fifty per cent dominated by appeasers. Encouraged in the autumn of 1937 to return to Berlin for a few months more, Ambassador Dodd was abruptly informed twenty-five days after his return to Berlin that he would be expected to quit Germany before the end of that year—at the request of the Germans—and others. . . .

He returned to the United States. A few months later came the surrender at Munich whose approach he had seen, and a year later the world war he had warned against—and which might have been averted had his contemporaries followed his advice.

No future study of the causes of World War II will be complete without full cognizance of Dodd's diary, for as his children have written, he "kept the democratic faith in an age of betrayal."

EDGAR ANSEL MOWRER

The Court Then and Now

THE STRUGGLE FOR JUDICIAL SUPREMACY. By Robert H. Jackson. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

THE Attorney General of the United States here gives us a superb brief in condemnation of the not-too-remote conduct of the Supreme Court of the United States and in praise of the conversion that has since come to pass, with an account of the intervening struggle, all of which he saw and part of which he was. He deals lightly with the particular device proposed by the President to overcome the judicial frustration of major policies of his first administration, and is obviously sparing of praise. The proposal was, of course, a threat which, if carried out to the full, would have afforded a precedent for subsequent action that could have reduced the judiciary to impotence in the political arena. Fortunately there was enough judicial surrender to yield results which have been characterized by the comments that a switch in time saves nine and that the President lost the battle but won the war.

Mr. Jackson makes it clear that had the Supreme Court of 1936 continued unchanged in personnel and in temper, still further frustration of major national policies must have been administered. He makes it clear, too, that the temper changed after the reorganization proposal while the old bench was still in power. Even before the President's message on February 5, 1937, the equal division on the New York Unemployment Compensation Act, with Mr. Justice Stone not participating because of illness, made it clear that Mr. Justice Roberts had approved of a pooling provision similar to the one he condemned in the Railroad Retirement Act, and on March 9, 1937, he reversed his prior condemnation of the Minimum Wage Law. The election and the Presidential attack were bearing fruit. The approval of the Wagner Labor Relations Act and the Social Security legislation came shortly after.

The details of the conversion of Mr. Justice Roberts will doubtless always remain one of the secrets of history. Did he see the light himself, or did the Chief Justice, with his wiser statesmanship, indulge in some plain talk? On all fundamental matters of constitutional power, Mr. Justice Roberts has since kept the faith of the convert, even when it meant that he had to indulge in at least a tacit "Peccavi" for earlier deeds. Where he has refused to go along with the now ruling majority of the court, he has often had the Chief Justice with him, and in good lawyership and intellectual straightforwardness he has deserved the palm over those who have repealed or warped prior statutory construction instead of leaving the reformation to Congress, where it belongs.

No one can read the Attorney General's vivid story without appreciating that the former court needed an effective warning, if anything approaching democratic government were to continue. There should be a caveat with respect to the annulments of the first Farm Mortgage Act and the Industrial Recovery Act, which were unanimous, and to that of the delegation in the hot oil provision of the Recovery Act, which went by a vote of eight to one. These were novelties of such magnitude that some checking may well have been in order. One cannot condemn the checking without condemning also those Justices whose repeated forceful dissent lent the greatest strength to the demand for a general about face. The cautious scholar would write with some more reservations than the brilliant counsel for the government. In the main, however, the picture is a fair one, even though a few lighter shades should have been put here or there.

While the Attorney General deals lightly with the President's proposal, he pretty clearly disapproves of what he calls its "initial indirection." He says that he is not writing a defense of the plan, and refers to his statement before the Judiciary Committee as evidence of his statement that "I did that as well as my powers permitted when it was timely." Apparently, however, he approves of the President's subsequent radio address which, he says, "supplied the frontal attack which the message had lacked." In this address, however, there was a lamentable misrepresentation of the so-called "general welfare" clause, which ought to be nailed whenever it raises its head. The President said that the framers gave to the Congress the ample broad powers "to levy taxes . . . and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States." The clause reads: "To lay and collect Taxes, Duties, Imposts and Excises, to pay the Debts and provide for the common defense and General Welfare of the United States." Had the President been seeking accuracy as well as brevity he should have quoted: "to levy Taxes . . . to provide for the common defense and general welfare," making it clear that it was a power to tax and spend for the general welfare, and not a general power to provide for the general welfare. The President's elliptical version, which others have also urged, would render unnecessary all the other constitutional clauses conferring descriptively named powers on Congress. Such a version would make much of the rest of the Constitution extremely silly.

It is a pity that a good cause had to be fought with such faulty weapons. Yet it is not easy to conceive of a proposal that would be both an effective contemporary threat and a decent permanent part of our governmental system. For years the majority of the court had been battered by their colleagues, by scholars, and by informed laymen and yet had seemed to be increasing in obduracy. The oligarchy showed no sign of self-reform, and changes in personnel did not seem imminent. It may be that it took an unlovely way to put a stop to unlovely ways. Now it seems to not a few that the new and enlightened court occasionally feels compelled to indulge in some unlovely ways to reverse some of the unlovely ways of their predecessors. Judicial usurpation may take the form of acting in place of Congress as well as of putting chains on Congress. There are nice questions of intellectual morality that raise more difficulties for official action than for purely private conduct. Many are prone to condemn or condone methods depending on the ends they serve. It may perhaps be urged, however, that in considering methods, we should keep our standards of judgment pure and unswerving, even though we may forgive those who succumb to temptation to choose the method that seems to them essential to what they deem to be good ends.

THOMAS REED POWELL

Meditations of Rauschnig

THE REDEMPTION OF DEMOCRACY. By Hermann Rauschnig. Alliance Book Corporation. $3.

THIS is Hermann Rauschnig's third book. The first, "The Revolution of Nihilism," with which this former German conservative—who joined the Nazis to "annihilate" their revolutionary tendencies—sprang into literary prominence, was a source of much authentic information about Hitler that only an intimate could give; though long before Rauschnig many Germans had judged Hitler rightly by his deeds, and without Rauschnig's inside knowledge. The second volume, "The Voice of Destruction," was valuable and successful for the same reason as the first. It recorded Rauschnig's conversations with Hitler in 1932-35. Unlike the first two, his latest book, "The Redemption of Democracy," is largely the fruits of personal meditation about the deeper evils of this world. Written in London air-raid shelters, it gives a picture of a man "earnestly striving to overcome in his own soul the temptations of his own time."

Wandering in this book from problem to problem in a haphazard way and spraying metaphysical myths about him, the author sometimes reaches conclusions with which one may agree, though for reasons different from his. But often his meditations lead nowhere. Or, with an air of authority, the author makes statements that are contradicted by the record. To give an extremely grave example: "The truth is that every level of the French people went on strike. They wanted to live even without honor if necessary . . . the Catholic generals formed a mere front for a no longer extant France." As if the French generals had not sabotaged the Third Republic, just as Rauschning and the German generals sabotaged the Weimar Republic! Again, according to Rauschning, "Dollfuss and Pilsudski tried to give democracy a new meaning." And he even finds "something majestic about Hitler's plans and ideas."

The philosopher Rauschning visualizes progress and barbarism as twins. The whole intellectual development since the Middle Ages, in fact, all human history since the beginning of time—man's fight for liberty, his setting up of his own order, "an opposing order to the divine one revealed to mankind"—have been the work of the beast from the deep, and Hitler is merely one of its incarnations. Rauschning's cry is for religion. He is one of those people who, like the sorcerer's apprentice, are calling in this despair for the master to stop the forces of knowledge—identifying Hitler's barbaric misuse of all the results of modern thinking with modern thought itself.

The non-essentials of Mr. Rauschning's former books (including the meaningless name, the "revolution of nihilism," given to Hitler's will to power, and the belief in a forced reconstruction of Europe—after the Rauschnings of all nations had had many years in which to put their high principles into effect) are the essentials of this book. Yet in spite of them Rauschning again shows his grasp of the scope of Hitler's ambitions. He makes many pertinent observations as to the ultimate victory which a compromise peace would mean for Hitler and concerning the serious hope of the Nazis for internal difficulties in the United States.

Mr. Rauschning sees many of the trees but not yet the forest. On the other hand, it would be unjust to ask from any contemporary all the insight which his conservative admirers impute to him in their understandable longing for theories which acquit them of their crimes. The revolution of nihilism, the apocalypse, and much more high-sounding verbiage are used in order to produce reasons for the present disaster for which nobody, and least of all the comfortable metaphysicians of the ruling classes, wishes to be held responsible.

Rauschning senses clearly that we stand at the threshold of a new period in history. Yet, with due respect for his earnestness, he seems, as a political thinker, no less a dilettante today than he was at the time he associated himself with Hitler. For the student of contemporary political confusion, his new book will have a special interest. It puts forward honestly all the questions which a bad conscience must ask in pain—and who can have a good conscience today?

FRANZ HOELLERING

Mr. Russell on Empiricism

AN INQUIRY INTO MEANING AND TRUTH. By Bertrand Russell. W. W. Norton and Company. $3.75.

IN THIS book, the first on technical philosophy published by Mr. Russell in a long time, we find a thorough discussion of those problems that its author takes to be at the basis of empiricism. Empiricism, as we all know, is the philosophic doctrine according to which the source of knowledge and the ground of truth are experience. And Mr. Russell undertakes to give a rigorous account of the relations which obtain between these terms. But this cannot be done without going into such questions as the meaning of meaning and its criterion, and the nature of belief and its relation to knowledge.

But of course the elucidation of these matters depends on what we conceive to be the procedure and objectives of empirical knowledge, which is to say, of the scientist, who comes more fully than any one else into its possession. And perhaps because he is primarily a logician, Mr. Russell more or less implicitly assumes that the scientist seeks certainty just as the logician seeks necessary conclusions, and that just as the latter starts from a set of basic postulates so does the scientist start from some sort of ground, itself unquestionable. In order to satisfy these requirements Mr. Russell holds that empirical knowledge must be traced back to "basic propositions" which refer to observational facts. These propositions are considered true because they are directly observed. But unfortunately not all empirical propositions are of this kind. What, for instance, about memory propositions—can they be assimilated to those based on direct observation here and now? And what trust can we put on propositions referring to a whole class of objects of which only some have been examined, like the proposition that all men are mortal? The difficulties encountered in answering these questions are enough to shake one's naive confidence in empiricism. And our confidence is further shaken, Mr. Russell believes, when we remember that "physics tells us" that we do not perceive the objects which we naively believe we perceive, but observe only the effects of these objects on our selves.

No esoteric knowledge of the history of philosophy is needed if we are to recognize that Mr. Russell's difficulties are, in spite of their new fancy dress, the same old factitious problems which have been plaguing philosophers since Descartes. Let us deal first with the alleged need for basic propositions. When we give up the hanker for the indubitable and accept as the objective of inquiry corrigible knowledge, which is all the scientist seeks or ever gets, we come to see that its acquisition need not start from basic propositions. Knowledge-getting is continuous; it does not begin anew with every new problem. Observations, important as they are in the resolution of problems, are logically no more "basic" than the context of accepted knowledge out of which the problem arises. They are not made in vacuo; they are acquired by means of provisionally accepted procedures, which are themselves subject to constant improvement; and they are relative to assumptions which are determined by previous inquiries. The satisfactory solution of a problem, though a step forward in our knowledge-getting, also leads back to the reconstruction of the accepted context from which the inquiry started. And

Coming Soon in The Nation

The Nature and Destiny of Man

BY REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Reviewed by

DENIS DE ROUEMENT

it is only when we conceive of empirical knowledge on the model of deductive systems—conceive of it therefore, though perhaps unconsciously, as static and finished—that any element in the continuum of inquiry can be selected as logically more basic than any other. There is of course no doubt of the need for trustworthy observations. But they are trustworthy when they abide by the techniques of certification set up by the experts. We can ask, it is true, questions about the relation between propositions and that which they indicate; but only a psychologist can throw light on these matters, and he cannot tell us which among a group of observations are acceptable by the scientist as trustworthy and which not. And this is the reason that scientists find the epistemological game, with all its old-maid scruples about the validity of knowledge in general, so queer and so amusing. The game is silly because it has no bearing on the procedures involved in getting knowledge and arises out of a misconception of the objectives of science.

Nor is it true—to take another one of Mr. Russell's factitious assumptions—that "physics tell us" that we observe only the effects of things on us and not the things themselves. This is merely an erroneous philosophical interpretation of the act of perception, made by philosophers who cannot abandon a primitive, hypostatized conception of mind. According to this conception, the mind is a something to be found in the skull, within which, in turn, as within a stampbox within a drawer, we find "sensa," produced by the objects we perceive. In fact, however, we do not have a mind, but mind things. And when we mind them, though of course it is always we who do the minding, it is they we mind, not ourselves minding them. It happens that the act of minding can be analyzed. When we do analyze it, we break it up into activity within the body, involving perhaps sensa, and activity outside, producing the former and involving objects; but neither of the component parts can separately be called the act of perception; nor can either, considered in abstraction from the other, throw doubt on the existence of that which is disregarded. We cannot say, therefore, that what we observe is our sensa. If there are sensa—and the existence of these hypothetical entities is by no means as certain as Mr. Russell takes it to be—they are part of the process of observing, and are themselves merely inferred by-products of analysis.

The upshot of these considerations, succinctly put, is this: there is a great deal of philosophizing, in which must be included the epistemological labors of Mr. Russell, that is addressed to the resolution of phantom problems. This is not to say that this book is without value. In the resolution of his difficulties Mr. Russell ranges far afield and is forced to go into a number of questions on which he sheds valuable light. I take his criticism of the logical positivists, for instance, to be of real value. Nor is my criticism intended to belittle Mr. Russell's stature as a philosopher. For of him we know, whatever bigoted clergymen and stupid judges may think of his accomplishments, that he will be remembered in the history of philosophy as one of the most distinguished thinkers of our day. But the reasons for his preeminence and why it is questioned by bigots make up another story, and one which the reviewer has not been asked to tell.

ELISEO VIVAS

As Though to Breathe Were Life

THE LIVING AND THE DEAD. By Patrick White. The Viking Press. $2.50.

LAST year Mr. White, a young Australian, exhibited an extraordinary talent in his first novel, "Happy Valley," and in some ways "The Living and the Dead" surpasses its predecessor. Combining the detachment of an anatomical lecturer with an uncanny eye and ear for significant detail, he traces the lives of an English mother, son, and daughter who barricade themselves, in varying degrees, behind a wall of reserve and make-believe that at least subdues, if it cannot completely shut out, the importunate clamor of the real world of flesh and lusts and vulgarity and war and sacrifice. Their avoidance of life, however, is neither more nor less timid than that of the average "intelligent" modern human being confronted with a civilization that he can neither trust nor understand. And therein lies the theme of the book: the "dead" are those who, fearful of exposing themselves to pain or ridicule, "wanted instinctively to close the eyes, like Adelaide and Gerald, like Muriel, or the ranks of red suburban houses, smothered in a plush complacency"; only the "living" have the courage to "recognize the pulse behind the membrane, the sick heartbeat, or the gangrenous growth, . . . the drunken, disorderly passions of existence, that created but at the same time consumed."

If neither this novel nor "Happy Valley" is destined to figure in best-seller lists, it is because Mr. White sees too much and too clearly, and records too pitilessly what he sees. Like Virginia Woolf and James Joyce, he portrays character from within; it is as if he sat at a switchboard and pushed a series of buttons that caused a bright fluorescent light to flash on inside one character after another, illuminating not only the rosy flesh but the steadfast and enduring bone. While he employs the stream-of-consciousness technique more sparingly in "The Living and the Dead" than in "Happy Valley," he is extremely sensitive to the subtle overtones of conversation and of feeling, to the thought half-articulated and tinged with a crazy-quilt pattern of personal associations. He also reveals at every step a keen awareness of the impenetrable, intangible envelope that encloses each human personality—the "which-of-us-is-not-forever-a-stranger-and-alone?" of Thomas Wolfe—but where Wolfe rhapsodizes about it in hundreds of poetic and prolix pages, Mr. White merely suggests it in a dozen indirect and skilful ways.

There is no sentimentality in Patrick White's work, no blurred outlines to pamper the lazy mind or the namby-pamby heart. He aims at a discriminating audience, at the "living" rather than at the "dead," and for this audience he puts on a brilliant and masterful performance. He is a bold, original, and penetrating observer, who probes too deeply for comfort. Let the comfort-lovers beware.

LOUIS B. SALOMON

Buy Your Books Through The Nation

At the request of many readers who reside in communities in which no bookshop has been established, The Nation offers to deliver any book to your door at the regular publisher's price (post free) provided payment is received with the order or publisher's price plus postage if sent C. O. D.

Readers' Service Division

The Nation • 55 Fifth Avenue • New York

IN BRIEF

THE PARDNERS. By John Weld.
Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.75.

Bret Harte would have been proud to sign his name to this exuberant tale of the California gold-rush days with which Mr. Weld follows up his grim first novel, "Don't You Cry for Me." Put together "The Luck of Roaring Camp" and "Tennessee's Partner" and you'll have the flavor and most of the characters of "The Pardners," its sordid hoodlums with hearts of gold, and its warm treatment of male friendship out where men are men and a woman is a curiosity. Even if the people of Sycamore Flat have been lifted right out of Poker Flat, with change of names, they are still appealing, and the vividness of their background counterbalances any shortcomings they may exhibit as real live people.

THE EXILES' ANTHOLOGY. Edited by Helen Neville and Harry Roskolenko. The Exiles' Press, Prairie City, Illinois.

A varied little anthology of contemporary English and American poets, rather better than most things of this kind.

DRAMA

"The Talley Method"

IT would be too much to say that "The Talley Method" (Henry Miller's Theater) reveals any new aspects of the talent of S. N. Behrman. In fact, the play is very precisely in the manner of such of his later pieces as "Rain from Heaven" and "The End of Summer." But so far at least as I am concerned, it is enough that he should have found again that true way which he seemed momentarily to have lost in "No Time for Comedy," and that "The Talley Method" should again exhibit so delightfully the special kind of charm and special kind of wit which are his.

There is no contemporary writer whose gift is more exclusively or more purely comic. I have no doubt that he could, if he chose, write polite comedies of a more conventional sort, dealing with drawing-rooms, from which had been carefully excluded everything capable either of disturbing the pleasant tenor of events or of challenging, by implication, the adequacy of the comic approach to life. In fact, I have no doubt that such comedies would present to the writer fewer technical problems not solved frequently enough by others to offer great difficulty, or that such comedies would, in all probability, be also even more popular than plays like the present one, for the simple reason that the most familiar genres impose upon the spectator the minimum of strain. But it had been evident for a long time that Mr. Behrman's conscience has made it impossible for him to disregard the dilemma created for the comic writer by the terrible urgency of these times. He has not lost faith in the value of those virtues which a genuinely comic wisdom almost inevitably generates, but he is fully aware of the fact that ours is not a world in which all existing problems can be solved by wit, tolerance, and good will. He is willing neither to pretend that they can nor to choose themes which exclude from the field of awareness those facts which pure comedy cannot digest. He must create a kind of comedy which, in less skilful hands, would rapidly become no comedy at all because it must continually keep at the periphery an awareness of situations by no stretch of the imagination comic. All his recent plays have been, in one aspect, attempts to define the limits up to which comic wisdom is relevant. Sentimentality could easily obscure the issue; cynicism could attempt to cross the line. But Mr. Behrman is neither sentimental nor cynical. He is extraordinarily clear-sighted.

In the present instance the play revolves around the contrasting characters of a humanely intelligent woman and a great surgeon. She has fallen in love with him because, as a patient, she had observed in him a scientific competence which seemed to implement humane impulses like her own. But it presently becomes evident from his relations with his two rebellious children that both his skill and his apparent good will are strictly limited to his profession. He can and he will save a life with what looks from the outside like benevolence—but only if that life is threatened by way of the duodenum, the twelve-finger-broad segment of man to which alone the Talley method is applicable. In human relations he is clumsy; in his attitude toward men as men rather than as creatures in need of surgery he is unimaginative and brutal. Nothing in the world except the duodenum is likely to be the better for his existence.

The play is a comedy in the sense that it makes the audience laugh, and also in a more philosophical sense, and it need not, perhaps, mean any more than is here suggested. But without being in any formal way symbolic it almost inevitably (and no doubt intentionally) suggests a larger thesis which Mr. Behrman has suggested before. "Scientific" and revolutionary social philosophers are right when they proclaim that sympathy and benevolence and humanitarianism are as incapable as wit and fairmindedness of creating by themselves a better world. But it is also true, as "scientific" social philosophers so generally seem to forget, that a good world cannot be created without them. They are not sufficient, but they are indispensable. They are indispensable because a world in which they did not exist would not be a good world, but also because without them no Talley method and no aggregation of Talley methods can bring a good world about. Mr. Behrman first preached that thesis at a time when most intellectuals were extremely unsympathetic to it. Since then, the most famous of all Talley methods has come to be less widely acclaimed as the beginning and end of wisdom.

The leading female role in the play is performed with her usual brilliant effect by Ina Claire, who has spoken Mr. Behrman's lines on more than one previous occasion and whose manner has come to seem almost identical with his. It is relatively easy, of course, to get the proper effect out of a wisecrack but there are no wisecracks in the present play, despite the fact that it is performed to an almost continuous ripple of laughter. Indeed, there are few lines which could be detached and cited as examples of the wit which pervades the whole and it is all the more to Miss Claire's credit that she manages to make so effective the fact that so many of the lines sparkle in their context and are funny because they reveal so delicately and so expertly the author's keen perception of the implications of every situation and every attitude. Philip Merrivale in the less grateful role of the doctor is also excellent and so, for that matter, is the entire cast. Perhaps a special word should be said in praise of Hiram Sherman, as a ruefully debonnaire graduate student well aware of the fact that even the highest certificate of learning issued by a university does not guarantee its holder a welcome in this world. I hope it is not libelous to remark that Mr. Sherman suggests, in physique as well as manner, a junior Alec Woolcott.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

RECORDS

VICTOR gives us a performance of Verdi's Requiem recorded by Serafin (Set 734, $10.50). Listening to the work in the form that Serafin gives it in actual sound, I recall some of the different contours it had in Toscanini's recent performance, and the greater effect which his shaping of the music gave to its beauty and power; and I must regret that the form in sound with the greater effect is not the one that is given permanence on these records. Considered by itself Serafin's is a good performance—with the competent orchestra and excellent chorus of the Rome Opera; with Pinza, whose singing has its usual magnificence; with Maria Caniglia and Ebe Stignani, whose voices are fresh and lovely but not unflawed; and with Gigli, whose bellowing and sobbing would be more suitable for "Pagliacci."

The last-movement passacaglia of Brahms's Fourth Symphony being a series of variations on a brief opening sentence, and an important effect of the movement being the cumulative impact of this series of repetitions of the original brief sentence, one notes that Weingartner builds up this impact by maintaining the pace of the original sentence inexorably throughout the variations, whereas Koussevitzky destroys it with his many changes of pace, especially those in the second half of the movement. For this reason I would choose Weingartner's excellently recorded Columbia performance rather than the one Koussevitzky has recorded for Victor with the Boston Symphony (Set 730, $5); and though Koussevitzky's treatment of the earlier movements is very good, I am better satisfied by the greater weight of the first movement as Weingartner conducts it. The recorded sound of the Koussevitzky performance is more gorgeous; but on a high-fidelity machine it is also a little sharp.

I have not been able to compare the new Victor set of Mozart's charming Concerto K. 365 for two pianos made by José and Amparo Iturbi and the Rochester Philharmonic (Set 732, $3.50) with the older one made by Artur and Karl Ulrich Schnabel; but while the Iturbis play the work with spirit and polished fluency their phrasing includes occasional sentimentalities that I know were not in the more incisive Schnabel performance. The pianos are well recorded; but the orchestra sounds bad on a high-fidelity machine. Nor have I been able to compare the new set of Schumann's Piano Quintet made by Sanroma and the Primrose Quartet (Set 736, $4) with the older one made by Artur Schnabel and the Pro Arte Quartet; but I recall the excellence of Schnabel and Maas standing out above the mediocrity of the rest, whereas the new set offers the integrated performance of five equally fine players, and one that realizes admirably the music's warmth and intimacy of feeling. The work is Schumann's best piece of chamber music, in which, however, his powers do not function as impressively as in some of the piano works and songs. But of these, on the other hand, the "Frauenliebe und Leben" cycle are not among the best; nor are they the more impressive for the monotonously unvarying color, the excessive tremolo, the choppy phrasing of Helen Traubel's singing (Set 737, $3.75).

Stokowski's performance of the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger" with the Philadelphia Orchestra (Set 731, $2.50; with the Prelude to Act 3 of "Lohengrin" on the fourth side) distends the work enormously for breadth and emphasis; and the characteristic tonal splendor comes out a little harsh from a high-fidelity machine. There are fine passages of Handel in his Organ Concerto No. 13; the work is adequately performed by E. Power Biggs and Fiedler's Sinfonietta; the recording has the sharpness of many Boston recordings (Set 733, $2.50). And Grieg's Violin Sonata Op. 13, characteristic in its pretty melodiousness, is beautifully played by Heifetz and Bay (Set 735, $3).

Among Victor single discs one (17639, $1) offers the fine singing by John Charles Thomas of the Credo from "Otello," with an aria from "Andrea Chénier" on the reverse side; another (17610, $1) Chopin's Polonaise Brillante Op. 3, a minor piano piece transcribed for 'cello and piano and performed with verve by Feuermann and Rupp; another (4538, $.75) Scarlatti's delightful Sonata No. 387 (Longo Edition), which Casadesu recorded for Columbia with some degree of the proper sharpness, but which Myra Hess plays daintily and prettily, and her transcription of Bach's "Jesu, Joy of Man's Desiring"; another (17633, $1) Durante's "Misericordias Domini" and Palestrina's "Ecce, Quomodo Moritur," so poorly sung by the Augustana Choir as to make it difficult and pointless to evaluate the music; another (2142, $.75) Pfitzner's "Stimme der Sehnsucht" and "Michaelskirchplatz," sung by Marjorie Lawrence, which can be neglected.

Boxed with Van Loon's "Life and Times of Johann Sebastian Bach" (Simon & Schuster) is a set of four records of Bach's music played on the piano by Grace Castagnetta (Book: $2.50; Album of Records: $3; Boxed Together: $5). Most of the music and the best of it has been recorded by other artists; and there is nothing in Miss Castagnetta's performance of the Chromatic Fantasy and Fugue that should cause anyone to want it in preference to Landowska's; nor have the records any point I can discover in relation to the book. But then the Van Loon way of writing about Bach and his times is itself something I can do without, and gladly.

I have had profit and enjoyment from the little Pelican volume of E. J. Dent's "Opera." And other books which I can mention only briefly are Ernest Hutcherson's excellent "Musical Guide to Richard Wagner's 'Ring of the Nibelungs'" (Simon & Schuster: $2.75), valuable for the person who can read musical notation; Ira W. Ford's "Traditional Music of America" (Dutton: $5); the Supplementary Volume of Grove's Dictionary (Macmillan: $5), in which—to consider only one example—you can discover that Toscanini has conducted in London, in Bayreuth, in Salzburg, in recent years, but not in New York; and Curt Sachs's exhaustive "History of Musical Instruments" (Norton: $5), on p. 449 of which he writes that those who wanted Bach played on his own instruments were "faithful not to 'history' but to art. They demanded harpsichords, gambas, ancient organs, because they knew that an organ of the nineteenth century killed Bach's severe architecture, that the thick and sensual tone of a violoncello destroyed the delicate line of a gamba composition, that a cross-stringed piano suffocated the unemotional melody of a harpsichord piece. They saw what to a painter would be self-evident, that design and color could not be separated, that an outline drawn by Raphael could not be colored with Cézanne's palette." B. H. HAGGIN

NEWS FROM HOLLYWOOD

Anthony Bower's third letter from the film capital will appear next week and fortnightly thereafter

IN THE NATION

Letters to the Editors

Panama's Pocket-Hitler

Dear Sirs: President Arnulfo Arias ("the pocket-Hitler of Panama") took another defiant step on the road to totalitarian intolerance and despotism when, by a decree of January 27, he ordered the deportation of 36-year-old Edward William (Ted) Scott, long-time editor of the Panama-American (English section) and a British subject.

Mr. Scott has been a thorn in the flesh of the Panamanian authorities, not because he interfered in "internal partisan political questions of the country," as the deportation order untruthfully says, but because of his undaunted stand for democracy in the face of the government's more and more obvious Nazi-Fascist sympathies.

A New Zealander by birth and for many years a successful prizefighter, Ted Scott became a journalist some fifteen years ago and showed in his new profession the hard-hitting technique and pugnaciousness he had acquired in the ring. He never meddled in the internal politics of Panama. There is a Spanish section of the Panama-American to deal with such questions, and for this section Ted Scott was in no way responsible. It is entirely in the hands of the owner and managing editor of the Panama-American, Mr. Harmodio Arias, the brother of Arnulfo Arias and, since Arnulfo has veered toward fascism, his irreconcilable enemy.

There can be little doubt that President Arias's violent hatred for the democratically-minded Harmodio, whose paper he wishes to ruin, has been one of the motives for arbitrarily deporting Mr. Scott. For, Scott, in his daily column "Interesting if True" contributed greatly to the Panama-American's popularity and was undoubtedly one of its publisher's best assets.

Behind the President's discretionary order is the influence of his avowedly fascist adviser, Antonio Isaza, former Panamanian consul in Hamburg and now editor of the pro-Nazi La Tribuna. Isaza has already done much to poison the good relations between the United States and Panama. In this connection one need only recall that it was Isaza who urged President Arias to cancel the Rio Hato concession, thus depriving the United States army of an already prepared aerodrome and practice bombing field. Isaza is also founder of a miniature Panamanian Gestapo called the SIPA or Society of Anonymous Political Information, and he inspired the recent setting-up of a semi-military youth organization, the Cachorros (Cubs) de Ur-raca, which is modeled on the Fascist Balilla.

When President Arias came into power, on October 1, 1940, he chose Isaza for his private secretary and principal political adviser. Recently the story was spread in Washington that President Arias had decided to drop Isaza in order to better the relations between Panama and the United States. But Isaza's acts continue to belie President Arias's assurances, and the deportation of editor Ted Scott is typical Isaza handiwork.

That the expulsion of Mr. Scott from Panama has nothing to do with internal politics becomes clear if one recalls what happened on November 30 of last year. On this occasion Mr. Scott was hauled by a police officer before the Secretary of Government and Justice, Ricardo Adolfo de la Guardia, to receive formal warning that "Panama is neutral in the European conflict in word and in deed."

The warning was the aftermath of a complaint by the Italian Minister, who had taken offense at a news broadcast by Mr. Scott after a British blow to Mussolini's fleet in the Mediterranean. The news, rather than the broadcast, wounded the feelings of the Italian envoy.

When Mr. Scott continued to run his section of the paper on clean-cut anti-Axis lines—and his pen was generally regarded as the sharpest weapon thrust at the dictators by any journalist south of the Rio Grande—the Panamanian government, prodded by the Axis envoys, decided on strong action.

The deportation order signed, Mr. Scott was arrested and for three days held incomunicado at the Carcel Modelo. Then he was taken away under guard and on January 31 put aboard a ship for New York.

In American circles in Panama, where Mr. Scott is tremendously popular, the news of his deportation was received with dismay and indignation. Everybody is wondering just how long Panama's pocket-Hitler is to be allowed to play with fire under Uncle Sam's nose.

JOACHIM JOESTEN
Costa Rica, February 24

Franz Kafka

Dear Sirs: In his review of "Franz Kafka: A Miscellany" (The Nation, February 22), Mr. Rahv conveys the impression that my essay in this volume is solely concerned with a "class analysis" of Kafka. This is an amazing distortion of a treatment which devotes at most three pages (out of 23) to a general sketch of Kafka's Austrian-Czech-Jewish background, with a few passing references to its social implications. The essay, as a whole, attempts an analysis of Kafka's psychological alienation and of his metaphysical loneliness, resulting from the dilemma he saw in the ambivalence of the father-principle. The subtitle "Pre-Fascist Exile" which arouses Mr. Rahv's indignation against the publisher also, suggests only that Kafka experienced the sense of exile even before fascism came to give it the present accent. There is no point in going into Mr. Rahv's further distortions, such as that I impute "revolutionary motives" to K. (in that "he advances" on "The Castle," where Joseph K. was only a defendant), except as illustrating the familiar trick of isolating a parenthetical aspect of a work, treating it as though it were the whole, and then sneering at it. Mr. Rahv, in his present Marxist orientation, is apparently offended at my brief reference to Kafka's social situation, but that does not prevent him from confining himself exclusively to the social references in the essay.

HARRY SLOCHOWER
Brooklyn, N. Y., February 27

Dear Sirs: Mr. Slochower, who claims he has been misrepresented, apparently lacks the courage to back up his critical commitments. It is simply not true that only the first three pages of his essay are concerned with the political and sociological background of Kafka's work. What about the long analysis, which follows the initial three pages, in which Mr. Slochower attempts to demonstrate that Kafka's three novels mirror the developing political situation of his age, with "America" reflecting pre-war optimism, "The Trial" the wartime pessimism of 1914-18, and "The Castle" the renewed optimism called forth by the revolutionary events of the post-war years? Moreover, what about the idea that K.'s association with the barmaids Frieda and Pepi illustrates his tendency to form a united front with the oppressed members of the village community against the hierarchy entrenched in the castle? Such an analysis is an obvious example of the "he-too-belongs-to-us" school of criticism which in recent years has found both its apotheosis and its grave in the pages of the New Masses. Of course, it is not against any political approach to the Kafka problem that I protested in my review, but against Mr. Slochower's particular political approach, which seems to me not only irrelevant but wholly misleading. And the phrase "pre-fascist exile," which Mr. Slochower has used in such a conspicuous manner, fully expresses the wilfully tendentious spirit of his essay. There is no valid critical reason that I can see for stretching Kafka's metaphysical meanings so as to domesticate him inside our present political environment. If Kafka is to be characterized as a "pre-fascist exile," why not call Dostoevski, who was sentenced to penal servitude in Siberia, a pre-Stalinist prisoner? Clearly, if one puts one's mind to it, there is no limit to the political tag-lines one could attach to the great writers of the past.

PHILIP RAHV

New York, March 3

Lincoln's Faith

Dear Sirs: As an editor of the writings of Abraham Lincoln, I feel called upon to correct a misstatement made by Merwin K. Hart in his comment on the National Association of Manufacturers' recent report on textbooks. Mr. Hart said that "Lincoln did not use the word democracy but spoke of the republic."

This is entirely untrue. Lincoln not only used the word democracy; he defined it very well. In his message to Congress in special session, dated July 4, 1861, he made a statement which is peculiarly fitting today. "This issue embraces more than the fate of these United States. It presents to the whole family of man the question whether a constitutional republic or democracy—a government of the people by the same people—can or cannot maintain its territorial integrity against its own domestic foes."

In his reply to Douglas in the fifth joint debate at Galesburg, Illinois, on October 7, 1858, Lincoln said: "I presume that Judge Douglas could not go into Russia and announce the doctrine of our national democracy; he could not denounce the doctrine of kings and emperors and monarchies in Russia; and it may be true of this country that in some places we may not be able to proclaim a doctrine as clearly true as the truth of democracy, because there is a section so directly opposed to it that they will not tolerate us in doing so. Is it the true test of the soundness of a doctrine that in some places people won't let you proclaim it? Is that the way to test the truth of any doctrine?"

In the Chicago Historical Society there is an autographic manuscript reading as follows:

"As I would not be a slave, so I would not be a master. This expresses my idea of democracy. Whatever differs from this, to the extent of the difference, is no democracy. A. Lincoln."

Mr. Hart's statement that the word democracy did not come into common usage until Woodrow Wilson employed it during the First World War is equally untrue. De Tocqueville's "Democracy in America" (published in 1835) is too well known to need citation. The Oxford English Dictionary traces the word back to the early sixteenth century and quotes a definition dated 1574. "The Democratian commonwealth . . . is the government of the people; where all their counsell and aduise is had together in one."

A subtle attack on democracy is part and parcel of the world-wide attack on the liberties of free people everywhere—an attack now being fostered from within our borders by men like Mervin K. Hart. Their technique obviously has more in common with Hitler's than with Lincoln's, for it was Hitler who praised the use of a lie so impudent that it would be believed.

Lincoln astutely forecast this betrayal of our liberties from within when he wrote about Thomas Jefferson in a letter to H. L. Pierce (April 6, 1859). "The principles of Jefferson are the definitions and axioms of free society. And yet they are denied and evaded with no small show of success. One dashing call them 'glittering generalities.' Another bluntly calls them 'self-evident lies.' And others insidiously argue that they apply to 'superior races.' These expressions, differing in form, are identical in object and effect—the supplanting of the principles of free government, and restoring those of classification, caste, and legitimacy. They would delight a convocation of crowned heads plotting against the people. They are the vanguard, the miners and sappers of returning despotism. We must repulse them, or they will subjugate us. . . . All honor to Jefferson—to the man, who, in the concrete pressure of a struggle for national independence by a single people had the coolness, forecast, and capacity to introduce into a merely revolutionary document an abstract truth, applicable to all men and all times, and so to embalm it there that today and in all coming days it shall be a rebuke and a stumbling-block to the very harbingers of reappearing tyranny and oppression."

PHILIP VAN DOREN STERN

Brooklyn, N. Y., March 3

CONTRIBUTORS

A. HARDY, a member of the British Labor Party, is a trade-union organizer and an authority on trade unionism. He is a frequent contributor to the New Statesman and Nation.

BROOKS ATKINSON is the drama critic of the New York Times and author of several books.

HARRY BLOCK is The Nation's Mexican correspondent.

JAMES WECHSLER, formerly on the staff of The Nation, is now a labor reporter on PM.

EDGAR ANSEL MOWRER, the distinguished foreign correspondent, was for many years chief of the Chicago Daily News bureau in Berlin.

THOMAS REED POWELL is Story professor of law at the Harvard University Law School.

FRANZ HOELLERING, a native of Vienna, was for many years editor of the Berliner Zeitung. He has recently published a novel named "The Defenders."

ELISEO VIVAS is assistant professor of philosophy at the University of Wisconsin.

LOUIS B. SALOMON is a member of the English Department of Brooklyn College.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 55 Fifth Ave., New York. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 152

NEW YORK · SATURDAY · MARCH 15, 1941

NUMBER 11

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

EDITORIALS

Road to Asia Minor	284
Which Way Japan?	285
Insurance Under Fire	286

ARTICLES

Wheeler's Cliveden Set by I. F. Stone	287
Yugoslavia Yields by R. H. Markham	289
Chemicals for War by Jack Schuyler	291
Turkish Dilemma by Peter Stevens	294
Putsch in Java by George Pepper	295
Everybody's Business by Keith Hutchison	296
In the Wind	297
A Native at Large by Jonathan Daniels	298

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Notes by the Way by Margaret Marshall	299
Eye-Witness by Pierre van Paassen	299
Tragic History by Hans Kohn	300
A New Reading of Shelley by Sherman Conrad	301
The Finnish-Russian War by Harvey S. Ford	304
Films: Academy Awards by Anthony Bower	305
Music by B. H. Haggin	306

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

307

Editor and Publisher

FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor

ROBERT BENDINER

Washington Editor

I. F. STONE

Literary Editor

MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors

KEITH HUTCHISON MAXWELL S. STEWART

Dramatic Critic

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager and Director of Circulation

HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager

MARY HOWARD ELLISON

The Shape of Things

THE DRAWN-OUT DEBATES IN CONGRESS ON the Lease-Lend bill at times seemed to exemplify Hitler's sneers at the hopeless inefficiency of democratic processes. But now the bill has become law, after minority opinion has been given ample opportunity to express itself, we have a chance to make up for lost time by rallying around the President and making it possible for him to use his new powers swiftly and effectively. Senator Vandenberg has given a good lead by pointing out that even the emphatic two-to-one vote in the Senate for the bill did not represent the true extent of the desire to aid Britain, which was shown more exactly by the fact that 90 out of 95 Senators supported either the bill itself or the Taft substitute. We hope Axis commentators will ponder these figures, which should also serve as a warning to Senator Wheeler and his fellow irreconcilables who are threatening a raging, tearing campaign throughout the country in opposition to the principles of the Lease-Lend Act. For if the Republicans now gracefully accept the fait accompli, these "crusaders" will have to seek support among a motley assembly of dubious elements—Coughlinites, assorted fascists, Jew-baiters, and Communist fellow-travelers. Anticipating the passage of the bill the President is believed to have plans drawn up for making it immediately effective. The news that Britain lost 148,000 tons of shipping in the week ending March 2 should act as a spur. Hitler's spring Blitz has begun. Let us speed the tools to counteract it.

★

BRITAIN'S REJECTION OF MR. HOOVER'S PLAN for establishing experimental soup kitchens in Belgium preparatory to developing methods of feeding the peoples of other occupied nations may seem harsh. But the arguments brought forward are impressive and Mr. Hoover in his reply has not succeeded in controverting them. The British position is that the blockade is directed against the whole economic machine of the enemy, intended not only to deprive him of imported goods but to drive him into using uneconomic methods of production and distribution, and to aggravate transport problems so as to interfere with military operations. A recent report by the official Berlin Institute for Research into Economic Trends concluded "Germany is in a position to guarantee the feeding of every single individual on the continent of Europe." And this is true provided food is not used as an industrial raw material, for instance in distilling industrial alcohol from potatoes, and is given transport priority. Mr. Hoover claims he has promises from Berlin that breadstuffs and soup materials will be released for Belgium if his plan goes through. But the Germans will have to release such supplies, in any case, because they are attempting to exploit Belgium economically and cannot permit its workers and their families to starve. Another point on which Mr. Hoover's assurances are inadequate is the administration of his relief scheme. He promises complete American supervision but who will service the actual soup kitchens? We know that in Spain food provided by the American Red Cross is being handed out by a Falangist organization and used as a political argument. Would the same thing be done in Belgium by the Nazi "Winter Relief" or a Rexist organization?

✱

ADMIRAL DARLAN, VICHY DEPUTY PREMIER, recently made a bitter attack on the blockade and threatened to use the French navy to convoy foodships. He declared that the blockade was useless as a weapon against the Germans, whom he described as "more generous and more understanding of the needs of humanity than the English." And, as an illustration, he pointed out that Germany had released for consumption in the occupied zone two million quintals of French wheat out of 2,700,000 previously requisitioned for the German army. As an example of Nazi generosity this appears a trifle ironical: it seems rather a striking proof of the effectiveness of the British blockade. There is no doubt that Germany is egging on Vichy to break the blockade, hoping that embroilment with the British navy may bring France back into the war as an Axis ally. The United States could do much to spoil this effort by making it clear to Marshal Pétain that America's vital interests call for a British victory and that it will discourage blockade-running by refusing to sell food or provide financial facilities.

✱

THE RAID ON THE LOFOTEN ISLANDS, OFF Northern Norway, carried out last week by a joint British and Norwegian naval squadron, has a significance beyond its immediate results. Not that these are unimportant: 18,000 tons of shipping and an armed German trawler were sunk, a big glycerine plant—useful for explosives—destroyed, and 215 Germans and ten "Quislingists" captured. In addition, the raiders were able to recruit a number of volunteers for the Norwegian forces in Britain and leave supplies for the inhabitants of the islands. But, beyond all, this successful expedition must have sent a thrill of hope throughout Norway. We may be sure that there will be more British raids of this kind not only on Norway but on other occupied countries. For if the long stretch of Europe's coastline which he controls is an advantage to Hitler, it also carries its hazards. Not all his men can guard every mile of it and a time will come when larger expeditions will be landed, bringing arms for those now fighting with bare hands. The first news of the Lofoten raid was a statement from Berlin saying that it lacked "any military importance whatever." To those versed in Nazi methods this nonchalant account clearly indicated an attempt to forestall the British story which could not be published until the return of the expedition. But now the Germans have exposed the falsity of their own report by a dispatch stating that the Nazi commissioner Terboven had ordered the burning of all property belonging to the families of men who volunteered to go with the British, and levied a large fine on the inhabitants of the island for the benefit of the families of those taken prisoner.

✱

WE CONGRATULATE THE STATE DEPARTMENT on its decision to close down two Italian consulates—a step which we advocated in these pages on February 22. We are glad also to note that the Italian embassy has been asked to restrict movements of consular officers to their own districts and to report to the State Department any journey by military and naval attachés. For all the formality of its diplomatic wording, Mr. Hull's communication to the Italian ambassador makes no attempt to conceal the fact that this action is retaliation for the closing of two American embassies in Italy and for the much more severe restrictions to which our representatives in Italy have recently been forced to submit. This firm action should serve as a salutary warning to the Axis against kicking our interests around.

✱

JOURNALISTIC BOOBY PRIZE OF THE WEEK goes to the editors of the New York Times for their handling of the press conference at which the President pointed out that strikes have affected only about one quarter of one per cent of defense industry at any one time. Had Mr. Roosevelt deplored strikes in defense industries, one may be sure it would have been in headlines. As it was, the Times carefully sandwiched the President's statement inside a story based on a War Department press release about a minor airport building strike at Dayton, Ohio. Neither the head nor the subhead referred to what Mr. Roosevelt had said. This is in accord with the policy of most newspapers in playing up every strike they can find. The purpose is to whip up hysteria for legislative action curbing labor's rights. The Times added hypocrisy to distortion the next day with an editorial expressing great surprise over what Mr. Roosevelt had said. It wanted to know his sources. The source is the Bureau of Labor Statistics. Every Washington correspondent has been in possession of the figures for some time. In contrast to the phony surprise of the Times is the testimony of a conservative confidential news service from Washington, written for people who can afford to pay a big price and do not need to be fooled. It says that the only two serious stoppages on defenses have been the Vultee and Allis-Chalmers strikes. If the President's figures do, indeed, differ "so radically from the public impression regarding the situation," it is because the public has been given a distorted picture by its newspapers, the Times among them.

★

THESE SAME NEWSPAPERS WERE MUCH LESS reticent about playing up President Roosevelt's pronouncement on jurisdictional strikes a day or so later. We can understand the President's strong feeling over the hampering of defense production by walkouts based on no ground other than the employment of men belonging to a competitive union. But the problem is not always so simple; employers have been known to cultivate jurisdictional situations to their own advantage. Nor do we see the need for a new super-board to handle labor mediation. Philip Murray of the C. I. O., in a memorandum submitted to Sidney Hillman last week, forcefully argued the case against a new agency of this sort. If it is merely to mediate, Murray asks, why not add to the manpower of our efficient United States Conciliation Service? In the event of some major strike in a great industry, the President has power to name a special board, as he did in the case of the steel strike. But the proposal to establish a new labor board with power "to formulate policies on labor relations and practices in defense industries with a view to avoiding delays" opens the door to modifications of the Wage-Hour, Wagner, and Walsh-Healey Acts. No new agency is needed if these laws are to be enforced, and if they are enforced there will be less cause for strikes. Big business wants the board as a bulwark against unionism and a means of suspending labor reforms "during the emergency."

★

A FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION REPORT ON canning corporations is of interest in this connection. For it throws ironic light on the recent effort to use the canners as an entering wedge for suspension of overtime provisions on defense contracts. The effort was unsuccessful but may be renewed. The report shows that the canning industry is in an unusually profitable condition. In 1939 our ten leading fruit-and-vegetable-canning corporations earned a return of 13 per cent on their stockholders' investment after payment of all bond interest and taxes, including income taxes. Canning seems to be one of the few industries in this country of which the profits are as great as its wage bill. Production wages and salaries in 1939 were $24,641,523; net income after taxes was $24,616,556. The ratio of wages to other items was unusually low; less than ten cents on every dollar of sales went to wages. This means that a 10 per cent increase in wages would amount to a one per cent increase in total price. The canners already have so many exemptions under the Walsh-Healey Act that less than one-tenth of government purchases from the industry has been subject to it; and so many exemptions from the Wage-Hour law that the canners can operate twenty-eight weeks a year without payment of overtime for work beyond forty hours a week. Like the Associated Farmers, the canners provide a useful front for big business.

★

DESPERATE EFFORTS ARE BEING MADE BY conservative commentators to erect the molehill of rebuke in the Supreme Court's 5-3 decision in the Express Publishing Company case into a mountainous obstacle to the Labor Board's powers. A sweeping board order against a San Antonio newspaper was reduced by the majority of the board to a restraint against the practices of which the paper had been guilty. The majority, speaking through Justice Stone, agrees with the minority that the violator of a law "may be restrained from committing other related unlawful acts." But on the facts of this case it saw no reason for an order which went beyond instructing the newspaper to bargain with its employees. The minority—Justice Douglas speaking for himself and Justices Black and Reed—seem to agree with the majority on the facts in this case. But it fears that to restrict the order might invite the employer to evade other provisions of the Act. The danger is obvious; the remedy for violations is but slowly obtained. We prefer the minority's reasoning but the majority leaves little comfort for those seeking new ways of hamstringing the Wagner Act. It warns that though board restraining orders cannot go beyond the practices of which the employer was guilty, the court will not permit evasion of the order "by indirections or formal observances which in fact defy it."

★

ONE RESULT OF THE NATION'S EDITORIAL on housing in its issue of February 1 is that the White House has asked Harold E. Pomeroy, formerly executive secretary of the Associated Farmers, to resign as aide to Defense Housing Coordinator Charles Palmer. Palmer placed Pomeroy in charge of the home registration division. It is the job of this division to advise local defense-housing bodies and aid them in taking legal steps to maintain normal rentals for housing. As The Nation said, Mr. Pomeroy is "not a vigilante or a thug or a fascist" as his connection with the sinister Associated Farmers might imply. He seems to have found working for them distasteful, and resigned after but a year in office. But his long associations with reactionary business and political circles in California make him a poor choice for a job that calls for a certain militancy, independence, and willingness to buck powerful interests. Mr. Pomeroy, we are informed, has refused to resign, and it remains to be seen whether his chief will oust him. A correspondent claims that our editorial did some injustice to Coordinator Palmer's housing record in Atlanta in the past, and on investigation we believe the objection well taken. It is also encouraging to report that recent criticism seems to have left Mr. Palmer less ready to compromise. Maybe he will yet prove that the National Association of Real Estate Boards was too hasty in supporting him. We hope so, but we are still keeping our fingers crossed. After all it was Palmer who picked Pomeroy.

★

WE HOPE THAT THE HOUSE WILL APPROVE a resolution introduced by Congressman John J. Sparkman of Alabama to extend the life of the Tolan committee investigating conditions among our migratory workers. A large amount of migration has been made necessary by the defense program. About 65 per cent of primary defense contracts, as Federal Security Commissioner Paul V. McNutt points out, are in the Northeast and Pacific states, which have only about 40 per cent of our unemployed labor. McNutt joined with Defense Commissioners Chester C. Davis and Harriet V. Elliott in urging that Congress continue the work of the Tolan committee. For the problem of defense labor migrations, with the burdens they may impose locally on community facilities for housing, education, health, welfare, and recreation, can be met effectively only if we are in full possession of the facts. Inquiry is needed not merely to help in the reallocation of labor but also in laying the groundwork for solution of the problems inevitably created for the post-war period by these temporary shifts in population. Serious situations have already developed at many points. The Tolan committee and its staff, with a year's study behind it, is the only governmental agency qualified to deal with these special problems.

★

SHERWOOD ANDERSON, WHO DIED LAST week at sixty-four, was one of the leaders in the literary revolt against the American small town which gave us the "Spoon River Anthology" and "Main Street." His "Winesburg, Ohio" was no less sharp in its strictures about the frustrations and consequent distortions of life and of the individual constrained in village mores, but as Carl Van Doren pointed out in The Nation at the time, Anderson still cherished the memories of some specific Winesburg. He revolted personally against his own small town of Elmyra, Ohio, where he had "settled down" as manager of a paint factory after a turn in the Spanish-American war. He went to Chicago where he met and came under the tutelage of the group which included Theodore Dreiser, Carl Sandburg, and others. During the next decade, he wrote his best books, including "Winesburg," living in various cities at home and abroad. But as soon as he could get the money together he bought a newspaper in the small town of Marion, Virginia, and his last book was "Home Town," a nostalgic celebration of the "specific Winesburg" he continued to cherish. This does not mean, however, that he had come to accept the poverties and the stupidities of small-town life. It was rather that, as he wrote in "A Story Teller's Story," he wanted "as all men do, to be long," a desire which finds no satisfaction in the rootlessness of life in American cities.

Road to Asia Minor

HITLER'S ostentatious diplomatic offensive in the Balkans may be a feint but we are inclined to regard it as the prelude to his major spring campaign. This would mean that he had accepted the fact that, for the time being, the Western front is deadlocked, just as it was by the trench system of the last war, with the Channel taking the place of No Man's Land. In these circumstances attempts at invasion would have to be postponed until aerial bombardment and the submarine blockade had weakened the island's powers of resistance.

Meanwhile, where could the German army, which is eating its head off, be more profitably employed than in sundering Britain's imperial life-line in the Near East? It is difficult to regard the massive movement of German troops into the Balkans as a mere rescue party for Mussolini. Yet if the Nazi march stopped at the shores of the Aegean, that is about all it would accomplish. For the British would be left in possession of Crete, their navy would still be master of the eastern Mediterranean, and they would continue to control the oilfields of Iraq and Iran. It is impossible, therefore, to explain the efforts now being made to take Yugoslavia and Greece into the Axis unless it is planned to use these countries as way-stations for the invasion of Turkey and the use of that country in turn as a base for still wider conquests.

In the Balkans the role of the German army is still secondary to that of the diplomatists and propagandists. It remains very visibly in the background, spreading out over Bulgaria and along the Greek and Turkish frontiers, consolidating its positions for a spring offensive when the word is given. Meanwhile every psychological device known to the Nazi masters of terror is being used to hammer on the taut nerves of those countries which have not yet submitted to the Axis. A stream of rumors pours forth day after day from the German agencies and the many news sources in Belgrade, Budapest, and other cities which are under German control or influence.

A few days ago Yugoslavia seemed really to succumb, at least to the extent of signing a non-aggression pact which would effectively neutralize that country during German operations against Greece. But some hitch in the negotiations has occurred which at the time of going to press has not been explained. According to some accounts, Hitler is not satisfied with the compromise proposed by the Yugoslav government in the hope that it would be allowed to remain a bystander in the Balkan troubles, but insists on full adherence to the Axis, and, presumably, on the right to occupy the country. Other reports speak of growing popular opposition to any deal.

Until this matter is settled, the Nazis will be unable to turn their full heat on Greece. There are rumors of a German ultimatum to Athens but this seems unlikely. Hitler does not usually present an ultimatum until either its acceptance has been assured by "unofficial" representations or the invasion of the threatened country has actually started. But no doubt the German envoy in Athens is hard at work combining bullying with cajolment. One moment he will draw attention to the Panzer divisions waiting at the border and to the planes ready to take off from Bulgarian airports; the next, he will praise Greek valor in the war against Italy, hint that all has been done that honor demands, and suggest that co-operation with the Axis now will give Greece a preferred position at the peace table.

So far there is no indication that the Greek government is weakening. Its position, truly, is difficult in the extreme. We do not know what undertaking Mr. Eden was able to give during his recent visit but it seems improbable that enough British troops can be spared to make certain of checking a German invasion at the border. Britain cannot afford to risk another Dunkirk at Salonika and it may feel bound to hold such reserves as it has for the eventual defense of the Straits in conjunction with Turkey.

Yet desperate as their situation appears, the Greeks continue to insist that they will never surrender but will fight for every inch of their country. And while they make preparations to meet German invasion in the Struma valley they continue to press the Italians hard in central Albania. It seems likely, therefore, that Hitler's hope of a bloodless conquest of the Balkans will be dashed by a nation who, in the proud words of a Greek journalist, "will show to the world how to die as she has shown the world how to fight."

It seems improbable, too, that Turkey will respond to the Nazi spider's soft invitation to "walk into my parlor." Special messengers flew to Ankara last week bearing, it was reported, an assurance from Hitler that he had no intention of invading Turkey and was only anxious for friendship and peaceful trade relations. The Turkish government has yet to respond officially to this overture, but very wisely, considering the fate of those who have previously listened to this siren message, it is mobilizing more troops and making other defensive preparations. As a correspondent points out on page 294 of this issue, Turkey is in a difficult dilemma. It has a large army but is short of equipment and is particularly vulnerable to air attacks and ill-prepared to meet them. If it fulfills the strict letter of its obligations to Greece, it may leave its own flank open to attack. At present it seems to be playing for time and possibly it has assurances from Britain that aid is on the way. But whether or not Turkey takes the initiative when Greece is attacked, there is general agreement that any assault on its own independence would be resisted to the end. And since Turkey commands the only land route for the conquest of the Near East, that assault seems inevitable in the near future unless Russia, whose interests are also at stake, plucks up courage to oppose Hitler with something more awesome than post facto protests.

Which Way Japan?

WITH Vichy's acceptance of the Japanese-imposed peace terms, Tokyo achieved another bloodless victory in its campaign for the mastery of Southeast Asia. Under the settlement, the French surrender to Thailand all territory in Pakse and Luang Prabang provinces west of the Mekong River as well as a strip varying up to twenty-five miles in breadth along Cambodia's north and west frontiers.

Details of what Japan obtained for itself as a result of the agreement have not yet been released, but they are probably more significant than Thailand's gains. It may be taken for granted that Japan's previous penetration of the northern portion of the colony will be extended southward to include the strategic area around Saigon. Whether Japan will be granted access to the naval bases now existing in that region is not yet clear, but it may be assumed that it will take over the bases as soon as they are required. Furthermore, as a price for obtaining Vichy's capitulation, Tokyo is expected to exact heavy payment from Thailand. Not much is likely to be said publicly about the terms of this payment, but if Japan's next step is to be, as many observers believe, a drive against Burma, Thailand will doubtless serve as the chief base for the drive.

It would be dangerous to assume, however, that such a drive is inevitable. Despite the ease of its Indo-China victory, Tokyo is obviously at odds concerning its next step. The military clique wants to move on; it believes that there will never be another time more suitable for Japan to achieve its historic destiny. But naval and civilian elements have opposed precipitant action, preferring to await the outcome of the Battle of Britain.

That Japan's next drive is still unsettled despite innumerable bellicose statements regarding Japan's future in Southwest Asia may be surmised from Foreign Minister Matsuoka's sudden decision to visit Berlin. The trip is open to many interpretations. Some commentators assume that he has gone to Berlin to receive orders from headquarters. This, however, hardly seems likely. Japan probably received its orders quite some time ago, and it may be guessed that they called for an attack on Britain's Asiatic possessions prior to, or simultaneously with, the Nazi drive in the Mediterranean and the North Atlantic. But the Navy group asks why a weakened Japan should risk a simultaneous conflict with Britain and the United States when it is evident that neither Berlin nor Rome is in a position to aid their eastern Axis partner. And they argue that the least Berlin can do is bring pressure on Moscow forcing the Soviets into a non-aggression pact with Japan so as to prepare the way for a drive to the south. The Japanese have been trying to get a non-aggression pact with the Soviet Union for six months, but the most they have been able to achieve so far is a temporary fisheries agreement and the settlement of one or two minor trade matters. Matsuoka is scheduled to stop in Moscow, and it is no secret that he hopes to return with some sort of general treaty in his pocket.

Faced with a demand for concrete assistance, Hitler is likely to bluster and threaten to cut Japan off from the benefits of an Axis victory in Europe. Six months ago these tactics might have been successful. Germany was then confident that it could win without Japanese aid, and the Japanese themselves seem to have been persuaded to this viewpoint when they signed the Tripartite Pact. But the situation has changed and no one knows it better than the clever Matsuoka.

In the end Hitler can hardly escape making concessions to Japan, and it may be assumed that renewed pressure will be brought on Moscow to achieve a Soviet-Japanese treaty. Moscow is reported to be making stiff demands for such a treaty, and Tokyo is said to be prepared, in part at least, to grant them. These appear to include restoration of the North Manchuria railway to Soviet control, and surrender by Japan of the southern part of Sakhalin Island. But the larger question of continued Soviet aid to China remains a stumbling block. Moscow has made sacrifices to prevent Japanese domination of China, and it is hardly likely to yield on this point at a moment when its bargaining position is stronger than it has ever been. A Soviet-Japanese pact, then, would almost certainly make some vital provision regarding China. What this provision would be can only be guessed. It is known that Japan has offered peace terms to China on several occasions, and it is reported that these terms have been increasingly liberal. It is not impossible therefore that Matsuoka will ask Germany to undertake settlement of the Chinese war as a price for a Japanese drive against Britain in the South Seas.

Insurance Under Fire

THE shortcomings of America's traditional forms of life insurance have never been more thoroughly demonstrated than in the summary, just released, of the hearings of the Temporary National Economic Committee. Life insurance is shown to be America's greatest business enterprise. The 365 companies engaged in this business have an annual income totaling more than $5 billion, or only slightly less than the receipts of the United States government. The face value of the 124 million outstanding policies is $111 billion—nearly double our national income in recent years. Assets of the twenty-six largest companies are $28 billion and are expected to reach from $37 billion to $40 billion by 1950, which is about the size of our national debt before the present emergency. The ten largest companies control 70 per cent of the assets possessed by all the companies—a concentration of wealth and economic power comparable only to that enjoyed by our great banks.

Some idea of the extent of the economic power wielded by the life insurance companies may be gained from the ubiquitous presence of directors and executives of these companies on the boards of other business enterprises. The 135 directors of the five largest life insurance companies were found to be serving as directors of 100 other insurance companies, of 145 banks and other financial institutions, and of no less than 534 industrial, real estate, or other corporations—a total of some 780 other corporations. Many instances are cited in which this interlocking had definite influence on the apportionment of funds or other business favors. In general it was found that the life insurance companies—with their huge accumulations of money saved by men of moderate means—favored big industries as against small industries in making their investments. Life-insurance executives are quoted to show that industrial loans of under $100,000 are not wanted and are practically never made. The bulk of investments are in United States government bonds, mortgages, railroad and public utility bonds, real estate, and policy loans. Antiquated laws governing the legal investments of such companies are, of course, chiefly responsible for the essentially unproductive use of the life insurance companies' huge reservoir of capital, but the companies themselves were found to be largely uninterested in the broader economic and social implications of their investment policies.

If the life insurance companies were efficiently performing the task for which they were established, we might be disposed to overlook some of the evils which have arisen in connection with their growth and operation. For there can be no denying that the protection of families against want arising from the premature death of the family breadwinner is of the greatest social importance. Yet despite the 124 million policies, the investigation shows that the companies have failed conspicuously in their main task. The great majority of American families are virtually unprotected against the economic hazards associated with the death of a chief wage-earner, and those who have protection pay far more than they should for this essential service. This is most evident in the case of industrial insurance—which is the only insurance carried by most low-income families. Out of nearly 200 million industrial policies terminated between 1928 and 1937, only 4.45 per cent were terminated by death and less than one per cent by maturity. "Thus," the TNEC report observes, "only slightly more than 5 per cent of the policies which go off the books . . . terminate in a manner which represents the accomplishment of the purpose for which the insurance must be deemed to have been taken out." Taking all insurance together, ordinary as well as industrial, we find that 78 per cent lapses or is surrendered, and that only 22 per cent is paid out either as death benefits or as matured policies. The lapses represented a loss to the policyholders—and a gain for the companies—of some $66 million a year between 1918 and 1937.

The cost of insurance to policyholders is shown to be high beyond any economic justification. This is attributed to a number of factors, including the costs of blundering, high-pressure salesmanship; unnecessary multiplicity of policies; the difficulties placed in the way of the prospective policyholder who seeks to compare costs between policies or between companies; and excessive overhead. Amazing differences are revealed in the costs of similar policies taken out with various companies—differences which are not revealed by merely studying the rates. For example, we find that the net cost of a standard $1,000 policy from the most expensive company is more than three times that of the company granting the most advantageous terms.

Apart from suggestions for the remedying of minor abuses, the TNEC report carries no recommendations for the solution of the grave problem arising from the failure of legal reserve life insurance to do the job set out for it. Savings-bank life insurance is praised for its economy, but its record in Massachusetts does not suggest that it will ever meet the insurance needs of the majority of the population. On the contrary, that state's thirty-eight-year experience shows rather conclusively that the families needing protection most cannot be relied upon to take the initiative in seeking it. Nor can they safely be left to the mercy of high-pressure salesmanship. As with unemployment, old-age, and health protection, voluntary and private methods have been tried and found wanting.

All experience, both here and abroad, points to the need of compulsory, low-cost survivors' insurance if basic protection is to be afforded. A start in this direction has been made in the revised Social Security Act. But it is evident that this protection needs to be extended and liberalized.

Wheeler's Cliveden Set

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, March 8

THE lease-lend bill, a measure no more extraordinary than the times in which we live, finally passed the Senate tonight. The future is in the hands of Mr. Roosevelt. Within a few weeks, it is probable that there will be a declaration of emergency, a move likewise without precedent. It will be imposed for its psychological effect. The hope is to obtain war-time powers at home, as abroad, without actual participation in war, a step which no responsible spokesman for the Administration regards as other than a last step, to be avoided as long as possible. The chances are that before the issuance of a declaration of this kind, a triple-barreled attack by the Axis powers, against England, in the Mediterranean, and in the Pacific, will amply provide the sense of urgency so necessary to an effective effort. The President, in his address tonight to diners commemorating the eighth anniversary of the New Deal's agricultural program, used the phrase which is the key to the period we are entering, "Total Defense."

Though it will interfere with business-as-usual, the adjective is total, not totalitarian. An opposition crystallized and united by the fight against the lease-lend bill will do its best to represent the defense effort in a sinister light, although this opposition is itself infected with the totalitarian virus. Senator Wheeler, with his excursion into Coughlinite demagoguery, seems tempted to complement his record for tolerance in the last war with a little sly dabbling in anti-Semitism in this one. Last January 11 in the columns of the Washington Daily News, Senator Wheeler debated the lease-lend bill with Senator Wagner. The Senator from Montana was generous. "There are those," he admitted, "who are honest, sincere, patriotic, Christian gentlemen who oppose a negotiated peace at this time—certainly among them is my good friend, Senator Wagner." In a radio address delivered March 3, the Montanan said, "Now we find these same international bankers with their friends the royal refugees and with the Sassoons of the Orient and with the Rothschilds and Warburgs of Europe in another theme song . . . 'Our investments in India, Africa, and Europe must be preserved. Save democracy!'"

It is becoming increasingly difficult to believe that the resemblance of such remarks to the ranting of Father Coughlin is wholly coincidental. A prominent New Dealer recently told me that when he was at the Senator's home a year ago a telephone call came in from the Detroit priest and that the conversation was long and friendly, though the Senator, after it was over, seemed somewhat embarrassed. Even more disturbing to one who wishes to believe that the Senator's recent tone is due to a temporary hysteria and not a considered position was the conversation I had with Mrs. Wheeler, who is said to exert a strong influence over her husband. The Senator, she said, was in her opinion much too tolerant of the Jews, often defending them unjustifiably in conversations in the Wheeler home. She also told me that she thought the Jews were 100 per cent for the lease-lend bill and agreed to except only one Jew—an aide of her husband's—from her sweeping allegation.

Voltaire said if there were no God, we should have to invent one. If there were no Jews, Hitler would have to invent some. In the past Senator Reynolds of North Carolina—whose "courage and ability" are praised by Senator Wheeler on page A 887 of the Congressional Record for February 25—was the only member of the upper House to show the benefits of the Third Reich's higher learning. Senator Holman of Oregon seems to have joined the happy little band. He was Reynolds's stooge on the Senate Immigration Committee in the fight against the Wagner-Rogers Child Refugee bill and he would like to save American labor from the Wagner Act. He expressed himself in opposition to Nazism but thought Hitler ought to be given credit for breaking "the control of the international bankers and traders over the rewards for the labor of the common people of Germany." Not in the same class with Wheeler, Reynolds, and Holman but in strange company lately is Senator Nye. The Senator seems to have been too busy doing research into the misdeeds of the British to catch up with those of the Third Reich. He is strongly opposed to aiding the "despotic" British Empire, but spoke at a Gerald L. K. Smith mass meeting in Detroit recently—rather odd auspices for so fervent a democrat.

We have our own Cliveden set, and its outlines became clearer during the lease-lend debate. Most of those who opposed the bill did so from considerations whose weight cannot be denied, however much one may disagree with them, and their patriotism cannot be questioned. But there was also a minority of appeasers, pro-Hitlerites, and a few native fascists who have begun to develop a vested interest in defeat, for it is only in the event of a British or Anglo-American reverse that they can hope to take power. Their anxiety is to "make the record clear"; their strategy is to inherit power in a debacle. A little anti-Semitism fits in with their plans. Their chief campaigning grounds will be in the isolationist farm belt; all Senators from Kansas, Wisconsin, North Dakota, Idaho, and Colorado voted against the lease-lend bill and one each from South Dakota, Missouri, Iowa, Nebraska, Illinois, Indiana, Minnesota, Michigan, and Ohio. The states of the Far West and all the states of New England but Maine cast one vote against lease-lend. Only Senator Reynolds from the South and "Puddler Jim" Davis from the industrial East voted against the bill. These sectional differences are likely to grow less as new victories bring the Nazis closer.

The appeasers, and their allies, have lost the battle against the lease-lend bill but intend to fight the President every step of the way as he puts it into effect. The bill itself authorizes the expenditure of but $1,300,000,000, and it will soon be necessary to ask for more. The Administration's first concern under the bill will be how to get war materials to the British, and there will probably be a fight in Congress over that as well. Convoys of American sub-chasers—the Canadians have found these small fast boats effective for the purpose—may be used to escort shipping part way across the Atlantic, not into the war zone itself but perhaps to the Azores. Long-range bombers may also be used for this purpose. More shipping may be transferred to the British, for they will need it badly, and we may soon see a heavier burden thrown upon our railroads, with freight priorities and probably government operation as in the last war. All this will coincide with a speaking tour by Wheeler, and there are reports that John L. Lewis will go back into action with a series of speeches, starting with the "shrunkened bellies" and winding up with an attack on aid to Britain.

These sour reflections aside, there is more hope now for energetic action on all-out aid than ever before. Harry Hopkins has been working for the past two weeks on plans to put the lease-lend bill into effect. The Bureau of the Budget is drawing up suggestions for a new organization of defense which will largely supersede the present set-up. The real problem, of course, is personnel, but a change in organization provides an excuse for a shake-up. Other plans are being presented to the President. The chances grow stronger that Justice Douglas will step down from the Supreme Court to become top executive of defense. It looks as though Tom Corcoran, whose energy, devotion, and enthusiasm have too long been left idle, will share direction of aircraft production with Robert Lovett. The pair of them can be trusted to see the possible uses of idle automotive equipment a good deal more clearly than Mr. Knudsen.

Yugoslavia Yields

BY R. H. MARKHAM

ADOLF HITLER has the Balkan states where he wants them. He intensified their mutual animosities, isolated them from each other, and picked them off one at a time. In fact, he hardly had to pick them at all—they just fell into his lap. Each in its turn. Now it's Yugoslavia's turn.

In each case, the Nazi Fuehrer used a special kind of squeeze. Or rather, he took advantage of a squeeze that already existed. History put a strong noose about each Balkan state, and all Hitler had to do was pull it. Pulling Yugoslavia's noose has been easiest of all. Not only is that state almost completely surrounded by Axis armies, but within it, also, are many internal Axis agents, while the Yugoslav masses, opposing the Axis, are not united among themselves.

The name Yugoslavia means South Slavia and designates the land of the South Slavs. Nearly two-fifths of all the inhabitants of Europe are Slavs. They are all marked by common traits, but are also divided into many units, widely differing one from another. In their early history they wandered over much of the continent and eventually three groups of them settled in the mountains east of the Adriatic Sea. Two of these, the Serbs and the Croats, speak languages that are as nearly identical as English and American. The third language, that of the Slovenes, is as near Serbo-Croatian as Spanish is to Portuguese. However, even though these closely related Slav peoples lived side by side in the Balkan Peninsula for a full millenium they never formed a common state until December, 1918, after the first World War, when they created the Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats and Slovenes (Yugoslavia). It was natural that after so many centuries of separation, they should find themselves faced with an extremely difficult task of consolidation and unification.

The country now embraced in Yugoslavia has always been marked by conflicts of extreme violence. There lay the chasm separating the Eastern Church from the Western, there Europe met Asia, there the cross clashed with the crescent, there Hapsburg fought Sultans. Those ferocious struggles left flaming fires of enmity in South Slav hearts. So, when these groups joined with one another in a free state of their own, they had to quench very persistent hatreds.

The twenty-two years that have passed since have not proved a long enough period for that. During this time Serbs and Croats opposed one another with violence and fury. The Serbs shot Stephen Raditch and many other noted Croatian leaders. They also threw hundreds and thousands of humbler Croats into prison. On the other side, a Croatian revolutionary organization brought about the murder of the Serbian king, Alexander. Shots were fired in Parliament, shots were fired at the throne. The Yugoslavs passionately killed each other. The Croats repeatedly threatened to secede from the new kingdom and form a state of their own.

A year and a half ago, a reconciliation was effected, a large degree of autonomy was given to the Croats, a plan was adopted for redressing their worst grievances, and an all-Yugoslav government was formed with Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes heartily co-operating. It was a decisive step forward, but even that could not at once create complete trust. The South Slavs, still mindful of centuries-old hatreds among themselves, are not able to face their enemies with any real unity. Each group still fears that the others may let it down.

Prince Paul, Regent

Another matter of extreme importance is the fact that more than two million inhabitants of Yugoslavia do not belong to any of these three South Slav groupings. There are, for instance, half a million Germans permanently living in Yugoslavia. Most of them—especially the young men—are ardent and aggressive Nazis. Their loyalty is to Berlin and they take orders from there. Like the Germans of the Sudetenland, they are the vanguard of the Nazi army. They would like to help destroy Yugoslavia in order that large parts of it could be annexed to the Reich.

In addition, there are half a million permanent Hungarian residents in Yugoslavia. Most of them inhabit areas contiguous with Hungary. Many of them feel unreservedly bound to Budapest and would like to have their cities, towns, and counties restored to the "motherland." Though they are Yugoslav subjects, they would come eagerly to the aid of Hungary in a war against Yugoslavia.

Besides these groups, there are about two-thirds of a million Macedonians, who do not feel at home in Yugoslavia and whom the Bulgarians claim as their own. Many of these Macedonians would like to be liberated from "the Yugoslav yoke." Finally, there are at least two-thirds of a million Albanians in Yugoslavia, who see no reason to sacrifice their lives for a South Slav army commander or a South Slav government. All these powerful destructive forces of foreign racial origins among the South Slavs might well prove the fatal factor in a time of crisis for the Yugoslav state.

Further, it should be noted that some of the South Slavs themselves, both Serbs and Croats, are Nazis. A number of educated, organized, and revolutionary Croatian separatists are as fanatically authoritarian as German storm troopers. They would join the devil, if thereby they could take vengeance on the Serbs, and they are very adept in using bombs and guns. These Croats would cooperate with the most desperate local Germans in opening the gates of all citadels to Hitler's invaders—and the Serb Nazis would likewise help Hitler destroy their own state. There are not many such Quislingovitches, but they are dangerous.

Finally, there is no strong king to curb all this dissension and rally the loyal forces. Yugoslavia is ruled by three regents in the name of a boy sovereign, whose father was assassinated six years ago. Prince Paul, the chief regent, is a very cautious man.

The German army, disengaged in both the west and the east, is free to throw its full force against the South Slav kingdom and there are no strong natural barriers to prevent its advance. As it swept in with tanks and stukas, it would be welcomed by local Germans scattering flowers, waving swastikas, and shrieking "Hail, Victory!" It could reduce Zagreb and Belgrade to Coventries in two days if Yugoslavia were to resist.

Side by side with the Nazi invaders would march the armies of Hungary, another member of the Axis. For twenty years the Hungarians have been shouting with all their might, "Everything back! Everything back!" Now that cry is reaching the fury of a tempest. Hungarian soldiers have whetted their swords and are restless to swoop down the Danube valley, charge across plains as level as a floor, and reoccupy Yugoslav areas which all Hungarians consider an inalienable part of the millennial kingdom of St. Stephen. That king's Magyar crown is considered holy by Hungarians, and some of its choicest jewels, Subotitsa, Voivodina, Bachka, and Croatia, are all now in Yugoslavia. For two decades these jewels have been absent from the crown, for two decades Hungarian flags have drooped sadly at half mast, and a sorrowing statue has stood in Freedom Square in Budapest pointing dramatically in the direction of the lost southern provinces.

Now the moment of restitution seems to be near, and if Yugoslavia should defy the Axis, Hungarian soldiers would plunge into a "war of liberation" beside German Nazis. These avid enemies would cut as a freshly sharpened scythe through all the wheat fields of northern Yugoslavia.

On the east, too, Bulgarian soldiers, shouting songs of vengeance and battle cries of restoration to give added force to their gleaming bayonets, would join the onslaught against Yugoslavia. In 1913, Bulgarian soldiers attacked along that line and were driven back. In 1915, when Serbia was hard pressed by huge Austrian armies, Bulgarian soldiers again attacked, poured over Serbia's borders along its whole length, drove the Serbs into Albania, and pushed the British-French armies into Salonika. Then in 1918 the Greeks and Serbs drove the Bulgarians back and out, ending the World War, and retaining not only most of Macedonia but even parts of old Bulgaria. Now if Yugoslavia should refuse Axis demands, Bulgarians, with a fury nursed by their twenty-two years of humiliation, would make every effort to settle those old accounts.

That is the sword of Damocles that Hitler has held over Yugoslavia's head all winter. And beside it has dangled another weapon—Salonika. The Nazi Fuehrer has warned Belgrade that even if the general assault on Yugoslavia were postponed, Greece would be smashed, and Bulgaria might get Salonika as its reward. Bulgaria's possession of that port would be as disastrous for Yugoslavia as Germany's possession of Ireland would be for Great Britain.

And Hitler has slyly added, "But if you Yugoslavs come with the Axis it is possible that you'll be the ones to get Salonika."

Rarely was a state in a more helpless position. The Axis on the east, the Axis on the west, the Axis on the north volleyed and thundered, as only Hitler and Mussolini can thunder. Hungarian students marched on Budapest's boulevards, shouting, "Everything back!" Bulgarian students paraded in Sofia's squares, crying, "Macedonia back!" Croatian separatists threw bombs before the British consulates in Zagreb and scattered leaflets demanding "Down with Yugoslavia." Russia, the traditional protector of the little Balkan peoples, was weak and frightened. And terrific Nazi forces stationed at the German border only seventy miles away from Salonika crouched for a Blitz charge against Greece. No possible help from any source was available. England was almost beleaguered. American Senators were spending days and weeks in repetitious declamations, holding up action and darkening hopes. What could Yugoslavia do? What would any ruler in Prince Paul's place have done? He had to choose between an at least temporary break-up of his unstable kingdom and leading his state into the darkness of political and economic slavery. He is not the first to whom life imprisonment has seemed preferable to immediate execution. Maybe there will come a day for the opening of prison gates, he thinks.

Now Hitler nears the end of his spring training in the Balkans, and prepares for the season's real contest. The winter is over, spring has come, the Danube ice breaks up and floats downstream, the time for action has arrived. And Hitler, when he acts, moves with terrible swiftness.

Practically all southeast Europe has fallen through squeeze plays, almost without the firing of a gun. Bismarck declared the Balkans weren't worth the bones of a German soldier; Hitler has got them almost without sacrificing a soldier. He squeezed Czechoslovakia to pieces and marched into Prague; he lured the chauvinistic Magyars into subjection and stole into Budapest; he let Russia terrify Rumania and was summoned to Bucharest as a savior; he huffed and he puffed until Bulgaria's gates blew away and then rode over the Balkan mountains into Sofia. Yugoslavia had no choice.

To pretend that this easy conquest of the Balkans isn't a terrible blow to the cause of freedom, would be very shortsighted. Attempts to explain it away are like weak alibis. Hitlerism is marching on, with destruction as terrible as that of ancient conquerors. When the Turkish sultans, more than half a millennium ago swept into the Balkans, that was a world disaster. And they did not depart for five full centuries. No local power could drive them out. Nor will any local Balkan power be able to throw off the new Nazi yoke.

When Germans press into the southeast, they usually stay. Hapsburg emperors settled them in Hungary, Transylvania, the Banat, Bessarabia, and they are still there. They settled Germans in Slovenia, Croatia, Bosnia, and they are still there. Now Hitler has taken Germans even further down the Danube and he plans that they shall remain there.

This is barely the beginning of Hitler's spring, a preliminary for his real fight. The operations of 1941 have just opened. The Balkan mountain passes are all roads to other places, to Asia and Africa. Hitler is moving out over the trails that have often led to the conquest of continents. Only those people who are asleep can fail to see that he has begun a march which he expects, before this year ends, will place world dominion within his grasp. Budapest, Bucharest, Belgrade, Sofia are stations on a through route that Hitler believes will lead to the ends of the earth.

Chemicals for War

BY JACK SCHUYLER

WITHOUT chemical products in adequate quantities, no effective defense program would be possible. The products of the chemical industry are needed for every basic industry and, directly or indirectly, for every article of commerce. Agriculture needs chemical fertilizers and insecticides; the textile industry needs bleaching materials and dyes. Transportation, communication, medicine, the electro-chemical industry, and even the arts—all must have chemical supplies.

Yet very little is written of the importance of the chemical industry. Generally speaking, the large chemical corporations employ public relations men, not to gain public good will, but to keep information out of print. Logically so, for the industry touches the consumer at comparatively few points.

Today the United States has one of the most powerful chemical industries in the world, producing a wide variety of both heavy chemicals and synthetic organic compounds, ranging from dyes to explosives. The industry could be expanded to meet our war-time needs. It already meets the peace-time demand and has something left over for export to other countries.

The national defense program will stimulate not only the manufacture of explosives but that of a thousand and one chemicals. Chemicals are used to treat steel and metals, and are also used in the leather, coal products, rubber, shipbuilding, and aircraft industries. Sulphuric acid has been called the "pig iron" of the chemical industry. It is certainly important in all kinds of products incidental to defense. It is required for the making of military explosives; for pickling iron and steel; for the manufacture of high-grade aviation gasoline, and so on.

Coal, air, salt, and sulphur are the four basic materials used for the manufacture of most of the chemical substances necessary for national defense—and for peacetime industries. When coal is heated in an air-tight chamber, it gives off illuminating gas, coke, and tarry vapors. From the tarry vapors comes coal tar, which is treated and distilled to yield products that are the main base of a large part of our synthetic organic chemical industry: toluene, necessary for the production of both T. N. T. and dyes; phenol, essential to the manufacture of explosives and plastics; picric acid, vital to the making of explosives, poison gases, and dyes; aniline, basic to the production of poison gases, dyes, and medicinal supplies—all are derived from coal tar.

The next essential raw material for chemical warfare and peace-time industry is air, the very air we breathe. By various processes, ammonia produced from air is used to make both fertilizers and refrigerants. Nitric acid, made from ammonia, is essential to the manufacture of nitroglycerine and other explosives, dyestuffs, plastics, artificial leather, and fertilizers.

Salt is used to make caustic soda and chlorine. The rayon, soap, and petroleum refining industries are all dependent upon caustic soda. Chlorine is important as a water-purifier, disinfectant, bleaching agent, and in the making of war gases.

Sulphur is basic to the manufacture of certain explosives, each pound of which requires two pounds of sulphuric acid. Sulphur is also used as a vulcanizer in the rubber industry and to make sulphur dioxide, a bleaching agent in its own right but more important as the basis for the manufacture of sulphuric acid, vital in oil refineries, explosives manufacture, metal pickling, and dye making.

The chemical industry is well organized to contribute its share to the national defense program. Almost two years ago several committees were set up by the Army and Navy Board to make a series of surveys of the chemical needs of the military program. Long before that, the Chemical Warfare Service established its own procurement program on a comparable basis. Five geographical districts were organized, each with advisory boards made up of from eight to fifteen leading industrialists. Educational orders, that is, small orders giving the producer a chance to work out the problems arising in a shift from peace-time to war-time goods, were placed for gas masks and related equipment, and a chemical defense program was outlined.

The chemical industry is not a munitions industry and has not made munitions since the first World War. It does make enormous amounts of chemicals for peace-time markets. However, these chemicals can be made into explosives just as steel can be made into guns. The making of military explosives in the United States calls for new plant capacity, now being built to the tune of $50,000,000 or more, plants to be run for the government by chemical companies.

Meanwhile, the industry holds itself able to supply the vastly greater demands consequent on the stepping up of the defense program. For last year, when production of chemicals of virtually every sort was at the highest level on record, plant expansion not only kept pace with the increased demand but anticipated, in part, added requirements of this and future years. In the first eleven months of 1940 contracts for new plants amounted to $142,159,000, and construction of plants reached a new high in the same year. One synthetic phenol plant, six synthetic rubber plants, three aluminum plants, one bromine plant, and one magnesium plant were built by private industry. Government money built three smokeless-powder plants, two T. N. T. plants, one ammonia plant, one toluene plant, and one ammonium nitrate plant.

The present crisis therefore finds the chemical industry in a far better position than that of 1914. At that time our chemical industry, enormous as it was, lacked coal-tar chemical plants and was pitifully dependent on Chile for nitrates and on Germany for potash. We have since discovered and developed sources of potash in California and New Mexico that are ample for all our needs.

In 1914 only 10 per cent of the dyes consumed in the United States were made here. During the subsequent war years the textile industry, the medical profession, the photographic industry and scores of others became acutely aware that the most vital of their raw materials came from abroad and that these sources of supply had been cut off. When the German submarine Deutschland appeared in Newport harbor we were startled but also jubilant. The submarine had run the English blockade with a cargo of coal dyes and other then rare and scarce chemical products. These were bought for fantastic prices.

Domestic chemical manufacturers rose to the first World War emergency and spent millions of dollars in research and experimentation. Today, after less than twenty-five years, America has a dye industry second to none, whose products equal any produced by other nations. It no longer follows, but leads the way.

The American dye industry is a key industry. Not only does it provide color for many materials—textiles, leather, and even paper—but continuous research in it gives to our physicians and hospitals countless new products in the drug and medical field.

The establishment of this self-contained synthetic organic chemical industry at last emancipated our research, our medicine, our agriculture, and our industries from the domination of the German chemical trust.

All the basic raw materials for chemical warfare are used in the making of dyes. So closely is the making of dyes connected with the manufacture of war gases and explosives that most of the dye plants need only to be enlarged, and many of them require no new technics in order to manufacture war gases. Moreover, men trained in dye manufacture are men who can easily be shifted to the manufacture of explosives.

Chemical engineers will play an important role in industrial mobilization for national defense. Products of their ingenuity are, for the most part, products even more essential in war than in peace. The list of essential chemicals required in large amounts by the army and navy for the manufacture of explosives and war-agents is a considerable one. Included in it are acetic acid, wood alcohol, nitric acid, acetone, benzol, caustic soda, chlorine, grain alcohol, hydrochloric acid, phenol, picric acid, potash, soda ash, sulphuric acid, and toluene. The bulk of these chemicals go into the manufacture of explosives of various sorts.

The methane of natural gas, crude petroleum, alcohol from the fermentation of molasses or potatoes, sugars, coal tar, and sulphur are all raw materials used in the manufacture of explosives and are quite plentiful in this country.

One of the primary raw materials for the manufacture of high explosives is glycerine. During the first World War this basic material was obtainable only from animal fats, and its scarcity is supposed to have contributed to the defeat of Germany. We are no longer dependent on animal fats for our supply of glycerine since we are now able to synthesize this organic substance from coal-tar derivatives or from gases obtainable from crude petroleum.

Practically all modern explosives are mixtures of nitrated organic compounds which require the use of sulphuric and nitric acids in their manufacture. Ammonia is necessary for the making of ammonium nitrate, which is likely to be most widely used in high explosives, and into ammonium picrate, used in armor-piercing projectiles because of its insensitive character. Acetone, acetic acid, and the alcohols are used as solvents for smokeless powder. Chlorine is the basic raw material used in the synthesis of most chemical war-agents such as mustard gas and chlorpicrin. Toluene is used not only for the manufacture of T. N. T., but for other, less widely known kinds of explosive.

The chemical industry is remarkable for the way it has substituted synthetic for natural products. The plastics industry, of which the United States possesses one of the largest in the world, is essential for the production of material for telephones, telephonic equipment, electrical devices, switches, auto parts, spectacles, photographic film, safety glass, wire insulation, radios, refrigerator parts, surgical instruments and sutures, aircraft, cockpit windows in military airplanes, gun parts, gas-mask lenses, and other parts. The chief raw materials, of which we possess an abundance, are derived from such substances as air, water, coal, petroleum, salt, sulphur, cellulose, and limestone.

DuPont synthetic coatings, Duco and Dulux, are used and needed in the airplane and automobile industries. DuPont also produces the glass-clear plastic, Lucite, used for windows in airplanes.

Efforts to discover substitutes for vital imported materials and to develop products formerly imported from countries now occupied by the Nazis, were highlights of industrial research in 1940. The chemical industry has relieved us of dependence upon foreign sources of supply for some important raw materials—rubber, particularly. In addition to the normal demand of 600,000 tons a year, our preparedness program calls for mechanized instruments of warfare for land, sea, and air in which rubber is an essential material. Various synthetic rubbers—neoprene, buna, Ameripol, chemigum, thiokol and koro-seal—are the more important synthetic rubbers now produced in the United States. Production of these synthetic rubbers will probably reach a total of 15,000 tons this year.

Charcoal made from coconut shells is used for gas masks. Almost our entire supply comes from the Philippines. An adequate substitute has been developed from sawdust, coal, and hardwood charcoal, and we are no longer dependent upon a foreign source for this most important material in our defense program. Contracts for gas-mask charcoal made by this new process, as well as other chemicals used in gas-defensive appliances and amounting to about $10 million, have been closed or are being negotiated. In warfare silk is used for parachutes. Practically all our raw silk comes from Japan. A wholly satisfactory substitute, nylon, is now available for parachute manufacture. Synthetic resin enamels are being used instead of tin for coating certain types of cans, lessening our needs for imported tin. Chemically coated cardboard containers have also to some extent taken the place of tin cans. Toluene, basic ingredient in the manufacture of T. N. T. and important in the making of dyes, drugs, lacquers, varnishes, and enamels, comes largely from by-product coke ovens. But methods of obtaining it from petroleum have recently been developed, and in 1940 the Shell Oil Company opened a plant at Houston, Texas, which will produce 2 million gallons annually.

Our organic chemical industry can produce all the explosives, dyes, drugs, photographic chemicals, rayon, and plastic materials which this nation might need in war. Other large-scale chemicals which are produced synthetically are wood alcohol, camphor, and tanning materials. Glycerine is now produced synthetically. Today we obtain our iodine from our own brine wells in California instead of importing it from Chile. We have looked to other countries for much of our paper, but the South is now doing its bit to displace this dependency. Our industry can supply all of the various kinds of war gases—lung irritants, lachrymators, vesicants, and toxic smokes.

The chemist's contribution to warfare is more than that of supplying explosives, war gases, and flame-throwers. The airplane, tank, ship, and submarine have been brought to their present state of perfection by the combined efforts of the chemist and physicist. The defense leaders look to these scientists to produce new materials of construction, new fuels, better lubricants, and improved instruments. Greater speed in airplanes, more powerful fuels, more destructive explosives—and better drugs to restore the wounded soldier—are problems to be solved through scientific research.

Turkish Dilemma

BY PETER STEVENS

Istanbul, February 17

THIS is written on the Bosphorus in mid-February and the new Bulgarian pact with Turkey has just been announced. No doubt before this article reaches America the full meaning of the treaty will be clear. There are several schools of thought here regarding the immediate future; it may be revealing to know what they are:

There are the case-hardened cynics who feel that we are in the first stages of the great "sell-out" which will proceed in the pattern already set by Germany in Rumania. The Turks, they argue, are in desperate need of supplies; England has been unable to carry out the economic accord of early December, 1940; with Turkish shops nearly bare, the Turks must keep the Balkan route open to receive from Germany and Italy the necessities which they themselves cannot manufacture.

President Inonu

Take, for example, transportation in Istanbul: one by one the street cars are being withdrawn from service. England can send neither replacements nor parts, and the Turks cannot go on hanging like grapes from overcrowded cars.

The net effect of Turkish neutrality, argue the cynics, will be the protection of the left flank of the German army as it moves down across Bulgaria to annihilate Greece before General Wavell is free to send any real reinforcements. Turkey on its side, will gain peace, manufactured goods from Germany, and a ready market for her agricultural surplus.

The Turkish treaty with England called for "all possible aid" to England if it were involved in hostilities over its guarantee to Greece. The cynics smile and say, "Turkey did not move on October 28 when England was involved in hostilities in Greece and Albania over its guarantees to Greece. It never intended to. It won't now." These people, and some of them are Turks, like to end their argument with the quotation from Time, which is so well known here, to the effect that Turkey "will stay bought only so long as England continues to pay."

Then there are the Friday-night quarterbacks and arm-chair strategists who say that Turkey will aid the Greeks and has made an arrangement with Bulgaria whereby the latter will protect the Turkish border from Adrianople to the Black Sea, while the Turks send aid to Greece through Thrace. These people have no answer to the obvious question of whether the Germans will allow Bulgaria, once they have occupied it, to tell them where and how they may move their troops. It is a weak argument put forward by those Turks who hate to swallow their boasts about what they would do to the Bulgarians and the Germans, if the former allowed so much as one German in uniform to come into the country.

Finally there is the British interpretation which here and at this time sounds like whistling in the dark. It says that Turkey has merely "restated" her amicable intentions toward Bulgaria and that Bulgaria has promised Turkey it will not aid the Germans in a possible attack on the Bosphorus and Turkish Thrace. "This treaty," the British say, "has not affected British-Turkish treaty relations." Turkey has promised England all aid if Germany attacks Greece, and they add, "No doubt the outcome of the recent Anglo-Turkish staff talks in Ankara was a decision that Turkey could best help by holding its Thracian border."

Now each of these points of view has obvious holes in its logic. The hole in the first is to be found in Turkish public opinion. It is perfectly true that there is no independent press in Turkey, let alone any opposition press; it is equally true that the government makes and remakes public opinion through its orders to the press. But it would be most foolish of Turkey—and the Turks in authority are neither ignorant nor foolish—to change sides so suddenly and at the end of a long violent anti-New Order and pro-British press campaign. The government radio and press have convinced all Turkey that Germans and Italians are evil and that Britain is good; that the Axis must inevitably lose this war and that England cannot lose it. It will take a long and delicate campaign to change the Turks who have a deep-seated dislike for the Germans and Italians.

The second argument, that Turkey is playing a very clever military trick on the Germans, is patently ridiculous. One has only to look at the map and to know the pitiful state of the Turkish army to dismiss it as absurd.

The third one may have some truth in it; but its inevitable conclusion that the best help is no help and that the way to save Greece is to abandon her, is difficult of acceptance.

I think that the best explanation is one which does not altogether contradict the third argument. I think that the Turks are desperately short of all sorts of war material and that they are playing for time in the belief that Britain will send via Busrah-Bagdad, or through an Italian-free Mediterranean, a generous share of American supplies and help. The Bulgarian-Turkish treaty is the best means through which to freeze the status quo here until Turkey is ready. This theory would also account for the persistent rumor that Turkey recently refused an offer from Yugoslavia to make a joint statement that any occupation of Bulgaria would be considered an act of war.

It is also possible that the Turks would look on a German occupation of Bulgaria as releasing them from the commitments under this new treaty. There are an endless array of possible explanations; but unless the British are very good actors, they are not disturbed much by this move. For this reason I am inclined to think that the best explanation is that Turkey is playing for time to accumulate mechanized equipment and to acquire some aerial defense for defenseless Istanbul, which is built mostly of wood and so is peculiarly vulnerable to incendiary attack.

One thing is certain, no treaty can make Turks love Bulgars or Bulgars trust Turks.

Putsch in Java

BY GEORGE PEPPER

FEW people realize that Java, in the remote Dutch East Indies, was the scene of a coordinated Nazi plot to seize power in those islands as early as last spring. Not many more even knew where the islands were until Cordell Hull's sharp notes to Japan catapulted them into the limelight. The world's suicidal struggle has done more for geographic knowledge, if for nothing else, than all the atlases printed since the first world war, and today we know that this group, aside from seductive Bali, contains vast natural resources. Borneo's rich oil fields; Sumatra's rubber; 97 per cent of the world's quinine; tea, coffee, tobacco, sugar, tin, copper, gold, and iron—all these make the East Indies a prey of aggressor nations.

When Hitler stunned the world by invading Holland last May all eyes turned to that tragic scene. Few stopped at the moment to wonder about its island colonies out in the remote southeastern Pacific, colonies that felt safeguarded by the British navy and American diplomacy. Counting on this false sense of security and the confusion their latest offensive had created, the Nazis naturally prepared to seize them; yet a few hours after Holland was invaded every German and every Nazi sympathizer in the Dutch East Indies was under arrest. The story behind the plot's failure must be recorded as an odd twist of fate.

For an understanding of why the German coup nearly came off, it is well to realize that there have always been a good many German residents in the Indies. They were splendid colonists, assiduous workers, keen business men, and, having lived in the Indies for several decades, they held many key positions in the colonial government. Last year saw many new arrivals at the German colony there. Some carried Dutch passports; others wished to settle permanently for business reasons; and still others claimed to be "refugees" from Nazi terror. The Dutch Colonial Government, always tolerant once the head-tax fees have been collected, pocketed the new revenue and continued to dream of fresh profits from coffee, rubber, and tobacco. The newcomers wasted no time dreaming, but set to work undermining the entire governmental structure. Dutch Nazis were contacted and employed; Germans in high offices were ready at a moment's notice to sabotage any coordinated effort to resist; the long suppressed nationalist movement in Java was geared to rebellion, and munitions appeared from nowhere to be placed in secret caches or stored in private homes. As usual, the web had its spider in the form of German consular offices. There a certain Baron von Plessen grasped diplomatic respectability with his right hand, and with his left managed a tangle of underground activity. A suave handsome man, long known in the Indies as a sportsman, hunter, and ethnologist, he managed to steer an even course to the very last.

Time in the tropics usually has little significance. However, one must remember that Java time is a full day ahead of European time on the calendar, and May 10 in Germany was May 11 throughout the Indies. Action synchronizing with the German invasion of Holland had been planned, and when May 11 dawned over Java all strategic spots were covered by hidden machine-gun emplacements; well-known hotels were the sites of secret barricades, and all short-wave sending sets were in readiness to flash an instant order for the uprising. The cream of Dutch society had received cunning invitations for a party at the home of Baron von Plessen. There, according to the Nazi scheme, they were to be confronted by a fait accompli. The one remaining question was: at what moment will the order to strike come from Berlin? Advance information led the plotters to believe that Hitler would choose May 12 (Java time). Perhaps it was a miscalculation that caused him to move one full day sooner.

Batavia, the chief city of Java, has a large, modern post office. On the morning of May 11, the postmaster was away and an obscure subordinate was in charge. A lengthy cable from Berlin addressed to the German Consul-General passed across the acting postmaster's desk. Well aware of the cable's diplomatic immunity, he hesitated to have it decoded, but nevertheless felt uneasy, and he decided to withhold delivery until the postmaster returned—although the Nazi consular offices twice sent anxious inquiries by messenger asking for mail. When the door closed on a third messenger, this alert Dutch clerk called the military in order to have the cable decoded. Once decoded, the entire conspiracy lay before the authorities. They read orders for an immediate uprising throughout the Indies, orders calling for the co-operation of some twenty-three German ships lying in the neutral waters of Java, and finally, an order calling for the utmost speed and precision in attaining all "planned objectives." The last order was further elucidated by the statement: "Germany will invade Holland in three hours. Der Fuehrer expects news of your success before that time."

The authorities immediately informed the Governor-General. He issued an order for the instant arrest of every German, regardless of age or position, and further cautioned those who knew not to divulge the fact that an invasion of Holland was imminent. Within two hours all arrests had been made, all German ships seized, and Dutch citizens with known Nazi sympathies were being arrested. By this time the first news of Germany's move on Holland began reaching the outside world—news withheld by the Governor until every arrest had been made. It was late afternoon before he made a radio address telling of Holland's great tragedy. He also described the last-minute rescue of the Indies and praised the obscure clerk whose intelligence had made this possible.

Everybody's Business

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

German Oil Supplies

IN THE last war it was once said, "the Allies floated to victory on a wave of oil" and there can be no doubt that in the present conflict oil will prove one of the decisive factors. Operations by land, air, and sea are all absolutely dependent on a constant supply of oil products, while for the industries which lie behind the fronts it is also a vital necessity, particularly in the form of lubricants. But Europe's own resources in oil are very limited and, excluding Russia, Rumania is the only producer of importance. Rumania in 1938, however, was able to furnish only about one-ninth of Europe's import requirements or about 4 million tons out of 36 millions. The balance had to be brought by sea either from this hemisphere or from east of Suez, and from these sources Germany and the countries it dominates are now, of course, entirely cut off.

Britain, on the other hand, can obtain all it is able to convoy through the German counter-blockade, for in both America and Asia there is a surplus rather than a shortage of oil. Nor, in spite of Hitler's submarines and bombers, is there any lack, at present, of tankers to carry it. Britain and its Allies control at least 50 per cent of the tanker tonnage of the world, or considerably more than was employed in pre-war days to fill British needs. Another British advantage is the proximity of oilfields it controls to the Near Eastern war area. Its forces in North Africa and Greece can draw on the refineries at Haifa, the terminus of the pipeline from the Irak fields, and additional supplies can be shipped from southern Iran. Haifa, of course, is somewhat exposed to air attack and has been bombed several times, but the Irak and Iran oil districts are beyond the range of effective raiding.

Consider, in contrast, Italy's problem in fueling its North African army. It has practically no domestic supplies, and its Albanian oilfield, always a very minor affair, has probably been closed down by British and Greek bombings. Aside from reserves, its only resource is import from Rumania, which involves a long overland haul to Italian ports. There it must be loaded on tankers to run the gantlet of the British navy to Tripoli. There is good reason to believe that not the least of the causes of Graziani's collapse in the Libyan campaign was insufficient supplies of oil.

Germany is far better off than its partner in the matter of oil supplies, yet this question must be among the constant worries of the Nazi war-lords. Before the war the annual oil consumption of Greater Germany and the occupied countries of Western Europe is estimated to have been around 17 million tons, of which German military and industrial requirements amounted to 6 million tons. From the very beginning of the war civilian consumption of gasoline was severely restricted in Germany, as in all other belligerent countries, and the conquered areas are of course even more tightly rationed. But the internal-combustion engine has become so integrated with modern economic life that its use cannot be banned altogether without industrial consequences that Germany cannot face. It needs the factories of the defeated countries and so must supply them with some means of transport as well as with lubricants for their machinery. Taking such factors into account, it has been estimated that the strictly civil requirements of the territory Germany controls amount to 5 million tons of oil annually. Thus, since the army can hardly be using less than it used in peacetime, it must find by one means or another a minimum total of around 11 million tons annually.

Germany has long been working frantically to increase production of synthetic oils. We have no exact figures of the supplies available from this source, but in 1939 output is believed to have been about one and one-half million tons, and new plants coming into operation last year may have added another half million. There are also a few small oilfields yielding some 750,000 tons, while benzol and fuel alcohol production might supply the equivalent of an additional one million tons. In all, then, domestic sources, according to these figures, which I owe to Maurice Seldman, would supply something under 4 million tons. Another estimate, this one by E. M. Friedwald, the French petroleum authority, quoted in the New York Times of December 22 last, places the total at 4,280,000 tons.

How far these figures have been affected by British air raids we cannot tell. We know only that oil refineries and synthetic plants have been among the targets most frequently assigned to the RAF, and it is impossible to believe that all their bombs "fell in the fields." On the other hand, Germany is no doubt continuing to add to its productive capacity, building plants as nearly out of range of the British planes as possible. Thus a hydrogenation plant capable of processing 5 million tons of coal annually is reported under construction at Brux in the Sudetenland.

Making every possible allowance, it seems certain that Germany must obtain more than half its oil from Russia and Rumania or from reserves. The latter were no doubt very considerable at the outset of the war, and they have been swollen by the loot of the conquered countries, which had also laid in considerable stocks. Russia's total exports were not much over one million tons in 1939, and it is doubtful if Germany obtained as much from this source in 1940. The recent trade agreement provided for a total of one and one-half million tons in 1941, but the fulfilment of this undertaking depends on the ability of the Russian railroads to deliver.

Rumanian production today is completely under German control, and it amounts to the very considerable total of between 6 and 7 million tons. It is unlikely, however, that the Germans can get out anything like this amount. Three-quarters of Rumania's exports were normally shipped by sea and only about a million tons by rail or Danube barges. The Germans have made great efforts to supply additional tank-cars and river carriers, but with all the physical difficulties involved they will be doing well if they extract a total of 3 million tons from this source in the current year, and a part of this total will have to be spared to Italy.

One can only conclude that Germany cannot cover current needs for oil from current supplies, domestic and foreign, and consequently must eat all the time into reserves. How long these will hold out depends on the tempo of the war. This is one explanation of Hitler's patient effort to take the Balkans with terror tactics. For Blitzkrieg campaigns burn up gas in terrifying quantities and, if he is to attempt to invade Britain this year, or to drive through Asia Minor, he must economize this most vital of war materials.

In the Wind

BRITISH AGENTS: When the Lackawanna plant of the Bethlehem Steel Corporation went on strike, several agents of the British government were in town. They went immediately to the Steel Workers Organizing Committee and assured the men that they would do no business with Bethlehem until collective bargaining prevailed.

GREAT BRITAIN keeps 5,000 good military planes grounded, according to observers who have recently returned from England. They are to be used if and when the Nazis attempt an invasion. Military observers believe that, in case of an all-out attempt on Britain, many planes will be needed to fight off Nazi bombers, fire the English Channel, and bomb German invasion ports.

AT THE LAWYERS GUILD dinner in Washington a standing vote of applause was given to Justice Reed, one of the guests. Of those present only Carol King, attorney for Harry Bridges, refused to honor the liberal jurist.

COMMUNISM AS RELIGION: For several days after Earl Browder was sentenced to four years in prison, the Daily Worker published whole pages of letters protesting the decision. One of the letters said that even while the party chief was behind bars, ". . . whenever two comrades come together . . . Comrade Browder will be the third."

AND WHEN Robert Minor was appointed as Browder's successor, the Daily Worker printed a statement congratulating the party on its choice. That statement was signed by William Z. Foster—and Robert Minor.

FOR SEVERAL MONTHS the FBI has been investigating new employees in government agencies and key defense industries. Recently the investigators have been demanding that workers sign waivers permitting examination of their bank accounts, safety-deposit vaults, and personal papers.

THE CAMPAIGN for Liberty Bonds, although they will not be called that, is getting under way in Washington. It is under the direction of Harford Powel, an advertising executive, and Gail Johnstone, formerly a Metropolitan Life Insurance Company official.

CALIFORNIA has a new panacea group known as the Monetization of Food. The Food Dollar vs. The Gold Dollar is their slogan.

THE LORD HAW-HAW of Italy is Lt.-Col. Cecil Rocke. Before the war he was living in Italy on a British army pension. When his voice was heard over the Rome radio and his identity established, his pension was cut off. In the British "Who's Who" he is listed as having two recreations: "rearmament and anti-communism."

IN GENERAL KRIVITSKY'S last letter to his wife the press reported one sentence as "friends will help you but enemies will not." Photostatic copies of the suicide note show that what he really said was, "friends will help you, but enemies of the Soviet Union will not." The police, for reasons of their own, suppressed the reference to the Soviet Union.

FALSE RUMORS, apparently started in an effort to keep American money out of Canada, are spreading that food is being rationed there and that gasoline is selling for ninety cents a gallon and more. Canadian government officials assert that these stories have appreciably affected the tourist trade.

[The $5 prize for the best item in February goes to Mr. N. F., 927 Grant Avenue, Bronx, for his story about Jan Valtin, published on February 8.]

A Native at Large

BY JONATHAN DANIELS

$21-a-month Men

THEY put it in the papers so it must be news: William Martin, bachelor, New York City, thirty-four years old, will ask for no exemptions and take his turn when his number comes up in the draft. It is entirely incidental to the defense of America that he is also head of the New York Stock Exchange and gets $48,000 a year. Off somewhere in a camp in Jersey or Georgia, he will be giving up that big pay check and may be homesick for the West Side Tennis, Yale, Brooklyn Heights Casino, Island Court, and University Clubs. Of course, there are other young men, not getting $48,000 a year, who have also begun to make some little success, who are comfortable where they are, who have no desire to go soldiering, but are going with as much sacrifice and patriotism as William Martin is. William Martin is important, nevertheless. As a $21-a-month draftee he will be an example worth regarding, not by other young fellows pulled out of their jobs by the draft, but by those who belong to the same clubs and the same income-tax brackets and have become dollar-a-year men in Washington. I like $21-a-month William Martin better.

Some weeks ago I wrote about the return of the dollar-a-year men to Washington in a process which perhaps gave Washington the use of great talents but also set up again, in the process of defending democracy, the same sort of plutocratic patterns which helped make democracy very elegant when we defended it before. Since then Lord Halifax, serving without salary, has come over to the British embassy to give a sort of British approval to the plan. But there have been signs of less approval in Congress. Even some department heads have been apparently working as gently as possible to limit the legion of such well-to-do patriots as want place, not pay, in the exciting center of the land. Their number is still described as "a host." A writer in the Washington Post says that "dollar-a-year men, who have come to town to help with the defense program, are fighting for office space." Certainly you can see them resting from sacrifice in every fashionable bar in the capital. The ladies from the tool and steel towns are looking for houses and apartments and making bright paragraphs and comely pictures on the society pages. The hotels are so crowded that the Statler Hotel organization is pushing ahead with its plans for building the biggest new hotel yet to be seen in the city which has swollen along the beautifully landscaped swamps by the Potomac.

It gives me pleasure to contemplate William Martin across that scene. I think he makes a pleasanter spectacle than the cherry trees which will be blooming soon. He may be a gilded young man but, for the moment at least, he shines in a way to throw light on the questions: Why should a government which can pay millions for a battleship be interested in saving a few thousand dollars on the salary of a man? Why should such a man be or seem above taking those few thousand dollars for service, while William Martin looks like a patriot going to his soldier's pay?

Some of the dollar-a-year men in this crisis are rendering splendid service—as some did in the previous war. (No evidence has been presented that they would not have done just as well if they had been paid.) But once again, others, according to reports from Washington, have not hesitated in the midst of their charitable services also to sell goods to the government, exert pressure for their industries, even interfere with government monopoly action against a vast corporation—all from the inside. Even so, I do not think the dangers of crookedness in dollar-a-year clothing is so serious, serious as it might be, as the confusion and snobbery in a great national effort that might be the creation of a special class of gentlemen in office, who use their office space to look down on such men as have to be vulgar enough to take the government's pay for the same or better work.

If the government needs any man's service in a crisis, there should not be any question of its getting by, any more than there is any question about taking the youth and body of young William Martin or young John Jones. And in the defense of a democracy those services should be taken on a democratic basis—and the whole dollar-a-year system is a rejection of the idea of democracy in defense service. Fortunately this "short-of-war" time gives us opportunity to make our mistakes "short of war," if war is coming. But it may not give us much time to correct them. One mistake which can be corrected, and promptly, is this dollar-a-year foolishness. The process might not improve the parties at the Mayflower but it would help put a democratic spirit into the whole defense effort. If dollar-a-year men are good, put them on the payroll. If they are merely free, send them home. This is a crisis, not a party. Washington should be crowded by the best brains, not by the cheapest ones.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Notes by the Way

"BUT I really mean it," insisted the man with the tired look about the eyes. "Even a great novelist has no right to write a book a thousand pages long!" His voice was tense, his face was drawn, he seemed on the point of tears. Presently he moved on and I heard him telling other people that long books are inexcusable. It was a one-man crusade. And no wonder; it turned out that he has one of those monstrous jobs—for a digest magazine—which requires a human being with only two eyes and one assimilating system to read half a dozen books a week and review them in ten lines each. That week the list included "The Thibaults."

Books are certainly getting longer and longer and though Martin du Gard, from all reports, has the "right" to fill a thousand pages, publishers tend to "bring out number, weight, and measure In a year of dearth"—to use Blake's scornful lines in a different connotation. But I have just finished one book which seems to me too short. It is "Kabloona" by Gontran de Poncins. (Reynal and Hitchcock. $3.) Kabloona is the Eskimo word for white man, and the book is the account of fifteen months spent in the Canadian Arctic. It is one of those rare travel books, like Osbert Sitwell's "Escape with Me," in which we are taken on a double journey. Gontran de Poncins was not searching merely for strange sights. His concern was with the Eskimo, with his life and traits, his broodings and ruminations, his invincible serenity in the face of the hardest physical existence lived by man anywhere upon earth. It was because of the simplicity and directness of his existence that I went into the Arctic to live with him; and living with him was not easy. Hardest of all was not the severity of the climate, not the intensity of the cold, not the physical anguish which, often, I endured as every man from Outside must endure it. The cold was a problem; but a very much more difficult problem was the Eskimo mentality. There was no getting on with the Eskimo except on his own terms; and as I was not a tourist concerned with externals, but a man concerned to find himself with the aid of the Eskimo, I had to get on with him. . . . I sought to live the Eskimo life. . . .

De Poncins succeeded, in so far as it was possible for a white man to succeed, in living the life of a people still in the stone age; and though he records enough "sights," strange and wonderful, amusing and repellent, to satisfy the most avid appetite, it is the story of his gradual absorption into the Eskimo existence, and the unpremeditated beauty of the telling, that yields the new-old reward of a good book—the sense of having shared a significant experience.

His first contact was with Eskimos whose mode of life had been softened and contaminated by poverty and by the standards and customs of men from the Outside; and it was like the thawing dirty edge of a glacier. Only after many weeks—and a grueling seventeen-day trip with sled and dogs—was he able to penetrate to Pelly Bay where he found the true Eskimo living as he had always lived.

The Eskimos of Pelly Bay are prosperous; their igloos are spacious and they have devised a communal architecture which nevertheless provides full scope for private life.

Thanks to the abundance of seal, these people exhibited to me a powerful and dignified community. . . . The generosity and courtesy of their hospitality struck me as forcibly as the grace of their life. . . . True primitive hospitality consists not merely in welcoming the stranger but in seeking to incorporate him into the community.

Their friendliness also includes the privilege of making fun at his expense and they are wonderful mimics. De Poncins gives us portrait after portrait of individual Eskimos, men and women; scene after scene of family and communal life, and of the landscape, with its dogs and sleds, its furred huntsmen posed immobile—sometimes for days—over a seal's breathing space or a fishing hole in the ice; its nomad dwellers building an igloo with incredible speed and skill against time and the blizzard. One of the recurring images, since he was so often on the trail, is that of an igloo rising out of the waste, lighted from within by seal-oil lamps. And to those who read his book the frozen north becomes luminous too, lighted from within by the vigorous life of a proud people.

The sophisticate found among the primitive Eskimos the serenity he was looking for. He is no sentimentalist and he knew, even as he wished to stay, that he could not renounce his own world. But he brought back with him the profound realization that the serenity he had found was the fruit not of an "escape" to a primitive world but of a full participation in the communal life which is the price and the reward of existence in the Arctic. Civilization please note.

The book is illustrated by drawings, in line and color, by the author; and there is a sheaf of excellent photographs.

MARGARET MARSHALL

Eye-Witness

UNDER THE IRON HEEL. By Lars Moën. J. B. Lippincott Company. $2.75.

SUCH books as "Under the Iron Heel" are inevitable in Swartime. We must resign ourselves to a spate of them in the near future. People with an urge to write, and fated by circumstances to become eye-witnesses of the European inferno, will be unable to withstand the temptation to set down personal experiences which they, of course, consider unique.

There is nothing fundamentally wrong with Mr. Moën's book except that it comes a little late, after a dozen or so competent foreign correspondents have revealed to us the tragedy of the brutal Nazi invasion of the Low Countries and the ruthless Nazi administration of occupied territories. Almost everything that Mr. Moën has to say has been said by others, only better. But while the professional observers on the spot were chafing under a rigorous censorship and were compelled to give us the low-down between the lines, Mr. Moën has unnecessarily shackled himself to a sublime ideal of strict objectivity.

Only a scientist—and Lars Moën evidently is one—disciplined to work perseveringly according to a rigid formula, could so successfully have prevented his imagination, his emotions, and his nerves from intruding on his task. Mr. Moën possesses scientific self-restraint to a fault. Whenever anger or indignation threatened to overcome him he sternly curbed his impulse to succumb. Only rarely does he permit a conviction to sneak up on him. As a result "Under the Iron Heel" lacks human feeling, and because of his rather uneventful existence in a small hotel called "In the Shadow of the Cathedral" at Antwerp Mr. Moën's experiences are devoid of excitement—though it would be unkind to reproach the author for not having led a more heroic, adventurous life just to provide us with a more thrilling notebook.

After five months of a very uncomfortable existence Mr. Moën does permit himself a few conclusions, which are neither startling nor even unexpected. Thus he believes—very cautiously, however—that the Germans may crack if the war continues and England keeps on harassing them with air raids. He also ventures to state that the Belgians do not love England as much as they hate the Germans. His objectivity, however, compels him to report that the Nazi soldiers, with but rare exceptions, behaved in quite an exemplary manner toward the conquered population and tried their best, although very clumsily, to befriend the unfortunate Belgians. All in all, Mr. Moën's very distasteful five months in Antwerp add little to our knowledge on the subject of the Nazi occupation of Belgium.

Robotlike as Mr. Moën's reactions are to daily life under the Iron Heel of the Nazis, there still unfolds, despite his measured tone of objectivity, a sordid picture of destruction, chaos, and bewilderment in a land that, until the Nazi occupation, was happy and good to live in. It is perhaps not so much because of what the book reveals (Mr. Moën reveals very little that we do not know), but because certain events, such as the exodus of the Belgians before the German invasion, evoke in us memories of horror stories read elsewhere. Prosaic and pedestrian as the descriptions are, we cannot but be moved by even the objective tales of the hunted men and women whom the strategic plan of the German General Staff made innocent victims of the war against France and England. The sinister role of the Gestapo, which dominates Nazi occupation in the Low Countries, was hardly observed by Mr. Moën from his hotel room or his laboratory, where he experimented with a new film color process. Whether this was due to his insistence on recording merely the surface life of this Belgian city, or whether at the time of his stay in Antwerp the Gestapo had not yet taken charge, is something I cannot say. But even the first day of Nazi occupation inaugurated a strict anti-Semitic policy which Mr. Moën might have noted—even objectively.

A civilization is being torn asunder in Europe by Hitler's hordes. His iron heel is crushing all innocent humanity that stands in his way to world conquest. It means cynical looting, undisguised plunder, ruthless gagging of any and all independent life, systematic exploitation and enslavement of non-Germans for the benefit of the Nazi Herrenvolk. You must therefore forgive me if Mr. Moën's book, with its tiptoeing over the fundamental issues involved, rather irritated me. Not until he is in Portugal, on his way to the United States, does he throw off his restraint and express his gratitude that there is still a world where butter, good coffee, sugar, and cabarets make life worth while.

No. "Under the Iron Heel" is too deadly a nightmare title for so gentle and objective a book as Mr. Moën's. Objectivity toward the Nazis is an artificial attitude which produces a reality that is out of focus. Even the best and most honest observer will produce a distorted picture if he uses an apparatus that lacks heart, memory, and a little, just a little, indignation.

PIERRE VAN PAASSEN

Tragic History

NIGHT OVER EUROPE: THE DIPLOMACY OF NEMESIS, 1939-1940. By Frederick L. Schuman. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.50.

IN THIS remarkable book Professor Schuman unfolds with rare eloquence and penetration the tragedy of the last two years, tragedy from the point of view of the survival of the liberties of all democratic peoples. It is a continuation of his "Europe on the Eve," and shares with it the deep sincerity, the vigor of presentation, and the power of interpretation. It does not detract from the permanent value of the book that Professor Schuman, in writing his next volume, may find the guesses about the future which he ventures in the present book have left out of account certain important factors, as did the prognosis of his former book. Professor Schuman is probably right in saying that "any reversion to neutrality by America will almost inevitably mean the conquest of the world by the Triplice," but there seems to be little prospect of any such reversion, and Professor Schuman's book will have helped in clarifying democratic thought in that direction. And even louder than anyone's words speak the facts themselves.

The book combines an analysis of the past with a summons to the future. The most interesting passages of the analytical part are devoted to Stalin's attitude. As interesting though not as convincing is Professor Schuman's judgment on the motives of British policy before the outbreak of the war, which he regards as a well-laid-out, almost Machiavellian attempt to direct Germany against the Soviet Union.

At the root of the policy of appeasement was not primarily a class-conscious plot (though class concern and sometimes, especially in the case of Spain, an almost unbelievable class stupidity played a certain role), but a fundamental misunderstanding of the nature of fascism. This misunderstanding was shared by many elements of the left; Lansbury and Faure (not to mention many American leftists) were more eager for "peace" than many of the conservatives. Right and left simply clung to the line of thought processes of yesterday, of least responsibility and least effort, and reflected in that the desire of the masses everywhere "for 'peace' through 'neutrality,' 'isolation,' and 'pacifism.'"

Professor Schuman has tried again and again to wake up the democracies. The pages in his book which he devotes to the United States are, like those on the Soviet Union, among the very best. They are a sharp indictment of isolationism, and of the pacifism which seeks to escape the terrors of war, not by organizing the world for peace but by refusing to oppose war-makers. Without aid from America and the Soviet Union, Professor Schuman sees Britain lost, and America and the Soviet Union lost as well. "Every dictate of self-preservation counseled aid to Britain to crush the Triplice before its members had achieved in the world arena that invincibility which was already theirs in western Europe and eastern Asia. But in epochs of decadence, rulers and peoples seek safety not by doing what is requisite for safety, whatever the cost, but by avoiding all responsibilities and risks until too late and thereby insuring their destruction." Thus the book ends in unmitigated gloom.

Professor Schuman's impatience, his despair, are understandable. He saw the tragedy unfold, and he knows that it could have been averted again and again by an understanding of its nature and by courageous action. He has done his share to bring about understanding and action. But though his impatience is understandable, it does not seem justified. He underrates the power of democracy to think and to act; he overrates the intelligence and efficiency of the totalitarian powers. The experiences of the last months have clearly shown that Hitler and Mussolini do not always have their way. It is a myth that totalitarianism means efficiency or is the form of survival in the twentieth century. The Japanese so far have been unable to conquer China and, though the German people are highly efficient, totalitarianism has proved its claim to efficiency neither in Italy nor in Russia. The new "élite" in Moscow, Tokyo, Rome, and Berlin are in no way superior to the people in office in London or Washington, except in their utter ruthlessness in the use of secret police and in their disregard for all human values and all objectivity of truth. The fact that the English last June and the Greeks last October said "No" to the apparent "owners of the future," may have changed the future. Totalitarianism in the long run can produce only apathy and lethargy in the masses, for fascism is not a revolutionary movement, but the first sustained and consistent effort to make all revolutions impossible and to freeze mankind in an "order" for a thousand years.

Professor Schuman rightly draws a distinction between tyranny (Hitler's, Mussolini's, Franco's, Stalin's rule) and dictatorship as a form of power resorted to voluntarily and temporarily by democracies to meet emergencies. He rightly argues against the "disposition of Democrats to regard 'Dictatorship' in time of crisis as fatal to Democracy rather than as fundamental to its preservation." But how different is this temporary and voluntary dictatorship from the vaunted totalitarian unity maintained with the help of Gestapos! Once the danger was realized in England, English democracy offered the spectacle of moral stamina which took the fascists by surprise and which was achieved with an astonishing degree of political and personal liberty and humane decency. English democracy stands up infinitely better under infinitely harder blows than does fascism in Italy; nobody knows how totalitarian Germany or Russia would stand up under similar blows. There is no reason to despair of London or Washington. They pay a terrible price for their late awakening, but since last June they have traveled a long way toward full awareness. Many today will agree with Professor Schuman that "the prime prerequisite is recognition that the world society is one, that it must be recon-quered from the barbarians and reordered as a single polity in which justice for each is protected by the organized might of all." More and more recognize that the great withdrawal of America in 1919, the "realistic" abandonment of Wilson's "ideal," the shirking of responsibility for world peace and world order, were essential causes which made it possible for the Caesars to arise.

The world order to which Professor Schuman aspires is fundamentally opposed to the Caesarism which Spengler foresaw as the state form of the future. For Caesarism promises no stable world imperium. "What looms ahead [in Spengler's vision] is titanic and timeless strife among the empire-builders in ever wider arenas of combat. Beyond looms disintegration and the coming of the long darkness." In spite of all fascist assertions of the inevitability of this future and of the decadence of democracy, it is by no means certain that the future will belong to Caesarism instead of to a democratic world order. We do not know the outcome of the struggle; the future is unforeseeable; but those who believe in world democracy and in the values of liberty, equality, fraternity, have no reason to be overcome by gloom. They will carry on, "strong in will to strive, to seek, to find, and not to yield." The world of the Spenglerian future is in his own estimate meaningless and insipid. The dark forces of the ages scorn as absurd—to use words of the Pétain regime—the belief in the equality of men and in government by the people, the great heritage of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries' revolutions. But in a similarly decisive period of struggle between liberty and authoritarianism Fox wrote to Lord Holland: "I believe that the love of political liberty is not an error; but, if it is one, I am sure I shall never be converted from it, and I hope you never will. If it be an illusion, it is one that has brought forth more of the best qualities and exertions of the human mind than all other causes put together; and it serves to give an interest in the affairs of the world, which without it would be insipid." There is night not only over Europe, but over the world; Professor Schuman has written the great epic of that night; his eyes are so fascinated by the darkness, which he describes in a masterly way, that he does not see the dawn which he himself has helped to bring about.

HANS KOHN

A New Reading of Shelley

SHELLEY. By Newman Ivey White. Alfred A. Knopf. Two Volumes. $12.50.

FOR many of us the life of Shelley has meant Maurois's "Ariel" and Elinor Wylie's biblio-flirtation with "The Orphan Angel." Though nineteenth-century readers could accept his poems, for his private life they always thought with Carlyle that "yon fellow Shelley was a scoundrel." But since 1920, though indifferent to the poetry, we have found stagey personifications of our own moral shell-chipping in the "true stories" of Ariel Shelley, Glorious Apollo Byron, and the rest of their circle. As both the preface to this new, two-volume, twenty-year work and the body of the biography itself make clear, Professor White's "Shelley" is in an altogether different genre, a picture of the most considerable sort. The working credo recited in the introduction should be a mirror for all engaged in serious biographical studies. And the reconstruction of the life is a job done to meet all requirements, I should guess, for another century.

It is now fifty years since Dowden wrote the last thorough life of Shelley. Much new material has appeared; in letters alone, the chief source for Shelley, White has used 600 to Dowden's 150. This fact, added to his belief that the perspective of time on the old material is of critical value, constitute White's apologia. His procedure is equally unassuming and authoritative: "to keep myself as far in the background as possible, allowing the readers every opportunity of forming judgments of their own." He admits that the biographer's absolutes, "fidelity to facts" and "justice to personality," are unattainables. His devices are: an over-use of "perhaps," "apparently," and "it seems"; abstention from invented conversations and imputed thoughts; a common-sense, pre-Vienna psychology, "the only one yet proper to biography." With these he has singularly realized his hope of "adding to and refining the body of truth which is necessary to understand so great a poet and personality."

I do not rehearse these merely as prefatorial pieties, but rather because they have so nervingly informed with sensible liveliness what in similar works often remains just more information. Revealed, not obscured, by careful documentation; its thoroughness proportioned to the pace of events; candidly dignified, sensitively unprejudiced—the familiar story has never come through better. P. Shelley, atheos and Oxford expellee; the two Harriets and Hogg, and the elopement with Mary Godwin; the Italian group—Byron, Claire Clairmont, Trelawney, and the Hunts; Emily Viviani; Jane Williams with a guitar; the boat, toy, and symbol; Sophocles and Keats in the drowned man's pockets; the heart that would not burn; and aftermath of widow and wrangling friends. D. H. Lawrence comes to memory—the misinterpreted pure-in-heart, and so many women. Professor White's especial contributions are an emphasis on the childhood because of many carry-overs, Shelley's lifelong sense of mission, his well-recorded readings, his health and mental peculiarities.

Such definitive portraiture of the poet and man, however, only makes more urgent the present need for some new anatomizing light on the poetry itself. Not until the last two chapters does White permit himself to approach this problem. Believing that "great poetry is degraded by prose commentary," he satisfies himself by quoting throughout many passages which "assert their greatness better than any attempted exposition could." Not necessarily, of course; that depends on the expositor. And less friendly critics have not shown similar hesitation in exposing some of those same passages as examples of plain bad writing. White graphs the rise of Shelley from an early popularity among non-poetic, "radical" groups, to a place among the five or six greatest English poets—a rise curiously accompanied by an ever-increasing rejection of the beliefs he held, lived by, and wrote of in most of his poetry. The criticism of the detractors is fully acknowledged—Arnold, Leslie Stephens, P. E. More—as well as the kindlier but no less deadly variety administered by Francis Thompson. For a poet's boobification the epithet of "an enchanted child peering over his metaphysics" is quite as sufficient as that of "an ineffectual angel beating

Give yourself the supreme experience of reading now, in its first weeks of publication, one of the few novels of our time that may prove immortal

- "One of the very great novels of world literature... I was enthralled." —ANDRÉ MAUROIS, Herald Tribune Books
- "A mighty crescendo of greatness...one may almost dare to prophesy immortality." —KATHERINE WOODS, N. Y. Times Book Review
- "One of the few literary and human documents which are sure to survive our time." —STEFAN ZWEIG
- "One of the most sweepingly inclusive—one of the most engrossing novels of our day." —CHARLES POORE, N. Y. Times
- "Twice or thrice in a lifetime... a masterpiece." —JUSTIN O'BRIEN, The Nation
- "A superlative reading experience... deserves to be linked with the work of Tolstoi." —HARRY HANSEN, World-Telegram
- "By far the greatest work of fiction done in our time." —ALBERT JAY NOCK, Atlantic Monthly

THE WORLD OF THE THIBAUTS

by Roger Martin du Gard NOBEL PRIZE WINNER

For the first time in English, the complete text of the eleven French volumes which won for their author The Nobel Prize. The first—and smaller—section, The Thibaults, was published here in 1939. Readers of that volume may obtain the new volume, Summer 1914, separately at $3.50. TWO VOLUMES BOXED $6.00.

his luminous wings." White makes out his case for the future of Shelley's poetry—in so far as he makes one or feels the need for such—on three points: "a peculiar intensity which, with his music, makes Shelley one of our most hypnotic poets; a unique sense of loneliness; a superb faith in human destiny." Howsoever it is, he says, Shelley's reputation is ever on the increase. Where—except perhaps in university presses or the pages of the P. M. L. A.?

The apathy, if not actual antagonism, toward Shelley's poetry at the present time is a fact not to be minimized. And if one believes that criticism does bear a real, efficient relationship to the health of the body poetic, then this is certainly the moment for its utmost operation by pro-Shelleyan critics. Of the true, two-faceted nature of the poetic faculty Shelley's own definition will do as well as any. The mature poet is both a discoverer of poetry and a maker of poetry; "by the function he creates new materials for knowledge, by the other he reproduces them according to rhythm and order." It is not often though that this ideal of the whole poet is either sought or commended. Shelley's own practice emphasized markedly the first half, as did most of the poets who followed him for almost a hundred years. Our own poets have leaned heretically toward the second; descending rather in a Keatsian line, we have tended to produce a poetry of words, the dense, starch-stiff factibile. Accordingly, the first century of Shelley critics, in genteel conspiracy, eliminated his poetic "material" as too tenuous for consideration. Our latter-day precisionists, taking up at that point—some of them even finding his ideas "repellent"—have proceeded from their own new bias to attack his craftsmanship, his "music." That about brings the obituary notice full-round. The best, for instance, that the barometric Eliot can say for Shelley (whom he cites as the typical schoolboy "crush" poet) is that "toward the end of his life he was beginning to profit by his reading of Dante." There have been a few voices raised in resuscitation, for the most part those of scholars. But in those higher councils where the tastes of a period are formed, almost no one has made any effort to see Shelley's poetry plain and new.

The beginnings of a fresh, helpful approach to this body of work might well be found in Yeats, both for useful comparison and as one of the few congenial commentators. A similar attempt is already starting to enjoy Yeats "as" poetry, while spoofing about the Besant-ific "vision" which the poems exactly reflect. This is not possible, finally; and it is wrong—wrong because wasteful of the very value in that vision there contained. It seems as if no prophet is so without honor as he who is at once a poet. And yet the poet-seer has always been a familiar conjunction, and in the nature of human psychology must continue to be. In his "Essays" Yeats writes of Shelley: "One cannot help thinking him a vague thinker unless one compares passages till one has discovered the system of beliefs that lay behind them. He soon became more than a Godwinian revolutionist . . . he foresaw more than political regeneration. Having experienced all but the most profound mystical states . . . he awakened in himself the age of faith."

Yeats sees in Shelley's technique, his language, an instinctive and fairly advanced attempt to find, "as the poet of pure ideas and essences must," a vocabulary of precise symbols.

Just as he constantly sought an expression of human spirituality clearer than any possible in the provided forms of his times, so he persistently experimented with a new poetic speech "uncorrod by custom." Rather than being just clichés, picked up in his reading of Gothic horror tales, his recurrent lamp, cave, ship, river, veil are the initial entries in that new lexicon—a multi-denotative language—which poets ever since have been trying to piece together. Yeats, himself, closer in his methods to Shelley than any other, and following them out to the furthest reaches, evolved a symbolic vocabulary uniquely successful among modern poets.

The usefulness of Yeats's remarks on Shelley—and I have only suggested the directions he indicates for a rehabilitation—is that they show Shelley in a different, wider context than is usual. A recent book by B. Ifor Evans, "Tradition and Romanticism," trying to break up the conventional categorizations of English literature, does the same. Because he carried certain tendencies to their greatest extremes, and because in the argot of lecture hall and literature outline these tendencies are termed "romantic," Shelley's poetry has been made a clothes-rack for the whole wardrobe of the "romantic period"—that mythology of old embroideries. We are now almost unable to see the text, what for the textbooks. Because of curricular exigencies, the arts must all be mustered into a presentable order, and history set going like a pendulum that we may tell school time by poets. The case of Shelley, as well as the other "romantics" from whom we have now been for some time "reacting," demonstrates how necessary it is to uncatact our reading from these formulas. We must for party-success assured!

with a Lafayette Radiocorder.
Gives you four different ways to entertain your guests (and yourself)!

Lafayette
RADIOCORDER $47⁵⁰ with tubes, microphone,

recording discs and needles.

Lafayette Radiocorder is four instruments in one—A 7-tube radio of superb quality . . . A recorder to capture the musical and dramatic talents of your guests . . . A modern record player . . . and a high-quality sound amplifying system with dozens of entertainment uses.

PHONE AND MAIL-ORDERS FILLED

Lafayette Radio

100 SIXTH AVENUE • NEW YORK, N. Y.

901 W. JACKSON BLVD., CHICAGO • 265 PEACHTREE ST., ATLANTA
110 FEDERAL ST., BOSTON • 24 CENTRAL AVE., NEWARK
542 E. FORDHAM RD., BRONX • 90-08 166th ST., JAMAICA, L. I.

a time accustom ourselves, in the widest possible extent, to apparent disassociations, "a powder of particularities." Then we may slowly come to have, rather than a table-of-contents knowledge, a sense of and friendship with an enlarging, inviolable unity where ride the superficial cycles, the ticking antinomies, "in their green going, a wave interminably flowing." History then might be seen as "a stream of biography"; writing one of its vocalities, as so many testaments, incalculably, ever-changingly interrelated. One of the jobs of criticism would be to observe these free associations as they reveal each other and the mystery of their common buoyancy.

Seen in some such way, the whole phenomenon of Shelley and his poetry will be of much greater meaning and use to us. He lived at a time when the world's last great picture-order was cracking apart from the pressure of internal energies. Those fissures completely sundered now explicate the dead level where we ourselves walk. It was his especial grace that he was freed almost at once from the hindrances of the old life, and that in his short maturity he tried almost all of the successive adaptations which the eruptive new life was to take for a hundred years to come. He mastered the science of his time; he worked at social reform; he trained himself in philosophy; his personal difficulties came from his effort to find a human relationship that might fill his peculiar needs. In retrospect he seems to have described in sizable dimension that "ordeal" which a self-appointed succession of men have been undergoing ever since—"the heroes' journey to the cinders," in Hulme's phrase.

Shelley did not live out this experience under the vacuum-bell intension of Rimbaud's season. Nor did he achieve that "bisexual" maturity that Mann suggests in his Goethe-Joseph ideal—though Edward Carpenter analyzes many of Shelley's emotional troubles as a failure to so realize himself. Like Lawrence he did insist that "conversion does not operate through negation of passion but through its aid and for its affirmation." And his Love is certainly that Eros which is not the destroyer but "the builder of cities" in Christ and Freud, Blake and Auden. He came to believe that the supernatural could inbreak upon time only through individuals, individuals freed from those "desires that cannot live with wisdom." His last letters show how completely he had lived through and past, one after another, the false, old heteronymous refuges. Shortly before he died he wrote, "I live from day to day." He did not live long enough to issue forth from that passive vacancy; Rilke, alone perhaps, has been permitted through endurance to hear his angels speak. Nor could Shelley see with the same specific clarity what Henry Miller has begun to say: "When the old hierarchies are finally broken down, there is the drift to the new unthinkable order, the era of the Holy Ghost." Shelley's Hellenism thus is no nostalgic looking back at the broken columns of Greece, but rather his latest and not yet adequate symbol of the future, so much of which lay already half-open in his intensely apprehended present.

This lengthy coda to the consideration of Professor White's work is not aimed to imply correction or derogation; nor is it merely an indulgence of personal vagaries. White's lens has been occupied, and rightly, only with certain aspects of one man. All that I have suggested, though pertinent, is either unknown or unmentioned by him. This has seemed the proper and urgent time and place, however, to suggest the picture in a different pair of eyes, binoculars that sweep a longer, less detailed stretch. Maritain says, "As the world breaks up we see the things of the spirit gather together . . . art and poetry, metaphysics and wisdom." Shelley is one who belongs there in that gathering. We cannot afford to lose any part of his rich participations: either through faulty knowledge or divisive attitudes.

SHERMAN CONRAD

The Finnish-Russian War

INVASION IN THE SNOW: A STUDY OF MECHANIZED WAR. By John Langdon-Davies. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.50.

M^{R.} LANGDON-DAVIES is a British journalist who was assigned to report the Russo-Finnish War. Immediately after the end of the war, in April, 1940, he wrote this book and it was originally published in England under the title of "Finland: The First Total War." Instead of a chronological history—more emphasis on the time sequence would have been helpful—events are classified under three headings, each of which is studied as a separate entity: the guerrilla fighting, the position warfare, and the attack on the civil population. There is a fourth and final section on the social and economic structure of Finland, in which the author discovers the source of the high Finnish morale.

One is constantly impressed by the ingenuity of the Finns—their careful exploitation of every advantage of terrain and environment, their "winter roads," their Suomi pistols, their stoves which burned without telltale smoke or sparks. Ample evidence of their skill in warfare is the fact that on one occasion they annihilated 36,000 Russians at the total cost of 150 of their own men. The fighting on the Carelian Isthmus was similar to the Meuse-Argonne offensive of 1918. On each battleground a greatly superior force attacked along a narrow front against an entrenched position in a heavily wooded region, and the results were much the same in both cases. The war demonstrated plainly that Soviet Russia is as barren of military genius as was Imperial Russia. Seldom did the Russian operations show any trace of skill, let alone brilliance. Stalin, like his Tsarist predecessors, apparently relied for victory upon the inexhaustible reserves of Russian manpower, and in consequence the same stupid, costly frontal attacks with which the world had become familiar in 1914-18 were repeated in Finland.

The author went to Finland convinced that Soviet Russia could not be altogether bad. He would not believe that "the Red Army could treat the common soldier precisely as the Tsar had treated him," nor that a proletarian government "would willingly sacrifice human life with a liberality usually attributed only to profit-making merchants of death." He dismissed as propaganda the stories of Russian bombings of hospitals, women, and children. But he came back from the war completely disillusioned, despising the Russians, and earnestly determined to prove to those who had thought as he had that the Russia they had envisioned was wholly imaginary. To the latter project he devotes much of the book, and it should be required reading now, when we are inclined to overlook the Finnish war, the land-grabs in Poland, Rumania, and the Baltic states, and to welcome Russia into the fold.

HARVEY S. FORD

FILMS

Academy Awards

• Hollywood, March 6

THE Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences is best known to the public for its annual awards dinner. The institution was founded in 1927 with the late Douglas Fairbanks as president, ostensibly to promote and reward artistic endeavor in the industry, and for this purpose it introduced the custom of annually handing out gold statuettes for the most outstanding achievements in various branches of motion-picture work. The academy, actually, had other functions besides prize-giving and served as a most convenient producers' organization. The formation of the academy, in fact, coincided rather significantly with an attempt by Actors Equity to enter the Hollywood field. The purpose of the academy was so apparent that it came to be recognized as a sort of producers' guild and it was partly in opposition to this that, in 1933, the Screen Actors Guild embarked on its career. The main show-down between the guild and the academy occurred in 1935 when members of the guild decided to boycott the awards banquet; however, some sort of compromise was effected at the last moment and a sprinkling of players did attend. Nevertheless from that time on the strength of the guild rapidly increased, and in 1937 it successfully negotiated a contract.

Last Friday found producers and actors sitting down to the thirteenth annual academy dinner with an admirable display of amity and solidarity. Thirteen hundred people attended the festivities; two hundred of them were guests of the academy while the remainder had paid either twenty-five dollars each to sit at a ringside table or eleven dollars for a rather more distant view of the proceedings. Among the recipients of gold statuettes were Ginger Rogers, James Stewart, John Ford, Preston Sturges, Donald Ogden Stewart, and "Rebecca." Highlights of this year's dinner were President Roosevelt's speech, which was delivered to the guests by radio before the dinner started, and the suspense created by the unusual procedure of keeping the winners secret until the actual presentation of the awards.

The winners are now chosen by an elaborate balloting system: first, the various branches of the industry send in nominations for the awards and then everyone regularly engaged in the production of motion pictures—actors, directors, writers, producers, and their staffs, cinematographers, etc.—is sent a ballot sheet on which he records his votes. This year the ballot sheets were sent to Messrs. Price Waterhouse and Company, the accountants, who returned the result of the 12,000-odd votes at the last moment. The announcements this year were as usual received with acclaim, the award to Miss Rogers being particularly popular. Miss Rogers, who found the experience altogether too much, dissolved into tears, as did Mrs. Jack Oakie when her husband failed to capture the award for the best supporting actor; otherwise, with one exception, all went happily.

The only serious spot on the tablecloth was made by Quentin Reynolds, whose monophonic and slightly lugubrious commentary to "London Can Take It" caused such a furore. Mr. Reynolds had been chosen to present the writing awards and made a short facetious speech about the academy's having the votes added by Messrs. Price Waterhouse. He doubted, he said, if many of the people present could count up to 12,000 and then added "Yes, there are a couple of producers who could count—but not in English." Mr. Reynolds, who has arrived in town to a fanfare of favorable publicity, departed to the tune of very different music.

It is interesting to note in connection with the academy awards that Dr. Gallup has recently conducted, through the American Institute of Public Opinion, a poll on the most popular movie releases of last year. The public selected as the best pictures of 1940: "Boom Town," "Knut Rockne," "Northwest Passage," "Rebecca," "Strike Up the Band," and "Fighting 69th," a very different selection from the nominations for the academy awards which were: "All This And Heaven Too," "Foreign Correspondent," "Kitty Foyle," "The Grapes of Wrath," "Our Town," "The Great Dictator," "The Letter," "The Long Voyage Home," "Philadelphia Story," and "Rebecca."

It is difficult to draw any conclusion from this vast discrepancy between the public's taste and the industry's estimation of its best achievements. However, one begins to regard the industry's more ambitious production with something approaching awe. With the average movie-goer mentally arrested somewhere near the pre-adolescent adventurous stage, the industry's sallies into sentimental adolescence (the highest common factor of production and public taste), are impressive, while the adult offerings of the industry on its more conscious levels are of staggering boldness. The trade papers have pointed out that Dr. Gallup's survey represents box-office opinion, but the producers probably won't forget that the public has a way of growing up a little every year and that it's well to keep ahead of it.

THE PRESIDENT TO THE INDUSTRY

Roosevelt's speech marked the first occasion on which a president has addressed the film industry. The speech stressed the importance of the industry as an instrument of propaganda (without using the objectionable word) both over the entire continent and abroad. The President expressed his thanks to the newsreels for clarifying the issues of the lease-lend bill to the public, and to the industry as a whole for its Pan-American good-will policy. He wound up by saying, "For all this and for your splendid cooperation with all who are directing the expansion of our defense forces, I am glad to thank you. In the months and weeks that lie ahead, we in Washington know that we shall have your continued aid and support." A very nice thing to know.

Hollywood is delighted, up to a point, with the speech, and enchanted with Walter Wanger who is acting as a kind of self-appointed liaison officer with Washington and who is reported to be getting along there famously; however, some people have found the speech tinged a little with paternalism and, jealous of Hollywood's independence of governmental influence, are slightly annoyed at the publicity given to its cooperation in the defense program. The defense set-up in Hollywood is an interesting study and will be dealt with shortly in this column.

RECENT FILMS

"Nice Girl" disclosed Deanna Durbin in a series of familiar situations. She sings in a very pretty voice to her family, to the guests at the Boat Club Ball, and to an entire regiment of draftees. Meanwhile, she finds time to fall in and out of love with Franchot Tone. Recommended to Durbin fans.

Preston Sturges does a very remarkable job with his latest picture "The Lady Eve." He first writes for himself a script neither particularly original nor very subtle in its humor, chooses Henry Fonda and Barbara Stanwyck, both noted for heavy dramatics rather than for comedy, to play the leads, and then proceeds by prodigies of direction to concoct one of the most amusing and delightful films seen on the screen for a long time. The almost Rabelaisian gusto with which Mr. Sturges works, communicates itself most successfully to the audience, and the cutting and tempo of the picture should be studied by every director in the industry.

"Rage in Heaven" is a rollicking melodrama masquerading as a psychopathic study. Perhaps James Hilton's novel treated the psychopathic angle more seriously; luckily the film concentrates on telling an exciting story, which it does with some success. Ingrid Bergman, in the most hideous clothes imaginable, looks enchanting and acts with conviction while Robert Montgomery makes an engaging if somewhat nonchalant appearance as a paranoiac.

Bowdlerized by the Hays office, rewritten for the screen by Nunnally Johnson, directed by John Ford, "Tobacco Road" emerges as a rather slapstick, castrated version of the murky stage play. It would seem that John Ford, after a lengthy screen experience with landless workers and farmers of a different caliber (in "The Grapes of Wrath"), just could not bring himself to believe that the Lesters and their neighbors were nearly as black as Erskine Caldwell had painted them. Perhaps he is right but in this version they are certainly less entertaining than ever before—though the film is worth seeing for the superb photography.

ANTHONY BOWER

MUSIC

EACH time that I hear Webster Aitken play the piano I am astonished all over again by what distinguishes him from other pianists of equal talent. What his playing offers—as against the warmth, the plasticity, the fluency of theirs—and what is heard with a shock after those qualities, is the sharp contours and powerful tensions of a concentrated style that gives the music the impress of individual, forceful, and extraordinarily matured qualities of mind and feeling. In the middle section of the second movement of Mozart's Concerto K. 595, which Aitken played recently with the New York Philharmonic under Walter, these contours and tensions—created with the utmost subtlety in phrases that revealed themselves with the utmost quiet—made the long cantilena one of the most exciting things I have ever heard.

In a properly organized musical life such a musician would be heard constantly and everywhere—in solo recitals, in performances with orchestras, in broadcasts, on phonograph records. In our commercialized musical life such a musician has almost no place. A man who plays Beethoven's "Diabelli" Variations and Schubert's sonatas is not material for commercial exploitation by the two huge concert-management combines which monopolize concert activity throughout the country by their own system of block-booking, and which use this system to fill the ears of the population eternally with the easy effectiveness, the sentimentality, the flashy virtuosity of standardized programs of Chopin Nocturnes, Liszt's Rhapsodies and "Liebestraum," and, at most, Beethoven's "Pathétique" and "Moonlight" and other early sonatas. A superb musician who is not built up into a commercially valuable property by these managements is not worth anything to broadcasting and record companies which traffic in currently celebrated names. Nor is he worth much to symphony orchestras; and if he chooses to give the audience and critics subtlety in a Mozart concerto instead of thundering imposingly for them in Beethoven's "Emperor" he is not likely to be engaged soon again.

Nor—from the story as it has reached me—is even the one experience what it should be. Concerto performances as perfectly integrated—which is to say as carefully worked out in rehearsal—as those of Schnabel with the New Friends of Music Orchestra last year, and with the National Orchestral Association the year before, are exceptional. A conductor, as I have pointed out on occasion, normally does not put a concerto on a program as something worth doing for itself, like a symphony. It is, instead, something he has to accept with the soloist, and something he has little interest in, since its purpose is to show off the soloist, not himself. If, then, he has two and a half hours in which to rehearse a Mozart concerto and a piece of rubbish by Korngold for orchestra alone, he will give most of the time to the rubbish by Korngold—unless the soloist is important enough to command the time necessary to achieve some degree of homogeneity of phrasing and style and some degree of integrated execution in the joint performance. If the soloist is only a young American he will get the last thirty minutes of the rehearsal for a work that requires that long merely to play through—time enough, in fact, merely to rush through it once, and not time enough for the soloist to make his wishes known, or for the conductor, himself a Mozart specialist with his own sentimental way of playing the music, to discover that the soloist is one whose wishes merit consideration. The result is an all but improvised performance in which our young American must concentrate all his attention and effort into merely fitting his notes smoothly into the work as the conductor creates it in accordance with his own conception of it. Mr. Walter—by the evidence of his recent performances with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra and the Metropolitan Opera Association—is a man of impressive gifts as conductor and musician; but that performance of Mozart's K. 595 was, among other things, an example of a virtuoso conductor's artistic consciencelessness and personal ruthlessness.

The Ballet Theater has offered competent, lively performances of "Les Sylphides," "Swan Lake," and "The Bluebird," but performances which, inevitably challenging comparison with those of the Ballet Russe, have lost by one's recollection of the aura of stylistic brilliance about Toumanova's every movement in these classical ballets, the unique lightness and fluent grace of Riabouchinska, and other things of the sort. More successful and enjoyable have been the Ballet Theater's productions of the modern ballets in which the dancers' limitations have been less apparent or of less consequence. The best of these, I would say, is Eugene Loring's "Billy the Kid," taken over from the Ballet Caravan, with music by Aaron Copland that is almost unbelievably good to listen to and admirably contrived for the purposes—which is to say the theatrical point, the wit, the atmosphere—of choreography that is as strikingly original and effective in the simple pas de deux as in the most complex counterpoint of differently paced movement. Original also is the vocabulary, the style which Antony Tudor uses with beautiful effect for the expression of the intensity and agony of "Jardin aux lilas," with Chausson's nostalgic "Poème" as a sort of musical backdrop. With Tudor's "Dark Elegies" I had the difficulty that I was occasionally aware of the words of Mahler's songs referring to specific things which the movements had no relation to; but I also found the movements pointless or inadequate in relation to the music, of which they were presumably a visual interpretation, and unimpressive in themselves.

B. H. HAGGIN

Letters to the Editors

Communists and Unions

Dear Sirs: Your editorial, Communists and Unions (March 1 issue), seems to be based on the presumption that the Communists are to blame for all the new and exasperating troubles that labor unions have had to face during the past decade. Trade unionism once "seemed a fairly simple proposition" of a movement to obtain "fair wages and decent working conditions," but now it has become a complicated and bewildering struggle because "them damn Communists" are boring from within. Such seems to be the grounds for your approbation of the purge which the Counts faction in the American Federation of Teachers tries to accomplish. Your premises are too simple. They are like the explanations that labor-union politicians of the old bureaucratic school are giving for the perpetuating of their regime.

But even you seem to be conscious of the contradiction in the purge as a means of resolving internal union problems. You recognize that Communists in unions are "willing and efficient brothers" who "do whatever of the hard work of the organization they can lay their hands on." Is it possible that you and Brother Counts mistake any zealous, hard-working unionist for a Communist? You intimate that getting rid of Communists is not enough. So does Brother Counts. The fellow-travelers are not amenable to bureaucratic discipline. Then there are the honest liberals who refuse to join in the hue and cry against Communists. You will have to get rid of all of them to restore the unions to their former static and relatively peaceful condition.

Now that Counts, with the help of labor bureaucrats, has started his purge, where can he end it? He started out to get rid of Local 5. Already he has had to purge the College Teachers Union, Local 537; the New York WPA Local 453; and the Philadelphia Local 192; that is, about 25 or 30 per cent of the membership of the Federation. There are a great many members of the American Federation of Teachers throughout the country who take old-fashioned American principles of tolerance, democracy, and freedom seriously, and to whom a purge is exceedingly distasteful. How can the Counts faction have any peace if it does not get rid of all of them? Yes, he has "taken the bull by the horns," and he is likely to lose much of his professional dignity before he is through with it. His course certainly does involve "dangers and painful precedents."

Your statement that the Counts faction will get "rid of a growth that has been sapping it (the A. F. of T.) internally and exposing it to attack from without" is wholly contrary to fact. The history of the American Federation of Teachers during the past decade shows conclusively that it has grown in membership, prestige, and effectiveness during the period when the four locals that are to be expelled were flourishing. As for the attacks "from without," most of them have been from labor-union politicians who are exploiting the red issue on the slightest pretext. And, of course, any bona fide militant union inevitably runs afoul of such attacks as Dies and Coudert make.

CHARLES J. HENDLEY, President,

The Teachers Union of the City of
New York, Local 5, A. F. of T.
New York, March 8

Dear Sirs: Your editorial Communists and Unions is an illuminating and fair analysis of the problems faced by unions in general and the American Federation of Teachers in particular. Your distinction between closed-shop unions and those in the field of civil service and education and the statement that membership tests which might be valid in the latter would be unjust in the former are, I think, helpful.

Without knowing the answer to the problems you raise I should like to offer my testimony on the difficulties which prompted the action of the American Federation of Teachers. I had what must now seem the dubious honor and privilege of helping Dr. Counts organize a "save-the-union" committee in 1935. Our purpose was to prevent elements now organized in the Teachers Guild from "purging" the union and applying tests. We succeeded, but also we failed. (It may be important to call attention to this service of Dr. Counts, in view of the Communist attacks upon him.) The Communists were in control of the union in a fairly short time. I have known members of the union to admit this in private years ago and to deny it in public in order to prevent "red baiting." The control was not so apparent during the days of the united front when Russian foreign policy dictated Communist policies in general conformity with those followed by other groups. It became crystal clear with the signing of the Russian-Nazi pact.

Some of us have been challenged recently by those who have not been "through the mill," to wrest control of the unions from the Communists "by the democratic process." But it is difficult to find enough people with the time or energy to devote themselves to the purely negative task of preventing a trade union from falling under the control of a determined and disciplined minority. They would rather resign than be engaged in this thankless and uncreative task. Incidentally, some of us now smile sardonically when the Communists protest against a membership referendum as undemocratic, for we remember when they insisted on more "delegate assemblies" and fewer meetings of the executive committee. The assemblies were supposed to be more democratic but they were preferred in fact because a disciplined minority could count on a larger proportion of absentees among its opponents in the general body.

There is no solution for this problem which may not be subject to abuse and which may not seem undemocratic to the uninitiated, that is, those who do not know with what chicanery a determined minority can use and abuse the democratic process for the purpose of destroying it. We must be careful to preserve essential democracy, but we will hardly be impressed by the touching solicitude for democracy, expressed by elements in the union which have for years practiced every trick of the trade in keeping a minority in control.

REINHOLD NIEBUHR

New York, March 7

Dear Sirs: To those of us who have been engaged in the thankless task of reestablishing democratic principles and purposes in the New York teachers' unions, your editorial of March 1 came as a welcome harbinger of change in the climate of American liberal opinion.

One further point might have served as support for your argument. Any union must stand or fall on the basis of its ability to organize the workers in the industry under its jurisdiction and to effectively represent their interests. On this basis alone the New York locals of the A. F. of T. stand condemned. The College Teachers Union claimed 1,100 members at the time of its formation in 1938. At the present time there are, from all indications, not many more than 600 in good standing, and many of these are from the non-instructional staffs. Local 5 has experienced an even more drastic loss in membership. It once boasted a membership of around 6,500. Recently the national office of the A. F. of T. communicated with 6,300 persons still on its mailing list, asking them to indicate by return postal whether or not they considered themselves members of the union in good standing. Although the administration of Local 5 conducted a vigorous campaign to have the cards returned with affirmative answers, only about 2,100 so replied. Making all possible allowances, it is fair to conclude that the membership of Local 5 does not now greatly exceed 3,000. And there are some 40,000 teachers within its jurisdiction. Furthermore, Local 5 has been expelled from the Joint Committee of Teachers Organizations, an affiliation of which it was so proud only two years ago. Both New York City locals have been expelled from the Central Trades and Labor Council.

A final word of commendation for your comments on that form of political blackmail by which all opposition is branded "red-baiting." If the members of the A. F. of T. understand this tactic for what it is worth, it will again be possible for such outstanding liberals as John Dewey, John Childs, Reinhold Niebuhr, and hundreds of others to return to teacher unionism—where they rightfully belong. JAMES LOEB, JR.

New York, March 6

Dear Sirs: Your editorial (Communists and Trade Unions) in the March 1 Nation shocked and distressed us. At a time when trade unionists should be bending all their efforts to maintain and strengthen their ranks, at a time when the enemies of labor are doing their best to strip the unions of their hard-earned rights, at such a time it is discouraging to find the voices of the "liberals" beginning to join in the hue and cry.

For six years most of us have been members of Local 5, A. F. of T. We have tried to be good trade unionists by attending meetings and taking as active a part as possible in the work of the union. We have been affiliated with no faction and have always voted independently along the lines which seemed best for the union's growth and effectiveness.

At all times there has been full and free discussion of important issues. At all times decisions were reached by the democratic process. The administration of the union was elected last spring by 80 per cent of those voting. The election was honest and represented the free choice of the membership. Isn't it still part of the democratic process to stand by duly elected leaders till they are denied at the polls by their own responsible electorate?

ELBERT LENROW, JULIA HAMLIN,
HARRY HELLER, DOROTHY EMERSON, and others

Fieldston School Chapter, Private School Section, Teachers Union,
Local 5.

New York, March 7

The D. A. R. Protests

Dear Sirs: A letter signed by certain of our members, in the New Republic and in The Nation (February 22), accuses the National Executive Committee of the Descendants of the American Revolution of undemocratic procedure in adopting the resolution opposing H.R. 1776. This action was taken in accordance with the statement of policy adopted by the National Council on January 12, 1941, and with paragraph (a), section 3, of our constitution, in our capacity as the duly elected executive body of the organization.

The National Council's statement of policy was passed unanimously. It had therefore the vote of two members who signed The Nation letter.

Our constitution states it is our principle "To reaffirm the Declaration of Independence and the Bill of Rights, to uphold the Constitution of the United States, and actively to defend the liberties guaranteed therein by furthering the principles of democracy in the political, social, and economic life of the United States of America."

On the question of a referendum of the membership before any resolution is adopted, it is the function of the national executive committee to act for the membership as their duly elected representatives by applying the policies of the organization to specific and immediate legislation.

The National Executive Committee in its statement on H.R. 1776 made it clear that it did not take a stand on the issue of foreign policy, which is outside of its scope. In the statement released to the press the National Executive Committee made clear that they opposed the Bill because "it is an undemocratic abdication of their powers by the people and their elected representatives."

The National Council and the National Executive Committee opposes, and will continue to oppose, any bill which in any way endangers the Bill of Rights or the Constitution of the United States. MARION BRAND,

Recording Secretary for the National Executive Committee, Descendants of the American Revolution.
New York, March 7

CONTRIBUTORS

R. H. MARKHAM a native of Kansas, has spent twenty-five years in the Balkans as an educator and foreign correspondent.

JACK SCHUYLER has contributed science articles to the Survey Graphic, Current History, and a number of other publications.

PETER STEVENS is the pseudonym of an American writer now residing in Istanbul.

GEORGE PEPPER is a Californian who has recently returned from a year's visit in the Dutch East Indies.

PIERRE VAN PAASSEN, author of the widely read "Days of Our Years," has long covered critical events in Europe and the Near East.

HANS KOHN, professor of modern European history at Smith College, is the author of "Not By Arms Alone" and other books.

SHERMAN CONRAD is an associate of the School of Letters at Iowa University.

ANTHONY BOWER, formerly film critic for the New Statesman and Nation, is to contribute a regular fortnightly column from Hollywood for The Nation.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 65 Fifth Ave., New York. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 152

NEW YORK · SATURDAY · MARCH 22, 1941

NUMBER 12, PART 1

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

EDITORIALS

PART I.

- Speed British Aid 311
The Vichy Front 312
Sherwood Anderson by Freda Kirchwey 313

ARTICLES

- O'Mahoney Sums Up by I. F. Stone 315
Who Are the Appeasers? by Herbert Agar 316
A New World Literature. 1. The Novel in Indo-America by Luis-Alberto Sánchez 323
In the Wind 326
A Native at Large by Jonathan Daniels 327

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

- The Evil in Man by Denis de Rougemont 328
A Tribute to Milles by Morton Dauwen Zabel 329
Countermine Against Hitler by Keith Hutchison 330
Drama: A Pretty Problem by Joseph Wood Krutch 331
Music by B. H. Haggin 332

PART II

- Foreword by R. B. 333
Europe Under the "Master Race" by Konrad Heiden 334
Notes on the United States, 1950 by Walter Millis 337
The Fate of Latin America by J. Alvarez del Vayo 342
Imperialism, Old and New by Albert Vito 345
Revolution by Consent by Harold J. Laski 349
Economy for a New World by Keith Hutchison 353 Fighting Chance for a Sick Society
by Reinhold Niebuhr 357
Labor's Stake in a Victory by George S. Counts 360

Editor and Publisher

FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor

ROBERT BENDINER

Washington Editor

I. F. STONE

Literary Editor

MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors

KEITH HUTCHISON MAXWELL S. STEWART

Dramatic Critic

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager and Director of Circulation

HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager

MARY HOWARD ELLISON

The Shape of Things

309

THE PAST WEEK MAY WELL PROVE TO HAVE marked the turning point of the war. Our sometimes lumbering democratic machine was shifted at last into high gear as Congress rushed through the last stages of the Lease-Lend bill. Without a moment's delay Mr. Roosevelt asked for a round seven billion dollars to implement the measure and the House quickly went to work on the appropriation bill. Money on this scale not merely talks; it shouts in tones that rouse the dictators to spasms of psychotic rage and spur those resisting them to new efforts and new hope. And before the echoes of these explosive billions had died down the President rubbed in their meaning in a message that reached every corner of the earth. His speech was a challenge to the Axis powers, a warning that from now on material aid would pour forth in ever larger quantities until the forces of democracy prevail. It was also a challenge to ourselves—a challenge to overcome all obstacles, to speed up production to the utmost, and to accept cheerfully the temporary sacrifices which the job we have undertaken demands.

✱

BRITAIN RESPONDED TO THE PASSAGE OF THE Lease-Lend Act by a renewed offensive against Germany and the invasion ports. Assured of new supplies from this country the RAF went into action over Berlin, Hamburg, and the Ruhr on a larger scale than ever before. New types of bombers carrying heavier loads and with a longer range were employed and reports suggest that they have caused heavy damage to industrial plants, docks, and communications. The Luftwaffe has also speeded up attacks against Britain, striking particularly at the western ports which are the gateway for American material. No doubt these attacks have caused losses but the British are encouraged by the greater effectiveness of their defenses, which are now proving really dangerous to night-raiders. Although Hitler in his latest speech boasted that Germany was stronger than ever before, there is good reason to hope that its relative strength has diminished. It is noteworthy that, while he once again assured his audience that no power on earth could prevent Britain's fall, he did not repeat the promise made in his last speech that victory would be achieved this year.

★

THE ASSURANCE OF AMERICAN AID HAS proved a factor also in the diplomatic struggle taking place in the Balkans. For weeks Yugoslavia has been balanced on a knife-edge but with every indication that the weight of the Axis would be decisive. But now the balance seems to have swung the other way. Prince Regent Paul and his principal ministers have been attempting to maintain an equilibrium between the demands of Germany, which wants Yugoslavia to follow the Bulgarian example in submitting itself to protection and occupation, and popular opinion, which is growing increasingly antagonistic to any form of Nazi domination. An attempted compromise by which Yugoslavia would sign a treaty of friendship and non-aggression with Germany and Italy has proved unsatisfactory to the Germans while it is opposed inside the country as de facto surrender. The news from America and reports that strong British forces are landing in Greece have increased popular pressure on the government and there now seems a chance that negotiations with Germany may break down entirely. By asking too much Hitler may have suffered a diplomatic setback in Belgrade which can only be retrieved by military measures. But this would mean the opening of a broad Balkan front—just the end which he has striven anxiously to avoid. The Yugoslavian army is now being mobilized. It is numerous and composed of tough fighters capable of occupying the attention of many German divisions despite poor equipment. No doubt the mechanized Nazi troops could rapidly overrun the northern plains but the mountains of the south and west are ideally suited to defense by troops schooled in guerilla warfare. Moreover, with Yugoslavia ranged against the Axis, the resistance of Greece would be further strengthened and Turkey would be encouraged to throw its weight against the Axis. During the past week the Greeks claim to have thrown back a large-scale Italian counter-offensive. The advent of Yugoslavia as a Greek ally would at once endanger the rear of the fascist army, making its position in Albania untenable.

★

MUSSOLINI'S LEGIONS IN EAST AFRICA ARE being rapidly cut into disconnected pieces. Since the British victory in Somaliland which yielded 31,000 prisoners, the largest body left intact seems to be the garrison at Cheren in Eritrea. This force is estimated at 40,000 and is believed to include the most reliable native and Italian regiments remaining in this war zone. The British strategy appears to aim at containing this position, constantly battering it from the air and with artillery but refraining from an assault which might prove costly.

With limited manpower the utmost economy is essential, and General Wavell has already shown what can be accomplished on these lines. Meanwhile, several columns aided by Ethiopian tribesmen, some under British officers, are harrying the Italians in western Ethiopia and pushing them back toward Addis Ababa from which their only remaining avenue of retreat will be the railroad to French Somaliland. However, still another British column driving rapidly forward from conquered Italian Somaliland is threatening to cut the railroad at Dire-dawa. If this move succeeds, the final disintegration of Mussolini's East African empire will not be long delayed.

★

AMONG GERMANY'S "GIFTS" TO FRANCE, according to the official Berlin list, were 225,000 tons of wheat, 100,000 tons of potatoes—and 500,000 tons of newsprint. Even Mr. Hoover would have difficulty proving that the potatoes were actually delivered; but the news that has come out of Paris and Vichy of late makes us feel quite sure that the figure for newsprint is correct. Admiral Darlan himself must have used up a good deal of it trying to prove to the French people that the Germans have been "more generous and humanitarian than the British"—in his larger attempt to win support for his obvious desire to put the French fleet into the service of the Axis. Incidentally, the comparative figures for newsprint and potatoes are an accurate reflection of the five-to-one ratio between food and propaganda which prevails in the provinces of the "new order," including Germany itself where the master race dwells.

★

RECENT REPORTS FROM CHINA INDICATE that the dispute between right-wing Kuomintang elements and the former Red Army units is still far from being settled. There is a sharp divergence in the statement of issues as reported by official Kuomintang circles and independent American observers such as Edgar Snow and Major Evans Fordyce Carlson. The Kuomintang charges the Communists with breaking the united front agreement by seeking to establish themselves politically in the territories recaptured from the Japanese and refusing to submit to orders from the Minister of War. In reply the Communists accuse Chungking of seeking to destroy the Fourth and Eighth Route armies, which have played such a conspicuous role in defense against Japan, and with retarding democratic progress in China. It is obvious that a real cleavage has developed in which each side is convinced of the justice of its cause. In such a controversy there is nothing to be gained by trying to assess the relative share of blame. A break could serve no one's interest except Japan's. If civil war develops, there will be no China for either Chiang Kai-shek or the Communists to rule. And the United States will have lost its chief defense against Japanese dominance of the Pacific. This country has no direct concern in the outcome of the factional struggle in China. But it is vitally concerned that China should retain its unity in the face of Japanese aggression. To this end it might well make it clear to both factions that the continuation of American aid depends on a peaceful settlement of their dispute.

✱

REJECTION BY THE SOFT-COAL OPERATORS of the eight-state Appalachian region of the United Mine Workers' proposals for a new contract does not necessarily foreshadow a shutdown on April 1 when the present agreement expires. It was merely part of a preliminary and almost formal skirmish, following which the joint conference appointed a subcommittee to discuss a new agreement. Although Charles O'Neill, spokesman for the operators, suggested that the financial cost of the miners' program would be crippling, the proposals put forward by John L. Lewis do not appear exorbitant. He asked for a blanket increase of one dollar per day for regular classifications of day-workers with corresponding increases for piece-workers. Contrary to expectation, no change in hours was proposed but there were demands for a minimum guarantee of 200 days' work a year, two-week vacations with pay, and rigid safeguards against accidents, including the right of workers' safety committees to inspect any mining operation and authorize a suspension of work when dangerous conditions were discovered. This last proposal is of especial importance. As Mr. Lewis pointed out, mine fatalities in 1940 reached 1,400, an increase of 342 over 1939. Non-fatal accidents number tens of thousands, putting an untold burden of suffering on the miners and their families. Even in unsentimental terms of dollars and cents this "blood on the coal" is costly, involving a charge of 20 cents a ton or, in 1940, of $90,600,000. This, incidentally, is only some $18,000,000 short of Mr. O'Neill's estimate of the cost of the new wage schedules asked by the U. M. W. Yet the operators seem to have brushed the question of safety aside. We do not think such callousness will help their relations with the public any more than will their refusal to accept a non-stoppage resolution stipulating that any increase in wages finally determined should be retroactive to April 1.

✱

THE CHOICE OF JUDGE CHARLES B. SEARS TO preside at the new deportation hearings for Harry Bridges would seem to guarantee a trial fully as fair as that conducted by James M. Landis. Judge Sears, who recently retired from the New York Court of Appeals, is a jurist of high repute. At the New York State constitutional convention he led the fight against the proposed amendment which would have hamstrung administrative agencies. Although Bridges is now to be tried under a law which makes it a deportable offense ever to have been a member of a party that advocates overthrow of the government by force, the issue this time differs little from last. It is useful to recall that Landis did not pass merely upon the question of whether Bridges was a Communist at the time of his arrest. "The defense lawyers," Landis said on the closing day of the hearings, "have taken the stand that Bridges never was affiliated with the Communist Party, and that therefore he is not now affiliated with the party. Since the defense takes that stand, it follows that if the government does establish that he was at any time affiliated, that affiliation must be deemed to hold true now." Only the split hair of a legal technicality distinguishes this retrial from the double jeopardy against which the Constitution protects citizen and alien alike.

Speed British Aid

PASSAGE of the aid-to-Britain bill commits the United States belatedly, but irrevocably, to the policy of making this country the arsenal for the democracies. As opponents of the bill never tired of pointing out, this policy carries certain risks. While we do not believe that the risks are nearly as great as those involved in failing to help Britain, they undeniably exist. But they are serious only in case of an Axis victory. So far Germany has practically ignored the passage of the bill, but press comments in Rome make it clear that the Axis partners regard the bill's enactment as bringing the United States into the war on a non-belligerent basis. They also make it clear that the Axis will retaliate with whatever weapons it may have at its disposal.

It is evident also that the Axis has no intention of forcing the issue to the point of a declaration of war as long as Britain remains unconquered. But our security depends more than ever on a British victory. Having taken the plunge, we dare not leave a stone unturned in the effort to give Britain full assistance in the least possible time. The President has shown that he understands the gravity of the situation by asking for an immediate appropriation of $7,000,000,000. No intimation has been given as to how long the Administration expects this appropriation to last. Some press comments have suggested that it might last until 1942 or 1943. We cannot believe that this view is shared by the President. Estimates that have appeared in these columns indicate that Britain will need assistance to the extent of approximately $1,000,000,000 a month if it is to hold its own against the Axis during the remainder of this year. And the need will be greatest in the next six months. If Britain is to make up its deficiencies in armament as compared with Germany, our aid must exceed the $1,000,000,000 level during the vital spring and summer season.

Such a task can be achieved only by a fundamental shake-up in our defense program. Shipments to the British Empire in the past six months have been averaging only about $200,000,000 a month. In January they reached a peak of $224,000,000. The transfers now under way from army and navy stocks—the amount is still unrecorded—will doubtless bring the March and April figures substantially above the earlier ones; but it is doubtful whether we are yet in striking distance of the $1,000,000,000 level.

The reaching of this level is largely a problem of production. Despite recent gains, the industrial capacity of the country is still not fully organized for defense. Plane production in February was under that of January. A recent report by William S. Knudsen shows that 784 industrial plants have added to their capacity by an estimated total cost of $2,138,000,000 with the aid or encouragement of the United States or British governments. This is but a small fraction of the 175,000 manufacturing plants in the country, a large proportion of which could aid in the defense program if a more adequate system could be organized for farming out parts.

Some stepping up in aid to Britain is also possible within the limits of present production. For some months we have been proceeding on the assumption that England was to receive half of our defense output while half was to be reserved for the American armed forces. In some types of armament this figure has undoubtedly been surpassed. Britain has been receiving from 80 to 90 per cent of our output of combat planes. But except for a few special categories, Britain has not even come close to receiving half of our defense output. This may be seen from the figures of our defense expenditures. From July to September, 1940, American military expenditures amounted to about $200,000,000 a month, which was about equal to our shipments to the British Empire. But beginning with October our military expenditures began to rise. In November they rose to $375,000,000; in January they amounted to $572,000,000; and in February they reached $596,000,000. Thus in February we were spending nearly three dollars for domestic defense for every dollar's worth of goods shipped to the British Empire. It is true our military budget includes such items as the building of barracks for the new draft army and advances for plant expansion which can scarcely be compared with actual defense production. But even allowing for these items, the fact remains that our defense expenditures greatly exceed our material aid to Britain in these critical months. If we were wholly realistic, this situation would be reversed. If we get sufficient aid to Britain and get it there quickly, there would be little need for an expansion of our own defenses. But if we fail to aid Britain adequately, we shall have to increase our present rate of defense expenditures manyfold to obtain the same protection now afforded by a free and powerful Britain.

The Vichy Front

ADMIRAL Darlan's recent threat to convoy foodships through the British blockade and to fight for their protection "so that France can eat" was clearly inspired if not ordered by Berlin. Twenty-four hours before he made his statement the German-controlled Paris radio announced he would take a threatening line, and immediately it was published the Nazi press voiced lip-smacking approval. A long step forward had been taken, in the German view, towards bringing about a clash between France and Britain that would put the former in the war on the side of the Axis.

Hitler, and even more Mussolini, has lately been made aware that sea-power is by no means obsolete. In the eastern Mediterranean the British fleet is a preponderant factor and the two dictators would dearly like to divert at least part of its strength to the task of watching the still powerful remnants of the French navy. Better still, of course, would be an actual sea battle between the former allies that would give Pétain an excuse to turn to active collaboration with Germany.

The biggest obstacle to that development hitherto has not been the Vichy government, which is wholeheartedly anti-democratic and composed of men who, in effect, have bet their shirts on a German triumph, but the strongly anti-Nazi and pro-British attitude of the French people. That was the real reason for Laval's dismissal. He was so loathed and distrusted that no policy he advocated had a chance of approval. There is now reason to believe that the Nazis recognized this fact and that their apparent struggle to reinstate him was no more than an elaborate piece of stage play which served to strengthen the popular position of Pétain and to dissociate the comparatively unknown Darlan from his predecessor.

Every day, however, it becomes more certain that, whatever Frenchmen may come and go at Vichy, the Germans remain in charge of policy. The advent of Darlan has brought no change in official propaganda, which remains viciously anti-British. The whole blame for the food shortage, from which unoccupied France is undoubtedly suffering, is ascribed to the British blockade. Nothing is said of the German requisitions of food and transport facilities and of the economic effects of the barrier dividing France. Yet even so consistent an apologist for Vichy as G. H. Archambault writes in the New York Times:

"France in her entirety could be self-supporting in the matter of food, were there no line of demarcation . . . From north to south no supplies cross the line; yet the northern section is by far the more productive, particularly in cereals. How far supplies pass from south to north is not revealed beyond the indication that much fruit goes to Germany."

Replying to Darlan's threat, the British Ministry of Economic Warfare declared: "If there are any means of helping unoccupied France without helping Germany, the British government will always be prepared to consider them, but so far no proposal has been put forward." It is now known that last October London offered to discuss economic questions with Vichy on a quid pro quo basis. But the French government failed to pursue this opportunity owing, it is believed, to a Nazi veto. Recent dispatches from London make it clear this offer still holds, but it would not suit the German book for France and Britain to get together.

So now Darlan asks the United States to supply France with wheat and demands free passage through the British blockade. But he offers no concessions to Britain, no guarantees that food for France will not be the means of supplying aid to Germany, beyond a promise that the wheat in question will be consumed wholly in unoccupied France. Again and again Vichy spokesmen have bid for American sympathy and have appealed to this country for moral and material assistance. Clearly they are hoping either that Washington will put sufficient pressure on Britain to force a breach in the blockade or that a British refusal will weaken Anglo-American understanding.

According to Messrs. Alsop and Kintner "the best opinion" in Washington inclines to the view that the recent French move against the blockade was not made in Germany. Both the State Department and the President, they further report, have been working to convince the British "that something could be done about Vichy." If this be so, we hope that Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Hull will make certain, before interceding further with London, that Pétain's government is not acting as a front for Hitler. Will they demand proof that factories in the unoccupied zone are not furnishing war materials to Germany? Will they ask why the Italian armistice control commission in North Africa has been replaced by German officers? Will they ascertain to what extent French diplomatic missions are being forced to carry out orders from Berlin? With regard to this last point we have recently been informed on first-hand authority that the French legation in Cairo has, on instructions from Vichy, acted as paymaster for German agents in Egypt and has forwarded to the Italian representative in Syria particulars of British military and naval dispositions. Any government which undertakes such tasks for other powers can hardly be regarded as independent.

We feel that, in the circumstances, the State Department ought to be extremely chary of accepting Vichy's assurances as a basis for urging Britain to make concessions. We ought rather to press on Marshal Pétain our view that a British victory is as vital to the independent future of France as it is to our own interests. Hence if he is expecting any help from us he must prove, at least, that his government is doing no more to assist Hitler than it is compelled to by the armistice terms.

Sherwood Anderson

BY FRED A KIRCHWEY

Guatemala City, March 12

I NEVER knew Sherwood Anderson personally until I met him eleven days ago on the Santa Lucia bound for Panama and the West Coast of South America. I had known his books since my youth; indeed, they were among the books that helped to educate me—into a sort of honest confusion about sex and social problems and life in general. You couldn't help liking the man who wrote those books; you knew him as a person of great integrity and warmth and generous feeling. And after that I met him two or three times at parties—the kind of parties that effectively prevent people from getting really acquainted. But I came to know him as a person only in the last week of his life, on the way from New York to Cristobal, where I was to disembark.

It was stormy the second day out and I was happy to find him and his wife, Eleanor, in the half-empty lounge. We talked for a while before lunch. Sherwood said he was on his way to South America to meet writers in several countries and to get closer to what was going on in various cultural fields. He was not on an official errand. Although he carried letters of introduction from people in the State Department, he was on his own, a writer going to meet his fellow craftsmen on terms of friendship and common interests. He and Eleanor and I talked about the baffling problems involved in creating quickly a strong hemisphere front, counteracting influences which had been allowed a long head start, and doing the job on a basis of honest collaboration and understanding, not on one of North American dominance. If ever a man was enlisted with his whole heart in the fight for equality and freedom and a union of the democratic forces in every country, it was Sherwood Anderson. But he saw the complications too.

The next morning he was ill. From then until we reached Cristobal, where he was carried off the ship on a stretcher and taken to the hospital, I saw him only for a few minutes once or twice each day. But I felt that I knew him well by the time I said goodbye to him on the afternoon we landed. Through those three days of pain and growing weakness, he was uncompromisingly optimistic. He dismissed impatiently the suggestion that he might have to go ashore at Panama to have a proper examination. While his wife worried about the limited facilities the ship could provide, Sherwood viewed his ailment with amiable contempt. He swallowed doses and endured treatments and came through spasms of pain without relinquishing his certainty that the attack would be defeated in the end by his determination to do what he had set out to do.

But perhaps he realized the seriousness of his condition more than he admitted. On the fourth day out he told me, with an air of humorous solemnity, that he had considered dying a noble death in the line of duty and being buried at sea. The whole event would have been written up under big headlines with crossed flags at the top of the page. "Noted author dies while carrying out mission of friendship to our southern neighbors." I told him that I thought it a poor idea and he'd get only a column in The Nation. He said he had decided against it anyhow, preferring South America to even the crossed flags.

On the last morning he seemed better. The barber shaved off a three-day beard and the doctor told him he might sit out in the sun for a while. When I went in to see him he eyed me with a pleased expression. "I'm feeling fine," he told me. "What you said did it. One column in The Nation—that settled it! I decided to call the whole thing off." But at noon he was seized with violent pains and his temperature went up. A shot of morphine did little good. Eleanor made up his mind for him and the doctor acquiesced. She began packing their bags after lunch and the purser radioed the hospital at Colon for an ambulance to meet the boat at Cristobal. I saw Sherwood for a moment while the packing was going on. He was still in pain and still stubbornly cheerful. In a dismal attempt at lightness I said, "Well, I see you couldn't bear to go on down the coast without me." "You expect pretty costly tribute from your admirers, don't you, my girl?" he answered. "I'll let them examine me here at the Canal and do what they have to do and then I'll catch the next boat. They aren't going to spoil my trip." But I knew, and I think Eleanor knew, that Sherwood's journey had ended.

When I heard of his death three days later in Costa Rica, I felt as if I had lost an old friend instead of a recent acquaintance. I am glad I got to know him in that last valiant week of his life, for Sherwood Anderson had qualities that quickly drew him close to people he met. And I wish most earnestly that he had lived to carry out the mission he joked about. I can think of no other ambassador to Latin America who would have expressed more surely and naturally the characteristics we like to claim for our country—humor and friendliness and courage and a democratic spirit that is bred in the bone.

FAMILY GROUP

O'Mahoney Sums Up

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, March 16

THE investigation made by the Temporary National Economic Committee under Senator Joseph C. O'Mahoney in the past two years and nine months will rank with the great inquiries of the past, with Frank Walsh's Industrial Commission and Samuel Untermyer's Pujo committee. Like its predecessors, the TNEC has shown the extent to which this country and its institutions, to echo Lincoln, no longer belong to the people who inhabit it. The facts are vividly summarized in Senator O'Mahoney's final statement, a document which deserves to be read by every American. To a greater extent than ever before, our economy is dominated by the corporation rather than by the individual entrepreneur. These corporations are collective enterprises without collective responsibility. "In popular discussion," Senator O'Mahoney says, "they are regarded as 'private enterprise.' But how private is such enterprise after all?"

The Senator closed the work of the committee, as he began it, with "a declaration of faith in the traditional institutions of our country." But he makes it clear that when he says "traditional" that is what he means. He does not intend to endow monster corporations, which have often irresponsibly revolutionized our ways of doing business, with the basic immunities with which we protect personal property and personal liberty. "When one considers the number of policyholders who are the owners of mutual life insurance companies like Metropolitan and Prudential, wholly national in their operation and effect, the number of stockholders and employees of a utility like American T. & T., or of an industrial like General Motors, and the stockholders, employees, and natural resources of industrials like the Standard Oil of New Jersey and United States Steel, it becomes immediately clear that there is no justification whatsoever for thinking of those units or of dealing with them as though they were natural persons clothed with the rights which are guaranteed to flesh-and-blood persons by the Constitution of the United States." We have passed, in the opinion of the Senator, as of most intelligent people, "from an individual economy to a corporate economy" and must act accordingly. The alternative before us, he says, is "free private enterprise or government planning."

The chances are that the choice, as in most epigrammatic antitheses, will not prove a real one. Given time, a measure of good will, and a minimum of stability, and the solution will no doubt combine a good deal of both.

The Senator himself is all for reviving free enterprise, i.e., enterprise free from interference by corporate monopoly as well as government official. But the possibility of turning back the clock is certainly a slim one, and his own remedy seems a puny one for so gigantic and revolutionary a change as has taken place since the 'seventies in our economy. He wants federal incorporation of all corporations operating in interstate commerce, a measure he and the late Senator Borah long championed. "The first and foremost step," the Senator says, "is to recognize that we must have a national rule for national business." With that none will disagree. Nor with his statement that "it is idle to think that the huge collective institutions which carry on modern business can continue to operate without more definite responsibility toward all the people of the nation than they now have." But one wonders whether he has gone to the heart of the matter when he says that "The Insulls and the Hopsons, the Coster-Musicas have been able to prey upon the economic system of all the people solely because they were able to secure the separate state charters which enabled them to engage in national commerce, although their creators had neither the desire nor the governmental power to regulate the commerce in which we are engaged." The railroads have long been regulated by the federal government, through the I.C.C., but that did not prevent the operations of the Van Sweringens.

One may support O'Mahoney's proposal for federal incorporation without having any great confidence that it would prove effective. The Senator wants a national charter law drafted so "as to reduce materially not only the possibilities of evasion of the anti-trust law but the difficulties of its enforcement." He wants this law written to "make corporate directors trustees in fact as well as in law." He would regulate subsidiaries through this law and "standardize intercorporate financing."

A steady stream of monographs has been issuing from the crowded archives of the committee. They are well worth watching, as are the concrete proposals put forward by its chairman. Given the complexities of business enterprise and the difficulties involved in even so seemingly simple a matter as the maintenance of competition, it is increasingly likely that some kind of administrative regulation will be necessary. Perhaps an easier way to keep the great collective enterprises of the corporation socially responsible would be to provide by law that large, widely held corporations admit the federal government into a share of their management.

Who Are the Appeasers?

BY HERBERT AGAR

SPEAKING at Columbia University recently, Harold Ickes divided our appeasers into four groups: the native fascists, the German-American Bund, the Italian fascists, and the Communists, together with their fellow-travelers. The first of these seems to me to be easily the most important. The foreign organizations are only dangerous because America does not yet take the world revolution seriously, and therefore tolerates treason against democracy. The Communists are only dangerous when they can find some bandwagon to climb aboard. Left to themselves they are a small, confused, quarrelsome, discredited group. The real menace comes from our native, non-Communist appeasers. They can reach the big public beyond range of the Communists. They can reach the patriotic public beyond range of the foreign organizations. They are dividing and bewildering the country, spreading confusion on what is really a simple issue, preventing millions of our fellow-citizens from seeing that the revolution which rages across the world is aimed against everything for which our country stands.

With his usual bluntness Mr. Ickes calls these people "native fascists." I prefer to call them appeasers, not out of politeness, but because I think my epithet is more accurate. Fundamentally there is no difference, for I include among my appeasers all those whose words and deeds are helpful to Hitler. It does not matter whether, like Lawrence Dennis, they applaud the Nazi revolution, or, like Senator Wheeler, they deplore it. They are all giving aid to Hitler.

Before trying to classify our native appeasers, I want to repudiate the theory that it is unfair to ascribe motives to one's fellow-citizens in the midst of a life-and-death debate. I think it is not only fair but necessary to ask what makes a man like Lindbergh, or a man like Hoover, drag down his country's will to resist evil. While admitting that a complete answer cannot be given, I think that unless we seek at least a partial answer we cannot protect ourselves against the harm that these men do.

It has become a game among our adversaries—among the very men who call the rest of us warmongers and anti-Americans—to protest against any attempt to analyze the motives for their own beliefs. Mr. Dennis, characteristically, has been in the forefront of those who play this game. The rules of the game are that "anything goes" when it comes to undermining and discrediting and deriding democracy, or when it comes to ascribing the most bloodthirsty plans to those who would defend democracy all across the world, but that no harsh word must be used about those who would persuade us to accept that dark "wave of the future" which is symbolized by the new ghetto walls in Poland.

Dividing the native appeasers into sub-groups, we come first to those who sincerely believe in appeasement as a way out of the world's troubles. These people still think the primary fact about Hitler is that he represents the legitimate ambitions of a country that has been greatly wronged. They still think of the war mainly as an attempt to rectify these wrongs. Therefore they still permit themselves to think of a world in which America can do "good business" with Germany after a negotiated peace.

The unconscious motivations behind these opinions are strong. Once it is admitted that this is not a simple war for land or money, or for rectifying the Treaty of Versailles, but rather a revolution in which the stakes are the mind and soul of man, the implications are disturbing. They are especially disturbing for those who have kept themselves from knowing that the world of the 'twenties and 'thirties is dead, no matter what the outcome of the revolution. All the comfortable people who thought that we would some time, somehow, return to the happy days when there was no Roosevelt, no New Deal, no dangers that could not be denied, were given a rude shock by the fall of France—so rude, in fact, that many of them began at once to deny the implications of this awful event. The Republican convention was gathering at the time, and almost overnight the politicians agreed that it was unpatriotic to admit America's grave danger. Newspapers which a few months before had been pointing out the treasonable blindness of the appeasing governments of Europe now began to use the precise language which those governments had used. Why should we try to settle the affairs of Central Europe? Why should we assume that the Nazis had unkind thoughts about America? Why not mind our own business and attain "peace" by means of domestic "security"? The Maginot Line was gone; but there remained the Maginot Ocean.

While the affairs of Europe seemed safely distant, the American press was the most intelligent in the world; the best informed, and the most mordant about the follies of the foreign appeasers. But when the front line of the war left the fields of Flanders and moved west into the Atlantic, the American press began to sound like the press of London in 1938. And the American politicians began to sound like the politicians of Britain in 1934.

It is not ignorance that makes sincere appeasers, that drives well-meaning men into befriending fascism. It is the awareness of a danger too great to contemplate. So long as we could persuade ourselves that our negligent society was good enough, that with all its sins it was still strong enough to survive, we were willing to see the evil in Nazism. But when France fell we had either to admit that our world needed to be reformed from the ground up or to pretend suddenly that the Nazi revolution was not as bad as it had been painted. Those whom I classify as the sincere appeasers, as the well-meaning native promoters of Hitler's revolution, are those who have accepted this easy way out. Rather than admit the sickness of our world, they minimize the wickedness of Hitler's.

Senator Taft is an example of this group. He is a sincere patriot and a man of wide knowledge. But he dare not see that Hitler has shown up the tawdriness of a democracy that is only in part democratic. He knows instinctively that the price of an all-out resistance to the Hitler revolution will be an all-out social and economic change at home. Believing that such change would be a catastrophe, he is forced to believe that Hitler does not have to be resisted, that by averting our eyes from the fate of all men everywhere we can snatch at safety in the midst of a perishing civilization.

"We know that in war there are no winners. . . . Don't let us suppose that necessarily there must be economic warfare between Germany and ourselves. . . . In my view there is room for Germany and ourselves in the trade with these countries." It sounds like Senator Taft today; but it is Neville Chamberlain in 1938. "Our will for peace is our first guarantee, our strength is our supreme guarantee. No matter what the circumstances, we are fully capable of assuring the inviolability of our frontiers." That sounds so much like Senator Taft that he has probably said it a dozen times; but the quotation is from Daladier in 1938. And in that same year Lord Halifax remarked, "Great Britain cannot be the policeman of the world."

Our Tafts, our Castles, our Vandenberges, are repeating belatedly the phrases that led France to death and England to the edge of hell. On a lower level of intelligence, our Lindberghs do the same. I suggest that there is hope of winning some of these people to the truth. They do not plan to betray their country. Sooner or later they will all know their mistake—as Chamberlain and Lothian did before their deaths, as Halifax does, as Daladier presumably does in his French jail. The question is whether we can convert them before our country is either dead or dying.

The second category of native appeasers is made up of professional peacemongers. These I think are lost souls. They have now a vested interest in confusing the American public, and there seems no reason to expect them to relinquish their rights in this bad enterprise. They need not be consciously insincere; but they have attained a state of mental apoplexy which makes them impervious to evidence and which even deprives them of the knowledge which was once in their own minds.

The mark of this group is that its members make statements which no sane man could believe. Senator Taft has never said anything which Senator Taft might not believe. Even Lindbergh has never said anything which a Lindbergh might not believe. But those who belong to this group, such as Senator Wheeler, constantly make statements which their best friends must ascribe to overexcitement.

Senator Wheeler, because he went to high school, must have heard about the Monroe Doctrine and that it could never have been promulgated without British cooperation. Yet the other day he cried out in the Senate, "It's idiotic to say that we depend upon the British navy. We never have received any aid from the British navy." And Senator Wheeler, because he went to college, must have read about the British Empire. Yet he announced in the Senate that Canada is a "colony" of Great Britain and that the English king declares war "with Parliament not permitted to vote."

In the same speech in which the Senator made his nonsensical remark about the British navy, he told us that he has "never been under observation . . . never been in a hospital for the treatment of nervous diseases." If, therefore, we write off that excuse for his mistakes, and if we assume his sincerity, we are left with the conclusion that he must be overexcited. I suggest that the reason for this unbalancing condition is that the Senator has so identified himself with the cause of peacemongering that he can no longer tolerate the thought of a world in which that cause is lost. We have all seen similar breakdowns in the case of rich men and women whose "safe" investments have suddenly gone sour. It is not an experience which promotes the life of reason. The peacemongers, I think, will not be won to our cause in time to help save the world from destruction.

The third group of native appeasers is made up of the rabble-rousers, of which Father Coughlin is a pure example. They differ from the second group in that they are not committed to peacemongering. They are not committed to anything. In whatever field they can become a noisy nuisance, in that field they will operate. Father Coughlin has tried monetary reform, the New Deal, the anti-New Deal, the brotherhood of man, and anti-Semitism. Having failed in all these businesses, he is now setting himself up as a peacemonger. It is a mistake to call such people fascists—just as it would have been a mistake to call Father Coughlin a democrat in the days when he enthusiastically supported Roosevelt. Father Coughlin is a fascist only in the sense that Goebbels is a fascist: They are both first-class hog-callers, ready to climb on any bandwagon—and to climb off when the going gets tough.

The next group of appeasers consists of a section of the Catholic Church. The Brooklyn Tablet gives voice to the views of this section, and so does Father Gillis. I am not trying to apply easy generalizations to the Catholic Church. That institution is too large and too old and too complicated for the quick classifications of journalism. Furthermore, an important group of American Catholics is among the front-fighters of our anti-Nazi, pro-democratic cause. The Tablets and the Father Gillises of our country are partly motivated by the ancient undying grievances of the Irish. These grievances are rooted in centuries of oppression. Nevertheless, if the Irish continue to indulge these grievances today, at the cost of forwarding a revolution which denies everything for which Ireland stands, the Irish are merely one more neurotic people who deserve the slavery which Hitler is preparing for them. The huge majority of American Catholics can be won to the cause of resisting the Nazi revolution. Many of them are already among the strongest fighters on our side. There is no insurmountable "Catholic problem" in regard to appeasement.

Composing the fifth group among the American servants of Hitler are the men who are defeatist by temperament. This is a small group, in terms of spokesmen, but it is immensely influential. It includes Lawrence Dennis, who knows that he is helping the Nazi revolution, and President Hutchins of Chicago University, who thinks that he is not. These two men would disagree on almost every problem that faces our world; yet they serve the same cause and for the same emotional reason. The emotion that binds them together is a fatalistic despair over the civilization of the modern democratic world. Dennis is glad enough to see that world go, and to ride the wave of the future. Hutchins looks out upon his opulent campus from his office window and murmurs that it is all doomed anyway, the whole great plant will soon be useless, but we can at least win a few more years for thought and self-cultivation by refusing to become tangled in the woes of our neighbors.

Robert Hutchins, the sincere democrat, is more dangerous to our democracy than Lawrence Dennis, the sincere totalitarian. For Hutchins speaks to the youth of America and tells them that democracy is so corrupt it has no right to seek to save mankind. The guilt which all true Americans must feel when they survey the American scene has afflicted Hutchins with a moral impotence. There is no man who can bewail our sins more eloquently; there is no man who can state more persuasively the hopelessness of redemption. We are so wicked, he tells us, that we are unworthy to defend democracy.

Until we have reformed at home, who are we to resist the revolution that enslaves man's mind and denies man's soul? There is no point of view that could more perfectly serve the plans of Hitler.

Finally, we have two American appeasers who fortunately do not represent a group and do not even agree with each other. Each of them stands alone in all the world, which is one of the few encouraging thoughts of our grim time. I refer to Henry Ford and Herbert Hoover. Neither of them could happen in any other country; even here neither of them has happened twice.

Henry Ford is a symbol of the American failure which so oppresses Robert Hutchins. In foreign policy he stands for ignorant American idealism, as in the peace ship plus ignorant American isolationism. In domestic policy he stands for the failure to accept social responsibility which has made American individualism a term of reproach. Again he is not a fascist in a literal sense; he is a fascist only in that he represents one of the main reasons for fascism.

Herbert Hoover is also an anomaly. Hitler has no more stubborn helper in all the world, yet Hoover does not intend that this should be the case. In his incessant efforts to put over his plan to feed Hitler's Europe, Hoover is carrying on a one-man revolt against the foreign policy of the United States. Yet Herbert Hoover is not a friend of Nazism. He is merely an egotist who dislikes the Administration, dislikes the British, and loves to be world-important.

We cannot stay out of a revolution. We cannot appease it. We can only resist it, or accept it. And the American people will not with open eyes accept a world revolution that denies the hope of freedom. But we cannot describe the revolution without admitting that it is the necessary result of our own failure to make our democracy democratic. It is this admission, of course, which scares Joe Kennedy even more than Hitler's bombs. To Mr. Kennedy a democracy is a country where a lucky gambler can hope to make millions on the stock exchange. Incidentally, this is what the word also means to the men who coined the phrase "the corrupt plutocracies of the West." France fell rather than face the perils of attempting a true democracy. England began to move toward democracy when the knife was at its throat. Since that eleventh hour, since the war in Britain became a people's war, Britain has become the world's marvel. We too can rise to greatness, can rise above our appeasers, but only at the price of carrying on two struggles at once: a struggle at home to show we mean democracy, and a struggle abroad to resist the murderers of freedom. If we do not make the first struggle we shall not have heart for the second; and if we do not make the second we shall not have time for the first.

A treasure the rich and living

The best of Living American Art

Perfect COLLOTYPE prints the size of a large newspaper page, reproduced in all their true colors, in a specially designed portfolio.

8 for $2.98

Turn flap to see what Directors of Art Museums and other Authorities say about these perfect reproductions.

Milk quest Harv of M emph his br

How are such masterly prints possible?

Up to now, only a limited few have been able to enjoy these works of American artists in expensive reproductions. Now everyone, from school children up will be able to absorb and study the strength and beauty of American contemporary art. A revolutionary new gelatin process known as Collotype, perfected by a world famous craftsman, makes it possible for art to be reproduced with such accuracy that experts actually try to rub chalk off pastels . . . feel for the brush work in oils! This extremely delicate process, requires much of the work to be done in air conditioned rooms. It took 70 years to perfect this process and then was used to reproduce paintings for $5.00 and $7.50 each. Now these exact same pictures are offered for about 38¢ a piece in this portfolio of 8.

How did such a price miracle happen?

"You are expecting the impossible!" we were told when we started working on this "miracle." We demanded faithful copies identical to the originals, sold for from $350 to $15,000 each. These prints have gained the enthusiastic praise of artists, museums, collectors . . . pictures that discriminating people would be proud to have in their portfolios or hang on the walls of their homes. Because the tremendous original cost of the negatives was defrayed by art museums, colleges and numerous individuals, this low price is possible.

Something about the pictures

All are approximately 17½ by 22 inches, reproduced on a paper especially made for this delicate process. Since we felt these pictures were worthy of collection, we have placed them in a specially designed portfolio. They were chosen with the aid of an advisory board of 25 which included directors of the principal museums of the country, prominent educators, artists, and other experts. See letter on page following photographs of pictures for their names.

Print on other side

1. WINTER BY THE SEA

A water color by JOHN WHORF

Gallery, Purchased for $350. John Whorf is beyond question one of the most skillful handlers of water color. Harvard University conferred on Whorf the honorary degree of Master of Arts with the following citation: "An expert in using a difficult and brilliant medium, who catches with brush the ever changing light and shade on land and water."

Handsome blond wood frame with
"button back"

$2.98

A NOVEL back opening allows for quick and constant change of pictures. Specially made to fit these pictures. Just insert and hang on your wall. A similar frame sells in a well known art gallery for $7.50.

COLLEGES AND ART MUSEUMS throughout the country have bought and exhibited Living American Art pictures. No greater praise can be given to any art reproductions.

What you get are museum quality colotype reproductions in full color of all 8 pictures illustrated.

2.

SAILING

An oil painting by
THOMAS EAKINS

Philadelphia Museum of Art, Purchased for $5,000. Eakins is now almost universally regarded as America's greatest realist. In design and drawing he probably has no equal.

3.

MINNESOTA IN AUGUST

A water color by
ADOLF DEHN

Privately owned. Famous for sixty years as lithographer, he would not show his water colors before he had attained equal mastery of this medium.

4.

SPONGE FISHING

A water color by
WINSLOW HOMER

Homer Museum, Maine, Purchased for $6,500. One of the best known names in American Art. He is more famous for water colors than for his oils, although these too are among the greatest.

5.

A PASSING SHOWER

An oil painting by
GEORGE INNESS

Privately owned. Purchased for $15,000. For many years Inness has been regarded as America's foremost landscape painter. Most of his scenes are of the Hudson River Valley.

6. LADY JEAN

An oil painting by GEORGE BELLOW'S

Privately owned. Purchased for $15,000. The Metropolitan Museum bestowed on him the highest honor which can be accorded an American painter.

7. THE SENTINELS

An oil painting by ALEXANDER BROOK

Whitney Museum, Purchased for $1,000. Last year the Carnegie International awarded first prize to Alexander Brook. This is one of his most mature works.

8. ICE GLARE

A water color by CHAS. BURCHFIELD

Whitney Museum, Purchased for $800. Burchfield is noted for his sense of design and is often grouped with the older masters.

Advisory Board: JAMES CHILLMAN, JR., Director Museum of Fine Arts of Houston, Texas • LYNN FAWCETT, Ex-President Art Students' League
 THEODORE DILLAWAY, Director of Art Education, Public Schools of Philadelphia • BLAKE-MORE GODWIN, Director Toledo Museum of Art
 WALTER HEIL, Director of M. H. deYoung Memorial Museum of San Francisco • SIDONIE M. GRUENBERG, Director of Child Study Association of America
 FOREST GRANT, Director of Arts, Public Schools of New York City • GERTRUDE HERDLER MOORE, Director The Memorial Art Gallery, Rochester, N. Y.
 ROSSITER HOWARD, Director Kansas City Art Institute • J. R. MCKINNEY, Director Baltimore Museum of Art • E. V. MEEKS, Dean School of Fine Arts at Yale
 CARL VAN DOREN • W. M. MILLIKEN, Director of Cleveland Museum of Arts • WILBUR D. PEAT, Director of Art Association of Indianapolis
 CAROLINE PRATT, Head City and Country School, New York City • HOMER SAINT-GAUDENS, Director Carnegie Institute, Dept. of Fine Arts, Pittsburgh
 GORDON B. WASHBURN, Director Buffalo Fine Arts Academy, Albright Art Gallery • SIEGFRIED R. WENG, Director Dayton Art Institute

CHARLES BONI, Director LIVING AMERICAN ART, 315 Fourth Avenue, New York

Dear Reader:

As you read the preceding three pages, which offer eight magnificent pictures by America's greatest painters, please keep in mind that these faithful color reproductions are made by a process that was technically unrealizable until recently. Every nuance of color, every brush stroke, every subtlety of tone is perfectly rendered by the amazing new Collotype Process. And, what is equally amazing, they are offered at 38¢ a piece.

Until you actually hold these pictures in your hand, see them for yourself, it is impossible for you to believe that such perfect copies can be made, or that they can be sold at so low a price.

That's why we make this sporting offer:

Send for a set of the pictures today. A complete portfolio will be shipped to you at once. Examine the pictures carefully, live with them a while, enjoy their rich beauty, their unique decorative quality; show them to your friends. Then, if for any reason whatever, you are not delighted, return them and your money will be refunded without question. This is a guarantee without any strings!

Remember, you get eight superb pictures in full color for less than the previous price of one; you get a portfolio free; each picture is a living lesson in art appreciation; every picture makes an excellent gift.

Order the "button-back" frame as well and you've started a real art gallery of your own; each picture fits snugly into the frame without any adjustment whatever, and you can change pictures as often as you wish.

Send for the portfolio of eight prints today, using the order form below. It is not necessary to send any money now; we will gladly send them C.O.D. if you prefer, and you risk absolutely nothing--for if the pictures, or the frame, fail to satisfy you in any way you may return them for a full refund. This offer is good only for a limited time, so act now.

Sincerely yours,
 LIVING AMERICAN ART, Inc.

Charles Boni

Charles Boni, Director

LIVING AMERICAN ART, 315 FOURTH AVE., N. Y.

PLEASE send me complete portfolios of 8 FAMOUS AMERICAN PAINTINGS at $2.98 per portfolio and "button back frames" at $2.98 each.

- ☐ Remittance enclosed
☐ Send C. O. D.

ME..... please print

DRESS.....

Money Back Guarantee!

We are certain that these pictures will delight you in every way. If, for any reason at all, they do not you are privileged to return them to us within five days for a full refund. You risk nothing! Mail the coupon at the left today.

A New World Literature

I. THE NOVEL IN INDO-AMERICA

BY LUIS-ALBERTO SÁNCHEZ

Like the majority of important Hispano-American writers, Luis-Alberto Sánchez, Peruvian, has had an active and varied career in addition to the fertile production of books. Before his exile from Peru, he was professor of American literature at the Universidad Nacional de San Marcos (Lima), the oldest university in the Americas. He was one of the most active younger allies of José Carlos Mariátegui, the great Peruvian revolutionary who gathered together in one movement the cultural and labor forces of his country, and who was cut off by death from becoming a formidable continental figure. With Mariátegui, he edited the famous magazine Amauta in whose pages the Indian-inspired art of José Sabogal and Julia Codesido appeared alongside literary texts which in breadth and depth of vision far surpassed the standards of The Masses and New Masses. After the fall of President Leguía and the death of Mariátegui, in 1930, Sánchez entered politics as one of the chief lieutenants of Raúl Haya de la Torre, founder of Aprismo. At the same time he practiced law, continued his teaching of literature, and wrote for the chief magazines of the Continent. Aprismo was suppressed and Sánchez was exiled. Except for a brief sojourn in Panamá, he has lived in Chile, where, in addition to his literary work, he is the editor of a leading publishing house.

Sánchez is an outstanding literary historian and critic; and his best in brilliance and scholarship is very good indeed. At little more than forty, he is the author of nearly a score of volumes, among them a history of the literature of Peru of which three volumes have appeared and "Vida y pasión de la cultura en America." His biographies have brought vitality to this undeveloped art form in America Hispana. Among the best are "Don Manuel," a portrait of González Prada, Peru's great nineteenth-century Socialist-poet; "La Perricholi," and "Garcilaso Inca de la Vega," "the first creole."—W. F.

TO SPEAK of the Indo-American novel is to speak of something contemporaneous. Although it was born at the beginning of the nineteenth century with the Mexican Lizardi's "El Perequillo Sarniento" (1816), it cannot be said to have evolved seriously from there. "Maria" by the Colombian Jorge Isaacs (1867) and "Amalia" by the Argentine José Marmol (1852) are also more like ancestors than fathers of the Hispano-American novel. Its progressive systematic evolution begins with the splendor of the realists, more strictly with the naturalistic school, about 1880. Which is to say that our novel is only sixty years old—a contemporary in the fullest meaning of the term.

This is true not only of non-Anglo-Saxon America, but also of your America. A novelistic art cannot be said to exist merely because dozens of novels are published; but only when the novels achieve a common and progressing style. I feel that I must make this basic point (the theme of my book: "America: Novel Without Novelists") before I go on to present the state of the novel of my race in the new continent. As a common style and a durable expression, the novel in both Americas has had, indeed, little more than forty years of life. The precursors, however illustrious (a Hawthorne with you, an Isaacs with us) reveal admirable aptitude for the novel but not the existence of the novel as a literary genus, a collective cultural expression. The best proof of this is perhaps the pragmatic one: the average reader of a work of fiction will know by the mere text, the style, the metaphors, the mode of composition, whether the author is French, German, English, Russian; he needs as evidence the name of neither characters nor author. Is this true of the American novels before 1890-1900? I think not. They lack differentiation as a group expression of land or race. And more than any other literary form, the novel is a profound admixture of individual and collective elements.

More than any other literary form, the novel cannot free itself of its social medium; and requires both complexity and a social circuit. Where the population is thin, the novel rarely flowers. Like the orator and the dramatist, the novelist needs a dense audience. The poet can live on his own images. The novelist, although he shut himself up in a cork-lined room like Proust in order to re-live the scenes of his past, must have had beforehand much traffic with men, much friction in the world. If not, his novel will unconsciously approach the poem or the psychopathic confession. If the true role of the novel today is to replace the epic, its destiny leads it inevitably to dialogue and chorus. The interior monologue is really a stammering dialogue in which consciousness masks itself as "the unconscious" and the interlocutors take a single name to disorient the reader.

Our naturalistic Indo-American novel begins, then, at the close of the era of the great inter-American wars: those of Paraguay with the Triple Alliance (Uruguay-Argentina-Brazil); that of the Pacific (Chile-Peru-Bolivia), the wars of resistance to the Spanish reconquest, and of Mexico against the French forces of Maximilian. The "populist," quasi-sociological tone of this novel surely owed much to the sudden wide contacts of social classes in the grip of war. Thus only can be explained the unheralded rise of the indigenous novel of Peru, which until then had been put off by a kind of tacit conspiracy. Doña Clorinda Matto de Turner's "Aves sin Nido" reflects and prophesies a multitudinous unrest. Something similar occurs in Mexico where romances of the war against Maximilian flourished. The novel in Argentina had a different beginning. Sudden wealth sent an "élite" to Europe (1880-1890); and they returned drenched with Parisianism. The novels of Eugenio Cambáceres, Lucio Vicente López, Leguizamón, etc., reveal this new passion. "La Gran Aldea" of López ("the big village," of course, is Buenos Aires) was not only a work of literary art but a notable human document. Typical also was the gallicized "Música Sentimental" of Cambáceres.

Born now as realism, the novel makes its way and within a few years reaches something like maturity. However, it does not yet become a focus of strong, individualized lives; it remains liquid before the external. In all the major examples of the Indo-American novel, the objective world rules over the personal, over aspiration, will, and spirit.

THE INDIVIDUAL AGAINST THE LANDSCAPE

If one factor better than another explains our American soul and, by the same token, our novel, it is this impotence of the individual before the cosmos, before society, and before the landscape. The European (in his novel) dominates his medium; so much so, that when (as in the tales of the Abbé Prévost and Chateaubriand) he crosses the sea and penetrates the prairies and jungles of America, he cuts his own personal path through chaos. The American, son of this European, when he would interpret and master his own world, falls under its spell; is overwhelmed, and muted. Witness the catastrophe in such works as "La Vorágine" by the Colombian José Eustacio Ribera, in "Canaan" and "The Illumined Voyage" by the Brazilian Graça Aranha, in "Doña Bárbara" by the Venezuelan Rómulo Gallegos, in Zalamea Borda's "Quatro Años abordo de mi mismo": the authors become bewildered and sightless catechumens under the overpowering mastery of the ambiente. In contrast to the Europeans, the natural chaos penetrates them, saturates and humiliates them. They are authors of great sensibility, of experience, even of wisdom: nevertheless, they succumb before the external world they have tried to picture. And this, in great part, is also the condition of the novelists of the United States; in their case the overwhelming jungle is not rural but urban—but on that account no less victorious over the artist who would describe it.

Of coincidences and discrepancies between North American and Indo-American novels, more some other time. Suffice it now to say that inferiority before his theme is characteristic of our novelists. One modern author, Eduardo Mallea of Argentina, scarcely gets out a stammer before his city, "La Ciudad junto al Río inverosímil."

If Ricardo Güiraldes in "Don Segundo Sombra" and "Xamaca" moves free through his Argentine pampas, this is because in great measure his landscapes are domestic, his own personal property, features of his paternal ranch rather than of the common panorama.

It may be said that terror is logical before such jungles and such plains. But compare the attitude of Guillermo Enrique Hudson, Argentine by birth, Englishman by race, culture, mentality, and language. His books—"Purple Land," "Long Ago and Far Away," "El Ombú" are of Argentina; "Green Mansions" is an idyll of the jungle of Venezuela—reveal tenderness, not stupefaction. The author, in order to dominate, holds himself aloof from his landscape, detached from his theme; whereas our writers with mystical gesture merge in their land and its dramas. The essential difference leads to another reflection: so immature are our novelists that they have not yet won the capacity of contemplation which requires immunization from what is contemplated. This trait (it holds also for the North American novel) is that of richly endowed, impetuous youth which still believes in magic.

The case of Hudson and of that other Anglo-Indo-American, Cunningham Graham, who pillaged the same regions, brings us to a generalization. Both Venezuela and Argentina are plains, immense, desolate, infinitely promising. Both have known the days, not yet extinct, of the wild plunging horse flung into frenzied assault. Both have become the source of vital novels. But for different reasons. Argentina, like Brazil, has a sturdy novelistic growth because it is an evolving nation of numerous population and of opposing forms of country and city life. In Argentina we find a various novelistic fauna: social and historical, as in Manuel Gálvez; studies of creole genre as in Güiraldes and Fernando Gilardi; picaresque-rural as in Roberto Payró and Benito Lynch; tales of passion, agony, domestic struggle—even of domestic ingenuousness in the novels of Gustavo Martínez Zuviria who writes his books "that his children may read them." In Brazil are novels of equal variety in style and theme. Without pausing over the chaste, smooth form of Machado de Assis, one of the great classics of Brazil, let me note the extraordinary distances (within a national mode) between the solid symbol-laden form of Aranha, the restless and poemetic texture of Jorge Amado, the subtle irony of Monteiro Lobato, to note only a few. In both Argentina and Brazil the novel is maturing within the still general Indo-American immaturity.

SOCIAL-POLITICAL THEMES

In Venezuela on the other hand, as in Mexico and Ecuador, novels (already numerous) cannot escape the direct social-political motive. The best of Venezuela (Dio Gil, Rufino Blanco-Fombana, Pocaterra, Otero Silva, even the later works of Uslar Pietri, Gallegos, Padrón, and, in the past, of Díaz Rodríguez) reveal their immediate inspiration in contemporary events; often they are romans-à-clef with direct satirical objectives. Those of Uslar Pietri, Gallegos, and Padrón do not come under this last stricture. "Las Lanzas Coloradas," "Canaima," and "Madrugada" are good examples. In Ecuador the novel was tame and serene ("Cumandá" by Juan León Mera is the highest expression of this beginning); and in the past ten years has become a truly amazing voice for the country's social and sexual problems. Fernando Chávez writes of the Indians' exploitation in "Plata y Bronce"; but his voice is timid compared to the passionate outbursts of Demetrio Aguilera Malta, Joaquín Gallegos Lara, Enrique Gil Gilbert, Alfredo Pareja ("Muelle," "Baldomera")—all novelists of the Pacific Coast. In the high Sierra appears a political novelist, at times more propagandist than artist, Jorge Icaza, whose famous "Huasi-pungo," for all its merits, seems to me inferior to his book of stories, "Barro de la Sierra."

Not different is the case of Mexico. The generation of 1927 wrote Platonic tales, from which immediate reality had been refined away. Such are the elegant pages of Jaime Torres Bodet ("Margarita de la Niebla"), Xavier Villaurrutia ("Dama de Corazones"); now a generation more loyal to the drama of the land moves to the front. Jorge Ferretis confesses in one of his prologues that he is writing ethnography as well as fiction. Gregorio López y Fuentes ("El Indio" and "Arrieros") and Rubén Romero ("El Pueblo Inocente," "Mi Caballo, mi perro y mi rifle") use the æsthetic weapon to get to the essence of their people. And the same is true of Mauricio Magdaleno in whose "El Resplandor" high skill and beauty give birth to bitterness. The same bitterness inspires the work of the most famous Mexican novelist of our day, Mariano Azuela, whose works ("Los de Abajo," "Las Moscas," "San Gabriel de Valdivias," etc.) are scarcely songs of the revolution; or, if they are songs, they are accompanied by funeral drums; but not on that account less forceful and able. On the other hand, "El Águila y la serpiente" by Martín Luis Guzmán is a series of straight, living revolutionary pictures.

Other countries of our world have other accents. (The reader will not forget that limitations of space force me to be extremely schematic.) I shall say little of the embryonic novel of Peru. We have good short-story tellers; first of all Abraham Valdelomar ("El Caballero carmelito"), Enrique López Albújar ("Cuentos Andinos"), Fernando Romero whose promise is great ("Doce novelas de la selva"), José Diez Canseco ("Estampas Mulatas"). Less good can be said of our novel, although one novelist of high quality has appeared, Ciro Alegría, in whose work the relations of Indian and mestizo are illumined ("La serpiente de oro," "Los perros hambrientos"). This is a theme of central importance in a country whose ancient Inca culture reached a splendid maturity and still deeply and visibly infuses the present. The novel of Peru is still a gesture, although titles are copious. "Tungsteno" by Peru's greatest contemporary poet, Cesar Vallejo, is a sketch for a novel. The talent and energy of the author save it perhaps from its inherent weaknesses; but neither its theme nor its frequently schematic and exhortatory tone justifies the enthusiasm, partisan rather than literary, that has greeted it as well as that other far superior tale, "Fabla Salvaje." The greatest number of Peruvian novels turn about the cant themes: anecdotes of creole and zambo life in Lima, or of stereotyped Indians of the Sierra. In this group, we must again mention Clorinda Matto de Turner whose precursor novel, "Aves sin Nido," without the huge resonance of "Uncle Tom's Cabin," played a similar part in arousing our society by its pathetic picture of the humiliating condition of the Indians and the abuses of the clergy.

The war novel (after a whole literature inspired by the wars of Paraguay with the Triple Alliance, including a fine trilogy by the Argentine Manuel Gálvez) flourishes anew with the recent struggle in the Chaco. Both Bolivians and Paraguayans have striven to capture in pulsing pages the drama of their people. To be sure, this is a novel as yet too allusive and without horizons; both chronicle and story. Prematurely, Oscar Ceruto freed himself from the mere reporting of events, in "Aluvión de Fuego"; and on the other hand Augusto Céspedes, also a Bolivian, has wrongly confined himself to the story. But there are beautifully achieved tales like "Repente" of Lara, the romances of Toro Ramallo, Baldovinos: a whole young forest of novels fiery, impassioned, and above all quick with sorrow and revolt. On both its Bolivian and Paraguayan slopes, the Chaco novel is revolutionary and of small comfort to the patrioteer. What stands out is the cruel sacrifice; the sense that the horrible battles of the jungle could have been avoided.

TOWN VERSUS COUNTRY

The Chilean novel presents the problem of the rival foci of town and country; and until the present, the rural work predominated. In this genre, Mariano Latorre, author of "Zurzulita," "Cuentos del Maule," "Chilenos del Mar," has been unique and left a school whose best disciple is Luis Durand. Other important names in the group are Fernando Santiván, Januario Espinosa, Marta Brunet, Pedro Prado (more poetic), Rafael Maluenda, author of the delightful "La Pachacha." But today, the novel of Chile follows another trend. The rural novel was clothed in an apparent gaiety, gave a note of country holiday not unrelated to the gaucho novels of Argentina which painted happy gauchos like "Don Segundo Sombra" or contrite, sophisticated gauchos like "Zogoibí" of Enrique Larreta. In sharp contrast is the crude, rending pathos of the novel of the Chilean city. It begins perhaps with Baldomero Lillo, although already in the classic works of Alberto Blest Gana the urban anxiety appears. The workers' suburb, poverty, the loom of the factory, were already present in "El Roto" of Joaquín Edwards Bello—a novel twenty-five years old and still timely. In this vein belong significant writers: Alberto Romero, Juan Modesto Castro; and, among the youngest novelists, Nicomedes Guzmán and Juan Godoy, whose "Angurrientos" is a story of both city and field, of both the outward and the inward man.

This brings us to the basic question: Is there inwardness to the Indo-American novel? or does it consist principally of anecdote, episode, detail? Alas! the second is closer to the truth. In addition to the fundamental reasons for this which I have suggested, this externality has circumstantial causes. The writer of our continent is hampered by many social taboos, by a poor economic status, by his frequent need of a bureaucratic job in order not to starve, by the lack of a broad public, by his ineptitude for truly intimate confession, by the congenital American extroversion. We have no autobiographical novels; except certain aspects of the work of Teresa de la Parra, Díaz Rodríguez, and one or more partially emancipated writers. Nor do we produce memoirs; or, if we do, the authors think more of the effect of their work than of the need of sincerity. Without these ingredients, the truly lyrical, truly profound personal novel cannot rise. A few modern writers strive to appear intimate, but they fail to hide their purpose, which is to equivocate and deform the deep impulse of self-confession. But if we lack the authentic novelized autobiography and the autobiographical novel, biography itself emerges, distinguished, since 1930. Here, the success of the Cubans, Jorge Mañach, Felix Lizaso, has been considerable as well as that of the Uruguayan Telmo Manacorda, the Argentine Galvez, and the Mexican Martín Luis Guzmán.

ANTHOLOGY OF THE IMPOSSIBLE

If, according to Thibaudet, the novel is "an anthology of the possible," the Indo-American novel has been, paradoxically, an anthology of the impossible. Not in the fantastic sense of Jules Verne, nor in the sense of free imagination as in the tales of Stevenson and Jack London; but because with excessive delight it has abused its literary instrument to give voice to the most unrealizable dreams, at times to the most bitter animosities, and only rarely to purposive aspirations. Reality remains on the margin, reduced to servant, vassal, slave, of the author turned prophet—a most regrettable phenomenon.

In all of which, despite many contradictions and within an analogous incipience and simultaneous old age, the Indo-American novel resembles the novel of the United States; through its chaos, its indiscipline, its shouts and outcries in lieu of voice; lacking both the articulation of the word and of truth. But now that Europe also throws out its heritage of measure and gives itself to an orgy of inarticulate ejaculations, civilization begins to make us all alike. Sinking into chaos, the march of us all may be broken. A fecund pause may come alike to the Americas, to Australia, to Europe, to Asia, even to Africa. This forced truce in the disoriented forward lunge of life may well prove fertile. It may help us to get hold of ourselves; and then to place the right foot forward in the paths of the universal novel.

(Translated by Waldo Frank)

In the Wind

THE STORY is told of a Nazi agent who was captured in a Dutch East Indian colony and offered his guard a thousand guilders to set him free. The guard refused. The Nazi offered double the sum, and the guard hesitated. Taking this as a sign of weakness, the prisoner asked if the captor's silence meant that he accepted. "All right, you can go," said the guard, "I get half a guilder for every Nazi I kill."

IN THE REAL ESTATE section of the New York Times for March 13 the following headline appeared: Boris Karloff Rents East 66th St. Suite: Other Tenants Go to East and West Side Houses.

AMERICANA: A shining delivery wagon visits new inhabitants of Quincy, Mass., to deliver a free pair of silk stockings, face powder, a car greasing, a pound of coffee, a case of ginger ale, a suit or dress cleaned free, an alarm clock, classified ads in local newspapers, and flowers. This dispensation of the Chamber of Commerce is known as the Welcome Wagon Service and is being copied by many of the new boom towns.

A LAW CASE that has been tabled for ten years will soon be pushed to a final conclusion. It concerns one Abraham Friedman, a medical student who ten years ago was expelled from Flower Hospital Medical College in New York. Mr. Friedman will claim that the reason for his expulsion was his refusal to take an examination on a Jewish holiday. His lawyers and backers feel that if the college can be forced to pay damages they may succeed in breaking the back of the notorious anti-Semitism in medical schools.

EDWIN S. FRIENDLY, business manager of the New York Sun, recently spoke before the Advertising Club and condemned the use of misleading superlatives in newspaper advertising. Mr. Friendly cited five common examples. His speech was reported in his own newspaper on a page that also contained the advertisement of a large department store. All of Mr. Friendly's horrible examples were to be found in that advertisement.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be easily authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

A Native at Large

BY JONATHAN DANIELS

Schooling for Defense

THERE are also the children of defense. As everybody very well knows, the movement of young men into the camps has pushed the American army beyond the number of a million men. More men— young, middle-aged, and old—have moved into jobs in the increasing industries of defense. Their women have moved with many of them, the admiral's wife and the lady of the mechanic doing her washing at the rear of the trailer. Now the federal commissioner of education reports that, with their elders, 250,000 children have also been moved. The army and navy have joined him in asking for $115,000,000 to help local school boards meet the problem.

No friend of these children of defense will object if the expenditure per child on the basis of the figures given amounts to $460 apiece. That sum is only to help local school boards, though it will include new school buildings. It is interesting, however, that the latest available figures show that in the United States the average annual expenditure per school child in daily attendance was $83.87. The highest figure reported was $147.65 in New York, the lowest $28.19 in Mississippi.

As money is being spent for defense, I am not objecting to a little lavishness in expenditures for the children. But the children who are the last line of defense are certainly not all congregated in defense centers. Even the schools they attend in the camps and the factory towns are not in general more crowded or more poorly equipped than are those which millions of other American children attend. Indeed, if the estimate of the children in defense centers is correct, they are a smaller number than the third of a million children of the migrants whom Dr. Will Alexander, former head of the Farm Security Administration, reported were living in transient camps, trailers, tents, and squalid tourist camps before the big movement of defense started in America. Some of them undoubtedly have moved with their papas to the eagerly sought jobs about the new camps and the new factories. There are still others moving to pick beans and pull up beets.

And not all the poor school conditions are in the places to which people move. Some are behind them in the places they left. In September, 1940, Fillmore County, Nebraska, reported: "Our problem is one of decreasing population. Our people are moving from the farms to Iowa, Illinois, and Oregon. Several of our rural schools have been closed because the attendance would only be one, two, or three." Indeed, the first fact in America so far as its children are concerned is that the most children are in the areas where the population pressure on resources is the greatest. These children make problems which are not merely rural. In Philadelphia last June officials discovered that six or seven thousand children from six Southern states had come to the Pennsylvania city without their parents to attend the schools.

Like housing for defense, schooling for defense is, as the heads of the army and navy agree, a matter in which the federal government must assume responsibility. Increasingly, however, it is hard to see how such responsibility can be restricted to a few crowded defense towns. This has always been an America in movement. Defense has merely emphasized national responsibility to the nation's children in the few places where it is most dramatic, most appealing.

Education, of course, is provided not merely to meet the needs of the future of the children and the nation, but also to serve parents' contentment now. The best workers presumably will hesitate to take their children into crowded centers with crowded schools. Army and navy men, who are ordered to localities, presumably have a right to ask the government to see to it that their children have decent schools. I have seen some of the packed schools in the defense towns now and I certainly would not say a word against making them better. But the children of defense are not merely in the defense towns. Before the selective draft was instituted, the highest ratios of enlistments came from Southern states where the families are the biggest and the schools least adequate—from the areas which are providing the population increase of the whole country.

All I say is that schooling for defense must in any realistic sense include the schooling of all. Of course, the government should help the overwhelmed school boards in the towns it has crowded. But no dramatic, comparatively lavish expenditure in a few communities will meet either the responsibility or the task. There are not only the schools defense has packed but the schools it has emptied. And there is the whole body of the children of an America where the biggest families get the worst schools and hundreds of thousands of America's defenders tomorrow get no schooling at all.

BOOKS and the ARTS

The Evil in Man

THE NATURE AND DESTINY OF MAN: A CHRISTIAN INTERPRETATION. I. HUMAN NATURE.

By Reinhold Niebuhr. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.75.

THE fact that man is parceled out by the play of forces in our modern societies creates an appeal to collective tyrannies. But precisely when man wishes to be "total," the state will never be totalitarian. The first necessity of our time, then, is to rediscover the total man and his definition. The undertaking is in some measure facilitated by the present crisis, for this crisis makes violently manifest, even to the most myopic eyes, certain terrifying potentialities of man, which other more stable epochs were able not to see, and thus hastened to deny or to repress.

All anthropology is therefore important today—and that which Mr. Niebuhr gives us is doubly so, for if one accepts his central thesis it furnishes the key to almost all the errors committed by modern isms; and if one does not accept it, it nevertheless forces the reconsideration of these isms in a hitherto neglected aspect: in their aspect of evil, essential, inevitable, secretly desired.

Mr. Niebuhr's point of departure is the Biblical conception of man: a being involved in finite nature but at the same time possessing the liberty to transcend himself ad infinitum, to understand himself from a point outside nature, outside his finite self, and, finally, outside the very consciousness of his selfhood. Hence "the essential homeliness of the spirit" in a finite world.

The first part of the book wages a battle on two fronts: on the one hand, against rationalistic systems, idealist or mystical, which lose sight of the concrete limitation of the individual; on the other hand, against the materialistic and naturalistic systems which lose sight of the liberty of man. The common denominator of all these contradictory systems reveals itself, finally, in their incapacity to comprehend the reality of evil except as an "error" related to a bad society, to a bad ethics, to a backward culture. But to ignore the essential reality of evil is to ignore the reality of man.

The only defect of this first section is inherent in the fact that it is concerned with a didactic exposition. Despite all the realism of the author, the systems appear sometimes as entities deduced one from another. This can impair the polemic value for their time of certain ideologies which were more often undergone than dialectically composed. But this reservation does not apply to the excellent analyses of Marxism and of romanticism which conclude the first section, nor to the second part of the book which is informed throughout by a penetration at once acute and moving.

Following Kierkegaard, Mr. Niebuhr sees the origin of sin in the essential liberty of man, in the "dizziness" and anxiety which overwhelm the individual in the measure that he discovers the contradictory possibilities opened to him by his capacity to transcend himself and by his natural limitation. "The temptation to sin lies in the human nature itself.

This situation is that man as spirit transcends the temporal and natural process in which he is involved, and also transcends himself." Thus his freedom is the basis not only of his creative but of his destructive power—of his temptation. For the essential temptation "resides in the inclination of man, either to deny the contingent character of his existence (in pride and self-love) or to escape from his freedom (in sensuality). . . . It is not his finiteness, dependence, and weakness but his anxiety about it which tempts the man to sin." Sin is the inevitable abuse which man makes of his essential liberty, an abuse which shortly leads to the loss of his liberty. Sin then is neither a moral accident nor an error which could be corrected by a better education. Whether man sins out of idealistic pride, out of weakness in alienating his selfhood in the mass, in race, in sex, or in mystical nihilism, man lies to himself and knows it without admitting it. Moreover, this fundamental dishonesty is the only proof of the existence in man of the "justicia originalis."

Marx and Freud had already made us aware of certain attitudes of ambivalence or half-conscious dishonesty in our social or personal conduct. They came nearer than the bourgeois rationalists to the Biblical vision of man. But Niebuhr goes further than they in their own direction and thus makes clear the insufficiency of their systems. His critique encompasses, moreover, far more than the non-Christian ideologies. It also brings a radical accusation against the idealism and the complacency of a Christianity become the accomplice of bourgeois values which are essentially superficial, if one may risk that conjunction of words. An anthropology such as that of Niebuhr can become a historic factor, "active" in this sense, that it unmasks the fundamental weakness of our modern world: its naivete in the presence of evil. Why are our democracies so easily disarmed, helpless, and as it were fascinated before evil incarnated in Hitler? Why do they persist so stubbornly in seeing in him only an accidental aberration—which has the practical effect of putting to sleep awareness of the menace? Because the democracies are first of all blind to the evil which is also within themselves, to the nature of sin inherent in "the human situation in itself." The most open-minded of our intellectuals still recoil before what seems to them the greater extravagance: the Biblical affirmation of sin. This prejudice is explained in good part by the fault of Christians themselves who have held and encouraged the belief, for two or three centuries, that evil was a moral category, or that it simply comprised all who were opposed to the bourgeois world and troubled its easy conscience.

I have come to believe that the "essential superficiality" of the bourgeois world arises from the simple fact that our democracies—above all the American democracy—does not believe in the devil. But why do they not believe? Because of anxiety. Evil is a fact, but it is also a scandal. All of our modern optimism and perfectionism is in reality only a desperate flight, and as such profoundly ambivalent, before this unacceptable fact. And how can man not take flight and not lie to himself if he no longer has a vision of transcendent salvation, of grace? Somnium narrare vigilantis est, wrote Seneca. By the same token, to confess the lie inherent in the sin would be the act of a man assured of pardon. Beyond this point I have no answer. But I believe the question to be correctly posed.

Dr. Niebuhr clarifies many confusions and introduces a preliminary and indispensable order. One may think, to be sure, that lectures, even Gifford Lectures, are not a very redoubtable weapon against the demoniac forces—but essentially human, I repeat—which are now unleashed. But if these lectures are read, they will contribute vitally to an unmasking of the reality of the demon among us. And the first trick of Satan, as André Gide so profoundly remarked, is to make us believe that he does not exist. DENIS DE ROUGEMONT

A Tribute to Milles

CARL MILLES: AN INTERPRETATION OF HIS WORK.

By Meyric R. Rogers. Yale University Press. $15.

MILLES is a sculptor of vigorous energies, high spirit, and remarkably fluent and graceful invention, an enthusiast with taste, and a folk craftsman of instinctive sophistication who possesses a genuine aptitude for bringing the eccentricity of the present imagination and the archaism of the studio out of their traditional confines into the public uses of the park, the garden, and the modern city. He is a designer of predominantly decorative and architectural inclinations, a stylist in the tradition of Bernini, Barye, and Carpeaux, who is saved by his mastery of scale and dramatic motives both from the refined pedantry that limited the work of Eric Gill and from the inflationary grossness that lamed the gifts of Bourdelle and Manship. His heroic sense has been redeemed from mere ceremonial grandiloquence by the realism of his humanitarian feeling and from rhetoric by a native talent for gnomic humor and the grotesque. He has never found his best expression in the purely monumental or serious subject. His ideal occasion is the fountain. He has taken the low tank or watering-trough of the market-place and the most sumptuous bowls and urns of formal gardens and built within their confines the most brilliantly mobile arrangements of figures and allegories, the most ingenious constructions of spouts, water-sheaves, and raining sprays, that have appeared since Bernini brought the Roman fountain-art to its height in the seventeenth century. His work in this line is as brilliant a correction of the stolid unaquatic masonry of Carpeaux and the French school as of the sentimental trivialities of English or American garden art. His mannerisms never approach insincerity, his allegory is curbed from Manship's violence by the charm of his modesty and realism, and once he had learned the lesson of Rodin's monumental style, he recognized his weakness in the epic and purely plastic orders of imagination early enough to draw away from that master and thus to save his own talent from the brutality of massive force that afflicted most of Rodin's disciples. He is a master of fancy, a national stylist of the first order, a superb decorative manipulator of bronze and wood, and one of the foremost craftsmen of our time.

All this is superbly illustrated in Mr. Rogers's volume, one of the most beautifully printed monographs on sculpture that have appeared in America. Its photographs lack the unity of style and brilliance of illumination that distinguished the recent Phaidon volumes on Michelangelo and Rodin, but they have been taken with sufficient care to exhibit the full range of Milles's inventions, technical methods, and the scope of his themes and motives.

They are far from showing all that Mr. Rogers claims for Milles's genius. He calls his commentary an "interpretation" but it might better have been called an homage or appreciation. It pays deserved honor to Milles's integrity, craftsmanship, and taste and to the personal courage of his career which has expressed itself in the variety and boldness of his public commissions, but it indulges so freely in an unqualified and officious order of homage that it misses a critical discrimination of Milles's talent and thus seriously misrepresents its special quality. Mr. Rogers writes in the language of a curator, and from curators we have come to expect little criticism. The remarks in his Foreword on "form" and "abstraction" may perhaps be taken as the axioms or prejudices on which the ensuing essay is based, but they are inert and mandatory beyond any usefulness. Mr. Rogers presents Milles as a master of "the paradox that is art," by which he means a revelation of "the essential simplicity of natural form so that we may be able to apprehend its infinite complexity." But this crude formulation only emphasizes what Milles falls short of and what Mr. Rogers has completely missed: the nature of genuine plastic authority and the special requirements of sculptural form. To compare Milles with a craftsman of his own type, sources, and purposes like Mestrovic is to see at once his shortcomings in vision and structural sensibility; to compare him with men of more intense humanistic or æsthetic capacities like Barlach, Meunier, Gaudier, Lehmbruch, or Rodin is to see how boldness of invention and ebullience of fancy can sap the strength of genuine plastic dynamism; to compare him with abstractionists like Brancusi is to set up a destructive antithesis of aims; to compare him, more reasonably, with the finest achievement of Maillol is to be abruptly reminded of what the central character of sculpture is and how far Milles has missed it.

His achievement is sufficiently secure without Mr. Rogers's extravagant claims and irrelevant arguments on original authority. The work of few modern sculptors can be more freely and pleasantly enjoyed, especially when Milles is working in his true medium and purposes. His Orpheus, Triton, Europa, Folkunga, Poseidon, and St. Louis fountains are among the most rigorous and graceful examples of public art in our time; his bowls, doors, and bas-reliefs are admirable examples of soundly applied structural decoration; the Rudbeckius, Swedenborg, Peace, and Swedish Tercentenary monuments sharply define his limitations; his isolated nudes and figures have difficulty in maintaining their formal independence; his recent "Nature and Man" figures in Radio City show, for all the beauty and intricacy of their woodwork, how badly mistaken his tendency to grotesque artifice can be. It is unfortunate that so honest and hearty a craftsman, so scrupulous a designer, and so genuine a revivalist of the best elements in the archaistic tradition should be made to suffer by the comparisons and references entailed by Mr. Rogers's extravagant claims in this sumptuous but critically uniformed monograph. MORTON DAUWEN ZABEL

HOLLOW MENMICHAEL GOLD

The Great Tradition. Can the literary renegades destroy it? A re-examination of our recent cultural history, by the author of "Jews Without Money."

128 pages, paper bound.

25c

WORKERS BOOKSHOP, 50 East 13 St., N. Y. C.

Spring Book NumberApril 12*On the Newsstands April 10

Advertisers are urged to make space reservations early to insure ample time for final O.K.s by April 8, the closing date for this issue.

Advertising DepartmentTHE Nation

A quarterly journal dedicated to the defense and extension of democracy

THE ANTIOCH REVIEW*SPRING NUMBER:

The Defense of Democracy—
Donald Kingsley

War Aims—Henry Alsberg

Intellectual Sources of French
Fascism—Herman Schnurer

Decline of the Investment Banker—
Paul M. Sweezy

Philosophy and Social Change—
George R. Geiger

Faulkner and the South—Warren Beck
The Professor as Radical—Paul Bixler

THE ANTIOCH REVIEW, Yellow Springs, Ohio
Enter my subscription for one year, beginning with the Spring issue.

Name

Address

☐ $2.00 herewith

☐ bill me

Countermine Against Hitler

HOW TO WIN THE WAR. By "An Englishman." Alfred A. Knopf. $1.25.

HITLER'S real secret weapon, the author of this book argues, is a political one—the disintegration of the social structure of his opponents. Analysis of his campaigns, beginning with that against Austria, certainly supports this view but there is all too little evidence that the controllers of British policy have made such an analysis and drawn the inevitable conclusions.

With a conviction that gains from the sobriety of his style, "An Englishman" shows how wishful thinking blinded the Foreign Office to the nature of the Hitler revolution from the beginning. Deluded by fears of Bolshevism, it treated Nazism as a rough but essentially conservative movement which could be placated and tamed by kind treatment. Even now, with appeasement dead and buried, the British government still hesitates to turn against Hitler his own methods of social disintegration.

Behind the German lines, even within the boundaries of the Reich itself, tens of millions of Hitler's victims provide explosive material for a democratic counter-revolution. This book sets out a program which could rally them to form a second, secret front against their Nazi oppressors. But to put this plan into action the British government must strengthen democracy at home by showing its willingness and ability to subordinate the rights of private property to national needs. And it must convince the people of Europe, whom it would attract to its side, that it is not merely aiming to restore the status quo but has a real alternative to Hitler's super-state.

In order to carry out a democratic counter-revolution, "An Englishman" suggests, three departments of the government must be entirely reconstructed—the Foreign Office, the Ministry of Information, and the Home Office. Writing obviously with inside knowledge, he explains how ill-equipped these departments are for the promotion of a dynamic policy. A particularly illuminating chapter is that on the Home Office which stupidly classified refugees as "enemy aliens" and thrust them into concentration camps. That mistake has now been partly remedied but Britain is still wasting exiled talent able to supply leadership for an anti-Nazi revolution.

Directed as it is at British policy, this book can also be of great value in this country, for all too many Americans still fail to appreciate the scope of Hitler's ambitions and the techniques he employs to fulfill them. I would criticize only its cursory and overoptimistic treatment of the Russian problem. If "sentimental hatred of Bolshevism" on the part of the right is a danger to realistic thinking, so is the sentimental affection of the left. "An Englishman" suggests that a modus vivendi with the Soviets may be found by confining the democratic revolution to the West and leaving Stalin to organize the East. Such a proposal can be based only on superficial knowledge of the Balkans. If we can trust such an authority as Stoyan Pribichevich, author of "World Without End," the land-loving, highly individualistic peasants of eastern Europe are hardly likely to be brought to revolt against Hitler's feudal policies by the equally abhorred alternative of collectivization.

KEITH HUTCHISON

DRAMA

A Pretty Problem

WHATEVER else one may or may not feel inclined to say about it, there is no doubt that the revival of "The Doctor's Dilemma" at the Shubert Theater provides a very agreeable evening of irresponsible wit and satiric farce-comedy. Of Katharine Cornell's performance as the incredible Mrs. Dubedat I shall say something presently; the others range all the way from the superb (Cecil Humphreys as Sir Ralph) through the highly satisfactory (Raymond Massey as Sir Cecil) to the merely acceptable; but thanks to smooth and skilful direction the whole is blended so perfectly that one is hardly aware of the unevenness and comes away with the conviction that the play has been made to yield pretty much all that it can.

"The Doctor's Dilemma" is, to be sure, not quite Shaw at his best. It was written in 1906 between "Major Barbara" and "Getting Married" and, unlike either of these two, is one of those plays in which the author makes no really serious attempt to expound systematically a major tenet of his creed. Instead, as in "Candida," "You Never Can Tell," and various others, he merely uses an artificial theatrical situation as an opportunity to take pot shots at this or that and occasionally simply to show off. The result is something which even thirty-five years later seems a great deal shrewder and funnier than ninety-nine out of a hundred plays. It is also something which forces even an old pro-Shavian like myself to admit how right the stuffiest of conventional critics were when they complained that however much intelligence there might be in the plays there was no human nature in the characters.

In the present instance, it will be remembered, the inventor of a new cure for tuberculosis who is able at the moment to take only one more patient, is faced with the problem of deciding whether he will choose to save a worthy nonentity or a brilliant but scoundrelly young artist. The dilemma itself is more ingenious as a problem in casuistry than credible as a situation, and Shaw, faced as he so often is with the impossibility of choosing between his Nietzschean self and his Puritan self, does not even solve the problem. Instead, he escapes the necessity of doing so by making the doctor sacrifice the genius, not because the doctor himself has decided the question on the terms in which it is stated, but because he is mildly in love with the artist's wife and wishes at least to spare her the knowledge of what a cad her husband is. Worse yet, however, is the fact that none of the principal characters is credible as a human being and that each is merely a counter to be moved in any manner which will serve to state the situation and work out a solution. The artist himself comes straight out of the paper-backs and exists only because his creator informs us that he will take as his first premise a genius who is also a sponger and a thief. The artist's wife, though sometimes cited along with Candida to prove that Shaw could draw womanly women, is equally non-existent as a person. Perhaps there is no reason not to believe that she would reappear as the merry and now remarried widow of the last act, but there is also no reason to believe that she would. Like her husband, she has no psychological processes, merely gestures made in response to the strings which the playwright pulls. The play, as a play, might just as well turn out one way as another. The logic of the arguments is clear, the logic of the persons non-existent.

As a debater Shaw is superb if often unscrupulous enough. In its way nothing could be better than the dialogue between the scientist and the old Scotch doctor concerning the main point at issue. When the latter demands to know which his friend would prefer, a world in which all the pictures were bad and all the men and women good or one in which the pictures were good and the human beings bad, one laughs with sheer delight at the skill of a debater who has managed to phrase the question with such expert unfairness. But when the characters begin to behave instead of talk, even when they begin to talk about emotions rather than ideas, one remembers the old legend of Shaw as a brain without a heart. It is said, I believe, that the bravura bit which involves the artist's dying profession of faith was written to prove William Archer wrong in his conviction that his one-time collaborator could not write a death scene. Actually, I think, it proves him right. Dubedat's purple passage about his devotion to art is pretty good rhetoric. It would deserve an "A" if produced in response to an old-fashioned examination question beginning "Write an imaginary dialogue in which a Renaissance painter discusses Faith with Savonarola." But it is a rhetorical exercise nevertheless. It is less sincere and therefore less moving than the driest of Shavian wit-ticisms.

This brings me logically to the only unfavorable criticism which I have to make of Miss Cornell's performance. She is charming as the merry widow of the last act and she succeeds beyond any reasonable expectation in her efforts to humanize the character she is playing, to give her some emotional reality. But I wonder if there is any use in making an effort to do anything of the sort. Jennifer Dubedat is at least as artificial as Congreve's Millimant. It may just possibly be a mistake to try to make her seem human. JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Coming Soon in The Nation

Ellen Glasgow's

"IN THIS OUR LIFE"

Reviewed by Louis Kronenberger

Denis de Rougemont's

"LOVE IN THE WESTERN WORLD"

Reviewed by W. H. Auden

First Place

FOR TONE QUALITY!

PHILHARMONIC
PHONOGRAPH-RADIO

This specialized instrument for those who want concert hall realism from records and radio has just been awarded FIRST PLACE for tone quality in The Record Book by David Hall. The PHILHARMONIC is used by leading record critics, radio engineers and discriminating music lovers everywhere. Plan to hear it!

THE STRATHMORE, automatic phonograph-radio, TWO speakers, ONE-OUNCE jewel-point pickup, $325. Other models $235 to $1000. Available with or without Frequency Modulation. Brochure request.

In New York, Exclusively at

PHILHARMONIC RADIO CO.
21 WEST 45th ST., N.Y. CH-4-0087

MUSIC

WHAT struck me first in Stiedry's performance of Bach's Passion According to St. John, and what delighted my ears—accustomed as they were to the sound of performances by the Schola Cantorum with eighty arrogantly indifferent, hastily rehearsed New York Philharmonic musicians—was the refinement and finish and balance of the combined singing of the small group from the Schola and playing of the excellent little New Friends of Music Orchestra. Later there was the superb effectiveness of the dramatic passages of the work: the narrative of the Evangelist and dialogue of Jesus and Pilate in recitative, the choral interjections and comments of the Jews. These gained primarily by the fact that Stiedry has spent most of his life conducting dramatic music in an opera house; the recitative gained further by the fine singing of William Hain, Mack Harrell, and Chester Watson, and by the use of the organ for accompaniment, which proved to be artistically advantageous as well as authentic. And whereas the Schola Cantorum's singing of the chorales in 1937 caused me to observe that "one will not expect it to sing as badly as Bach's congregation must have sung, but one will expect it to sing as simply," and to complain of "shading that I thought precious and out of place," under Stiedry's direction the chorus sang the chorales as simply as it did beautifully.

It was, in short, a performance that revealed the strength of the strong parts of the work. And it was one that, on the other hand, did not conceal the weaknesses of the weak parts. The work begins with one of those opening Bach choruses in which what would be impressive said only three times is wearisome when said the tenth time; and it was not the less wearisome for a pace that gave the music magnificent breadth but continued to do this for fifteen minutes—the pace, in other words, for a chorus one-third the length. And the arias were poorly sung for the most part by Herta Glaz, William Horne, and even Harriet Henders, whose voice has acquired tremolo and sharp edge in its upper register. The best singing here was that of John Gurney.

Beethoven's sonatas for piano and 'cello are not works for 'cello with piano accompaniment but dialogues for the two instruments; their proper effect is achieved only when they are played by a pianist and a 'cellist of equal artistic stature and with equal standing in the performances; and this effect was not achieved at the New Friends concerts at which one heard a powerful phrase that Feuermann had played on the 'cello with the force and authority of a solo artist played a moment later by Albert Hirsch with the meekness—however musically sensitive—of an accompanist. At an earlier concert it had been interesting to note that an artist who could phrase Schubert's "Wasserfluth" as Lehmann did could also come in a beat too soon after each piano interlude of the song. And at a later concert one heard Kipnis make superb things of Schubert's "Wanderer" and "Geheimes" and "Abschied"; then exhibit a lack of rhythmic sense that caused "Nacht und Träume" to fall to pieces and allowed excessive intensity to distort the shape of "Der Doppelgänger"; and end with a melodramatic "Erlkönig" that was sheer burlesque.

Among the March Columbia records that have arrived thus far is a set (X-187, $2.50) offering a fine performance of Mozart's "Eine kleine Nachtmusik" by Weingartner with the London Symphony, well recorded except for an excess of bass which can be eliminated only by a separate bass-control. I recall Bruno Walter's performance on Victor as excellent, but clouded by reverberant recording.

Then there is Mozart's String Quartet K. 465 (Set 439, $3.50)—one of the great six dedicated to Haydn. The performance by the new Kolisch Quartet is admirably sensitive, though to the point of being precious and mannered occasionally; and it is well recorded, with some of the surfaces of my copy a little noisy. But it hasn't the extraordinary tonal beauty and ensemble finesse of the Budapest Quartet's performance in the older Victor set, and is not as beautifully recorded.

Szigeti has recorded superb performances of Bloch's "Baal Shem," Three Pictures of Chassidic Life (Set X-188, $2.50), of which the first two, "Vidui" and "Nigun" (70743-D), are impressive examples of Bloch's writing. "Simchas Torah" (70744-D) I care less about; and the arrangements of Milhaud's "Sumare" and Falla's "Miller's Dance" on the reverse side less still. While I am speaking of Szigeti I might mention my disappointment over the characteristic discrepancy between promise and fulfillment in the WOR broadcasts: the orchestral accompaniments of Szigeti's playing have been ragged and otherwise poor; though complete concertos were promised the assigned half-hour period was sufficient for only the first movement of the Beethoven Concerto, and the other two were not played even the next Sunday; and there have been increasing amounts of the pretentious rubbish with which "Floyd Neale at the microphone" has disfigured WOR's broadcasts of serious music for years.

Barlow's performance of Dvorak's fine "Carneval" Overture with the Columbia Broadcasting Symphony (70739-D, $1) seems good; but if one gives the first side enough treble for fidelity and richness of orchestral sound one gets a horrible surface noise mixed with the sound; and from the middle of the second side, which doesn't have this defect, there is a drop in volume. The Adagio and Rondo from Stamitz's Violin Concerto in B flat (70747-D, $1), not very consequential music to my ears, are excellently played by Milstein and Balsam; but the first side is afflicted with a bad rattle. Suzanne Sten's tremolo spoils what her beautiful voice and fine musicianship accomplish with Mendelssohn's moderately enjoyable song "Suleika" (17264-D, $.75), and her singing of "Auf Flügeln des Gesanges" is somewhat explosive. Szymanowski's Twelve Etudes for piano Op. 33 and his Mazurkas Op. 50, well played by Jakob Gimpel (Set X-189, $2.50), mean nothing to me. Nor do I care much about Pinto's "Scenas Infantis" for piano, which Novaes plays well (17262-D, $.75).

B. H. HAGGIN

CONTRIBUTORS

HERBERT AGAR, editor of the Louisville Courier-Journal, won the Pulitzer Prize for American history in 1933. He has written several provocative volumes on problems of American democracy.

DENIS DE ROUGEMONT, distinguished French critic, is now in this country. He is the author of "Love in the Western World," a brilliant analysis of the source of contemporary attitudes toward love.

MORTON DAUWEN ZABEL, a frequent contributor of reviews on art and literature to The Nation, is the editor of "Literary Opinion in America."

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 55 Fifth Ave., New York. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $6; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 152

NEW YORK · SATURDAY · MARCH 22, 1941

NUMBER 12, PART 2

FOREWORD

NONE of our readers, we hope, will pick up this supplement with the thought that we have cast aside the pencil of the reporter for the crystal ball of the prophet. Had that been the case, we should have devoted these pages to a clear picture of the one world to come and not to the hazy outlines of two alternative worlds, all hedged about with if's and but's and blurred by qualifications such as no seer could indulge in and still keep his clientele. At the very least we would have been able to preserve a nice balance in presenting our alternatives: a Hitler world of just such a shade of darkness, a democratic world of so much light and so much shadow.

Unfortunately for editors, not even probabilities are made to fit such molds, and for that reason the second half of our issue is less prophecy than program. We know from their pronouncements and from what they have already done in the conquered countries of Europe what the Nazis would probably make of this world; but what Hitler's potential conquerors would make of it nobody knows, not even themselves. In part this uncertainty is a reflection of the position in which the British now find themselves. The war, with its vast destruction of wealth and profound social upheaval, has already cut them adrift from the worn moorings of an anarchic capitalism, just as the Cliveden set feared it would. Economics does not retreat, nor will it suffer a vacuum; out of the disintegration of the old pattern something new will emerge. The heterogeneous social forces engaged in the fight against Hitler make that something unpredictable. Opposition to a common enemy unites these elements now but that is all that unites them, and with the conclusion of the battle the cement will disappear. Then the kind of Europe, the kind of world, that will emerge will depend on the pattern into which the pieces fall, that is, the coalition of forces and their relative strengths after an exhausting war. This is hardly the sort of situation that invites prediction.

That a Nazi world will be black indeed while a Nazi-free world may be less black, may be gray, and then again may be white, is to be sure a very imperfect prophecy, and one which at first blush would scarcely seem worth so much emphasis. Its crucial point and saving grace, it seems to us, is that it does posit a world that may be white. We think the chance that such a world will emerge from a fascist defeat is good; others may disagree. But, no matter what the odds, surely a drowning civilization should grasp at whatever comes to hand without first arguing as to whether it is a lifeboat or merely a raft.

Normally it would be grotesque to give such stress to the obvious, but these are days when obviousness is condemned as conspiratorial cunning and myopia enjoys the status of a political principle. Senators who have seen photographs of Poland's best people hanging from street lamps, who know of the slaughter of innocents in the abattoirs of Bucharest, will ignore these Nazi horrors entirely and rant for days about England's failure to give India dominion status. Men who have seen Germany grind one nation after another into slavery while promising always to respect the integrity of its next victim are still fatuous enough to believe that Hitler has no designs on the Americas simply because he says so.

